
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<http://books.google.com>

ANDS
AH 51DM P

Harvard Depository
Brittle Book

ANDOVER-HARVARD THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY
 MDCCCCX
 CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

The Prayer Book Dictionary

The Prayer Book Dictionary

EDITORS

GEORGE HARFORD, M.A. MORLEY STEVENSON, M.A.

VICAR OF MOSSLEY HILL,
HON. CANON OF LIVERPOOL

PRINCIPAL OF WARRINGTON TRAINING COLLEGE,
HON. CANON OF LIVERPOOL

ASSISTANT EDITOR

J. W. TYRER, M.A.

FORMERLY VICAR OF ST. LUKE THE EVANGELIST, WALTON

PREFACE BY THE

LORD BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL

NEW YORK
LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.
FOURTH AVENUE AND 30TH STREET

1912

c

ANDOVER HARVARD THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY
NOV 16 1912
ANDOVER
THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

Q 63,713

764.64

Prayer

DEDICATED BY PERMISSION TO THE MOST REVEREND RANDALL THOMAS DAVIDSON
ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY

PREFACE

THIS Prayer Book Dictionary is an attempt to provide for the Book of Common Prayer a volume as full of information and of illumination as are the excellent Dictionaries of the Bible now at the disposal of students of Holy Scripture.

Recent historical research and the revival of liturgical study have produced a wealth of fresh knowledge on almost all subjects connected with the Prayer Book, which it is in every way most expedient should be made current coin, and brought within the reach of the clergy and laity, who have little leisure for the independent examination of original authorities. The proposed revision of the Prayer Book has awakened a widening and deepening interest in its history and contents, and has increased the necessity for some accurate and trustworthy Book to which reference can be made on all matters which are under discussion. If this volume helps Church-people to set a higher value on their great Book of Devotion (one of the most precious results of the English Reformation), to understand it better, and at the same time to realise where it needs enrichment and adaptation to modern needs, it will fulfil in part at least its mission.

The Editors and Writers claim for the contents neither infallibility nor finality, but they have steadily kept in view a threefold aim and have laboured unremittingly to attain to it.

1. Comprehensiveness of range. They have striven to cover the whole ground of the history and contents of the Prayer Book, so that those who consult this Dictionary may find some measure of light thrown on any subject upon which they may need guidance or help.

2. Fairness in controversial questions. Complete freedom of expression has been accorded to each writer. While none have concealed their own opinions on controverted points, they have endeavoured to state clearly and fairly the facts and arguments on both sides of the question.

3. Fulness and accuracy of data. No pains have been spared to collect all the information that was available on the subjects treated up to the moment of publication, and to present it in a clear and readable and trustworthy form.

The Editors have been singularly fortunate in securing the assistance of a large and representative list of Contributors, many of whom are recognised authorities in their own line of learning, while not a few of our younger scholars have here given to the world for the first time the results of their reading and research.

My sole excuse for accepting the invitation of the Editors to write this brief Preface is to be found in the fact that no fewer than twenty-three of the contributors are clergymen or laymen in the Diocese of Liverpool. It is a matter for great thankfulness that, in the midst of their incessant and exacting work, so many Churchmen in South-west Lancashire should have found time not only for honest and persevering study, but also for giving to the public in such an excellent form the fruits of years of careful reading and of long thought. At a time when the English Church is not always credited with a superabundance of learning, and when the clergy especially are supposed to prefer the absorbing claims of parish work to the no less important but less exciting and prominent duties of the study, it is reassuring to find that there are still so many real students (of whom the writers in this Dictionary are but representatives) who are as ready to serve the Church with their pen, as they are to devote themselves to the work of the pulpit and to pastoral visitation.

That the blessing of God may rest upon this book, and that it may tend to confirm the faith and the loyalty of many, to remove ignorance and prejudice, and to commend the truth, is the prayer with which it is sent out into the world by the Editors and their helpers.

F. J. LIVERPOOL.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE BY THE BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL	VII
INTRODUCTION BY CANON HARFORD	XI
LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS	XV
ABBREVIATIONS	XIX
ADDENDA	XX
DICTIONARY (ABLUTION TO YEAR)	1-826
APPENDIX—CONTENTS IN PRAYER BOOK ORDER	827-832

INTRODUCTION

1. SCOPE

THE Prayer Book Dictionary deals with the origins, history, use and teaching of the several authorised editions of the Book of Common Prayer within the Anglican Communion, including the Thirty-nine Articles and the Table of Kindred and Affinity. Its scope embraces all accompanying ceremonies and supplementary rites, the ornaments of the Church and of all ministers, Church structures and fittings in their relation to worship, ecclesiastical persons and bodies, and the legislative judicial or administrative authorities now or heretofore empowered or exercising powers in regard to the above.

2. GENESIS

The idea of such a Dictionary was brought before the Liverpool Diocesan Council of Sacred Study in June, 1908, by Canon Harford as Diocesan Warden of C.S.S.S., at the suggestion of Canon Stevenson, who is Chairman of the Council and Diocesan Representative of the C.S.S.S. At the instance of this body the proposal was next introduced at the appropriate session of the Pan-Anglican Congress with the cordial consent of the late Bishop Collins as Chairman of the section. The encouragement then and later received induced the Editors to lay the scheme in full outline before the Publishers. From them, and in particular from Mr. Arthur Reynolds, Literary Director of the firm, they have received every facility and consideration. They were also fortunate enough to secure as Assistant Editor one who is an unusually well-read patristic scholar, and an original member of the Henry Bradshaw Society, the Rev. J. W. Tyrer. The general scheme was, moreover, reviewed in some detail by an advisory committee in Liverpool, consisting of the following :—the late Canon Keating, D.D., formerly Sub-Dean of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, author of The Agapè and the Eucharist ; the Rev. F. S. Guy Warman, D.D., Principal of St. Aidan's College ; Canon Grensted, M.A., Diocesan Inspector of Schools ; the Rev. J. T.

Mitchell, B.D., Hon. Secretary of the Board of Biblical Studies ; and Canon Howson, Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Liverpool. Other friends in the south have assisted in a more or less formal way, by advising upon the details of the scheme, or by suggesting names of contributors. Among many others special mention may be made of the Rev. T. A. Lacey, the Rev. Wm. C. Piercy, Dean Beeching, Prebendary Reynolds, and Canon Pearce. Further, the Bishop of Liverpool readily consented to write the Preface, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, who at an early stage had expressed his sympathy with the enterprise, in accepting the dedication of the book wrote thus :—

“That a work of this kind can ever be so constructed as to satisfy everybody is not to be expected, but I have not any doubt that it will serve a high and useful purpose, and I am very glad that my name should be connected with it.”

3. PROCEDURE

The suggestion of the idea came, as is stated above, from Canon Stevenson. The detailed plan of the Dictionary, as set forth in this Introduction, with the classification of its contents, was drawn up by the present writer ; and the first lists of some twelve hundred titles of articles, and of about a hundred names of possible contributors, came from the same hand. Advice has been freely sought at every stage, and most generously given ; but the Joint Editors, in consultation with the Assistant Editor, are alone responsible for plan, policy, and particular details of execution. In the case of articles on controversial topics the contributors have been left complete freedom of treatment. The aim, however, has been to present an objective and historical view of all the data involved. The writers have not concealed their own convictions, but they have sought fairly to exhibit the grounds upon which others have been led to different conclusions ; and the Editors have, wherever it appeared desirable, inserted notes on facts or arguments which seemed to need inclusion in order to secure a well-balanced treatment of the case.

4. SCALE

In the general interests of readers the scope of the Dictionary has been deliberately made very wide. In order therefore that this should not defeat the main object of the Editors, that of treating with adequate fulness all matters directly arising out of the Prayer Book, severe compression has been necessary in the case of those topics which are less strictly relevant. In regard to these it may be said that a select ecclesiastical glossary has been incorporated with the longer articles on the specific Prayer Book subjects.

5. TEXTS AND SOURCES

In a few important instances, as in the case of the Collects and the XXXIX Articles, the Latin text has been given, as well as the English text with variorum notes. In other cases, as in the Canon of the Liturgy, it has been thought sufficient to supply the original text. Frequently, however, it has only been possible to present an analysis of older sources. By the kindness of the Publishers in permitting an increase in the size of the work, it has been possible to include (under RITUAL, §§ 14–53) a Variorum Synopsis of the successive Prayer Books, together with the full text of the Rubrics and other directive contents, which will, it is hoped, be found serviceable for comparison, though necessarily compressed.

6. CEREMONIES AND ORNAMENTS

The articles grouped under this head in the Appendix, R, fall into two classes, according as they relate to ceremonial, or to craftsmanship and design. In regard to the former, the aim has been to compile a concise Directorium Anglicanum, not laying down any law of impracticable uniformity, but describing alternative reverent ways of doing necessary things, elaborations which cannot claim authority or obvious relevance being omitted. Partly, such guidance is offered in separate articles, partly in the supplementary notes under RITUAL, iv.

7. DOCTRINE AND ETHICS

Certain of the articles under these heads demanded somewhat full treatment, from their special connection with the Prayer Book. Instances will be found under Baptism, Church, Lord's Supper, Orders, Repentance. A few subjects, fundamentally underlying the Prayer Book, but more general in character than those last named, have also been handled at some length, such as Authority, Man, Order, Religion. Other topics are more succinctly handled, and with stricter limitation to the Prayer Book treatment of them. Under Ethics the pastoral work of the Church has been included. This group of articles describes and discusses the best methods actually in effective use for carrying out the Prayer Book system in parishes of various kinds. In regard to specifically ethical subjects, a double aim has been kept in view, (1) to bring out the essentially practical nature of religion, as the peculiar genius of the Church of England conceives it, and (2) to reflect the tendency of our Church to throw responsibility on the mind and conscience of the individual or the community, and its guarded resort to the mere dictation of authority.

8. ARRANGEMENT

Every endeavour has been made to give information under the titles most likely to be referred to, Prayer Book terms being, however, uniformly preferred. Where it has been necessary to collect material in longer articles, cross-references direct the reader to the subsidiary topics included. A comprehensive Table of Contents in Prayer Book order serves, moreover, as a Subject Index, and at the end of each article reference is made to the section of this Appendix where kindred topics are mentioned. Thus the full resources of the Dictionary under any head can be readily unlocked.

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

- Addis, Rev. W. E., M.A., Vicar of All Saints', Knightsbridge.
Rome (Church of), Trent (Council of).
- Aitken, Rev. W. H. M. H., M.A., Canon of Norwich.
Mission (A Parochial).
- Allen, H. P., Mus. Doc., Organist of New College, Oxford.
Organ.
- Arden, T. H., Deputy-Registrar for the Diocese of Liverpool.
Banns, Licence, Patron.
- Armour, Rev. S. C., D.D., Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Social Life.
- Ball, Very Rev. Thomas I., LL.D., Provost of Cumbrae.
Altar, Colours, Elements, Fraction, Manual Acts.
- Barber, Ven. E., M.A., Archdeacon of Chester.
Induction, Institution.
- Bardsley, Rev. H. J., M.A., Vicar of Barton, Preston.
Courts, Established Church, Parliament (Authority of).
- Batterbury, Rev. H. C., B.A., Assistant Diocesan Inspector for London.
Harvest Festival.
- Battersby Harford, Rev. J., M.A., Canon of Ripon, Principal of Ripon Clergy College.
Articles of Religion, Baptism, Covenant, Deacon, Sacraments.
- Baylay, Rev. A. M. Y., M.A., Vicar of Thurgarton, Notts.
Breviary, Chancel, House of Prayer.
- Bell, Rev. M. F., M.A., Vicar of St. Mark's, Regent's Park.
Antiphonal Singing, Hymn, Hymn Tune.
- Bernard, Rt. Rev. J. H., D.D., Bishop of Ossory.
Fasting Communion, Resurrection, Virgin Birth.
- Berry, Rev. T. S., D.D., Prebendary of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin.
Ireland (Church of), Ireland (PB History in).
- Bishop, Rev. W. C., M.A., Rector of Orsett.
Ante Communion Service, Epistle, Gospel, Lectionary, Lights, Proper Lessons, Proper Psalms, Psalter (Liturgical Use of).
- Bridger, Rev. (the late) J., Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Commemoratory Letters.
- Bridges, Robert, M.A., M.B., Chilswell, Oxford.
Chant (Anglican), Chanting.
- Bullock-Webster, Rev. G. R., M.A., Hon. Canon of Ely, Rector of St. Michael's, Paternoster Royal.
Expenses (Church), Finance (Church), Intercession.
- Burgess, Francis.
Music (Liturgical), Plainsong.
- Burn, Rev. A. E., D.D., Prebendary of Lichfield, Vicar of Halifax.
Creed, Quicunque Vult.
- Carlyle, Rev. A. J., M.A., D.Litt., Rector of St. Martin and All Saints, Oxford.
Orders (Holy).
- Carter, Rev. C. Sydney, M.A.
Calvinist, Dissenters, Nonconformist, Puritans.
- Carter, Rev. G. Foster, M.A., Rector of St. Aldate's, Oxford.
Augsburg Confession, Foreign Influences on Prayer Book, Prophecysings.
- Catlin, Rev. G. E.
Independents.
- Cecil, Lord Hugh, LL.D., M.P.
Franchise.
- Chapman, Rev. E. W., M.A., Hon. Canon of Carlisle.
Visitation of the Sick, Visitation (Pastoral).
- Coop, Rev. J. O., M.A., Vicar of St. Catharine's, Liverpool.
Bowing, Chasuble, Cope, Hood.
- Creighton, Deaconess Beatrice.
Deaconess.
- Darby, F. M., Mus. Bac.
Motet.
- Darbyshire, Rev. J. R., M.A., Vice-Principal of Leeds Clergy School.
Asceticism.
- Day, Rev. E. Hermitage, D.D.
Chalice, Emblem, Fresco, Paten.
- Dennis, Rev. H. Wesley, M.A., Hon. Canon of Southwark, Principal of St. John's College, Battersea.
Saints' Days (Rationale of Services for).
- Ditchfield, Rev. P. H., M.A., Rector of Barkham, Berks.
Monuments, Painting, Sculpture.
- Dowdall, H. Chaloner, M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law.
Acts of Uniformity.
- Dowden, Right Rev. J., Lord Bishop of Edinburgh (the late).
Foreign Influences affecting Prayer Book, Quignon's Breviary, Te Deum.
- Driver, Rev. S. R., D.D., Canon of Christ Church, Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford.
Penitential Psalms, Psalter.
- Drury, Rt. Rev. T. W., D.D., Lord Bishop of Ripon.
Dead (Prayers for the), Elevation, Lord's Prayer.
- Du Bose, Rev. W. P., M.A., S.T.D., Professor of Exegesis in the University of the South, U.S.A.
Christ, Incarnation, Jesus.

- Eeles, F. C.
Candlesticks, Communion (Manner of), Lord's Table.
- Eves, Rev. R. S., B.A., St. Anselm's House, Cambridge.
Canon Law.
- Fausset, Rev. W. Y., M.A., Prebendary of Wells, Vicar of Cheddar.
God, Grace, Trinity.
- Feltoe, Rev. C. L., D.D., Rector of Ripple, Kent.
Collects.
- Firth, Rev. E. H., M.A., Rector of Houghton, Hants.
Diocese.
- Fisher, Rev. J., B.D., Rector of Cefn, St.
Asaph.
Welsh Version of the PB.
- Fowell, R. W., Office of the Ecclesiastical Commission.
Ecclesiastical Commission, Orders in Council.
- Freshfield, Edwin H., F.S.A.
Flagon, Plate.
- Fuller-Maitland, J. A., M.A., F.S.A.
Canon (music), Carols.
- Galpin, Rev. F. W., M.A., Vicar of Hatfield Regis, Essex.
Bands (Church).
- Gamon, Hugh R. P., Barrister-at-Law.
Burial, Cemetery, Property (Church).
- Gayford, Rev. S. C., M.A., Vice-Principal of Bishop's College, Cheshunt.
Death, Examination, Invocation of Saints, Purgatory.
- Gee, Rev. H., D.D., Master of University College, Durham.
History of the Prayer Book.
- Gore, Rev. A., D.D., Canon of Chester.
Pension.
- Grensted, Rev. F. F., M.A., Hon. Canon of Liverpool, Diocesan Inspector for Liverpool.
Calendar, North Side of Table, Punctuation of PB.
- Harford, Rev. D., M.A., Vicar of Emmanuel, West Hampstead.
Mysticism.
- Harford, Rev. G., M.A., Vicar of Mossley Hill,
Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Authority, Body, Canons (Sources of), Catechism (Revision of), Christian Religion, Doctrine, History, Knowledge, Man, Order, Ornaments Rubric, Religion, Revision of Prayer Book, Ritual, Ritual Law, Scripture, Truth, Unction.
- Harford, Rev. J. Battersby. See Battersby Harford.
- Hart, Rev. S., D.D., Principal of Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Connecticut.
American PB.
- Headlam, Rev. Arthur C., D.D., Principal of King's College, London.
Apostolic Succession, Episcopacy.
- Heap, J. S., M.A., Bath.
Anthems.
- Hobhouse, Rev. W., M.A., Hon. Canon of Birmingham, Professor of Theology, Queen's College, Birmingham.
Church, Heresy, Reunion, Schism, World.
- Hobson, Rev. E., M.A., Prebendary of St. Paul's, Principal of St. Katharine's College, Tottenham.
Ablution, Preparation (for Baptism, etc.).
- Holmes, Rev. T. Scott, D.D., Canon and Chancellor of Wells.
Cathedral, Chapel, Rubrics.
- Horan, Rev. F. S., M.A., Vicar of St. Paul's, Prince's Park, Liverpool.
Sea (Forms of Prayer).
- Howson, Rev. G. J., M.A., Vicar of St. Andrew's, Southport, Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Aisle, War.
- Jackson, Rev. Percival, M.A., Prebendary of Exeter, Vicar of King's Teignton.
Common Prayer, Daily Prayer (Obligation of), Shortened Services Act.
- James, Montague Rhodes, M.A., Provost of King's College, Cambridge.
Glass.
- Johnston, Rev. J. S. Spence, B.A., Domestic Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury.
Apostles' Creed, Nicene Creed.
- Joyce, Rev. Gilbert, D.D., Cursal Canon of St.
Asaph, Warden of St. Deiniol's Library, Hawarden.
Casultry.
- Keating, Rev. (the late) J. Fitz-Stephen, D.D., sometime sub-dean of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh.
Gloria in Excelsis, Kyrie, Post-Communion Prayers, Preface.
- Kempthorne, Rt. Rev. John A., D.D., Lord
Bishop of Hull.
Conscience, Conversion, Curate, Duty, Parish, Repentance.
- Lacey, Rev. T. A., M.A., Chaplain to the London Diocesan Penitentiary.
Archbishop, Hierarchy, Patriarch.
- Lambert, Rev. Edgar, M.A., Vicar of Wye, Kent, formerly Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Seamen.
- Langhorne, Rev. R. W. B., B.A., Deputy Priest-Vicar of Exeter Cathedral.
- Lea, Sir T. Sydney, Bart., M.A.
Lalty, Old Catholics.
- Lias, Ven. J. J., M.A., Chancellor of Llandaff.
Non-communicating Attendance.
- Maclean, Rt. Rev. A. J., D.D., Bishop of Moray and Ross.
Fast (Turning to), Eastern Churches, Fast, Festival, Week
(The Christian).
- Macleane, Rev. Douglas, M.A., Rector of Cod-ford St. Peter.
Coronation, Tithe.
- Macnamara, Rev. H. D., M.A., Priest-in-Ordinary to the King, Rector of St. James', Garlickhithe.
Banners, Images, Incense, Relics.
- Marriott, Rev. H., M.A., Vice-Principal of Bishop's Hostel, Liverpool.
Catechumen, Lay Baptism.
- Massey, Rev. E. R., M.A., Rector of Marsh Gibbon.
Rural Dean.

- Millard, Rev. F. L. H., M.A., Vicar of St. Aidan's, Carlisle.
Epiphany (Rationale of Services), Suicide.
- Miller, Rev. P. A., M.A., Vicar of Prenton, Birkenhead.
Eastward Position, Forms of Prayer.
- Mitchell, Rt. Rev. A., B.D., Lord Bishop of Aberdeen.
Scottish Church, Scotland (PB History in).
- Mitchell, Rev. J. T., M.A. (Oxon.), B.D. (Dublin), Rector of Wavertree, Liverpool.
Learning, Study.
- Montgomery, Rt. Rev. Bishop H. H., D.D., Secretary of the S.P.G.
Foreign Missions.
- Morison, Rev. E. F., M.A., Sub-Warden of St. Deiniol's Library, Hawarden.
Apocrypha, Canonical Books, Priesthood, Sacrifice.
- Moule, Rt. Rev. H. C. G., D.D., Lord Bishop of Durham.
Exhortations, Hope, Means of Grace, Regeneration.
- Moulton, Rev. W. Fiddian, M.A., Sheffield.
Methodist.
- Nicholson, Sir Charles A., Fellow of R.I.B.A.
Architecture, Font, Nave.
- Ottley, Rev. H. Bickersteth, M.A., Hon. Canon of Canterbury.
Sunday.
- Owen, Rev. G. Vale, Vicar of Orford.
Fittings.
- Papillon, Rev. T. L., M.A., Hon. Canon of St. Albans.
Bells, Belfry.
- Pass, H. L., M.A., St. Anselm's House, Cambridge.
Anglican Orders, Ordinal, Re-ordination.
- Powell, Rev. James Baden, M.A., sometime Precentor of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge.
Choir, Precentor.
- Rawnsley, Rev. H. D., M.A., Vicar of Crowthwaite, Canon of Carlisle.
Arts and Crafts.
- Redman, Rev. S., M.A., Vicar of Holy Trinity, Walton Breck.
Book-rest, Faldstool, Pall.
- Reynolds, Rev. Bernard, M.A., Prebendary of St. Paul's, Diocesan Inspector for London, Rector of St. Mary, Aldermanbury.
Alms, Litany.
- Robertson, Rt. Rev. A., D.D., Lord Bishop of Exeter.
Injunctions (Royal), Præmunire, Supremacy (Royal), Traditions of the Church.
- Rogers, Rev. C. F., M.A., Lecturer in Pastoral Theology, King's College, London.
Congregation, Godparents, Minor Orders, Poor (Care of).
- Romanes, Mrs.
Children (Training of), Marriage.
- Sampson, Rev. G. E., Community of the Resurrection, Mirfield.
Instructions.
- Sanders, Rev. H. M., M.A., Vicar of St. John's, Highbury.
Trinity Season (Rationale of Services for).
- Scott, Rev. H. E., M.A., B.D., Vicar of St. Mary's, Carlisle.
Burial Service, Marriage Service, Meditation, Praise, Prayer, Sick (Order for the Visitation of).
- Sherlock, F.
Easter Offerings.
- Simpson, Rev. J. G., D.D., Canon of St. Paul's.
Lord's Supper.
- Simpson, Rev. W. J. Sparrow, M.A., B.D., Chaplain of the Hospital of St. Mary, Ilford.
Angels, Resurrection of Christ, Scottish Communion Office.
- Smith, Rev. H. Gibson, M.A., Vicar of Allerton, Hon. Canon of Liverpool.
Cemetery Chapel, Churchyard.
- Smith, Rt. Rev. Lucius F. M. B., D.D., Lord Bishop of Knaresborough.
Bidding Prayer, Homilies, Preacher.
- Smith, Rev. M. Linton, M.A., Vicar of Blundellsands.
Benedicite, Benedictus, Evening Communion, Magnificat.
- Smith, P. Vernon, LL.D., Chancellor of the Diocese of Manchester.
Churchwarden, Faculty.
- Staley, Rev. Vernon, sometime Provost of Inverness Cathedral; Rector of Ickford, Thame.
Black-Letter Days, Cross, Habit of Clergy (Outdoor), Ornaments of Minister, Position and Posture of Minister and People, Procession, Surplice.
- Stevenson, Rev. Morley, M.A., Hon. Canon of Liverpool, Principal of Warrington Training College.
Catechising, Catechism, Reading, Schools, Sunday School.
- Stock, Eugene, D.C.L.
Anglican Communion.
- Stocks, Ven. J. E., D.D., Archdeacon of Leicester.
Convocation.
- Swallow, Rev. J. E., M.A., Chaplain of the House of Mercy, Horbury.
Chaplain, Clerk, Consecration of Churches and Churchyards, Dispensation.
- Swete, Rev. H. B., D.D., Litt.D., F.B.A., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge.
Fathers.
- Thompson, T., M.A., St. Anselm's House, Cambridge.
Bibliography of the Prayer Book, Laying on of Hands, Prayer Books (Various).
- Tisdall, Rev. W. St. Clair, D.D., Lecturer at C.M.S. College, Islington.
Versions of the PB (Older), Versions of the PB (Modern).
- Tyrer, Rev. J. W., M.A., sometime Vicar of St. Luke the Evangelist, Walton.
Baptismal Offices, Benediction, Bible in the PB, Doxology, Eucharistic Consecration, Mixed Chalice.
- Vernham, J. E., Professor of Music, King's College, London.
Singing.
- Wace, Very Rev. H., D.D., Dean of Canterbury.
Primitive Church.
- Wakeford, Rev. J., B.D., Prebendary of Lincoln, Vicar of St. Margaret's, Anfield, Liverpool.
Holy Week (Rationale of Services for), Eastertide (do.), Ascensiontide (do.), Whitsuntide (do.), Preaching.

Walters, H. Barron, M.R.I.B.A.
Church (Building of).

Warman, Rev. F. S. Guy, D.D., Principal of St. Aidan's College, Birkenhead.
Sign of the Cross, Temperance.

Warren, Rev. F. E., B.D., Hon. Canon of Ely, Rector of Bardwell.
Canon of the Liturgy, Communion (Holy).

Watkins, Rev. O. D., M.A., Vicar of Holywell, Oxford.
Divorce, Marriage (Christian), Prohibited Degrees.

Welch, Rev. E. A., D.C.L., LL.D., Hon. Canon and Vicar of Wakefield.
Diocesan Bishop.

Wesley, Rev. E.A., M.A., Rural Dean of South Liverpool.
Discipline, England (Church of), Free-Will, Morality, School-men, Vulgate.

Whitham, Rev. A. R., M.A., Principal of Culham College, Oxford.
Fasting, Original Sin, Sin.

Whitley, Rev. W. T., LL.D., Preston.
Baptist.

Whitwell, R. Jowitt, M.A.
Canons of 1604, Clergy Discipline Act, Consistory Court, Excommunication.

Wickham, Rev. W. A., Vicar of St. Andrew's, Wigan.
Archives, Books (Care of), Parsonage, Pew, Pulpit, Reredos.

Wilsden, Rev. J. S., M.A., Rector of Plumpton, Towcester, Hon. Canon of Newcastle.
Dilapidations, Insurance.

Winstanley, Rev. E. W., M.A., B.D., Diocesan Inspector of Schools, Lichfield.
Confirmation, Eternal Life, Holy Ghost, Judgment.

Wood, Rev. E. G., M.A., B.D., Vicar of St.
Clement's, Cambridge.
Archdeacon, Benefice, Incumbent, Ordinary, Priest.

Wordsworth, Rev. Christopher, M.A., Prebendary and Sub-dean of Salisbury Cathedral.
Books (Liturgical), Pie, Pontifical, Reservation, Use.

Worley, G.
Council, Notices in Church.

List of Abbreviations and Typographical Devices

THE list is not exhaustive. The more usual abbreviations are assumed to be familiar.

Books of the Bible are often cited as commonly contracted in reference Bibles.

Two sizes of Arabic numerals are used, without separating point, for chapter and verse, or for volume and page: e.g., Rom. 12 6-10 (in a few cases, e.g., Basil On the Holy Ghost, and the Canons of Hippolytus, the two sizes of numerals refer to the sections into which the work is divided according to two different systems).

The Psalms are usually cited from the Prayer Book version.

Cross-references are indicated by printing the title of the article referred to in small capitals.

The title words are represented by initial capitals in the body of each article.

Reference marks (e.g., H3*) point to the Appendix, Contents in PB order (or, in refs. to rubrics, etc., to the corresponding sections under RITUAL, iv. Variorum Synopsis).

A. = Answer
 Absol. = Absolution
 Access. = Accession Service
 Adv. = Advent
 aft. = after Amer. = American
 Ang. = Anglican
 Ap. = Apostle
 art. = article (in Dictionary)
 Art. = Article (one of the 39 Articles)
 Asc. = Ascension
 AV, AVm = Authorised Version,—margin
 bapt. = baptism,—al
 Bapt.^{1,2,3} = Baptismal Offices, (1) Public, (2) Private, (3) Adult.
 BCP = Book of Common Prayer
 bef. = before
 Bp. = Bishop
 Brev. = Breviary
 Bur. = Burial Service
 c. = chapter
 c. = circa cant. = canticle
 Cat. = Catechism
 CAT = Church Association
 CCR = Church Congress Report cent. = century
 Ch. = Church (the society)
 ch. = church (the building)
 Coll. = Collect
 Comm. = Commandment
 Comm. = Communion Service
 Conf. = Confession Confirm. = Confirmation
 Consecr. = Consecration
 Conv. Ca., Yk. = Convocation of Canterbury or York cp. = compare
 CQR = Church Quarterly Review
 ct. = contrast
 DA = Documentary Annals
 DAC = Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Chrétienne
 DB = Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible—5 vols.

DB ('09) = Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible—1 vol. edition
 DCA = Dictionary of Christian Antiquities
 DCB = — Biography
 DCG = Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels eccles. = ecclesiastical ed. = edited by, editor, edition
 Eng. = England, English
 EP = Evening Prayer
 EP = Ecclesiastical Polity
 Ep. = Epistle
 Epiph. = Epiphany
 esp. = especially Euch. = Eucharist,—ic
 exh. = exhortation
 f. (or ff.) = following verse(s) or paragraph(s)
 G. = Guardian
 Gel. = Gelasian Sacramentary
 gen. = general,—ly
 Greg. = Gregorian Sacramentary
 HBS = Henry Bradshaw Society
 HC = Holy Communion
 HE = Ecclesiastical History
 Hom. = Homily
 ib. = the same
 Injn. = Injunction
 JTS = Journal of Theological Studies
 Lit. = Litany
 lit. = literal,—ly
 Lit. Ref. = Some Principles of Liturgical Reform
 LXX = Septuagint
 Mar., Matr. = Marriage Service
 MEP = Morning and Evening Prayer
 min. = minister
 MP = Morning Prayer
 n. (or n.) = note
 NED = New English Dictionary
 NT = New Testament
 OCM = Ornaments of the Ch. and the Mins., 1908
 OHC = Order of HC, 1548
 OR = Ornaments Rubric

Ord.^{1,2,3} = Ordination (or Consecration), (1) of Deacons, (2) of Priests, (3) of Bishops
 OT = Old Testament
 PB = Prayer Book
 PBAH = Prayer Book, Articles and Homilies
 PH = Parson's Handbook, 1909
 pr. = prayer
 Pref. = Preface (1 "The Preface," 2 Concerning the Service of the Church, 3 Of Ceremonies, 4 Order how the Psalter is to be read, 5 rest of Holy Scripture)
 PS. = Parker Society edition
 Ps. = Psalm
 Q. = Question
 QV. = Athanasian Creed
 R. = Royal
 R. = Response
 Rel. Cer. = Principles of Religious Ceremonial
 RV, RVm = Revised Version,—margin
 sacr. = sacrament,—al
 Sar. = Sarum
 SCO. = Scottish Communion Office sent. = sentence Te D. = Te Deum.
 th. = thanksgiving
 Trin. = Trinity
 V. = Versicle
 v. (vv.) = verse (verses)
 VAI = Visitation Articles and Injunctions, ed. Frere and Kennedy
 Vis. = Visitation
 VS = Visitation of the Sick
 Whit. = Whitsunday—tide
 Z.L. = Zurich Letters, in the Parker Society Series
 * = For general readers
 † = For advanced students
 (2) = 2nd edition
 1, 2, 3 = 1st, 2nd, 3rd; or foot-note 1, 2, or 3 [] = editorial additions

ADDENDA

AMERICAN CHURCH, THE.—"That portion of the Catholic Ch. known in law as The Protestant Episcopal Ch. in the U.S.A." (Am. Ch. Almanack) is the lineal successor of the Ch. of Eng. in America before the Revolution. After vain attempts to secure the consecration of a bp. in Eng., Bp. Seabury was consecrated in 1784 by three bps. of the Scottish Ch., and Bps. White, Provoost, and Madison were, three yrs. later, consecrated in Eng., these four bps. transmitting the succession thenceforward. The general lines of the constitutional settlement which ensued naturally followed the course adopted in the political sphere, and, although a general convention for U.S.A. was given important central functions to discharge, the federal principle prevailed in the main, and the autonomy and equality of the constituent dioceses were carefully safeguarded. Practically, however, a large measure of uniformity both of constitution and procedure has resulted from the binding rule of loyalty to the PB, and proposals are in active discussion for the introduction of the provincial system. The AC. is numerically a small minority, but its importance is out of all proportion to its numbers. Its loyal adherence to Catholic Doctrine and Church Order, and its resolute maintenance of reverent liturgical Worship, give it a central position which may make it a pivot of reunion in the future.

For interesting particulars as to its position in regard to ritual, see the Bishop of Albany's evidence bef. the R. Com. on Eccles. Dis. (3 316-326). From this it appears that ornaments and ceremonies are regulated mainly by custom, subject to episcopal control, the resulting burden, however, upon the bishop being recognised as unfair and excessive. See further AMERICAN PB; Diocesan Bp., § 10.—A1.

ANNEXED BOOK.—Some notes on the MS. PB annexed to the Act of 1662, and subscribed by Convocation in 1661, may be of interest. They may be taken as supplementary to the Variorum Synopsis in RITUAL iv, to which the reference marks correspond. A facsimile edition of the AB was published in 1891.

|| B2⁷⁻⁹] Written on a new leaf, without heading, a blank space preceding.

|| D1¹⁻³] On separate page, facing opening of MP, after a blank page.

|| D1⁷, E1⁷] After the Amen following the Absolution two black lines are ruled across the page, as, though marking the close of the Preparation.

|| D2¹] Thy will be done in earth as it is . . . without comma, initial capital, or space.

|| D2⁹] The 1st clause of the Creed is punctuated, I believe in God, the Father Almighty, and the Min. may conveniently precent to the word God, the choir and people beginning again, and continuing without break.

|| D3¹ E3¹] After Then the Priest standing up the following words have been erased: and so continuing to the end of the service. This favours the inclusion of the Min. in All (observe initial capital) kneeling (cp. D3⁸ n. ||).

|| D3⁶] The heading is only A Prayer for, and there is a break of two blank lines between bless and Endue; similarly in the Litany.

|| F¹] After Ordinarie: has been erased The Min. and People all kneeling.

|| F6¹] A blank line precedes Then shall the Priest. . . Cp. F¹ n. ||, and F6⁸ n. ||.

|| F7¹] A blank line separates the Pr. from O Lord arise. . .

|| F8¹] ¶ Priest is written by itself in the centre of the line.

|| H³ end] Addition And the Ordinary . . . the Canon.

|| H⁴] The wording bef. alteration was: shall stand in the most convenient place in the upper end of the Chancel (or of the body of the Church where there is no Chancel). And the Priest standing at the north part of the Table. . .

|| H1⁷] Bef. alt. Let us pray for the good estate of the catholic Church of Christ. (And so under H5¹.)

|| H1⁸] The sentence after increase your damnation was added in the margin, being transferred from H2¹.

|| H2²] First written Draw near in full assurance of faith.

|| H2⁸] Semicolon in rubric after take the cup into his hands;

|| H2⁹] Consecrated is erased bef. bread at the end of the first rubric.

|| H6¹] An addition, written very closely, and across the red ruling of the page.

|| I2³] Erased And here all the congregation shall kneel.

|| I8¹] Covenanted and erased bef. promised.

|| I9¹] persons alt. to children.

|| K6¹] or some other at his appointment erased after The Curate of every Parish.

|| L5² (Coll. aft. LP.)] for these thy children (or servants) was first written.

|| L6¹] or unto Matrimony erased aft. Communion.

|| M14¹] Doxology added to Lord's Pr. in closer handwriting.

|| O5¹] out of the miseries of this life erased after departed.

|| P1¹] according to the accustomed manner added aft. the Litany ended.

|| T² end] Added: or hath had formerly episcopal Consecration or Ordination.—BI. G. HARFORD.

The Prayer Book Dictionary

Ablution]

ABLUTION.—A. is the name applied to the ceremonial washing of persons or things, such as was practised by the Jews (Ex. 30 18-21, Mark 7 3, 4, John 2 6; cp. John 13 10), this A. implying a symbolical cleansing from contracted pollution. It was also used to indicate exemption from guilt, as when Pilate washed his hands as a disclaimer of responsibility for the death of our Lord (Matt. 27 24).

The PB contains no express directions for such ceremonial ablutions, but there are two occasions in the Service of HC, 2. At HC. where, following ancient custom, such A. is frequently practised.

(1) The Lavabo at the Offertory. (See LAVABO and HANDS, § 1.)

(2) At the conclusion of the Service, when the sacred vessels are ceremonially cleansed. The direction of the rubric, If any remain of that which was consecrated, it shall not be carried out of the Church, but the Priest and such other of the Communicants as he shall then call unto him, shall, immediately after the Blessing, reverently eat and drink the same, is held to imply some A. of the vessels to remove any particles of the consecrated elements which may have adhered to them, and the consumption of these As. by the priest or other communicants.

The Lambeth Judgment (1890) affirmed that "the cleansing of the vessels appears to be not an improper completion of this act (of consumption) which is ordered to follow the close of the service without any break or interval," and adds, "The Rubric gives a general direction as to what is to be done in the way of consuming what remains after the service, and is not so minute as to go beyond this, our Book having abandoned many over-niceties of regulation. If a conscientious scruple is felt as to not 'carrying out of the church' slight remnants even into the vestry, it is not the duty of this Court to override it." The Judgment suggests that the Credence is the most fitting place at which the As. should be performed (following the use of the Eastern Liturgies); but the more usual practice is for the As. to be taken at the altar.—R2.

E. HOBSON.

[Absolution

ABSOLUTION.—[This art. refers to Liturgical forms only. For doctrine, etc., see REPENTANCE.] In the Pre-Reformation services the A. first pronounced by the congregation when the officiant had made his CONFESSION of sin, and then in his turn by the officiant over the congregation, was: "Almighty God, have mercy upon thee (or you), and forgive thee (you) all thy (your) sins; deliver thee (you) from all evil, preserve and stablish thee (you) in all good, and bring thee (you) to everlasting life. Amen."

"Misereatur tui (vestri) Omnipotens Deus, et dimittat tibi (vobis) omnia peccata tua (vestra); liberet te (vos) ab omni malo, conservet et confirmet in bono, et ad vitam perducat aeternam. Amen."

The officiant aft. saying this added: "The Almighty and merciful Lord grant unto you A. and remission of all your sins, time for true repentance, amendment of life, and the grace and comfort of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

"Absolutionem et remissionem omnium peccatorum vestrorum, spatium verae poenitentiae, et emendationem vitae, gratiam et consolationem Sancti Spiritus, tribuat vobis Omnipotens et Misericors Dominus. Amen" (Sarum Missal, etc.).

There was considerable variation in the form for giving A. to individuals aft. private Conf. The first of the above two short precatory forms was often said, and sometimes both: then followed the more definitive A. in some such form as this: "Our Lord Jesus Christ of His great pity absolve thee: and I, by the authority of the same our God and Lord Jesus Christ, and of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and by the authority committed to me, absolve thee from all these thy sins which with contrite heart and mouth thou hast confessed to me, and from all other thy sins which thou gladly wouldst confess if thou hadst them in memory: and I restore thee to the Sacraments of the Church. In the Name of the Father," etc.

"Dominus noster Jesus Christus pro sua magna pietate te absolvat: et ego, auctoritate ejusdem Dei et Domini Jesu Christi, et beatorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et auctoritate mihi tradita, absolvo te ab omnibus peccatis his, de quibus corde contrito et ore mihi confessus es, et ab omnibus aliis peccatis tuis de quibus si tuae occurrerent memoriae libenter confiteri velles: et ad sacramenta Ecclesiae te restituo. In Nomine Patris, etc." (Sarum Manual). The forms given in the Sarum Brev. (1531) and in Myrk's Instructions to Parish Priests (c. 1450) differ considerably from the above. The following form of benediction was also often added, either bef. or aft. the pronouncing of the definitive A.: "The merit of the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the prayers of our holy Mother the Church, the good that thou hast done and that by the grace of God thou shalt do hereafter, be to thee for the remission of thy sins": "Meritum Passionis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, suffragia sanctae Matris Ecclesiae, bona quae fecisti et quae per Dei gratiam facies, sint tibi in remissionem peccatorum tuorum." This is from the Sarum Brev. (1531). The form given by Myrk is somewhat different.

In the First PB of Edw. VI (1549) a form of A. was given, based on the first-mentioned Latin formula, and has been retained ever since in the Communion Service of the PB. The direction that this A. is to be pronounced by the bishop, if present, first appears in 1552. In 1552, to the new form of Conf. bef. MP was attached the long A. still to be found there. In the rubric bef. this A. the words "or remission of sins" were inserted in 1604, and "Priest" was substituted for "Minister" in 1662. In the VS the first PB (1549) provided a form of A. which followed the ancient forms pretty closely. This has remained unchanged ever since: but the direction—"the same form of A. shall be used in all private confessions"—was struck out in 1552. In the "Forms of Pr. to be used at Sea" (1662), the A. from HC is given; to be pronounced by "the Priest if there be any in the ship."—PB.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

ABSTINENCE.—See FAST, § 2.

ACCESS, PRAYER OF HUMBLE.—See HUMBLE ACCESS.

ACCESSION SERVICE.—The present three-fold form of A. service was first authorised by royal warrant on Nov. 9, 1901 (the birthday of Edward VII), having previously received the approval of Convocation. The earlier form dated from the A. of James II. It was intermitted in the next de facto reign, but revived by proclamation of Anne, Feb. 7, 1704. A royal warrant prescribed its use at the beginning of each subsequent reign. It lacked the synodical and quasi-parliamentary authorisation given in 1661-2 to the services for Nov. 5, Jan. 30 and May 29, owing to the circumstance that the legal A. day of Charles II was the day of his father's martyrdom, viz., Jan. 30. But the anniversary of the A. of each sovereign since the Reformation had been observed with special supplications. The forms put out in 1576 and 1578 are printed in Elizabethan Liturgical Services (Parker Soc.), pp. 548 ff. Canon 2 of 1640 enjoined the observance of Charles I's A., and recognised a particular form of pr. (Cardwell, Synodalia 1 392).

The form appointed in 1685 was a new one, and was considerably modified in 1704. The

Pr. for Unity was added at the A. of the House of Hanover, and
2. The Earlier Form. Josh. 1 1-9 substituted for Prov. 8 13-36 as 1st Lesson. This form followed the general outline of such occasional services, viz.: Special opening Sentences; a Cento of verses from the Pss. in place of Venite; Proper Pss. and Lessons; special Suffrages after the Creed; an appropriate Coll.; and special prs. in the end of the Lit. In the Communion Service a special Coll. took the place of the Colls. for the King and for the day; the Ep. was 1 Pet. 2 11-17, the Gospel Matt. 22 16-22; the Pr. for Unity followed that for the Church Militant.

At the A. of Edward VII a number of liturgical scholars petitioned Convocation for a new form. The form now authorised

2. The Present Form. is threefold—(1) a Service of Mattins, Lit. and Evensong, including Proper Pss. and Lessons, Suffrages and Colls.; (2) a special Coll., Epistle and Gospel; (3) Te Deum (printed in three divisions); Lesser Lit.; Suffrages; three special Colls.; Pr. for Unity, etc. In these forms two of the earlier prs. have no place, but a modified form of the ancient Coronation Coll. Deus qui populus is introduced into all three.

The new A. services, avoiding the strained phraseology of the closing 17th cent. and endeavouring to assimilate the ideas expressed to those of modern times, have been criticised as emasculated and weak. An example of modernisation is the omission of the words, "Blessed Lord, Who hast called Christian princes to the defence of Thy Faith and hast made it their duty to promote the spiritual welfare together with the temporal interest of their people." Again, the "spirit of wisdom . . . to govern this kingdom wisely" is not asked for the King, but only that "under him this nation may be wisely governed."—sz. DOUGLAS MACLEANE.

ACOLYTE.—(Gr. ἀκόλυθος, Lat. acolythus, a follower, attendant.) The highest of the minor orders in the Latin Ch. (Conc. Carthag. iv, can. 6). His work was to light the candles on the altar, to carry them in procession, especially at the Gospel, to prepare wine and water for the chalice, and otherwise assist the higher clergy in the services of the Church. Card. Bona (c. A.D. 1660), R.L. i. 2518, notes that, while this order was still conferred on candidates for the priesthood, its duties had been for 500 years performed by boys or untunsured men. (See SERVER and COLLET.)—r2. J. E. SWALLOW.

ACTS OF UNIFORMITY.—The Acts of Uniformity beginning with that of 1549 were directed to two ends: first, to

1. Introductory. secure uniformity of doctrine and worship within the Ch. of Eng., and, secondly, to secure conformity to that doctrine and worship by all persons inhabiting the realm of England and Wales. The first of these objects has been more or less attained, the second has not; for, although every person inhabiting the realm is still obliged under penalty of eccles. censure to attend the Ch. of Eng. services on Sundays and Holy days, that obligation is inapplicable to Roman Catholics and to Dissenters usually attending their own chapels, and may not in any case be enforced by pecuniary fine.

The following is an epitome of the principal Acts of Parliament bearing on the subject. Provisions which have been repealed are printed in italics; all references are to the official edition of these statutes.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY, 1549 (2 & 3 Ed. 6, c. 1), recites—Ancient diversity in forms of common prayer, viz., the uses of Sarum, York, Bangor and Lincoln; Recent increase in diversity in the forms of Mattins, Evensong, Holy Communion and other Sacraments; That some are pleased and some offended; That the King and Council having failed to secure uniformity had appointed a Commission who having regard both to Scripture and to primitive usage had prepared the Book of Common Prayer.

2. First Act of Ed. VI

And enacts—(s. 1) Indemnity for past offences, but from and after Pentecost, 1549, the PB forms are to be used regularly and exclusively in every cathedral, parish ch. and other place.—(s. 2) Imposes penalties on any parson, vicar, or minister failing to use the PB services, or using any other, or preaching against or depraving the PB.—(s. 3) Imposes penalties on any person who by plays, songs or words depraves the PB or procures any person to say prayer openly or minister a sacrament otherwise than in PB form or to interrupt a parson complying therewith.—(s. 4) Offences triable at Assizes.—(s. 5) Bishops may associate themselves with the justices of Assize.—(s. 6) Prayers may be said privately and at the Universities in Greek, Latin or Hebrew.—(s. 7) Public use of psalms and prayers from the Bible allowed.—(s. 8) Prayer books to be provided in churches.—(s. 9) Offences to be prosecuted at the Assizes immediately following the offence.—(s. 10) Peers to be tried by peers.—(s. 11) Mayors of London and of places where there are no Assizes may act instead of Justices of Assize.—(s. 12) Eccles. jurisdiction preserved.—(s. 13) But no offence to be punished twice.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY, 1552 (5 & 6 Ed. 6, c. 1), recites that people do not come to ch.; and enacts—

3. Second Act of Ed. VI

(s. 1) All persons inhabiting the realm, in default of lawful or reasonable excuse, must endeavour to resort to their parish ch. or chapel accustomed on Sundays and Holy Days to attend the Ch. services upon pain of punishment by Ch. censure.¹

(ss. 2 and 3) Require Bishops, etc., to put in force the Act.—(s. 4) Substitutes the PB of 1552 for that of 1549.—The remaining sections imposing penalties on any inhabitant of the realm attending any other form of public prayer or sacrament and requiring the Act to be read publicly every year were repealed by 9 & 10 Vict., c. 59.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY, 1559 (1 Eliz., c. 2).—(s. 1) Repeals 1 Mary, st. 2, c. 2, which had repealed

4. Act of Elizabeth

5 & 6 Ed. 6, c. 1, and reimposes the PB of 1552 with four specified alterations.—(s. 2) Imposes penalties on any minister in any cathedral or parish ch. or other place who fails to use the PB services or who uses any other form of public prayer or who privately or publicly uses any other form of celebrating the Lord's Supper.—

¹ Note that 7 & 8 Vict., c. 102, exempts Roman Catholics, and 9 & 10 Vict., c. 59, exempts Dissenters attending their own chapels and provides that in no case is any fine to be inflicted for not attending church.

(s. 3) Imposes penalties on any person depraving or despising the PB by plays, songs or rhymes, and on persons causing any minister to use any service made illegal by s. 2, and on persons interrupting service conducted according to the PB. The remainder of this section (which requires every inhabitant of the realm and of any other of the Queen's dominions to attend his parish ch. or chapel accustomed every Sunday and Holy day under pain of eccles. censure and of a fine of 12 pence) was repealed by 9 & 10 Vict., c. 59.—(s. 4) Bishops, etc., to enforce the Act by censures.—Ss. 5, 6, 8, 9, 10 and 11 practically repeat ss. 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 respectively of 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 1 (supra).—(s. 13) Provides for retention of ornaments of First PB until other order is taken by the Queen with the advice of her commissioners for eccles. causes or of the metropolitan of the realm; and if there is contempt or irreverence by misuse of the orders appointed in the PB the Queen may with the like advice publish further ceremonies or rites (see further ORNAMENTS RUBRIC).—(s. 14) Repeals laws establishing or authorising any other service or administration of sacraments or common prayer.

ACT TO REFORM CERTAIN DISORDERS TOUCHING MINISTERS OF THE CHURCH, 1571 (13 Eliz., c. 12).

5. Subscription Act of 1571

(s. 1) All priests and Ministers instituted, consecrated or ordained otherwise than in form authorised temp. Ed. 6 or Eliz. are to subscribe the 39 Arts. before Christmas, 1571. Repealed 26 & 27 Vict., c. 125.—(s. 2) Any person ecclesiastical or having ecclesiastical living, who advisedly maintains or affirms any doctrine directly contrary or repugnant to any of the 39 Arts., may be deprived by the Bp. or Ordinary or commissioners for eccles. causes if he refuses to revoke his error, or after revocation reaffirms the same.

(s. 3) No person is to be admitted to any benefice with cure unless 23 years old and a deacon.—The rest of the section and the corresponding part of s. 4 requiring subscription to the 39 Articles, etc., before admission are repealed by 28 & 29 Vict., c. 122, s. 15.—(s. 4) None to be made minister or admitted to preach or minister the sacraments under 24 years of age, nor unless he bring to the Bp. from men known to the Bp. to be of sound religion a testimonial of honest life and of profession of the 39 Arts., nor unless he can answer and render to the Ordinary an account of his faith in Latin according to the said Arts., or have special gift and ability to be a preacher.—(s. 5) None shall have benefice with cure of £30 value unless he is Bachelor of Divinity, or licensed by a Bp. within the realm or by Oxford or Cambridge University.—(s. 6) Avoids appointments and dispensations contrary to the Act.—(s. 7) Requires six months' notice to be given by the Ordinary to the patron before presentation to a vacancy occurring by deprivation.

ACT TO RETAIN SUBJECTS IN DUE OBEDIENCE, 1581 (23 Eliz., c. 1). This Act made it treason to be reconciled with Rome, and also imposed penalties on anyone over sixteen failing to attend Ch. of Eng. services, and on anyone keeping a schoolmaster not so attending or not licensed by the Bp. There was exemption for persons having the established form of service in their own houses and occasionally coming to Ch. (The Act was repealed by 7 & 8 Vict., c. 102.)

6. Act to Enforce Attendance, 1581.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY, 1662 (14 Car. 2, c. 4), recites—Excellence of the PB of 1559; wilful and schismatical abstention from public worship of a great many people in all parts of the realm; great and scandalous neglect of ministers to use the PB services; Royal Commission of 25 Oct., 1660, to revise the PB; revision of the PB by Convocations and publication thereof; King's approval of the same.

And enacts—(s. 1) All ministers in cathedrals and chapels and places of public worship throughout the realm are to say and use the prayers and sacraments as prescribed by the PB of 1662.—(ss. 2 & 3) All parsons, vicars, and ministers to assent to the PB before St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662.

(s. 4) All persons put into ecclesiastical livings to declare their assent to the PB. (Repealed by 28 & 29 Vict., c. 122.)—(s. 5) The resident incumbent of any living who keeps a curate must himself (unless prevented by some impediment allowed by the Ordinary) at least once a month read MP and EP and, if there be occasion, administer each of the Sacraments and other rites in the ch. or chapel of the living. Penalty, £5 fine, recoverable before justices of the peace.—(ss. 6, 7 and 8) Required all Clergymen, University Fellows, etc., schoolmasters and private tutors to subscribe the declaration (a) against taking arms against the King, (b) of conformity to the established liturgy, and (c) until 25 Mar., 1682, against the Solemn League and Covenant. (The form of the declaration was altered by 1 W. & M., sess. 1, c. 8, s. 11, and the whole provision repealed by 28 & 29 Vict., c. 122, and 34 & 35 Vict., c. 26.)—(s. 9) Deprived all beneficed clergy not then episcopally ordained priest or deacon. (Repealed by 26 & 27 Vict., c. 125.)—(s. 10) No person may be admitted to any parsonage, vicarage, benefice or other eccles. promotion or dignity nor shall administer the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper unless ordained priest in manner prescribed by the PB or unless formerly episcopally ordained. Penalty £100 and disability for priest's orders for one year.—(s. 11) Penalties of the Act do not apply to aliens of foreign reformed Churches allowed by the King.—(s. 12) Offices avoided ipso facto under the Act not to be filled until six months' notice given by the Ordinary to the patron or sentence of Deprivation publicly read in the church.—(s. 13) PB forms to be alone used in the Colleges of Universities and at Westminster, Winchester and Eton. The heads of the said Colleges to publicly subscribe the 39 Arts. and assent to the PB and if in Orders to read the services in chapel at least once a quarter. (This section except as to Westminster, Winchester and Eton was repealed by 34 & 35 Vict., c. 26.)—(s. 14) Services in the said Universities and Colleges and in Convocation may be read in Latin.—(s. 15) No person to lecture or preach in any church, chapel or other place of public worship unless licensed by the archbishop or bishop. (The rest of the section as to lecturers signing the 39 Arts., etc., was repealed by 28 & 29 Vict., c. 122.)—(s. 16) Contains a proviso as to lectures preached in cathedrals, etc.—(s. 17) Provides penalties against persons preaching if disabled or prohibited from doing so (see 15 Car. 2, c. 6, s. 6).—(s. 18) Lecturer to be present while service is conducted.—(s. 19) Exemption of University sermons and lectures.—(s. 20) Former

Acts of Uniformity confirmed and applied to the PB of 1662.—(s. 21) Names of King, Queen and royal personages may be altered in the PB as occasion requires.—(s. 22) True printed copies of the PB to be provided in all parishes and churches.—(s. 23) PB to be translated into Welsh for use in parishes where Welsh is commonly used.—(s. 24) Copies of this Act and of the PB exemplified under the great seal to be got by deans and chapters of Cathedrals and Collegiate Churches and copies to be deposited at the Law Courts and at the Tower.—(s. 25) Personal—(s. 26) Art. 36 of the Arts. of Religion to be read with reference to the revised form of ordination.

NOTE.—The time for subscribing to this Act of Uniformity was extended from St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662, to Christmas Day, 1663, by 15 Car. 2, c. 6. The same Act makes further provision as to the person before whom the oaths might be taken and modifies s. 17 supra.

Act for exempting Protestant dissenters from certain penalties, 1688 (1 W. & M., c. 18).

The effect of this Act was to relieve Protestant dissenters from the obligation of conformity to the Ch. of Eng.

The Act having achieved its object, and other legislation having been passed, it was finally repealed by the Promissory Oaths Act of 1871, with the exception of s. 5, which allows dissenters objecting to the oaths of certain parochial and ward offices to act by deputy, s. 8, which relieves dissenting ministers from jury service and parochial and ward offices, and s. 15, which imposes penalties for disturbing services of the Ch. of Eng. or services legalised by the Act.

Act for securing the Church of England as by law established, 1706 (5 Anne, c. 5). Provides that "All Acts now in force for the establishment and preservation of the Ch. of Eng. and the doctrine, worship, discipline and government thereof shall remain and be in full force for ever." This Act is incorporated with the Act of Union, 5 Anne, c. 8.

Roman Catholic Penal Acts Repeal Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict., c. 102), formally repeals those sections of the above Acts in so far as they impose the obligation of conformity on Roman Catholics.

Act to relieve subjects from certain penalties and disabilities in regard to religious opinions, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict., c. 59). This Act, besides repealing the provisions of the above Acts as noted above, also repeals a number of other penalties and disabilities on the ground of religious opinion. It also places Jews in respect of schools, worship, education and charities in the same position as Protestant dissenters and provides penalties for the disturbance of any lawful assembly for religious worship.

Statute Law Revision Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict., c. 125), repeals certain obsolete provisions, including those noted above.

Clerical Subscription Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict., c. 122), repeals provisions as to oaths and declarations by clergy as noted above, and enacts—(s. 1) A statutory form of "Declaration of Assent" to the 39 Arts. and the PB.—(s. 2) A form of "Declaration against Simony."—(s. 3) A form of "Stipendiary Curates Declaration."—(s. 4) Every person about to be ordained priest or deacon must before ordination make in the manner prescribed the "Declaration of Assent" and take the "Oath of Allegiance" (the form of which is now prescribed by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict., c. 72, ss. 2 and 8).

10. Subscription Act of 1865.

(s. 5) Every person about to be instituted or collated to any benefice or licensed to any perpetual curacy, lectureship or preachship must make the "Declaration of Assent" and the "Declaration against Simony" and take the "Oath of Allegiance."—(s. 6) Every person about to be licensed to a stipendiary curacy must make the "Stipendiary Curates Declaration."

(s. 7) Every person instituted or collated to any benefice or licensed to a perpetual curacy must on his first Sunday of officiating, or such other Sunday as the Ordinary allows, publicly read the 39 Arts., followed by the "Declaration of Assent," the words "which I have now read before you" being inserted after the words "Articles of religion." The penalty is forfeiture, but the vacancy is not to be filled without six months' notice.—(s. 8) Every person licensed to a stipendiary curacy must subscribe the "Declaration of Assent," and read the same in church on first officiating, under pain of his licence being avoided.

(s. 9) No other oath or declaration than those provided by the Act is necessary for ordination or licence to a stipendiary curacy or on or as a consequence of presentation to any benefice, perpetual curacy, lectureship or preachship.—(s. 10) On any other occasion on which any person in Holy Orders appointed to any eccles. dignity, benefice or office is required to make any declaration or subscription to the 39 Arts. or to the PB or Liturgy, the "Declaration of Assent" is to be used instead of any other form, and if an oath against simony is to be taken the "Declaration against Simony" is to be substituted.—(s. 11) No oath is to be taken during the services for the ordering of priests and deacons and the consecration of bps. and abps.—(s. 12) Nothing in the Act is to affect the oath of canonical obedience to the bp. or of due obedience to the abp.

Promissory Oaths Acts of 1868 and 1871 (31 & 32 Vict., c. 72, and 34 & 35 Vict., c. 48) provide a form of oath of allegiance and repeal oaths and declarations not in force.

University Test Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict., c. 26), effects among other repeals those above noted.

Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict., c. 35). For this see SHORTENED SERVICES ACT.—A4.

H. C. DOWDALL.

ADDITIONAL SERVICES.—See SERVICES, ADDITIONAL.

ADMINISTRATION, WORDS OF.—See WORDS OF ADMINISTRATION.

ADMONITION.—(1) In general sense applied (Ord. Pr. and Deac., last G.) to any direction given by an Ordinary or other ecclesiastical superior.

(2) Spec.—MONITION, now the more usual technical term.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

ADOPTION.—The word A. occurs in the PB in the Christmas Coll., in Bapt. 1, 2, and in the Epistles for the Sunday after Christmas Day (Gal. 4 5) and for the 8th Sun. after Trinity (Rom. 8 15; cp. 8 23, 9 4, and Eph. 1 5). It is only found in the NT in the above passages in St. Paul's Epistles.

The word adoberia is not used in classical Greek, but "no word is more common in Greek inscriptions of the Hellenistic time" (E. L. Hicks, Studia Biblica 4 8). The practice of A. is rare amongst us and has no place in our laws. Among the Jews it was still more rare; the Law makes no provision for it; family records were carefully kept. But among Greeks and Romans A. was common and was carefully regulated by their laws. It is significant that the word is used by a Greek-speaking Jew, who was a Roman citizen, and who was addressing Churches in Rome, Ephesus and Galatia. According to Roman law the ceremony took the form of a public sale with scales, ingot of brass, and seven witnesses. The adoptor publicly paid a price and claimed the lad as his son. The lad publicly called his adoptor "father." Result—the former family connection absolutely ceased; his own previous personality lost, he became a new man with a new name; debts previously contracted became legally extinct; he was member now of the new family as if born into it, and entitled to inheritance.

1. Early History.

In Bapt. God called us sons; by our proxies we called Him Father. Confirmation teaches us, when we are old enough to understand, to look in faith to our Heavenly Father, who sent His Son to redeem us. And therefore, because we are sons, God sends forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father (Gal. 4 4-6). Do men doubt our adoption? We have a Divine Witness (Rom. 8 14-17) to the fact: "we are children of God . . . heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ."—Id.

2. Christian Use.

J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

ADORATION.—See PRAYER, § 5.

ADORATION OF THE HOST, CROSS, etc.—

The practice of worshipping or adoring the Host, or the consecrated elements of bread and wine, was unknown until the 12th cent., and was the direct result of the general acceptance of the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, which had been first propounded by Paschasius Radbert in 831, and had become the authorised teaching of the mediæval Ch. in 1216. The belief that, when the priest pronounced the words, "This is my body," "This is my blood," the elements were transubstantiated into the Body and Blood of Christ soon led to the custom of elevating the Host for worship as soon as these words proclaimed that Christ was truly and substantially present on the altar. Thus the Synod of Exeter (1287) forbade the priest to elevate the Host until he had said the words "This is my body," "lest the creature be worshipped by the people for the Creator." In 1264 Pope Urban IV instituted the Feast of Corpus Christi, to be celebrated on the Thursday aft. Trin. Sunday, when the Host, after being worshipped in church, was to be carried in procession and adored by the faithful as Christ Himself.

1. Adoration of the Host.

A. of the Host is distinctly forbidden by the Ch. of Eng., which declares that Transubstantiation "overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament," and that the Lord's Supper "was not by Christ's ordinance carried about, lifted up, or worshipped" (Art. 28). The BLACK RUBRIC at the end of the Communion service also states that, by the reverent custom of kneeling at the reception of the Sacr., "no adoration is intended or ought to be done unto the Sacramental Bread and Wine" . . . which "remain still in their very natural substances and therefore may not be adored."

The "A. of the Cross" is a service performed in the Roman Ch. on Good Friday, during which a cross, unveiled by the priest, receives the adoration of priests and people by prostration, kissing, and the offering of prayers and hymns. The sanction given by the Second Council of Nicaea to a subordinate form of veneration and worship of images and pictures was gradually extended until Thomas Aquinas (1224-74) declared "that the Cross and image of the Cross and of Christ must be worshipped with the self-same supreme worship, latría, with which Christ Himself is worshipped" (Summa Theolog. 325). Abp. Arundel also ordered in 1408 that "all henceforth preach up the veneration of the Cross and of the image of the Crucifix and other images of saints." The Council of Trent directs images to remain in churches, because "by means of the images which we kiss and bow down to we adore Christ and reverence the saints whose likeness they bear" (Sess. 25).

The A. of the Cross or of any image is directly contrary to the teaching of the Ch. of Eng., as expressed in the Homily against Peril of Idolatry, and in Art. 22, which declares "the worshipping and adoration of Images . . . a fond thing vainly invented" and "repugnant to the Word of God."—
R2. C. SYDNEY CARTER.

ADULT BAPTISM.—See BAPTISM, § 6; BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 32, 33.

ADVENT.—A season of preparation did not at once follow the establishment of the festival of the Nativity (whether

1. History. Dec. 25 or Jan. 6: see FESTIVAL, § 4-7; it seems not to have been commonly observed before the 5th or 6th cent. But the Council of Cæsar Augusta (Saragossa) in Spain, A.D. 380, appointed the period from xvi kal. Jan. (Dec. 17) to viii id. Jan. (Jan. 6, the Epiphany) as a solemn season of prayer and church-going, though not as a fast. At this Council there seems to have been no festival of Dec. 25 (see FESTIVAL, § 5, 6). By the end of the 5th cent. we find a fast before Christmas, as in the Calendar of Perpetuus, Bishop of Tours, A.D. 491, and at the Councils of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (can. 9), and of Tours, A.D. 567 (can. 17). The latter orders monks to fast daily from Dec. 1 to 25. The Council of Mâcon orders the laity to fast three days a week (Mon., Wed., Fr.) from Nov. 11 to Dec. 25 ("St. Martin's Quadragesima"). But at Rome A. seems never to have lasted more than five Sundays and to have been reduced to four; and this is our present usage, though the services of the last Sunday after Trinity give it a certain A. colour. In the Gelasian Sacramentary (7th cent.) there are five Sundays. Fasting in A. did not last long in the West, but it has survived in the East. The Greek Church has a forty-days' fast, from Nov. 15 (Shann, Euchology, p. 498); but this was not a well-established custom till the 11th cent. The E. Syrians fast from Dec. 1 to 25; the season is called Sûbârâ, i.e., "Annunciation" or "Proclamation," often vernacularly "the little fast." There are four Sundays of Subara.

Advent Sunday is always the Sunday nearest to St. Andrew's Day (PB). In the West and among the E. Syrians it is the beginning of the liturgical, though not of the civil, or even always of the ecclesiastical, year (see NEW YEAR'S DAY). As the beginning of the liturgical year it has superseded other dates, notably the Vigil of Christmas. The Greeks begin their cycle of Eucharistic lessons at Easter (Shann, p. 480). In the Sarum Breviary the Te Deum is forbidden during A. (ed. Procter and Wordsworth, 129)—CI. A. J. MACLEAN.

2. Advent Sunday.

ADVENT (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).—As A. is not a season of primitive

1. 1st Sunday in Advent.

origin, there is no special Preface in the Communion Service. The special Lessons for the first Sunday are from Isaiah 1 and 2 (or 42); these passages deal with judgment to come, its cause, its certainty, and the way of escape. The key-note of the Sunday, as seen in the services as a whole and especially in the Collect, Epistle and Gospel, is Humility, the necessary forerunner of Repentance. This we must have because of: (1) the coming of Christ to judge the world; (2) the end of the world which is approaching; (3) our need of Conf., leading to forgiveness. So in the Coll. we pray that we may cast away the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light. The Epistle (Rom. 138) tells us how this which we pray for may be effected. The Gospel (Matt. 211) provides us with the picture of our great Example coming in meekness and humility and casting out the works of darkness.

That Repentance which is the outcome of the A. message prepares the soul to use rightly the Word of God. Consequently, the 2nd Sunday in A. is Bible Sunday. The Collect reminds us that it is by patient reading of that Word, and by the comforting assurance which that reading brings, that "we embrace and hold fast the hope of Everlasting Life" therein set forth, and so reap the fruits of repentance. The Epistle (Rom. 154) shows how the Scriptures give hope to Jew and Gentile alike, while the Gospel (Luke 2125) emphasises the assurance of that hope in the midst of the great final cataclysm.

2. 2nd Sunday.

The teaching of Holy Scripture is entrusted to human instruments—the ministers of the

3. 3rd Sunday.

Word. We need to pray for the Ministers of the Word, and to test them also to see that they are true and faithful. The 3rd Sunday in A., therefore, gives us in the Collect the beautiful pr. for the "Ministers and Stewards of Thy mysteries." The Epistle (1 Cor. 4 1) deals with the same subject, and the Gospel (Matt. 11 2) relates the incident when Our Lord's own Ministry was questioned, and the proofs of its truth were furnished by Him. On this Sunday notice has to be given of the Ember Days, the following Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, when we pray for those about to be admitted to the ordained Ministry of the Word.

The 4th Sunday in A. is the last before the coming of the King. Hence the Collect looks forward to His immediate arrival and the removal of anything in us which may hinder our participation in its full benefit. The Epistle (Phil. 4 4) takes us into the hour that precedes His A., and the Gospel (John 1 19) recognises it in the confession and declaration of the Baptist. The glories of that A. and the removal of all that hinders it form the subjects of the First Lessons.—G.

F. L. H. MILLARD.

ADVOWSON.—The right of nominating, or as it is technically called presenting, a clergyman to the Bp. to be instituted or inducted into a Parochial Benefice, and so to become the Priest of the Parish, is called an A. It is a perpetual right, and can, according to English law, under certain reservations, be sold; and can be bequeathed by will. Sometimes this right is attached to a manor, so that whoever is the Lord of the Manor is also owner of the A.; in such case the A. is called an "A. appendant." It may be, however, severed from it; in such case it is called an "A. in gross." The word is, says Godolphin (Rep. Can., c. 19), "a kind of bastard French word, sometimes called 'advocatio Ecclesiae,'" because the owner of the A., that is the Patron, is, as it were, the protector of the ch. and parish, inasmuch as on him lies the obligation of finding and presenting to the Bishop a fit and proper person to be the parish priest. In the Canon Law this right is called Jus Patronatus. The Canon Law regards the A. as a temporal thing annexed to a spiritual, viz., the cure of Souls, and therefore condemns the sale of an A. as simony. The English law regarding it as a temporal right, triable in the King's Court and not in the Eccles. Courts, permits the sale provided that the benefice is not vacant, and that more than a year has elapsed since the last institution to the benefice (The Benefices Act, 1898). (See PATRON, INSTITUTION, INDUCTION.)—Ta. E. G. WOOD.

AFFINITY is relationship through marriage. Such relationship in the nearer degrees has commonly barred marriage in widely different human communities. In the code of Lev. 18, out of 14 (15) marriages forbidden to the man, 8 (9) are relationships of affinity. (See the table in PROHIBITED DEGREES.)

The ancient Roman law barred the marriage of a man with his mother-in-law or his stepmother, and with his daughter-in-law or his stepdaughter. It did not bar marriage with a deceased wife's sister till this was done by a law of Constantius II and Constans in A.D. 355, almost certainly as the result of Christian influences. The law of the Suni Musalmāns again bars the marriage of a man—(1) with his wives' female ascendants and descendants, (2) with his sons' wives or the wives of his male issue how low soever, (3) with his father's wives, or with the wives of his male ascendants how high soever. Also by the same law in polygamous marriage a man may not have as his wives at the same time either two sisters, or two women so nearly related that they might not marry one another if one of them were a man. While, however, prohibitions of marriage in cases of near A. may thus be found in the legal systems of widely different peoples, the grounds assigned for the prohibitions vary. Thus, the familiar principle of the Roman law was the principle of household modesty. The interesting theory of sapinda relationship is accepted among the Hindus.

The principle of Holy Scripture is that a man and his wife are one bāsār, flesh or kin. This principle is unreservedly stated in the account of the creation in Genesis (Gen 2 24), in the provisions of Leviticus (Lev. 18 8, 16), in the teaching of our Lord (Mt. 19 5, Mk. 10 8), and in that of St. Paul (1 Cor. 6 16). Marriage with a stepmother is forbidden in these terms: "the nakedness of thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover: it is thy father's nakedness." The father and the father's wife are one bāsār.

The degrees within which marriage is prohibited in the Church of England are enumerated in the table usually printed at the end of the PB. This table was first put forth by Abp. Parker in 1563, and was adopted by the 99th canon of 1603. Of sixty relationships enumerated forty are relationships of affinity. The 99th canon declares them "prohibited by the laws of God." The English table does not include many more distant relationships of affinity which came under ecclesiastical prohibition before the Reformation, nor does it, like the Eastern Church, recognise any bar in "affinities of two marriages," such as the relationship of a man to his brother-in-law's wife.

The case of the deceased wife's sister has recently been the subject of much attention. If the principle of one bāsār is maintained, marriage is in this case clearly barred; though it cannot be affirmed that it is certainly prohibited by Lev. 18 18, or that the Israelites in practice abstained from such unions. The Christian Church has pronounced against such marriages for Christians from the earliest formulation of the question. Nor is there any case of dispensation for such an union prior to the case of the Count de Foix dispensed by Martin V in 1427. No such dispensations have been admitted in England since the Reformation, and till 1907 the law of England was in the matter of prohibited degrees identical with the law of the Church. In that year the Deceased Wife's Sister Act, which gave civil recognition to such marriages, created a situation of contrast. Nothing has been done ecclesiastically to alter the position of Churchmen, who must be understood to have the same obligations quod Churchmen as they had before.—Ma.

O. D. WATKINS.

AFFIRMATION.—The solemn declaration, with prescribed formalities, of the truth of facts alleged by the declarant, substituted for the declaration of those facts on OATH (as formerly requisite in all courts of law and legal proceedings generally), for the relief of those who conscientiously object to the use of oaths.

Article 39 of 1571, "Of a Christian mans othe," superseded Art. 38 of 1553 (titled "Christien menne male take an Othe"), aimed in practically the same words at the Anabaptists' literal construction of such passages as Matt. 5 34, etc. The protest against oaths was continued by some of the Puritans, strongly revived by the Quakers during the Interregnum, and continued under the Restoration. Primarily in their interest, statutory forms of asseveration were provided and modified from time to time: "I A.B. doe sincerely promise and solemnly declare before God and the World" (Toleration Act, 1689); "I A.B. declare in the Presence of Almighty God the Witnessse of the Truth of what I say" (7-8 Will. III, c. 34); "I A.B. do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm" (8 Geo. I, c. 6). This formula was, however, not available for witnesses in criminal cases, for jurors, or for place in the government. In 1833 this restriction was removed (3-4 Will. IV, cc. 49, 82), and Quakers, Moravians and Separatists (and later, 1-2 Vict., c. 77, former members of those bodies) allowed to make such a declaration in all cases whatever. In 1854, a witness, satisfying the court of "sincere conscientious motives" against swearing, had the same relaxation; and by the Oaths Act, 1888 (51-2 Vict., c. 46), "every person objecting to be sworn and stating as the ground of such objection that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief," is entitled to affirm in lieu of taking an oath.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

AFFUSION.—The method of administering the Sacrament of Baptism by pouring water on the head. (See BAPTISMAL OFFICES, §§ 19, 20, 21.)—1C.

J. W. TYRER.

AGE, CANONICAL.—1. As regards Holy Orders. We find no trace of any regulation as to the minimum age required in the recipient of Holy Order during the first three centuries. The earliest legislation on the subject was by the Council of Neocaesarea (314-325); canon 11 enacts that no one shall be ordained presbyter under 30 years of age, and gives as a reason that it was at that age that our Lord began His three years' ministry. Pope Siricius (385-398) in his decretal epistle to Himerius (Migne, PL 13 1142), lays down that the minimum age for the diaconate was 30, for the priesthood 35, and for the episcopate 45. Canon 4 of the third Council of Carthage (397) enacted that the age for the diaconate was to be not less than 25; this canon is reproduced in the Excerpts of Egbert, Abp. of York (740). The Council of Agde (506) fixed 25 as the age for deacons. The second Council of Toledo enacts that a subdeacon must be 20 years of age. The Quini-Sext, or Council in Trullo (691), ordained that the age for ordination to the diaconate should be 25, and to the priesthood 30; that is still the law of the Eastern Church.

The rule prevailing in mediæval England is given in the Pupilla Oculi, a treatise written by John de Burgo, who was Chancellor of the University of Cambridge in 1384. He says, 7 4a, "according to the jus novum (i.e., the law subsequent to the era of the False Decretals, cent. 9; the law previous to that being called by the Canonists jus antiquum) a man can be ordained subdeacon who is over 17, deacon if over 19, and priest if over 24, but according to the jus antiquum the age for a priest was 28, and for a Bishop 30." Gratian, dist. 77, recognises 25 for a deacon and 30 for Priest or Bp. The latter rule was laid down by Clement V in the Council of Vienne (1311) and is incorporated in the Corpus Juris Canonici, I Clem. vi. 3. The age for a deacon was raised to 21 by the Preface of the Ordinal of 1550, and the age for a Priest was altered to 24. By canon 34 of 1604 the age for the diaconate was again raised to 23, while that for the priesthood remained at 24. In 1662 the Pref. of the Ordinal was brought into conformity with the canon, and a proviso was added, with regard to a deacon, "unless he have a faculty"; that is to say, unless he has obtained a DISPENSATION; and it would seem that this should be from the Abp. of Canterbury.

The Council of Trent fixed 22 for the subdiaconate, 23 for the diaconate, 25 for the priesthood, and 30 for the episcopate. This is interpreted to mean that a man must have completed his 21st, 22nd, and 24th years respectively.

2. As regards Marriage. The Canon Law regards want of age as an impediment to marriage. It adopted from the Roman Civil Law, that is, the law of the Roman Empire, the age of 12 for a girl and of 14 for a boy as necessary to enable them to contract marriage. But if a marriage contract was entered into by parties who had not reached the legal age, that did not necessarily invalidate the marriage. The question of fact as to their physical and intellectual capacity could be tried in the Courts. Under the age of seven it was generally held that the contract would be invalid. Cp. Panormitanus, de despons. impub., and Esmein, Le Mariage au Droit Canonique 1 211.

3. As regards Discretion. The presumption in Canon Law is that under the age of seven a child is not doli capax, is not of years of discretion; between 7 and 14 the child may be so, but over fourteen it is presumed to have arrived at that age.—7A (A4).

E. G. WOOD.

AGNUS DEI.—After the Pr. of Consecration, it has been customary since the 7th cent., in many places in the West, to sing or say a threefold repetition of the words "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us." In later times—not before the 10th cent.—the phrase "grant us thy peace" was substituted at the third repetition; and about the same time the Agnus was inserted in the Lit. The Agnus was appointed in the First PB to be sung by the clerks in the Communion time. This order was omitted in 1552, and has not been re-inserted. But Abp. Benson (Linc. Judg., § 6) found that the singing of the Agnus in English, "being a well-known Hymn or Anthem used in the Lit., and forming part of the Gloria in excelsis, in words taken out of the Bible (John 1 29 and Ps. 51 1, et passim)" . . . "could only be condemned on the ground that any and every hymn at this place would be illegal, which cannot be maintained in the face of concurrent, continuous and sanctioned usage. To condemn the singing of that text here as unsound in doctrine would be contrary to the real force of Ridley's injunction, and to other unexceptional Protestant teaching."

N.B.—Ridley's injunction was the forbidding of the "Minister . . . saying" (privately) "the Agnus before the Communion"; "lest the people should be edified," is Foxe's sarcastic note, quoted by the Archbishop. (See further, RITUAL, v.)—H2. MAURICE F. BELL.

AISLE.—In 333 Constantine's basilica was erected at Jerusalem. Eusebius gives some interesting particulars. It had double porticoes or, as we should say, A's (ἀίτων στοῶν—Vita Constant. 3 37), and two rows of pillars with colonnades which stretched through the whole extent of the temple. The normal formation of a church seems to be nave with two As. and CHANCEL or Choir with two As., the As. at first being colonnades on either side, affording passage room north and south. Subsequently they were enlarged until the time came when accommodation was required, and these As. were widened and a passage down the centre of the nave was formed. A very common mistake in nomenclature is to call that central passage "the middle A."; A. being derived from ala (contraction from axilla), a wing, can never be in the centre of the body. The Greeks called a temple possessing colonnades ἀίτερος or αἰτερος, with the common notion of a wing. The nave As. were used by lay persons to view processions, and at Norwich the rings remain in the pillars through which the ropes were drawn on such occasions. (See Walsh's Sacred Architecture, Parker, Bloxam, etc.)—R6.

J. J. HOWSON.

ALB or ALBE.—A robe made of white linen, the length of a cassock but much fuller in construction, with close-fitting sleeves, worn by the celebrant and occasionally by the servers and other ministers at the service of HC. The A. is undoubtedly derived from the Roman tunic, and, like other vestments, originally formed part of the ordinary dress of the Roman citizen. Its use as an ecclesiastical vestment dates back to primitive times, and, although the exact date at which it came into use in the Christian Church cannot be fixed, it is referred to, together with other vestments, at the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) as being generally worn. Those who still wear it in the Church of England¹ declare that they derive their authority from the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.—R3.

J. O. COOP.

ALLEGIANCE.—See OATH.

ALLELUIA.—This Hebrew word A. (= "Praise the Lord"), which begins and sometimes ends a number of the Ps. (e.g., Ps. 146-150), was, like Amen and Hosanna, adopted without translation in the Christian Church. Its occurrence in the NT (Rev. 19 1, 3, 4, 6) was no doubt the cause of this. It was used as a shout of praise or victory (so in Rev.—cp. Sozomen, HE 7 15; Bede, HE 1 20). Hence it was early employed in the services of the Ch. In the West and among the Copts its use was considered specially appropriate for Easter—so Augustine, Ep. 55 Ben., ad Januarium. In the 1st PB an A. was appointed to be said after the first Gloria Patri at MEP, "from Easter to Trinity Sunday," and it also occurred in the Easter Anthems; in each place it was unfortunately omitted in 1552. As early as the 4th cent. A. was sung after the GRADUAL on certain Festivals, and afterwards it supplanted the Gradual altogether on these occasions. From the prolongation of the last syllable of the A. was derived the SEQUENCE. In the Irish PB an A. is permitted to be sung after the Gospel as an alternative to "Thanks be to thee, O Lord." (See arts. Alleluia in DCA and Cabrol's DAC; also art. Hallelujah in Hastings' DB.)—D2. MAURICE F. BELL.

¹ The A. was still in use in 1783 at Bledlow Church, Bucks, and is mentioned in the churchwardens' accounts. (See Dr. Wickham Legg in S.P.E.S. Trans., v, pp. 229-50.)

ALL SAINTS.—See FESTIVAL, § 40; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONAL), § 21.

ALL SOULS' DAY.—The day (Nov. 2nd) next after All Saints', observed in the West from the 10th cent. downwards as a day of special pr. for all departed Christians, but abrogated in Eng. at the Reformation.—C2. J. W. TYRER.

ALMS.—That which is given out of pity; from the Gk. ἐλεημοσύνη (pity). From six syllables the word has dwindled into one through the older form almesse. The word is singular.

1. Brief Historical Notice.

"asked an alms," Acts 3 3. Alms-giving has always been considered a part of worship. In Dan. 4 27 (Gk. 4 24) the word righteousness is translated in the LXX alms: "Break off thy sins by righteousness (alms) and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor." Trumpet-shaped alms-boxes were in the temple, and the man laid at the beautiful gate of the temple is lying there still. In the Sermon on the Mount our Lord mentions alms-giving as a recognised duty, "When thou doest alms." St. Paul was always collecting A. and enjoining it on others (1 Cor. 16 2). The subject is often mentioned in early Christian writings from Justin Martyr (155) downwards; cp. Cyprian's treatise Of Work and Alms-deeds (Benson, Cyprian 246 ff.). It is to be noticed, as was acknowledged even by Julian the Apostate, that the mercy of the Church was not confined to its own members (for instances, cp. DCA, p. 58). The alms-box of the Christian Church succeeded the alms-box of the temple. Institutions, like that of St. Basil at Cæsarea, were supported by the Church for the old and for orphans as well as hospitals for the sick and strangers. The offerings of the Church were in the West generally divided into four: (1) for the bishop, (2) for the clergy, (3) for the poor, (4) for church repairs; or (1) church, (2) clergy, (3) poor, (4) strangers. Offerings were often made in kind as they are still in some countries; see the details of an interesting collection at Rorke's Drift in Rivington's Handbook to PB 279. In the Roman Mass the bread to be consecrated was selected from that offered by the people. Special offerings were often made, and were connected with fasting days and penance. We are reminded of them by the word "briefs" in the Communion Service.

Briefs are royal Letters Patent for collections for special purposes. They were frequent in the 17th cent. and are often noticed in parish registers, e.g. at Porlock, "for the Protestant churches in Lithuania, 8s. 8d.," "for Mrs. Darmond, the wife of Dr. Darmond in Ireland, 5s." Briefs were sent out "for the sad fire in London," for "the redemption of slaves in Algeria"; but none have been issued since 1854 (cp. Hook's Church Dict., s. v.).

The method of collecting A. was in the earlier times for the poor to wait outside the church.

2. Method of Collecting.

Also there was an alms-chest, with a slot in the lid, at times in the church porch. See an interesting description of such a chest in Heckfield Church in Cox and Harvey's English Church Furniture 294 ff., a book which is very helpful on this subject for the illustrations as well as the text. The chest in question is possibly of the date of King John, when Innocent III ordered such chests to be put in English churches for the collection of money for the Crusade. In the time of Edward VI many of these chests were taken away. Still there remained "the poor men's box," and it is interesting to notice the changes with regard to the offering of A. in our PB. In 1549 the rubric was: "... Whiles the Clerks do sing the Offertory, so many as are disposed shall offer to the poor men's box, every one according to his ability and charitable mind." This system of collection was evidently found inconvenient, so in 1552 the rubric was altered to: "Then shall the Church wardens or some other by them appointed gather the devotion of the people, and put the same into the poor men's box." It was not till 1662 that our present rubric appeared, following the Scottish Liturgy of 1637 which directed that "... the deacon or (if no such be present) one of the churchwardens shall receive the devotions of the people there present, in a bason provided for that purpose. And when all have offered, he shall reverently bring the said bason, with the oblations therein, and deliver it to the presbyter, who shall humbly present it before the Lord, and set it upon the holy table." This was a return to the usual custom of the Latin Service-books, which directed that the A. should be taken up by the people to the Altar steps after the oblation of the elements, "first the men, then the women."

Alms boxes originally stood not longwise but upright, sometimes merely hollowed out of a rough log. There are a few left from pre-Reformation times, and these are illustrated in Cox and Harvey, op. cit. 240 ff., and a list and description given of such as remain.

2. Receptacles for Alms.

Offertory boxes were for special devotions; they continued the custom of the slot in shrines. All wooden examples of these have disappeared, but some stone ones remain (cp. Cox and Harvey, 243 sqq.).

Collecting boxes were made of wood with a handle of about 9 to 12 in. long. Some interesting examples remain, and one belonging to Holy Trinity, Guildford, is illustrated in Cox and Harvey, op. cit. 247.

Alms dishes are of Post-Reformation date. Some very interesting specimens are illustrated in Mr. E. H. Freshfield's book on the Communion Plate of the Churches of the City of London.

Alms bags are quite a modern but convenient device for obeying the injunction of Matt. 6 3, 4. Canon 84 should be studied on this subject; its references to the Injunction of Edward VI are marked, though the Injunction is not quoted.—Ht.

BERNARD REYNOLDS.

ALMS BOX.—See ALMS, § 3.

ALMSGIVING.—A. (ἐλεημοσύνη, pity) may be defined as "something freely given, in money or in kind, to the needy from motives of pity towards the recipient and of love towards God"; or more shortly as "a material service rendered to the poor for Christ's sake." The duty of sharing with others the material things which God has given to man is prominent in the Mosaic Dispensation (cp. Lev. 19 9, 10, 23 22, Deut. 15 11, 24 19, etc.). The obligation thus early impressed on the Jewish Ch. sank deep into the national conscience, and passages from the Deutero-canonical books show how important a place A. grew to occupy in the religious life of the Jews, being regarded as not only a sacred duty, but as having far-reaching effects, e.g., "delivering from death" (Tob. 4 7, 11), "purging from sin" (Tob. 12 8, 9, Ecclus. 3 30), "delivering from affliction" (Ecclus. 29 12, 13).

1. A Duty.

Our blessed Lord in impressing upon the Ch. of the New Dispensation the duty of A. accepts the earlier teaching of the OT, and assumes, without argument, its continued obligation. The maxim of Tobit (12 8), "good is prayer with fasting and alms," He takes up and enlarges in His Sermon on the Mount where He treats A. (Matt. 6 1-4) in close association with Pr. (Matt. 6 5-15) and Fasting (Matt. 6 16-18). The Master's teaching was fully recognised by the first members of the Ch., and its sacred obligation constantly insisted upon and consistently carried out (Acts 11 27-30, 20 35, 1 Cor. 16 1, 2, 2 Cor. 9). Indeed in the earliest days of the Ch. of Jerusalem an attempt was even made to establish a community of wealth (Acts 4 34, 35). And, though this effort gained no further footing, the Ch. has never ceased to teach that A. stands side by side with Pr. and Fasting among the three Notable Duties.

There are two questions which are matters of grave concern to every Christian. (1) What amount of money should the Christian dedicate to Almsgiving? (2) On what principle should the Alms so dedicated be expended? The answer to (1) can only be finally determined for each man by the judgment of a well-instructed conscience; that to (2) must vary as the conditions of social life vary from age to age. It may, however, be pointed out that the rule of devoting one-tenth of our substance to God finds a conspicuous sanction in the Holy Scriptures. Abraham in offering a tenth of the spoils to Melchisedech (Gen. 14 20) seems to be following a custom already long established, and this custom received sanction and enforcement in the Mosaic Dispensation. Those who adopt it have found that it secures consistency and generosity in giving, and leaves one point only to be solved—how the money dedicated to God may be best distributed. This raises the second question above referred to. The social circumstances of the present day make it impossible to follow in the letter the Divine precept, "Give to every one that asketh thee" (Luke 6 30), without doing a serious injury to the community at large. We must read it in connection with other Divine precepts as inconsistent, e.g., "Blessed is he that considereth the poor and needy" (Ps. 41 1), i.e., inquires into their individual circumstances; and again, "If any will not work neither let him eat" (2 Thess. 3 10). Probably the most effective way of A. in the present day, apart from relieving cases of poverty and suffering known to be deserving, is to support Institutions which have for their object either the organised relief, or the prevention, of poverty, distress and suffering.—K³. J. R. BULLOCK-WEBSTER.

2. Method of Fulfilment.

ALMUCE (Amess, or Amyss).—Not to be confused with the AMICE; the almuce is a cape with tippet, or a hooded-scarf of fur, worn by dignitaries and other clergy during the Choir Offices. The tippet-ends of the A. hang down in front, after the manner of a stole. This vesture appears originally to have been worn for warmth, when churches were not artificially heated. We find illustrations of clergy carrying the A. over the arm. The academical hood and the modern black silk scarf appear to have been derived or evolved from the ancient A. The A. is identical with the "tippet of saibles." There is good evidence that the fur A. was worn in Q. Elizabeth's reign. (See Atchley in Some Principles of the PB, pp. 2, 3; Hierurgia Anglicana, new ed., 1, Index. For illustrations of the almuce see St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. Trans. 4 214, 216; De Moleon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 48.)—K³. V. STALEY.

ALTAR.—The structure on (or at) which the Euch. is celebrated cannot be said, with certainty, to be directly named in the NT. The "Lord's Table" in 1 Cor. 10 21 seems to mean the Holy Food on the Table rather than the Table itself; and neither Catholic nor Protestant commentators agree among themselves as to exactly what the "altar" in Heb. 13 10 is to be taken to mean. But as early as the 3rd cent. we find the Euch. Table called by terms which signify a place for sacrifice or oblation. The Latin Fathers in this connection favoured the word altare. In the East, terminological development took a similar, though not absolutely identical, course; Eastern usage has had however so little influence on the language and structure of our PB that it will not be worth while to consider it further here, or subsequently in this art.¹ It is easy to understand how the term A. came to be applied to the Euch. Table.

¹ [In the East "Table," with some adj. such as "Holy" annexed, is the usual name for the A. And it is quite possible this fact influenced the compilers of the PB.]

The influence of the principle contained in the maxim that "Sacred Signs are called by the names of the things which they represent" may be discerned in the language of the OT; certainly it worked powerfully in the formation of Christian ecclesiastical terminology from the earliest times. Hence, it is easy to understand (without it being necessary to inquire for deeper theological reasons) how it came to pass that the Sacr. in which is made "the continual remembrance of the Sacrifice of the Death of Christ" was itself termed a Sacrifice, and so the Table at which it is celebrated would naturally be termed an A. The transference of sacrificial terms to the Euch. and its accessories came into the Church "without observation," and excited at its origin neither comment nor controversy.

All authors agree that the earliest As. were movable slabs or tables of wood, but by the 4th cent. stone As. were in use; we read also about that period of As. of the precious metals. Stone As. became before long the rule in the Latin Church, though the use of wooden As. lingered on. There is no evidence that the change of material was motivated by any development of Euch. doctrine; it was caused simply by a change in ecclesiastical fashion.

Fixed stone As. usually assumed one of two forms. They consisted either (a) of a slab supported on other slabs, or on one or more columns; or (b) of a slab laid on a hollow or solid tomb-like erection of brick, marble, or stone, ornamented with carving, or plain. Both these forms can claim a high antiquity. The origin of the table-like stone As. is obvious; the origin of the tomb-like As. raises questions to which the learned have not yet found conclusive answers. It is known that from very early times, in the Roman catacombs and elsewhere, a slab placed over the burial-place of a martyr served as an A. for the celebration of the Euch. Did the tomb-like As. take their origin from this custom? The learned are not agreed as to this.

It is said that there is no evidence for the consecration of an A., distinct from the consecration of a Church, before the 6th cent.; such consecrations, however, became customary in course of time, and by the Middle Ages they had become a ceremony of extraordinary complexity. It is certain that sometimes As. were consecrated without enshrining in them what were assumed to be relics of saints; eventually, however, the enshrining of relics became very generally an integral part of the ceremony of consecration. The origin of this rite will be clear from what has been said above about the practice in the Catacombs and elsewhere.

At the beginning of the 16th cent. every A. in our English churches was of stone and fixed; all had been consecrated with the elaborate mediæval rite; all, or nearly all, were supposed to contain relics, of one kind or another; most of the principal As. were of the tomb-like form built of plain stone, dressed or plastered over; carved and sculptured As. were not unknown. These As. were arrayed in frontals of more or less costly stuffs, and were commonly enshrined within curtains suspended at their sides. On the A. slab during time of Divine Service stood at least two candlesticks with tapers, and between them there usually was a Cross or CRUCIFIX.¹ Such were the As. which the Edwardian Reformers found in our churches.

From the first it was evident that men of two very different tendencies existed among these Reformers. Conservative influence is very evident in the PB of 1549. To pass by other particulars, the Communion Service therein is described as "commonly called the Mass," and the rubrics explicitly recognise "the A." eo nomine. But, in 1550, even while As. were recognised as lawful by the rubrics of the authoritative PB, the Privy Council issued an Injunction ordering their general destruction. The order was obeyed.² During Mary's brief reign As. were restored. But their removal was again provided for, though not required, by Royal Injunction, under Elizabeth.

4. Their Destruction.

When the Conservatives gained some influence during the succeeding reigns nothing was more marked than their line of action with regard to As. The Puritans accused them of setting up As. again; the accusation was true. Whenever they had the opportunity they erected fixed As. of marble or stone; few, if any, of these structures survived the devastations of the Great Rebellion. After the Restoration, though movable Tables became, or continued to be, the rule, yet fixed As. of marble or stone were not infrequently erected without prohibition or censure.

5. Since the Reformation.

This state of things came to an end in 1845 through the imprudence of an architectural society which superintended the restoration of St. Sepulchre's, Cambridge, and sought to compel the Vicar to allow, against his own judgment, the erection of a fixed stone A. as part of the restoration. Sir H. Jenner Fust, in the Court of Arches, ordered the A. to be removed, mainly relying for the legal determination of the case on the fact that As. had been taken away, under Royal Injunctions, issued in Queen Elizabeth's reign. Subsequently, in the St. Barnabas', Pimlico, case in 1857, the Privy Council practically adopted Sir H. Jenner Fust's judgment and its reasons, and ordered the removal of a fixed stone A.; and there, as far as legal pronouncements go, the matter remains.

Though the Church of England has abundantly recognised the lawfulness of the primitive custom of using a movable wooden Table for the celebration of the Euch., yet by no canonical or official pronouncement has the Church ever repudiated the term A. as suitable to the Lord's Table; this use of the term has never died out in the usual written or spoken parlance of Church of England men, and it has found a place in official or quasi-official documents of one kind or another. Neither has the Church ever synodically condemned the use of fixed stone As., which were removed without lawful canonical authority. It is to be regretted that the character of the chief ornament of our churches should be held to be ruled by action taken more than 300 years ago at a peculiarly disturbed period, when everything in Church and State differed from everything as it exists now. Common sense and history alike assure us that no doctrine concerning the Euch., false or true, is in fact involved in the material of the structure at which it is celebrated, or in its fixity or the reverse. [See further, LORD'S TABLE.]—R3. T. I. BALL.

ALTAR CLOTH.—See CARPET.

ALTAR LINEN.—See CORPORAS, FAIR LINEN CLOTH, PALL (iii), PURIFICATOR.

ALTAR PIECE.—See REREDOS, § 2.

AMBO, the ancient form of the modern pulpit. One or more ambones were provided in the early basilicas as adapted for Christian worship, from which the Scripture lessons were read and sermons preached. That on the North side of the church was reserved for the Gospel, and that on the South side for the Epistle, at the Eucharist.—R3. V. STALEY.

AMBROSIAN MUSIC.—AM. is the earliest system of M. used in Ch. worship of which we have any account, so called because introduced by St. Ambrose (Bp. of Milan, 374-397) into the ch.'s of his diocese during a persecution by the Arian Empress Justina, "lest the people should wax faint through the tediousness of sorrow" (Augustine, Conf. 9 7). Bef. the time of St. Ambrose such slight inflexions were used in singing or chanting that, as St. Augustine tells us of the Ps.-singer at Alexandria, "the effect was more like distinct reading than singing" (Conf. 10 33). But St. Ambrose, borrowing from the Greeks in this as in the matter of ANTIPHONAL SINGING, adopted their more melodious musical system for the services of his Ch. From the Greeks St. Ambrose borrowed four "modes" corresponding to the four (perhaps seven) white notes on our modern pianofortes that follow D, E, F and G respectively. These four modes differ from one another, like our major and minor scales, in the places of their semitones, and therefore the melodies formed from them vary considerably in "atmosphere," and were classified by old writers as being characteristically joyous, grave, exulting, or sweet. Many of these A. melodies were undoubtedly rhythmical; the hymns written by St. Ambrose for them were composed in a variety of metres. The study of AM. is of interest because it largely contributed to the formation in after years of the Roman Ch. Song finally codified by St. Gregory (c. 600) and brought into England by St. Augustine and his monks in 597.—Q2 MAURICE F. BELL.

AMEN.—A Hebrew word signifying "firmly," which was employed as a form of solemn agreement to religious formulæ (Deut. 27 15 ff., Neh. 8 6). From the Jews it passed unchanged into the Christian Ch., and has been used ever since NT times by the people at the end of prs. to express their assent (1 Cor. 14 16; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 65, etc., etc.—see Cat. Ans. aft. Lord's Pr.). It occurs also at the end of Doxologies (Rom. 9 5, etc.), Hymns and Creeds, where it is a strong asseveration of belief in what has just been said. (See art. Amen in DCA, Cabrol's DAC, and Hastings' DB.)—B2. J. W. TYRER.

¹ [But see Cross, § 3, 4.]

² See Dixon's History of the Church of England 3 200, etc.

AMERICA.—See UNITED STATES, PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF.

AMERICAN PB.—In the American Colonies along the Atlantic coast, from the foundation of Jamestown in 1607 until the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the English BCP was used by the members and adherents of the Eng. Church. No edition of the book was printed in the Colonies, though parts of it were published in a translation for the use of converted Mohawk Indians, and a modified edition of certain parts was printed for the followers of the Wesleys. As the Mother Ch. sent no bps. to America, all candidates for Ordination were obliged to run the risks of a voyage across the sea and endure its dangers with those of pestilence and the violence of enemies, and no colonial churchman could receive Confirmation unless he was called for some reason to cross the ocean. It is said that the omission of the short Exh. at the end of the office for the Bapt. of Infants was the only variation which the clergy of those days allowed in the PB services, so strict was their definition of conformity.

When the War of Independence broke out, and as it was protracted for seven years, the practice of the clergy varied. A few read the services in public as before, with no omission or change even in the State Prs.; a few, with like convictions as to the obligation of their oaths of allegiance, when they found that they could not use all that was in the PB, made no use of it at all, but gathered their people together for a service taken entirely from Holy Scripture; while no inconsiderable number, convinced that a lawful change had been made in their allegiance, read the old services with modifications in the words which spoke of the civil authority. As there were several Colonies, federated rather than united, which declared their independence, and as Great Britain at the end of the war acknowledged them severally to be independent, so there was for a while the possibility of separate action on the part of churchmen in different districts of the country; there was a critical period in Ch. as well as in State. The line of separate action was, owing to reasons which cannot be stated here, that which separated New England from New York and the states farther south. The churchmen of Connecticut, with whom their neighbours to the north and east were in harmony, were not willing to act without a bp.; and, in March, 1783, when the war was practically over, yet eight months before the British evacuated New York, they chose a bp. and sent him across the ocean to seek consecration in England, or, failing there, in Scotland. He came back in 1785—Bishop Samuel Seabury, with the "free, valid, and purely ecclesiastical episcopacy" which Scottish bps. had imparted to him; and after conference with his clergy he set forth in a broadside certain necessary changes in the PB which he charged them to make. The clergy and laity of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and other States in 1785 drafted an "ecclesiastical constitution," framed a petition to the English authorities for the gift of the episcopate, and proposed an amended form of the PB. This latter was intended to be on the lines of the proposed revision of 1689 in England, but it was so radical that it found no favour on either side of the ocean. Other and wiser action followed, the proposed book being practically withdrawn; and early in 1787 two bps. were consecrated in Lambeth Palace Chapel for American sees—William White for Pennsylvania and Samuel Provoost for New York.

Meanwhile Bp. Seabury had set forth and recommended to his clergy the form of the Communion Office which he had found in Scotland, resembling that in the First PB of Edward VI, but conformed in its order to the primitive and Oriental uses.¹ By God's blessing on the patience and wisdom of Bps. Seabury and White, Drs. Smith and Parker, and others, the Ch. in the United States came together into one in the year 1789; and a revision of the Eng. PB was soon set forth for use in that Church. The work was done rapidly, but not without preparation. In fact, it is evident that thoughtful men had had in mind desirable verbal alterations and needed adaptations in the use of the several services, and that thus their earnest purposes were found to be in accord. Some omissions were made of varying importance, the most noticeable being probably that of Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, with the abbreviation of Benedictus to four verses; some freedom of choice was given, of which the most serious instance was that of allowing the Apostles' Cr. to displace the Nicene on any day in the year. The Lit. was shortened by condensing into one all the petitions for civil rulers and magistrates; many repetitions were removed; permission was given for shortening the Bapt. Office under certain conditions; the Ornaments Rubric disappeared, as did the mediæval Absol. in the VS; the "Athanasian" hymn was omitted, though some wished it retained without any order for its recitation; Tables of Lessons were inserted more serviceable than those which had been in use. Some additions were made, as of three non-penitential Sentences at the beginning of MEP, several much needed special Prs. and Thanksgivings, our Lord's summary of the Law (for discretionary use) after the Ten Commandments, and a service for a day of Thanksgiving for the fruits of the earth. But the great change, made with general approval and in its value far outbalancing any losses that were incurred, was the adoption in the Communion Office of the Pr. of Consecration from Bp. Seabury's service, with one modification in the Invocation; this brought the

¹ A collation (made by the writer of the present art.) of the Scottish Communion Office with Bp. Seabury's will be found in Dowden's Annotated SCO., App. F.

Amer. Office into historical and spiritual harmony with the Ch. of primitive days, while it lifted the great act of Eucharistic worship above the storms of controversy, and became a bond of union in this Ch. for all time. Apart from the points specially noted, the revision in America in 1789 was notably parallel, in its methods and value, to that in England in 1661-2. The Ordinal was set forth in 1792, the form of Consecration of a Ch. in 1799, and the Office of Institution of Ministers (rarely used) in 1804; the Arts. of Religion were appended in 1801.

The PB, thus adapted for the use of the Amer. Ch. and established by constitutional and canonical provision, served without modification for more than a century. Proposals for the authorisation of shorter services and for the relaxation of certain rubrics were made at several times, but failed to meet with approval; and a strong spirit of loyalty to established order constantly prevailed.

In 1880, as the first cent. of the work of the fully organised Ch. in the United States was drawing to an end, the General Convention, on the motion of the Rev. Dr. William R. Huntington, appointed a committee of bishops, presbyters, and laymen to consider the matter of proposing "alterations in the BCP in the direction of liturgical enrichment and flexibility of use." This committee as its first act declared that it would make no proposal which might affect the Ch.'s principles or statements of doctrine, and then proceeded, practically on the lines of 1661-2 and 1789, to consider a large number of changes and additions, many of which had been for some time in the minds of men, and printed with its report a Book Annexed showing the PB with all the alterations which it recommended for adoption or serious consideration. The work of revision and of proposals for revision continued for twelve years, and was closed by the setting forth of a new Standard Book, carefully edited, in 1892. No change was made, or indeed could have been made, which did not have the approval of two consecutive General Conventions in the vote of the three Orders; and very few changes were made for which the final vote was not practically unanimous. The Ch. was willing to trust herself to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and the work was accomplished to the great satisfaction of all. Many of the changes were for the correction or amplifying of rubrics or the readjustment of certain occasional Offices, and call for no notice here. Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were brought back to their old place, and Benedictus was restored to its full form; the Nicene Cr. was ordered to be used at least on the five great festivals of the year; more Invitatory Sentences, chiefly adapted to the Ch.'s seasons, were prefixed to MEP, and provision was made for shortening these services, practically to their original English form; a Penitential Office was inserted, in place of the three prayers from the Communion

4. The Revision of 1892.

Service which had thus far been retained; occasional Prs. for Missions, for Unity, and for use at Rogation-tide, were added; the festival of the Transfiguration was placed in the Calendar on Aug. 6 and provided with proper Pss., Coll., Ep. and Gospel; provision was made for a first Communion on Christmas and Easter; permission was given to omit the Decalogue (the Summary being read in its place) except once on each Sunday, and the long Exh. when it has been read on one Sunday in the month; a form of presentation of candidates and a Lesson from Acts 8 were provided for use at Confirm.; provision was made for abbreviating the Communion of the Sick and the Bapt. of Adults in cases of necessity; in the Marriage Service, which was and is much shorter than that in the English Book, some phrases were restored in the Exh.; three additional Prs. were placed at the end of the Burial Office; Proper Pss. were assigned for ten days in addition to the former six; and twenty selections of Pss.—there had been ten before—were provided for use at any service which has not proper Pss. of its own.

Thus the PB, received from the Eng. Ch., adapted to the needs of the independent Ch. in the United States at the time of its organisation, again carefully revised with very general consent to meet possibilities of service for a new cent., is offered to the people of the great republic by the body whose special use it is. It holds a strong position as its use is sanctioned by canonical provision; but its place in the affections of those who use it is increasingly more strong.

—BT.

SAMUEL HART.

AMESS, AMYSS.—See ALMUCE.

AMICE.—This vesture is not to be confused with the Amess, Amyss, or Almuce (see ALMUCE). The A. is a square or oblong linen vesture, with an apparel or collar attached to one edge, at first used to cover the neck and shoulders of the priest at the Communion. It was originally a covering for the head, as well as for the neck and shoulders. The custom still survives of letting the A. rest momentarily upon the head, and adjusting it to fall back upon the neck when the rest of the Eucharistic vestments—the alb, girdle, stole, maniple and chasuble—have been assumed. The A. is thus the first of the vestments to be put on. See Hierurgia Anglic. 1, Index.—R3.

V. STALEY.

AMPULLA.—(1) The vessel in which is kept the consecrated oil or holy cream for chrism, unction, or coronation. The ampulla is always used for anointing the English sovereign at coronation. This English vessel is of gold, shaped like an eagle with outspread wings, and is about 9 in. high. (2) The pair of cruets (ampullae)—one for wine, one for water—used in preparing the chalice, and in rinsing the paten and chalice at HC. Both of these ceremonies were ruled to be legal in the English Church by Archbp. Benson in the Lincoln Case, A.D. 1890.—R3.

V. STALEY.

ANABAPTISTS.—The earlier sects on which this name was bestowed held varying views of a revolutionary, fanatical, and heretical nature, and sprang up in Germany, Switzerland and Holland about 1521. They all agreed in their condemnation of the practice of infant baptism, and the majority of them expected the immediate establishment of Christ's millennial reign, which they endeavoured to inaugurate by attempting to overthrow existing civil institutions. The leaders of the Peasant Revolt in Germany in 1525 were inspired with these theories. Their tenets, besides tending to subvert the general order of society, often degenerated into unbridled licentiousness and immorality. A number of fanatical A. obtained control of the city of Munster, in Westphalia, in 1533, and committed fearful excesses until the city was besieged and taken in 1536 and many of their leaders tortured and executed.

They usually advocated a community of goods and universal equality, the unlawfulness of oaths, vows and holding of civil offices by Christians, while they maintained the superiority of the inspired utterances of their visionary preachers over the written Word of God. Some even advocated polygamy and affirmed that those who were truly regenerate were incapable of sinning. Many denied the doctrines of original sin, the atonement and the divinity of Christ, and declared that salvation was the reward of virtuous conduct and in no way connected with faith. They were vigorously persecuted by both Romanists and Protestants, and often suffered death for their opinions. Some of these early A. came to England and made some converts, and in 1541 a very severe Act was passed against them.

A second and more moderate party started about 1536 largely owing to the teaching and labours of Menno Simonis of Friesland, an ex-Romish priest, and many congregations were formed in Germany and the Low Countries. These "Mennonites," at first usually composed of the earlier A. who had been disgusted with the excesses of their leaders, slavishly adhered to the letter of the Scriptures, and were at first very strict and austere in their manner of living. They were strongly opposed to precise dogmatic definitions, considering piety the surest index of a true Ch. Besides their denunciation of infant baptism, they strongly objected to the use of oaths and the holding of civil offices. A more moderate section, however, called the "Waterlanders," soon arose and drew up a Confession of Faith in 1580, and, as they gradually modified their views, their tenets soon differed but little from the Confessions of other Reformed Churches, while their discipline was similar to that of the Independents.

The first congregation of English "General" or "Arminian" Baptists appeared soon after 1610, and probably derived many of their opinions from the Continental Mennonites. The "Particular" or Calvinistic Baptists trace their origin from an Independent congregation in London in 1616, from which they formally separated in 1633, and their teaching has nothing in common with the peculiar views of the original A. except on the question of infant baptism. (See further, BAPTISTS.)

See Mosheim's Eccl. Hist., cent. 16, sect. 3, pt. 3, c. 3; Hardwicke's Hist. of Reformation, c. 5; Ridley's Works, p. 367; Parker Soc., Original Letters, pp. 65 and 87; Neal, Hist. of Puritans 5, c. 14 (1822 ed.).
—A1. C. SYDNEY CARTER.

ANAPHORA.—In the Eastern Liturgies the Euch. service is divided into Pro-anaphora, i.e., the earlier part up to the Sursum Corda; and A. ("offering-up"), or most solemn part of the service. The latter includes (1) Thanksgiving, (2) Recital of Institution, (3) Great Oblation, (4) Invocation (Epiclesis), (5) Intercession for the Church, (6) Communion. See Liturgies of St. Clement, St. James, etc. (Brightman, Eastern Liturgies).—H2.

J. F. KEATING.

ANCIENT PARISH.—See PARISH, ANCIENT.

ANDREW, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 26; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 1.

ANGELS.—(i) The credibility of the existence of A. depends greatly on our presuppositions. 1.

1. Angels Credible.

The belief requires the conviction that the ultimate reality is spirit. It is based on a spiritual conception of the Universe. 2. The suggestions of evolution confirm it. Fiske assures us that "in the long series of organic beings man is the last the cosmic process, having once evolved this masterpiece, could thenceforth do nothing better than perfect him" (Through Nature to God, p. 85). But, as Prof. Laurie says, "Only within his own orb is man the crown of things. To say more is arrogance" (Synthetica 2 56). Can reason justify the assumption that the whole Universe contains no nobler creature than a man? Is there no more perfect form of created self-expression in existence than this inadequate mortal animal human frame?

"They who have flesh, a veil of youth and strength
About each spirit, that needs must bide its time Living and learning still as years assist,
Which wear the thickness thin, and let men see."

But there may well be created beings who have no flesh, who need not bide their time before they see. Scientific writers are prepared to recognise this; witness Sir Oliver Lodge, The Substance of Faith allied with Science, ed. 3, p. 60: "Are there any beings higher in the scale of existence than man? Man is the highest of the dwellers on the planet earth, but the earth is only one of many planets warmed by the sun, and the sun is only one of a myriad of similar suns . . . We may reasonably conjecture that in some of the innumerable worlds, circling round those distant suns, there must be beings far higher in the scale of existence than ourselves; indeed we have no knowledge which enables us to assert the absence of intelligence anywhere . . . The existence of higher beings and of a Highest Being is a fundamental element in every religious creed. There is no scientific reason for imagining it possible that man is the highest intelligent existence—there is no reason to suppose that we dwellers on this planet know more about the universe than any other existing creature. Such an idea, strictly speaking, is absurd." The same author scouts the denial of higher intelligences than man as only an instance of the self-glorifying instinct of the human mind: a provincialism which science should dispel. "It is possible to find people who, knowing nothing or next to nothing of the Universe, are prepared to limit existence to that of which they have had experience, and to measure the cosmos in terms of their own understanding. Their confidence in themselves, their shut minds and self-satisfied hearts, are things to marvel at. The fact is that no glimmer of a conception of the real magnitude and complexity of existence can ever have illuminated their cosmic view" (p. 63).

3. This leads one to add that intrinsically an Angel is a more credible being than a man. An ethereal race might find excellent reasons for disbelieving in the possibility of a being half spirit and half clay. It might, apart from experience, be plausibly affirmed that the existence of unconscious material by itself was credible, or the existence of rational spirit by itself; but a weird combination of both, a compound of flesh and spirit, was unthinkable. Such an existence, it might be said, could only be expressed in paradox. It could think, for it was spirit: it could not think, for it was matter. How could these incompatible elements be fused into unity and yet retain their characteristics? An Angel would have much better reasons for denying the existence of a man than man can find for denying that of angels.

(ii) The distinctively modern objection to the doctrine of A. comes from the student of the history of Religions. Angelology is prevalent in many ancient beliefs. It is suggested that the doctrine was taken over into Israel from foreign sources, and adopted by our Lord just as He adopted other contemporary assumptions.

1. On the other hand, there is an intrinsic fitness in the part assigned to A. in the life of Christ corresponding with His uniqueness, and in perfect keeping with their rank in the scale of being. "The Angels who sung 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, goodwill toward men,' were the fitting choir for such a song," wrote Macleod, Campbell (Memoirs, 2 101). He adds: "But we rather believe that they were angels who so sung than that the song is divine because they sung it." The point is that there is an unearthly grace and dignity about their movements and their messages. The Gospel account of them has been the inspiration of the most graceful and ethereal work of painters and poets.

2. Ultimately for us Christians the belief in the existence of A. rests on the Authority of Jesus Christ. It is difficult to say that our Lord took over a contemporary religious conception without correcting it: for surely in every great religious truth which He adopted He divested it of misleading elements and enriched its contents. Moreover He seems to go out of His way to mention Angels: e.g., the A. of the children, the reapers are the A.; and again in the Lord's Prayer: "Thy will be done in earth as it is in Heaven." Wendt particularly notes that Christ actually disengaged the doctrine of A. from prevailing misconceptions, so that the Angelology of Jesus is vastly superior to that of His contemporaries (see Teaching of Jesus). And Bousset says of Christ's teaching: "What He attacked He branded for all eternity; what He respected He made eternally precious" (Bousset, Jesus, p. 200). Now He respected the doctrine of A. Has He thereby made eternally precious what is after all untrue? Surely His reassuring words apply here: "If it were not so I would have told you."—K2⁴.

W. J. SPARROW SIMPSON.

ANGLICAN COMMUNION.—This phrase AC. is a modern one. Ecclesia Anglicana, in Magna Charta, is the Church of

1. Meaning. England only; but as the Church spread to other countries, both within and without the British Empire, and became organised, more or less independently, in those countries, a term was required to indicate the aggregate of Churches, or branches of the Church, thus formed; and "AC." has proved to be a convenient designation.

That such a phrase is needed in the modern circumstances of the Church was scarcely realised half a century ago. The existence of the Scottish Episcopal Church and of the American Church was of course recognised, but not that they, with the Mother Church of England itself, were parts of a great whole; the Irish Church was integrally united with the English Church; and the Colonial Dioceses were regarded as simply extensions or branches of the Home Church. Three events led to a clearer understanding of the actual condition of things: (1) the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (not sitting as an Ecclesiastical Court of Appeal, but as the Court of Appeal in all colonial cases, secular as well as religious), which pronounced the Letters Patent granted by the Crown to bishops in self-governing colonies to be null and void (1863-65), and thus virtually freed them from the control of the Home Church; (2) the first Lambeth Conference, which brought together Anglican bishops from all parts of the world (1867); (3) the Disestablishment of the Irish Church (1869). The term "Pan-Anglican" was actually used of the first Lambeth Conference, not officially, but colloquially. From about that period, the phrase "AC." came into general use; and the Pan-Anglican Congress of 1908 presented once for all a picture of the great Federation or Union of Churches so described.

"The AC.," said Bishop E. J. Palmer, of Bombay, in his very able preliminary paper circulated before the Pan-Anglican Congress, "is not the Church. Neither is it a Church. It is a federation of National Churches." Yet the word Federation is not strictly correct, as it implies the federating of bodies originally independent, which was not the case with all the branches of the AC.

The AC. may be said to comprise six different groups of Churches or Branches of the Church.

(a) The CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the only Church which is (in a certain sense) "established by law." (But see c below.)

(b) Three entirely independent Churches, viz.: the Church of IRELAND, the SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH, and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the UNITED STATES. These three are in no way under, or responsible to, the authorities of the Established Church of England, but are self-governing in all respects, e.g., all three have PBs differing, however slightly, from the English PB and from those of each other.

(c) Five Churches in self-governing Colonies or Dominions, viz.: in Canada, Newfoundland, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. These also are self-governing, but by their constitutions they have linked themselves in varying degrees to the Mother Church. (See §§ 4-8 below.)

(d) Branches or outlying extensions of the Church of England in the Crown Colonies and Protectorates. Whatever they had for a time of establishment and endowment, this has now ceased, although they still, in varying degrees of connection, belong to the Home Church. In the West Indies, the Church is partly self-governing. In Ceylon, the only real connection with the Home Church is through the Metropolitan of India, the Diocese of Colombo being in his Ecclesiastical Province. In West Africa and Uganda, the Church has local Diocesan Constitutions, but the bishops are under the Archbishop of Canterbury; as also are those of the other outlying dioceses within the Empire.

(e) The Church in India, which stands alone in a different category from all the rest, being in a sense "established," most of the bishops being still appointed by the Crown (the only case remaining outside England), and some of them paid from State funds; and having no formal independent constitution. (See § 10, below.)

(f) The Church in countries outside the British Empire, consisting mainly of converts from heathenism. These are found in lands under European rule, as Turkish in Palestine, French in Madagascar, German in East Africa; also in independent Asiatic States, Persia, China, Japan. Japan has an organised Church, partially autonomous; and the Dioceses in China are making beginnings in the same direction. The bishoprics are as yet dependent on Canterbury.

Some brief particulars will now be given of the polity and constitutions of the sister and daughter Churches of the Church of

1. Polity. England. In varied circumstances and degrees of development, we see the Church in at least three stages of polity, well described by the Rev. J. J. Willis, of Uganda (Pan-Anglican Preliminary Paper S.F. iii b in vol. vii of Report), as Associated Enterprise, the earlier missionary stage; Limited Autonomy, as in West Africa and other fields; Self-government, in the great Colonies. And one other stage might be added, Complete Independence, as in Ireland, Scotland, and the United States. In this art. are included what are commonly called the Colonial and Missionary Churches.

Church organisation in the Dominion of Canada dates from 1851, when the bishops of the four then existing dioceses

4. Canada. met at Quebec, and affirmed the importance of diocesan and provincial organisation. In the same year the Bishop of Toronto held an informal Diocesan Synod, the first in all the Colonies. In 1854 the Canadian Legislature disendowed the Church, secularising the revenues of the Clergy Reserves; and in 1856 it passed another Act authorising the bishops, clergy, and laity to frame a Church constitution. In 1861, a General Synod of the Province of Canada drew up a constitution and canons.

The Province of Rupert's Land, comprising the Dioceses of the North-West beyond the boundary of Eastern Canada, was organised in 1875; and in 1893 a General Synod for all Canada was formed, and its constitution settled. The dioceses in British Columbia have so far remained extra-provincial, but they have individually joined the General Synod.

The whole number of Canadian dioceses is now twenty-three, viz.: ten in the Province of Eastern Canada, nine in the Province of Rupert's Land, and four that will presently form the Province of Columbia.

The General Synod at its first meeting in 1893 declared that the "Church of England in Canada" is "in full communion with the Church of England throughout the world, as an integral portion of the Body of Christ composed of Churches which, united under the One Divine Head and in the fellowship of the One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, hold the One Faith revealed in Holy Writ, and defined in the Creeds, as maintained by the undivided Primitive Church in the undisputed Ecumenical Councils; receive the same Canonical Scriptures of the Old and NT, as containing all things necessary to salvation; teach the same Word of God; partake of the same Divinely ordained Sacraments, through the ministry of the same Apostolic Orders; and worship One God and Father, through the same Lord Jesus Christ, by the same Holy and Divine Spirit Who is given to them that believe to guide them into all truth." It also accepted the PB and Articles. It further disclaimed any intention or right to interfere with the powers of the Diocesan Synods, or with the system of Provincial Synods. All the Synods, Diocesan, Provincial, and General, comprise bishops, clergy, and laity; and the voting is by orders.

The Constitution of the Province of Canada, adopted in 1861, and that of the Province of Rupert's Land, first adopted in 1875 and subsequently modified, make similar declarations of fundamental principles, and go into further details. The former "maintains the ancient doctrine" "that the Queen (or King) is rightfully possessed of the chief government and supremacy over all persons within (her) dominions, whether ecclesiastical or civil." The latter reserves the right to accept "any alteration of the Bible or the Formularies of the Church which may be adopted by the General Synod," and to permit special services, etc., authorised by the bishop of any diocese.

No canon passed by the General Synod is operative in any province or diocese until it has been accepted by such province or diocese. On the other hand, in the Province of Rupert's Land, no regulation of any Diocesan Synod has force in any diocese if it conflict with any enactment of the Provincial Synod.

Each Province is free to elect its own bishops and metropolitan in its own way; but the Bishops of the Upper House of the General Synod decide which of the two metropolitans shall be Primate of All Canada. The metropolitans have the title of Archbishops.

The Church in the independent colony of Newfoundland remains also independent, and has not joined the Church of Canada. It comprises only one diocese, which includes also part of Labrador and the Island of Bermuda. Its Constitution declares its fundamental principles in language similar to that of Canada. The diocese elects its own bishop. In Bermuda the Church is still "established," and receives certain grants from the Colonial Treasury.

Although the Church in Canada and Australia and New Zealand had taken steps towards self-organisation before the Church in South Africa, it was the litigation that ensued upon certain acts of Bishop Gray, of Capetown, that eventually settled the question of the Status of Colonial Churches generally. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided, in two cases in 1863-65, that Letters Patent for the erection of bishoprics granted by the Crown in self-governing Colonies were null and void; and that the Church of England, in places where there is no Church established by law, could adopt rules for its own administration like any other religious body, which rules would only be binding on those who expressly or by implication had assented to them.

In 1870 a Provincial Synod representing four dioceses assembled. The Diocese of St. Helena, which island is a Crown Colony, declined to join, and the Constitution then adopted (and amended in 1876) makes special provision for this case. That Constitution affirms the same fundamental principles of identity with the Church of England as have been noticed above in the case of Canada; but the title of the Church is not "the Church of England in South Africa," but "the Church of the Province of South Africa"—"this title not being intended to exclude other titles (such as English or Anglican Church) under which this Church or any portion of it may be known."

The Constitution has three provisos not exactly parallel in the case of other Churches: (1) that the Church may accept any alterations in the Formularies (other than the Creeds) which may be not merely adopted by the Church of England, but "allowed by any General Synod, Council, Congress, or other Assembly of the Churches of the AC."; (2) that any adaptations of Services made by the Province shall be liable to "revision by any General Synod of the AC. to which this Province shall be invited to send Representatives"; (3) that the Church is not "bound by decisions in questions of Faith and Doctrine other than those of its own Ecclesiastical Tribunals or of such other Tribunals" as it may accept. This third proviso is important, as it has been held, both by the civil courts in the Colony and by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that it practically separated the Church from the Church of England in a sense sufficient to prevent it from claiming property given for "the Church of England as by law established." But this difficulty, which was serious in Natal, has been settled by a legislative Act recently passed there.

The Preliminary Resolutions of 1870 also contain a clause specially laying stress on the expediency of the Laity being represented in the Synods.

The Constitution, unlike those of Canada and Australia, subordinates the Diocesan Synods to the Provincial Synod, which is the supreme authority. As there is only one province, and no extra-provincial dioceses, there is no place for a General Synod, such as exists in the two other Colonial States just mentioned.

The Province now comprises ten Dioceses, including that of St. Helena; and an eleventh, Walfisch Bay, is projected.

The Bishop of each Diocese is elected by the Clergy of the Diocese, "with the assent thereto of the representatives of the Laity." But St. Helena is an exception, its bishop being appointed by the other bishops, who at the last vacancy "empowered" the Archbishop of Capetown to select the man.

The case of Australia is markedly different. In 1850 the Bishop of Sydney, Dr. Broughton, invited the bishops of the four other dioceses then recently formed, viz.: Adelaide, Melbourne, Newcastle, and Tasmania, and also Bishop Selwyn of New Zealand, to meet and consider the steps to be taken towards Church organisation. Bishop Perry, of Melbourne, was the first to act upon the resolutions come to, convening a Diocesan Conference in 1851; and in 1854 he obtained from the Legislature of the Colony of Victoria an Act authorising the bishops, clergy, and laity to meet in Synod. In 1855 Bishop

5. Newfoundland.

6. South Africa.

7. Australia.

Short, of Adelaide, organised a Diocesan Synod without applying to the Legislature of his colony, South Australia. In 1866 the three Dioceses in New South Wales framed a provincial constitution under an Act of the Legislature of that Colony. This constitution was modified in after years, and the present form of it only dates from 1907. Meanwhile the other Australian Dioceses had independently organised themselves.

In 1872 the first General Synod was held, there being ten Dioceses, five of which were in the Province of New South Wales under the Bishop of Sydney as Metropolitan, while the other five were separate and independent. The General Synod, however, was so framed as to have little supreme authority. No enactment or resolution was to have force in any diocese without the consent of the diocese. The Bishop of Sydney was ex-officio Primate.

The subsequent multiplication of dioceses has since enabled two other Provinces to be formed for the Colonies respectively of Victoria and Queensland, with the Bishops of Melbourne and Brisbane as Metropolitans. This was done in 1905. The three Metropolitans now bear the title of Archbishop. Of the twenty-one dioceses, sixteen are in the three Provinces, and five still extra-provincial, viz.: Adelaide, Tasmania, Perth, Bunbury, and North-Western Australia. Each diocese elects its own bishop.

The Primacy of the whole Australian Church remained with the see of Sydney until lately; but there has always been an objection on the part of the other dioceses to an arrangement which gave the power of electing the Primate to the electors of one diocese only. It is now arranged that, while the Diocese of Sydney still, in electing its own bishop, elects the Metropolitan of New South Wales, the bishops of all the dioceses choose which of the three Metropolitans shall be Primate.

The Solemn Declaration at the beginning of the Constitution of the General Synod contains substantially the same statements as that of Canada already quoted. The Church is described as "the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania," and as "a branch of the A.C., an integral portion of the Mystical Body of Christ united under One Head, and in fellowship with the One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church." It holds "the one Faith revealed in Holy Writ, defined in the Creeds, as maintained by the Church Catholic in the undisputed Ecumenical Councils." It "receives the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and NT as containing all things necessary to salvation," and "partakes of the Divinely Ordained Sacraments through the Ministry of the Apostolic Orders." It accepts the PB, and reserves the right to accept "such alteration of the books and formularies as may from time to time be adopted by full lawful and canonical authority of the Church of England."

Although preliminary steps towards Church organisation had been taken in Canada and Australia earlier than in New Zealand, the New Zealand Church, under Bishop Selwyn's leadership, was the first to agree upon a regular Constitution, in 1857.

8. New Zealand.

By this step the Church virtually announced its separation from Australia, with which it had previously been regarded as connected. The Constitution was revised in 1865. Its opening clause affirms the expediency of the members of the Church of England in the Colony being "associated together by voluntary compact as a branch of the said Church." There being only one Province, and no extra-provincial dioceses, there is, as in South Africa, only one Synod over the Diocesan Synods; but, unlike South Africa, this is not called the Provincial but the General Synod. It consists, as elsewhere, of bishops, clergy, and laity. The statement of fundamental belief is substantially the same as elsewhere, though shorter. The liberty to accept changes in Formularies or in the Version of the Bible adopted by the Mother Church is expressed as applying to such changes as are made "with the consent of the Crown and of Convocation." Power is also reserved for the General Synod to make alterations in the event either of Church and State in England being separated, or of New Zealand being separated from the Mother Country.

The General Synod, like the Provincial Synod in South Africa, is the chief authority in a fuller sense than in Canada and Australia. The General Synod elects the Primate (as the metropolitan is called) from among the bishops, but if after three ballots no bishop obtains a majority of all three Orders, the senior bishop becomes Primate.

There are seven dioceses, including the missionary diocese of Melanesia. Each diocese in New Zealand elects its own bishop. Missionary bishops may be nominated by the members of the Mission, subject to the approval of the General Synod.

The New Zealand Church was the first to adopt the principle of a joint board of diocesan and parochial nominators for the appointment of clergy to cures, which has since been widely adopted, notably in Ireland.

The General Synod of 1874 changed the title of the Church to "The Church of the Province of New Zealand, commonly called the Church of England."

The new bishopric of Polynesia is under the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The West Indian dioceses, viz.: six in the islands, with Honduras and Guiana on the mainland, form a Province. The bishops are appointed by the dioceses, with certain conditions owing to the position of the Dioceses of Barbados and Guiana in connection with the civil power. All make a declaration rendering "all due honour and deference" to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Metropolitan, who is called Primate, is elected by the bishops from among themselves, and bears the title of Archbishop of the West Indies, in addition to his local diocesan title. Thus, the present Primate, whose diocese is Jamaica, is not Archbishop of Jamaica, but Bishop of Jamaica and Archbishop of the West Indies.

9. West Indies.

The Constitution of the Province was adopted in 1883, and amended in 1897. It is peculiar in this respect, that, in view of the difficulty of the clergy and laity assembling from such great distances, the Provincial Synod consists only of the bishops; but its decisions affecting the dioceses must be referred to the several Diocesan Synods for approval. On the other hand, any decision of a Diocesan Synod "altering or modifying the operation of any Article or Rubric of the Church of England" must be confirmed by the bishops of the Province and the Archbishop of Canterbury; while any such decision of the Provincial Synod must also be referred, not only to the Diocesan Synods, but to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The British dominions in India and Ceylon form a Province of which the Bishop of Calcutta is Metropolitan, and an appeal in case of need lies from him to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Bishops of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Lahore, Rangoon, Lucknow, and Nagpur, are appointed by the Crown, that is in effect by the Secretary of State for India; and the first three of these are paid by the State. The Church in India is to that extent "established," and its position is therefore unlike that of any other branch of the Church abroad. The seven dioceses named are territorial. The Bishops of Chota Nagpur and "Tinnevely and Madura" have no territorial dioceses, their spheres lying within Calcutta and Madras Dioceses respectively, and their appointment resting with the bishops of those dioceses; and their jurisdiction is consensual—as also is that of the Bishop of Lucknow in respect of part of his sphere which is within the diocese of Calcutta. Travancore and Cochin is a missionary diocese wholly in native states, and the bishop is appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Ceylon has one diocese, Colombo, and, the Church in the island having been disestablished in 1885, this diocese has a constitution of its own, and elects its own bishop. It is hoped soon to arrange for one or more Indian assistant bishops in the Diocese of Madras.

India, apart from Ceylon, has no Church Constitution, nor Diocesan Synods with constitutional powers. Several of the Dioceses have Diocesan Conferences, but they are voluntary bodies without authority, like those in England. The Provincial Synod of Bishops, however, meets regularly, and has attained great and just influence. Local Church Councils have been formed for various groups of native Christian congregations, for the administration of their own Church funds, and of the grants to such funds from the missionary societies. But there is no difficulty, other than linguistic, in Indians and Europeans working together; and most educated Indians know and speak English. See an interesting report from the present Bishop of Calcutta in the second Annual Review issued by the Central Board of Missions.

Japan is the only foreign mission-field in which the Anglican Church has been regularly organized. In 1887 the English and 11. Japan. American missionary bishops, with the missionaries of the English and American Churches, the Japanese clergy, and Japanese lay delegates, formed the "Nippon Sei-kokwai," literally "Japanese Church," but usually rendered "Holy Catholic Church of Japan." A Constitution and canons were agreed upon; and the General Synod meets decennially. The English PB, slightly modified in translation to agree partially with the American PB, has been adopted "for the present." Six dioceses or episcopal jurisdictions have been formed, four for the English Missions and two for the American. The bishops for the four are appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and those for the two by the American House of Bishops; but in each case the name is submitted to the Synod of the Nippon Sei-kokwai for approval. It is hoped ere long to see some Japanese bishops appointed, but the plans for this desirable consummation are not yet settled. The Missionary Bishop of Korea will no doubt be eventually associated with the Church in Japan.

In 1909, the Missionary Bishops of the English and American Churches working in China, with delegates representing the mission-

12. China. aries and the Chinese clergy and laity, adopted a Constitution for the Anglican Church in China provisionally, which was to be referred for consideration to the various Diocesan Synods or Conferences, and to the authorities of the English, American, and Canadian Churches. Local schemes for Diocesan Synods and administration have been provisionally adopted in the dioceses of Che-kiang and Fuh-kien, and are being prepared in others. The Chinese congregation at Hong Kong (which is a Crown Colony of Great Britain) also has a local constitution under the Bishop of Victoria (Hong Kong). The Bishop of Victoria (Colonial) and the English missionary bishops of North China, Shantung, Che-kiang (late Mid-China), Western China, Fuh-kien, and "Kwang-si and Hu-nan," are appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The American bishops of Shanghai and Hankow are appointed by the American House of Bishops; and the Bishop of Ho-nan by the Canadian Church.

In the dioceses of Sierra Leone and Western Equatorial Africa there are local Constitutions and Diocesan Synods, the African clergy and laity being numerous and the congregations to a large extent self-supporting. The bishops are appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and are English; but there are negro assistant bishops in Western Equatorial Africa. The missionary bishop for the Gold Coast (Accra) is also appointed from Canterbury. So also are the missionary bishops on the Eastern side of Africa, for the Dioceses of Uganda, Mombasa, Zanzibar, Likoma, and Northern Rhodesia. In Uganda, a local Church Constitution has been adopted.

The Colonial and Missionary Dioceses or Episcopal Jurisdictions of Gibraltar, Jerusalem (with its Asst. Bp. at Khartum), 14. Other Singapore, Labuan and Sarawak,
Dioceses. Korea, Mauritius, Madagascar,

Polynesia, the Falkland Isles, Argentina, are under the Archbishop of Canterbury, and have no synodical government. Nor have the outlying Episcopal Jurisdictions of the American Church: Haiti, Cuba, Porto Rico, Brazil, Cape Palmas, Honolulu, the Philippines.

Mutual relations between the different constituent parts of the AC. can scarcely be said to exist at present, e.g., the Church of South Africa and the Japanese Church have no mutual relations beyond the bare fact that both are members of the one Communion. Nor can it be said that even common relations exist, that is, of all the parts to the whole, because the circumstances of the several parts, the stages of development at which they have severally arrived, differ widely: e.g., the independent Churches, as of Ireland or the United States, can take a position in the Communion as a whole not yet belonging to an embryo Church like that of West Africa, which is only a part of the whole through being a part, so far, of the Church of England. Nevertheless, the equality which would be the ideal is foreshadowed by the equality of status enjoyed by all the bishops when assembled in the Lambeth Conference.

The great problem of the AC. is the degree of independence which may be claimed by the several parts, and the degree of interdependence between them. If we imagine the Churches of the great colonial States, and the Churches of such mission fields as India and East and West Africa within the British Empire, and China and Japan outside it, as in the future all completely organised and autonomous, we can at once see the reasonableness of the principle expressed in the 34th Art.: "It is not necessary that Traditions and Ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like; for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word. . . . Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish, ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying."

The question of the degree of liberty to be enjoyed by each autonomous Church, and of the influence which a Central
15. A Central Representative Authority should Authority. exercise, was largely debated at the Pan-Anglican Congress of 1908 (see the discussions of Section F, in Report, vol. 7). It is acknowledged that a great independent Church like that of the United States will brook no interference. It is highly probable that circumstances will at some time arise that would evoke the assertion of a similar independence by colonial Churches like Canada and South Africa. And, although at present the missionary Churches in Africa and Asia are more dependent upon the Home Church, it is certain that an Indian or Chinese Church will in the future claim, and justly claim, liberty to work out its own destiny. The Bishop of Gibraltar asked two questions, and then answered them. (1) Can the whole Communion direct the single Churches in any matter? Of course it can command, but it cannot enforce its commands, and they will not be obeyed unless they commend themselves to the individual Churches. (2) Can an individual Church do as it thinks good? Of course it can, provided that it is prepared to face the consequences—which might be schism. Then he urged that the right principle to be adopted is "the very ancient one, first stated in its present form in the Institutes of Justinian, brought into England through the Roman law, enunciated by Edward I in the writ by which he summoned our first House of Commons, and repeated again and again for hundreds of years, that 'what touches all should be by all determined.'" E.g., the marriage law, or the terms of communion: these "touch all" and should be "determined by all."

If a "Central Authority" is to exist at all, it must be representative and consultative: should it also be authoritative? To this question different answers are given. Anyway, such Central Body should not be confounded with the Home Church. All agree that the centralisation of Rome is to be avoided. There is to be no Anglican Papacy at Canterbury. No doubt the Churches derived from the Home Church hold it in affectionate respect as their Mother, while maintaining their local autonomy. Such a Church, like the colony speaking in Kipling's words, would say, "Daughter am I in my Mother's house, but mistress in my own." But the future relation will be rather that of Sister Churches, and the voice of the Central Body would not be the voice of the Church of England, but the voice of the whole AC. The weight of its voice, however, would depend very much upon the care with which all kinds of purely local questions were avoided, including in them such reasonable alterations and adaptations of modes of Divine worship and the like as would suit local and national circumstances. If the Central Body confines itself to great fundamental Catholic principles and the practical application of them, and to questions touching the relations of the Churches, or of Ecclesiastical Provinces, to each other, its resolutions will have great moral power. The decennial Lambeth Conference already exercises important influence in this way; and a small and definitely representative Body, meeting more frequently, would undoubtedly fulfil useful and unifying functions.

The Lambeth Conference of 1908 arranged for the appointment of such a body, but the American Church has not yet signified its approval of the scheme. Bishop E. J. Palmer, of Bombay, in the paper before mentioned, affirmed that we need (1) a General Synod of the Anglican Communion, (2) an Executive Council, (3) a Supreme Ecclesiastical Court of Appeal. None of these is proposed at present. No. 1 would make decisions on questions of doctrine and discipline which should bind the whole Communion, and this Bishop Palmer does not advocate. For No. 2 he suggests an interesting scheme, which has not been yet considered. No. 3 involves difficult controversial questions.

The AC. occupies a middle position, between the Roman and Eastern Churches on the one hand and the Protestant Churches and denominations on the other.

17. External Relations.

Apparently, therefore, any possibilities of the future Re-union of Christendom are dependent upon the growth of its influence. De Maistre himself, ultramontane as he was, and viewing the Anglican Church at almost its least efficient period, the end of the 18th cent., wrote of her thus:

"Si jamais les Chrétiens se rapprochent, comme tout les y invite, il semble que la motion doit partir de l'Eglise d'Angleterre. Le presbytérianisme fut une œuvre française, et par conséquent une œuvre exagérée. Nous sommes trop éloignés des sectateurs d'un cult trop peu substantial: il n'y a pas moyen de nous entendre; mais l'Eglise Anglicane, qui nous touche d'une main, touche de l'autre ceux que nous ne pouvons toucher; et quoique sous un certain point de vue, elle soit en butte aux coups des deux partis, et qu'elle présente le spectacle un peu ridicule d'un révolté qui prêche l'obéissance, cependant elle est très-précieuse sous d'autres aspects, et peut-être considérée comme un de ces intermédiaires chimiques, capable de rapprocher des éléments inassociables de leur nature" (Considérations sur la France, chap. 2).

Mr. Gladstone, quoting this passage in his long letter to Bishop Blomfield in 1850 on the Royal Supremacy (Gleanings, vol. v), draws encouragement from the fact of "a stranger and an alien," "a stickler to the extremest point for the prerogatives of his own Church," and "nursed in every prepossession against ours," "turning his eye across the Channel," and although only seeing the Anglican Church "in the lethargy of her organisation and the dull twilight of her learning," discerning that there is "a special work written of God for her in heaven," and that she is "very precious to the Christian world."

Two special advantages the AC. enjoys. The first was emphasised at the Pan-Anglican Congress by Chancellor P. V. Smith. We can link, he said, the Past with the Present, and the Present with the Future. The Eastern Church represents the early Past; the Roman Church, a more extended Past, recognising the principle of growth and development of doctrine; but Rome "continually forges fresh theological chains which impede the freedom of the Present and have barred in advance the rightful liberty of the Future." On the other hand, the other Churches of the Reformation and still younger religious bodies have "failed to maintain sufficient connection with the past to qualify them for taking the lead in linking together the Past, Present, and Future of Christendom." But the AC. is "united to the first ages of the Church by a double strand which has never been severed." Through its "Continental element" it was allied to the West; through its "ancient British and Celtic element" with the East. And, repudiating infallibility, it can look forward with hope and confidence to the Future.

The other advantage was dwelt upon by Bishop Palmer, in the paper before mentioned. It is the nature of the Anglican polity. If Christendom is ever to be united, will its constitution be Congregationalism, Monarchy, or Federation? The first is impossible. It would mean, not union, but chaos. The second has been tried by Rome, and has failed; the reason of failure being—so the bishop urges—the ignoring of the principle of nationality. But the third, Federation, combines union with freedom; and so the constitution for which the AC. stands is the ideal constitution for the Universal Church.

The fundamental conditions or basis of Re-union are contained in what is called "the Quadrilateral," framed by the American Church (inspired by the late Dr. W. R. Huntington), and adopted by the Lambeth Conference in 1888. They are: (a) The Holy Scriptures, OT and NT; (b) the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds; (c) the two Sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper; (d) the Historic Episcopate, "locally adapted in the methods of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the unity of His Church."

AI, 2.

EUGENE STOCK.

ANGLICAN ORDERS.

- INTRODUCTORY, § 1.
- CONSECRATION OF ABP. PARKER, § 2.
- CONSECRATION OF BP. BARLOW, § 3.
- OTHER LINES OF SUCCESSION, § 4.
- THE MATTER OF ORDERS, § 5.
- THE FORM OF ORDERS, § 6.
- THE ENGLISH FORM, 1550-1662, § 7.
- THE PRESENT FORM, § 8.
- THE INTENTION, § 9.
- BIBLIOGRAPHY, § 10.

The position of the English Church with regard to Holy Orders may be gathered from the authoritative statements on this subject contained in the Ordinal, Introductory. Art. 36 of Religion (Of Consecration of Bishops and Ministers), Art. 26 (Of the Unworthiness of the Ministers), and Art. 23 (On Ministering in the Congregation). This position may be best summarised in the words of the Pref. to the Ordinal of 1550, in which it is stated: (1) that it is evident the three Orders of Bishops, Priests and Deacons have existed within the Ch. from the Apostles' time; (2) that no man might presume to execute any of them until, after examination of his fitness, he had been admitted thereunto by public prayer and imposition of hands; (3) that it is requisite no man should exercise his ministry in the Ch. of England until he has been admitted thereto in the manner set forth in the Ordinal (the only exception to this being the case of one already ordained Bp., Priest, or Deacon). The modifications introduced into the language of this Pref. in 1662 merely serve to emphasise this position and to distinguish yet more clearly between the ministry of the Ch. and that of the separated non-episcopal bodies. It is further stated in Art. 36 that the Ordinal "set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth. . . doth contain all things necessary to such consecration and ordering: neither hath it anything that of itself is superstitious and ungodly." It is therefore decreed that all who have been ordained according to this rite "be rightly, orderly and lawfully consecrated and ordered." The purpose of this art. is to investigate this last statement and to show that the English Ch. has faithfully carried out the intention expressed in the Pref. to the Ordinal—that of continuing in valid succession the Ministry which has been in Christ's Church "from the Apostles' time." We must first make three inquiries. (a) What is generally agreed to be requisite to this end? (And in order to do this it will be best to ascertain what is considered necessary for this purpose by those who have disputed the validity of Anglican Orders.) (b) How far these demands can be said to have been legitimately satisfied by the practice of the English Church? (c) How far these demands are in themselves right and reasonable when compared with the practice of the universal Ch. from Apostolic times, as far as this can be determined?

The requisites for the validity of Holy Orders may be divided into three heads. (I) An uninterrupted chain of succession must be maintained by episcopal ordination—every ordaining bp. having himself been validly consecrated. (II) The right form and matter must be used in conferring Orders. (III) The intention of those who minister the rite must be in accord with the mind of the universal Church.

(I) It has been objected that the English Ch. has not maintained a valid succession. This is a matter which is capable of historical investigation, and the controversy has centred round the consecration of Abp. Parker. The reason for this is that at the time of his consecration, in 1559, a large number of sees were vacant; and it may be admitted, at least for the purpose of this argument, that Parker is the main source through whom our Bps. derive their succession.¹ In 1604, 29 years after Parker's death, a Roman controversialist, John de Sacrobosco (Holywood), circulated a story, afterwards known as the Nag's Head Fable, stating that those who had been nominated to the vacant bishoprics assembled at the Nag's Head (a tavern in London), and that Scory laid his hands upon them, and that they in turn did the same to him. For this absurd story there is not a shred of evidence, and it is no longer accepted by anyone. On the other hand, there is abundant evidence that Parker was consecrated on Dec. 17th, 1559, in the Chapel of Lambeth Palace. Of this we have not only the official record, but also contemporary witness in the Zurich Letters, Machyn's Diary, Parker's own Diary, and a MS. still extant presented by him to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. Further, we have the evidence of the Earl of Nottingham in 1616, in which he claims to have been present at the ceremony. From this evidence we learn that Parker was consecrated by four Bps., viz., Barlow (formerly of Bath and Wells, then elect of Chichester), Scory (late of Chichester, then elect of Hereford), Coverdale (late of Exeter), and Hodgkin (Suffragan of Bedford). It is beyond dispute that the Latin PONTIFICAL had been used at the consecration of three of these Bps., viz., Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin, and it is therefore impossible to call into question the validity of their Orders. Difficulty has, however, been raised in the case of Barlow, as the official record of his consecration is not forthcoming. But even if it were proved (for which there is not a shred of evidence) that Barlow had not himself received episcopal consecration, this would not affect the validity of Parker's Orders. It is clearly stated that all the Bps. present not only laid their hands upon him, but also that each of them repeated the accompanying formula; and, consequently, he received imposition of hands from at least three Bps., and thus fulfilled in this respect the requirements for episcopal ordination, as laid down in the earliest canons dealing with this subject (see Apostolic Constitutions 3 20; Van Espen, Jus. Eccl. Univ., pt. 1, bk. 15).

But, when we come to investigate the case of Barlow, we find the following facts. (1) We have the record of the King's of Bp. Barlow.

² Consecration

Congé d'Élire for his election to the Bishopric of St. Asaph, dated Jan. 7, 1535. (2) We have the certificate of his confirmation at the church of St. Mary-le-Bow. (3) We have the record of his confirmation to the see of St. David's in 1536. (4) We have the royal writ, dated Apr. 26 of the same year, by which the temporalities of that see were restored to him. (5) He took his seat in the House of Lords on Friday, June 30, in the 20th year of Henry VIII, and his name appears in the Parliaments of 1541, 1542, 1543, 1546. (In this connection it should be observed that no Bp. since the days of Edward III has ever taken his seat in the House of Lords bef. consecration, and that for this purpose he must be introduced by two Bps. as witnesses of his consecration.) (6) He was present at the Provincial Synods of 1536, 1537, 1540, 1552. (7) He assisted as Bp.

¹ See, however, § 4.

at the consecration of the Bp. of Bangor in 1541. (8) He is referred to by Gardner as "my brother of St. David's." (9) There was no suggestion in 1554, when he was deposed by Queen Mary, nor at any other time, that there was any flaw in his consecration. On the other hand, the official record of his consecration is missing from Cranmer's Register. It should, however, be noted that his is not a solitary case. For example, neither Gardner's confirmation nor consecration is recorded in the Canterbury Register. A careful consideration of this evidence will probably lead to the conclusion that there can be no doubt whatever as to Barlow's valid consecration. If, however, for purposes of argument, we choose to allow this to remain an open question, it remains certain that Abp. Parker at his consecration received imposition of hands from at least three Bps. who had themselves been validly consecrated, and that each of these recited over him the formula of consecration. As we have said, the present Bps. of the English Ch. trace their succession through Abp. Parker, and consequently in this respect it may be safely asserted that the English Ch. has maintained a valid succession in accordance with the demands of the Universal Church.

It must, however, be added that, since the consecration of Abp. Parker, two other lines of succession have been introduced into the English Episcopate. In 1617, George Montaigne, Bp. of London, was consecrated by Abbot, Abp. of Canterbury, assisted, among other Bps., by Mark Antonio de Dominis, Abp. of Spalato. Montaigne assisted at the consecration of both Abp. Laud, and Williams, Abp. of York. Of the eight Bps. surviving at the Restoration in 1660, six had received consecration from Laud, one from Juxon who had himself been consecrated by Laud, and one from Williams. Thus all the Bps. of the English Ch. can trace an Italian line of succession through Mark Antonio de Dominis. Theophilus Field, Bp. of Llandaff, also assisted at the consecration of Laud and Williams. Field had been consecrated by Abp. Abbot, assisted among others by George, Bp. of Derry, and thus introduced the Irish line of succession. Thus three lines, the English, Italian and Irish, meet in the succession of the English Episcopate, a threefold cord which cannot easily be broken.

(II) We have now to consider the second question, viz., how far the Ordinal of the English Ch. will be found to comply with the requirements of a valid ordination to the Orders of Bp., Priest, and Deacon. For this purpose we shall confine our attention chiefly to the Ordinal of 1552, which, with one modification, was restored under Elizabeth in 1559. It would, indeed, appear impossible to doubt the sufficiency of the form employed since 1662. If, therefore, the argument holds good for the form used in 1552, it will a fortiori apply to the later form. If, however, that of 1552 is insufficient, it must be admitted that the alterations made in the later Ordinal could not be used as an argument in favour of the validity of Anglican Orders. It is usual, in considering any sacrament or sacramental rite, to distinguish between the matter and the form employed in its administration. It is now very generally agreed by theologians that the matter of Holy Orders is the imposition of hands. This view is, however, contrary to that which was held in the West in the later Middle Ages, when it was considered that the matter consisted of the ceremony of the Porrection of the Instruments. Thus Pope Eugenius IV, in his decree addressed to the Armenians at the Council of Florence in 1439, writes as follows:—" Sextum sacramentum est ordinis, cuius materia est illud per cuius traditionem confertur ordo: sicut presbyteratus traditur per calicis cum vino et patenae cum pane porrectionem; diaconatus vero per libri evangeliorum dationem." But it was impossible to maintain this view for any length of time, and it was sufficiently refuted by Morinus and Pope Benedict XIV. As a matter of fact, the ceremony of Porrection of the Instruments was not introduced into the Roman rite itself until the 10th cent.; it was of Gallican origin, and appears to have been used from the 6th cent. onwards at ordinations to the Minor Orders in Gallican countries (for particulars, see ORDINAL and INSTRUMENTS). On the other hand, imposition of hands is the only ordination ceremony mentioned in the NT and the early Fathers, and it has been universally employed in the Christian Church.¹ It will therefore be seen that the English Ch. uses the necessary matter in conferring Orders.

The form of ordination consists of suitable prayer, and should accompany the matter, or be separated from it at most by a very brief interval. It has been contended that the form employed in the Ch. of Eng. is insufficient.

One objection is that the form ought to contain explicit mention of the office conferred, and that, since the English Ordinals of 1550 and 1552 did not contain in the formula which is used with imposition of hands at the ordination of Bps. and Priests an explicit mention of the office conferred, the rites were invalid. It must, however, be remembered that the Prs. used at an earlier point did contain explicit reference to the office which was to be conferred, and therefore of themselves defined the intention of the above formula. Thus, at the close of the Lit., a Pr. was used in which the words occur, "Mercifully behold these thy servants now called to the office of Priesthood," "Mercifully behold this thy servant now called to the work and ministry of a Bishop." It is significant to observe in this connection that, when in 1662 the words, "for the office and work of a priest, etc.," were inserted in the formula used at the imposition of hands in the Ordering of Priests, the position of the Pr. just referred to was changed; it was no longer placed at the end of the Lit., but was appointed as a special Coll. for the Communion Office. It is not, however, necessary to press this point, for two reasons. (1)

¹ See ORDINAL, § 13.

It has not been proved that such explicit mention of the office conferred has always been employed by the Church. (2) A careful examination of the formula used in the English Ordinal will show that it is in itself sufficient. With regard to the first point, it should be remarked that the recently-discovered PB of Bp. Sarapion, which contains one of the oldest forms of Ordination in our possession, does not in the Pr. at the "laying on of hands of the making of Presbyters" make any explicit reference to the office conferred. The same is also true of the very ancient form in use among the Abyssinian Jacobites. The PB of Bp. Sarapion cannot be later than about the middle of the 4th cent., and we may quote the late Bp. of Salisbury's words with regard to the above-mentioned Pr.:—"The office of a steward and ambassador, and the ministry of reconciliation, are all touched upon; but the order of priesthood is not mentioned, and there is no reference to any sacramental acts, except that of reconciliation" (Bp. Sarapion's Prayer Book, p. 51, ed. by John Wordsworth, London, SPCK, 1899).

We now pass to the consideration of the formula employed in the Ordinals of 1550 and 1552. In the case of Priests, it runs as follows:—"Receive the Holy Ghost: whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven: and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained: and be thou a faithful dispenser of the word of God, and of His holy Sacraments. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." It will be observed in the first place that these words are entirely scriptural. They begin with a quotation from John 20 22, 23:—"Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them: whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." Seeing that this was spoken by our Lord Himself, it has been argued that it would of itself constitute a sufficient form, as the Church cannot reasonably claim anything more than was done by Him to be necessary. But the English formula has added other words which render it still more explicit. They are based in the first place on 1 Cor. 4 1, 2:—"Let a man so account of us as of ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God. Here, moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful." In conferring the office of priesthood the English Ch. therefore expresses the intention of conferring that which St. Paul describes as the essential part of his own and his fellow-apostles' ministry. Further, it should be observed that the word "mysteries" is translated "sacraments," thus defining the Church's interpretation of the apostolic stewardship. Finally, there is a reference to the ministry of the word. For this we should look to Acts 6 2, 4, where, before the ordination of the first deacons, the twelve, addressing the multitude, say, "It is not fit that we should forsake the word of God and serve tables. . . .

But we will continue steadfast in prayer and in the ministry of the word." It would therefore appear that, by including this reference to the ministry of the word in the formula of ordination, the Ch. is employing the very phrase by which the apostles distinguished their own ministry from that of the diaconate. Further, it should be noticed that in the service itself a number of explicit references occur to the office of priesthood, viz.:—(1) when the candidates are presented to the Bp.; (2) when they are presented by him to the people; (3) in the Pr. at the close of the Lit.; (4) in the first Interrogation.

It has also been contended that some explicit reference is necessary to the priestly function of offering the Eucharist. This is, however, sufficiently covered:—(1) by the reference to the administration of the Sacraments contained in the formula of ordination; (2) by the formula which accompanied the delivery of the Bible, "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God and to Minister the Holy Sacraments, etc."; (3) by the words of the third Interrogation, "Will you then give your faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine, and sacraments and the discipline of Christ as the Lord hath commanded, etc." It is impossible to doubt that these sufficiently cover the Euch., and it may be held that the Reformers were justified in refusing to isolate any one Sacr., however important, from the rest of the priestly office. Further, in view of such documentary evidence as we possess about the forms employed in the early Ch., it is absolutely impossible to contend that an explicit reference to the Euch. sacrifice is necessary to the validity of ordination to the priesthood.

What has already been said as to the sufficiency of the form employed at the ordination of Priests will be seen to apply mutatis mutandis to that employed at the consecration of Bishops. This form in 1550 and 1552 was as follows:—"Take the Holy Ghost, and remember that thou stir up the grace of God, which is in thee, by imposition of hands: for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and love, and of soberness." This formula is also entirely scriptural, the words, "Take the Holy Ghost," being derived from John 20 22, and the remainder being based on 2 Tim. 1 6, 7:—"For the which cause I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God which is in thee through the laying on of my hands: for God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness, but of power and love and discipline." It was commonly believed in the 16th cent. that in these words St. Paul referred to the ordination to the episcopate which St. Timothy had received at his hands. Thus the Ch. expresses her intention of conferring that which was conferred by the apostles and which had been transmitted through their successors to the ordaining Bishops. As in the case of the priesthood, the intention is further made manifest by explicit references to the episcopate which occur earlier in the service, viz., when the Bp. elect is presented to the Abp., and in the Pr. at the close of the Litany.

We have now to consider the chief alterations made in 1662.

At that date the words, "for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands," were inserted in the formula of ordination to the priesthood, and the words, "for the office and work of a Bishop in the Church of God now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands, in the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen," in the form of consecration to the episcopate. It has been asserted that the insertion of these words implies that the English Ch. recognised that the previous form was insufficient. As a matter of fact, the alteration was made to meet the argument of the Puritans, that on account of the similarity of the formulæ employed no clear distinction was made between the episcopate and the priesthood. The Ch. had sufficient reason for the conviction that the formulæ employed since 1550 were sufficient in themselves, and that the scriptural references which they contained were entirely adequate to make clear the distinction between the offices conferred. Nevertheless, it was felt that, since this distinction was not clear to the mind of those who had rejected the tradition of the Ch. on this head, it would be safer to expand the formulæ in such a manner as to leave no doubt in the mind of any one that the English Ch. was following Catholic tradition and had dissociated itself from any body which had rejected the threefold apostolic ministry.

8. The Present Form.

(III) In dealing with the question of the adequacy of the form and matter found in the

9. The Intention.

Edwardine Ordinal, we have been obliged to allude from time to time to the subject of Intention. This must now be considered by itself, because it has been alleged that, even if the form and matter of the Edwardine Ordinal can be proved to be sufficient, it is clearly defective in Intention. By Intention is meant the purpose with which an act is performed; and it is generally agreed among theologians that the necessary intention in conferring any sacrament or sacramental rite is the purpose to do that which the Ch. means and does in this action. Thus, if the necessary form or matter were employed in jest or on the stage, nothing would have been conferred. Nevertheless, validity cannot in any sense be held to depend on the private opinion or the interior disposition of the minister. In this view the Council of Trent (Sess. VII., canons 11, 12) is in agreement with Art. 26, and that it is correct can scarcely be doubted. Were it otherwise, there could be no assurance that any sacr. had been validly celebrated. The only legitimate test is external. If the minister uses the matter and form prescribed by the Ch. in a grave and serious manner, it is universally held that the faithful may be assured of the validity of his action. Thus, when individual Bps. or Priests outwardly conform to the use of the Ch. in conferring a sacrament or sacramental rite, their private opinions can in no sense be regarded as affecting its validity. It is therefore quite beside the point to quote from the writings of Anglican theologians who have expressed opinions contrary to those generally held by the Church. In conferring Holy Orders according to the form prescribed by the English Ch., they have outwardly expressed their acceptance of its intention. This view is clearly set forth in Art. 26 ("Of the unworthiness of the Ministers which hinders not the effect of the Sacrament"). Now the Intention of the Ordinal is so clearly expressed that it leaves no room whatever for doubt. The familiar words of the Preface, stating that it is evident unto all men that the three Orders of the ministry have been in Christ's Church from the Apostles' time, and that the purpose of the Ordinal is that "these Orders may be continued and reverently used and esteemed in the Church of England," are in themselves a sufficient guarantee of the intention to continue what was already in existence and not to introduce something that was new. The practice of the Ch. also has faithfully carried out the directions contained in the Preface. Never at any time has the English Ch. re-ordained one who had already received valid consecration or ordination, for example, a priest of the Greek or Roman Communion who desired to exercise his ministry in the English Church. On the other hand, it has been her practice to ordain those members of other Christian bodies who have joined her before they could be admitted to her ministry, even though these had been fully recognised as ministers by the various bodies to which they belonged.¹ Whatever may have been the opinion of individual Reformers as to the ministry, the authoritative view of the English Ch., as set forth in the Pref. to the Ordinal and in Art. 36 "Of the Consecration of Bishops and Ministers," is a sufficient safeguard of her intention in this matter. It is, therefore, idle to assert, as certain Roman controversialists have done, that the mind of the Reformers was so opposed to the Ch. that they clearly intended something different from that which the Ch. intends. We reply that the Anglican formularies contain a categorical denial of this assertion, and that the unbroken practice of the English Ch., in the face of great opposition from Presbyterians and other Puritan sects, ought to convince any impartial person of the sufficiency of her intention to continue in unbroken succession the three Orders of the Apostolic Ministry.

(1) Apostolicae Curæ, A Treatise on the Bull (Church Historical Society 19, London, SPCK, 1896); (2) Bailey, T. V., Ordinum

10. Sacrorum in Ecclesia Anglicana Bibliography. Defensio, London, 1870 (c. 1 contains the documents relating to the consecration of Abp.

¹ The evidence for this statement will be found in Mr. Denny's pamphlet The English Church and the Ministry of the Reformed Churches (see § 10).

Parker referred to above, and c. 3 those relating to Barlow and other Bps. consecrating Parker); (3) Benedict (XIV, Pope), de Synodo Dioecessana (bk. 8, c. 10, relates to the matter of Ordination, and gives the Roman arguments and authorities on both sides); (4) Boudinhon, A. (in a number of articles quoted in Appendix IV in Lacey's Roman Diary); (5) Brightman, F. E., What objections have been made to English Orders? (Church Historical Society 61, London, SPCK, 1896); (6) Bulgakoff, A., The Question of Anglican Orders (Church Historical Society 55, London, SPCK, 1899—a treatment of the subject from the point of view of the Eastern Ch.); (7) Dalbus Fernand (= Portal, F.), Les Ordinations anglicanes, Arras, 1893-4; (8) Denny, E., The English Church and the Ministry of the Reformed Churches (Church Historical Society 57, London, SPCK, 1900); (9) Denny, E. and Lacey, T. A., De Hierarchia Anglicana, London, 1895; (10) Dixon, R. W., History of the Church of England; (11) Estcourt, The Question of Anglican Ordinations discussed; (12) Frere, W. H., The Marian Reaction, London, 1896; (13) Gams, P. B., Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae, Ratisbonae, 1873; (14) Gasparri, P., Tractatus Canonicus de sacra Ordinatione, Paris, 1893-4, and De la valeur des ordinations anglicanes, Paris, 1895 (see Revue Anglo-Romaine, vol. 1); (15) Gore C., The Church and the Ministry, also Orders and Unity; (16) Haddon, A. W. (in vol. 3 of Bramhall's Works in Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology); (17) Lacey, T. A., A Roman Diary and other Documents, London, 1910 (contains the Latin text of the Bull Apostolicae Curae, the Responsio Archiepiscoporum Anglicae, and Pope Leo XIII's Epistola ad Archiepiscopos Anglicae, together with a very full Bibliography of the controversy on Anglican ordinations); (18) Le Courayer, P. F., A Dissertation on the Validity of the Ordinations of the English and the Succession of the Bishops of the Anglican Church, Oxford, 1844 (a discussion of the subject by a divine of the French Ch., translated first from the original in 1724); (19) Moberley, R. C., Ministerial Priesthood, London, 1905; (20) Morinus, P., De Sacris Ordinationibus, Paris, 1665, Antwerp, 1695 (pt. 3 contains a discussion of the matter of ordination); (21) Morse, H. G., Apostolical Succession, 1887; (22) Palmer, Sir W., Origines Liturgicae, Oxford, 3rd ed., 1839, also A Treatise on the Church of Christ, London, 3rd ed., 1842; (23) Puller, F. W., S.S.J.E., Les Ordinations anglicanes et le sacrifice de la messe, Paris and London, 1896; (24) Revue Anglo-Romaine, 3 vols., Paris, 1895-6 (contains a number of important articles on the subject of ordinations); (25) Stubbs, W., Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum, Oxford, 1897; (26) Swete, H. B., On the Bull Apostolicae Curae, Cambridge, 1896; (27) Wordsworth, J., Ministry of Grace, London, 1902, Responsio ad Batos (de ualiditate ordinum Anglicanorum), Salisbury, 1894, Ordination Problems, SPCK, London, 1909, Bishop Sarapion's PB, SPCK, London, 1899.—rd.

H. LEONARD PASS.

ANNUAL CHARGES ON BENEFICE.—

1. Taxes—(a) Property; (b) Income; (c) House Duty; (d) Land Tax. 2. Rates (see RATES and TAXES). 3. Other charges—(a) Fee Farm Rent; (b) Quit Rent; (c) TITHES; (d) PENSION (if any) to previous Incumbent; (e) Statutory charges, payable to a daughter or neighbouring parish; (f) Cost of collecting income; (g) DILAPIDATIONS; (h) INSURANCES; (i) Stipend of Curate, or portion of it, where necessary for the minimum of services required.—A6. J. S. WILSDEN.

¹ Prob. rent paid for lands originally held under a religious house.

² Prob. rent paid for lands originally held under the Crown.

ANNUAL VALUE OF BENEFICE.—The value of a Benefice is frequently quoted, without distinction being made between gross and net income or reference to charges and obligations (ANNUAL CHARGES ON BENEFICE). The gross income is the sum total accruing from all sources, which it is the duty of the incumbent to administer; the net income is what remains after the charges on the benefice have been satisfied. It would be a more complete definition to quote the gross and net income respectively, and to add (if such be the case) that there is an official residence, which the incumbent is bound to occupy and to maintain in tenable repair, subject to the periodic inspection and approval of the Diocesan Surveyor (DILAPIDATIONS).

Even then it would be unsafe to infer that the net income represents the amount which the incumbent can deal with for his own use and benefit. Local custom and sentiment often influence a timid and sensitive man, and constrain him to contribute unduly to Adverse Balances, and sometimes to Ch. Expenses, for which the parishioners, not the clergyman, are legally and morally responsible.—A6.

J. S. WILSDEN.

ANNUNCIATION.—See FESTIVAL, § 14; ADVENT, § 1; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 9.

ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE.—At the end of the HC Service in the PB are found certain Rubrics, the first of which is as 1. Lawfulness follows: "Upon the Sundays and other Holy-days, if there be no Communion, shall be said all that is appointed at the Communion until the end of the general prayer 'for the whole state of Christ's Church Militant here on earth,' together with one or more of these collects last rehearsed, concluding with the blessing."

In the former revisions the wording had run—"until the end of the homily, concluding with the General Prayer," etc.; but in the First PB it ran: "till the end of the Offertory"—the General Prayer not being ordered to be said, as in that book it came later in the service; and the direction to use the AC. service was extended to all other days "whenever the people be customably assembled to pray in the church, and none be disposed to communicate with the priest."

This Rubric is quite plain for days when there is no Communion; but it has been very commonly evaded of late and the AC. Service omitted at the midday Service, on the plea that a celebration of the HC at an early hour is a sufficient compliance with the Rubric, and that this obviates the necessity of saying the AC. Service at midday. The AC. Service ought certainly to be said at every Communion, and its use at an early Communion Service is doubtless a compliance with the letter of the Rubric, but it is quite contrary to its spirit and intention. This may be seen from the facts: (1) that all notices are to be given out during the AC. Service; (2) that there is no provision for a sermon except at this Service; (3) that on certain days the Gospel is a continuation of the 2nd Lesson at MP; (4) that the most authoritative writers on the PB uphold this conclusion, e.g., Bishop Sparrow says: "The Morning Service is to be said at the beginning of the day . . . The Communion Service is to be some good distance after the Morning Service. . . . The Litany is . . . no part of the Morning Service," but is "a kind of Preparative to the Communion" (Rationale 1684). It is doubtful whether any celebration of the HC should come before MP; it is certain that at least the AC. Service should always come after it.

And this usage of the Church of England is in strict accordance with the law and custom of the Church both East and West, as will be seen presently: whilst there is no ancient or even mediæval precedent for utilising an office like Mattins as the chief popular Service of the day, when it is not possible to have the complete service of the HC at the hour of the principal Service.

For what is the AC. Service, and what is its origin and history? The one service of the first Christians, the "Liturgy" par

2. History. excellence, was what we call the Communion Service. But then, as now, it contained far more than the parts which had to do with the actual communion. It consisted of two divisions, the former part being in substance the old Synagogue Service; and the latter part being the specially Christian addition of the breaking of the bread, i.e., the fulfilment of Christ's command to "do this." In the primitive Church this first part of the service was called the Liturgy of the Catechumens (Missa Catechumenorum), the latter part the Liturgy of the Faithful (Missa Fidelium); because the catechumens were allowed to be present at the first part, but the faithful only at the second. It is thought indeed by some (see Cabrol, Origines Liturgiques, App. J) that these two divisions were at first two separate services (perhaps those of Saturday and Sunday) which were very soon fused together. However this may be—whether the Missa Fidelium was ever used alone or not—it is certain that the Missa Catechumenorum (or AC. Service) was used alone in the early ages, and has continued to be used both in East and West as the normal type of people's service when the full Eucharistic Liturgy could not be used. (1) Socrates (Hist. Eccles. 5.21) tells us that it was the ancient custom of the Alexandrian Church on Wednesdays and Fridays to have all the usual Liturgy except the actual Consecration and Communion. (2) In the Ambrosian rite on every week-day in Lent except Saturdays there were Missae Catechumenorum both morning and afternoon. (Missa Fidelium was subsequently added to the afternoon services but not to those held in the mornings.) These Missae Catechumenorum existed already in the time of St. Ambrose and the morning ones are still said regularly in Milan Cathedral, though the evening ones have been dropped. A similar series of Missae Catechumenorum was said in the Mozarabic rite. Until recent times another set of Missae Catechumenorum (twelve on each day) was said at Milan on Rogation days; and similar services existed in the Mozarabic rite. It is quite possible that in the Roman rite also the daily Lenten Masses were originally only Missae Catechumenorum for the instruction of the candidates for Bapt., the Missa Fidelium being added about the 6th cent. In the Byzantine rite a similar series of Missae Catechumenorum is still said in Lent, and the Missa Fidelium cannot be added to these, as in Lent it is only on Saturdays and Sundays that consecration of the Euch. is allowed. At other times of the year also, whenever the Euch. cannot be celebrated, a service called "Typica" is substituted for it, which is simply the AC. Service with the addition of some concluding devotions. This custom (which has always been the regular rule of the East) was followed also in the West with all the authority of the Papal Curia up to the Reformation, and it was dropped in the Pian Missal, in all probability only because objection had been taken to an abuse to which it had been perverted, viz., that certain priests took the fee for saying a mass and said nothing but Missa Sicca (as it was called), i.e., Missa Catechumenorum together with the Lord's Pr. and certain other portions of the Missa Fidelium but without Canon or Consecration. Indeed the (so-called) Missa praesantificatorum used in the Roman rite on Good Friday is nothing but Missa Catechumenorum, to which Communion with the reserved Sacr. has been subsequently added; and the Liturgy of the Presanctified which is used in the East throughout Lent except on Saturdays and Sundays is of precisely similar character.

The AC. Service, the Christian adaptation of the old Synagogue service, consisted originally of Lessons from (1) the Law; (2) the Prophets;

3. Contents. to which we find (3) a Ps. added (1 Cor. 14.26); and then lessons from (4) the Epistles (1 Thess. 5.27, Col. 4.16); and finally (5) the Gospels. A lesson from Acts preceded the Epistle at certain seasons. (This may be taken as the general scheme subject to local variations.) These lessons were followed by the Sermon and possibly certain Intercessions, though the principal intercessions belonged rather to the Missa Fidelium. In Post-Nicene ages various chants were added before the lessons, but soon after, if not before, first the lesson from the Law and then that from the Prophets began to be dropped in many places. The lesson from the Law has survived during parts of the ecclesiastical year in the Persian, Mozarabic and Ambrosian rites; and also (for the Lenten Missae Catechumenorum) in the Byzantine rite. The prophetic lesson has disappeared from the Byzantine rite, and (except for the week-days in Lent with a few other instances) from the Roman rite—probably in both cases from about the 5th century.

It will be convenient to give at this point a few references to passages in early Christian literature in which the reading of Scripture-lessons is alluded to, first premising that these allusions to Scripture-lessons in the popular services have reference to their use in the Eucharistic Liturgy, the Liturgy of the Catechumens, or a Vigil-service similar to the Easter-Vigil, and not to any of the services which were afterwards embodied in the Brev., as these services were monastic in origin. Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 67, speaks of the Sunday Liturgy, at the beginning of which "the memoirs of the Apostles or the writings of the Prophets are read as long as time allows." Tertullian, de Anima 9, speaks of the reading of Scripture and singing of Pss., and, in Apol. 39, of the reading of Scripture in the ordinary worship; in de Præscript. Hæret. 36, he mentions the reading of the Epistles; and in other passages appears to allude to lessons from the Prophets and Gospels. Origen has many allusions to the reading of both OT and NT books in the services. Cyprian, Eps. 38 (33) 2 and 39 (34) 4, 5, alludes to the Gospel as read by a lector from the pulpit. Augustine and Chrysostom frequently allude to lessons from the Prophets, Epistles and Gospels.

The adaptation of these lessons to the days and seasons of the ecclesiastical year could not be earlier than the rise of the ecclesiastical year itself, which dates in the main from the 4th cent., bef. which period little more was recognised than the festival of Easter, with the Paschal fast preceding it and the fifty days of Eastertide following it, and perhaps some period of preparation for Bapt.; also the festival of the Epiphany. It seems pretty clear from the writings of Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine and the Peregrinatio Etheriae (= Silvæ) that by the end of the 4th cent. the special lessons assigned to the principal holy-days and seasons had already acquired the sanction of tradition and use; but it is equally clear that (in the West and probably also in the East) there was still a great deal of liberty as to the choice of lessons for the rest of the year when no great holy-day required a special selection. Even bef. the 4th cent. it had apparently become customary to read certain books during the fast bef. Easter, and it is possible that the still-remaining series of lessons bef. Easter intended for the instruction of catechumens may be substantially earlier than the cycle of the (strictly) ecclesiastical year, viz. Genesis (or the Law), Proverbs (or Sapiential Books)—and (in the West) St. John's Gospel. Besides these books, in Eastertide Acts was almost universally read, and in the West (except at Rome) Revelation—it being hardly read at all in the East.

The Passion from Matt. appears to have been universally read on Good Friday—except at Rome; and the Resurrection from Matt. to have been everywhere the original Easter Gospel. The selection of lessons for ordinary Sundays was the latest portion of the lesson-cycle.

Aft. the lessons came the Sermon, and aft. that the dismissal of the catechumens and penitents, this dismissal being made the occasion of a. Comunion an intercession for them. (At Rome alone the catechumens were dismissed before the Gospel.) These dismissals ended in strictness the Missa Catechumenorum or AC. Service; but in the Middle Ages, aft. there had ceased to be any catechumens to dismiss, when the Missa Fidelium did not follow entire, portions of it were nevertheless included—omitting of course all that related to the consecration; and this service was called Missa Sicca (or by the Carthusians, who still practise it, Nudum Officium), of which service our AC. Service is the exact equivalent.

As this service consisted originally of little more than lessons and a sermon, it was not said at the altar. Even the Coll. bef. the lessons

a. Cumential in the Roman Mass (which was really the completion of the Lit.) was not originally said by the pontiff at the altar, but at his throne. The lessons (and the Ps., which was sung by a soloist and counted among the lessons) were read by the readers in the place provided for them, i.e. the pulpit or ambon;¹ and the sermon was preached by the bishop not from the pulpit but from his throne. The deacon's announcements and dismissal of catechumens and penitents were also pronounced from the pulpit, the rest of the clergy occupying their usual seats or positions. (See INCENSE, LIGHTS.)

At the Reformation a return was made to this primitive custom. In the Injunctions of Edward VI (1547) it was ordered that "In the time of High-Mass . . . he that saith or singeth the same shall read or cause to be read the Epistle and Gospel of that Mass in English and not in Latin, in the Pulpit or in such convenient place as the people may hear the same," and there is abundant evidence to show that this custom was put in practice and continued under the PB's both of Edward VI and Elizabeth. (The alternative "convenient place" was evidently intended only to cover cases like college chapels and cathedral choirs, where there was no pulpit.) This direction applied also to the chapter of OT and NT at MP and EP; that it was a conscious and deliberate reversion to primitive custom is shown by the draft of Cranmer's original suggestions for the reform of Divine Service; where we find "Et legendas sive lectiones non intra cancellos ut hodie, sed foris a suggestu ut apud veteres fieri consuevit censemur recitandas" (see Gasquet and Bishop's Edward VI and the Bk. of CP, p. 375). This direction has never been superseded by any subsequent direction, nor is any other place for reading the Epistle and Gospel or the lessons at MP and EP recognised in the rubrics or official documents of the Church of England. (See PULPIT, LECTERN, AMBO.)

That the Epistle may be read by the parish clerk, and has been so read by continuous custom in the Church of England, is shown in C. Atchley's The Right of the Parish Clerk to Read the Epistle (Alcuin Club Publicns.) and in Dr. J. Wickham Legg's Clerk's Book of 1549 (HBS).

On subject of AC. Service generally, see Dr. J. Wickham Legg's Three Chapters in Liturgical Research (Ch. Hist. Soc., S.P.C.K.).

7. Bibliography. For information with regard to ancient Lectionaries, see DCA, art. Lectionary, which gives a good account of the Byzantine Epistles and Gospels, the Lenten lessons from Gen. and Prov. not included; paper by De Lagarde in Abhandlungen d. historisch-philologischen Classe, Göttingen, for Coptic Lectionaries; Wright's Catalogue to Syriac MSS. in B. Museum and Forshall's do., for Syriac do.; Maclean's East Syrian Offices (Appx.), for Nestorian do.; Mozarabic Missal and Brev., also G. Morin's Liber Comicus, for Mozarabic do.; Mabillon's De Liturgia Gallic., for Gallican do.; Auctarium Solesmense, vol. i, and Magistretti's Manuale Ambrosianum, for Ambrosian do.; Ranke's Kirchliche Pericopen-system, and Thomasii, Opera, for Roman do.—H.T. W. C. BISHOP.

ANTEPENDIUM.—The vesture which hangs in front of the holy table—the altar cloth: the word is sometimes inaccurately used of the Frontlet, or narrow strip of fringed material, which hangs from the front edge of the altar, and hides the top of the altar frontal.—R3. V. STALEY.

ANTHEM.—Etym. merely an Englishing of the Lat. antiphona (ANTIPHON); but in current English it designates a piece of sacred vocal music performed in the course of Divine service, but not forming part of the liturgical office itself. This use of the word is, however, quite modern. Bef. the Reformation free use was made of such pieces of vocal music, but they were called Motets. In the PB the word occurs in the following places. (1) In the Pref., "Concerning the Service," etc., where anthems are grouped with responds, etc., as among the things cut off in order to simplify the service. Here the word is clearly the equivalent of antiphon. (2) In the rubric bef. Venite (introduced in 1662)—"Except on Easter Day, upon which another A. is appointed." Here the word = "Canticle." N.B.—In the rubric on Easter Day the word is used in the plural, and in 1549 these texts of Scripture were actually antiphons, to be sung "afore Matins." It was in 1552 that they were put in the place of Venite, and in 1662 the Gloria Patri was added. This use of a series of texts to form a Canticle no doubt suggested the similar compositions in the old Accession Service, and in the other State services now suppressed. (3) In the rubric aft. the 3rd Coll. at MP and EP: "In quires and places where they sing, here followeth the A." This rubric was first inserted in 1662, at which date it may be assumed that the word "A." had acquired its present meaning.—Q2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

¹ The people stood originally for all the lessons; afterwards for the Gospel only. See Cyprian, Ep. 39 (34) 5, and Eusebius, Martyr. Palest. 13 8.

ANTHEMS.—The present article is intended to cover both Anthems and Services (i.e., musical settings to the Canticles and Communion Office).

1. Introductory.

The Anthem was a normal element of the old Latin services in the greater churches, and at the Reformation directions were early given (see below) for substituting English words. Moreover, the absence of Hymns in the English PB at this time, together with the disappearance of the Antiphons to the Psalms and Canticles, roused a strong feeling of need for music, which was met by the provision contained in the 49th Injn. of 1559 to the effect that in certain churches, music, in the form of a Hymn or Anthem, be permitted at the beginning or end of MEP. England during this period certainly claimed to be a musical country, for Henry VIII was a composer, and Queen Elizabeth used her practical influence to maintain music in the Ch. Service. Excepting during the Great Rebellion when Organs and Ch. Music Books were the objects of wilful destruction, the Anthem has ever since held a place in the Choral Service, and from the time of the Reformation all the eminent musicians of this country have contributed to the wonderful and varied store of Ch. Music now in our possession.

The growth of the Anthem may be divided into 4 periods.

2. Periods.

1st Period (1520-1625). Here are found the Musicians who may justly be termed the founders of English Church Music:—Redford, Tye, Tallis, Byrd and Gibbons. The Anthems of these famous men were in all probability accompanied by a small portable Organ, together with some stringed instruments which played in unison with the voices, and were in each case "Full." We look to Cathedrals to set the example of preserving these compositions, and thus preventing them falling into oblivion, for they are far more suitable to the Cathedral Service than to the average parish church.

2nd Period (1650-1720). Pelham Humphrey, Wise, Blow, Henry Purcell, Croft, Weldon, Jeremiah Clarke. The A. in this Period undergo a great change, chiefly owing to the introduction of Solos and Verses, due to the influence of Henry Purcell, whose writings will ever remain amongst the most treasured of all Ch. Music. The free accompaniments and daring harmonies used by these masters paved the way for what was to follow.

3rd Period (1720-1845). Greene, Boyce, Hayes, Battishill, Attwood, Walmisley, Goss, Smart, Wesley, Elvey. Little difference at the commencement of this period is to be noticed in the way of absolute novelty, but Solo and Verse Anthems grow in favour. The influence of Handel is conspicuous in the later Anthems of this Period.

4th Period (the Modern Anthem). Ouseley, Garrett, Barnby, Stainer, Sullivan, Martin, Stanford, etc., etc. The A. of this period are so well known and so extensively used that little need be said. Perhaps the elaborate, and, in many cases, the entirely independent accompaniments constitute the most noticeable feature of these compositions. These A. are a delight to the qualified organist of the present day, for, if he be the fortunate possessor of one of the many excellent organs now to be found almost everywhere, it is quite natural that he should select these Anthems in preference to those in which he has nothing more to do than to accompany the voices, note for note, though this fact does not afford him any excuse for shunning the A. of the old Masters which will always hold their own.

A few remarks, dealing with the selection of suitable A. for Church Service, together with a classification of the same, may, it is hoped, be found helpful.

3. Practical.

(1) The capabilities of the Choir should first be studied. Nothing is more distressing for a congregation than having to listen to a Choir manfully struggling through long and difficult A., which in reality are far too advanced. Such A. as these should be left entirely to the most efficient and highly trained Choirs, for in these days members of congregations are only too prone to find an excuse for looking upon A. as merely a "Performance by the Choir," and bad or indifferent singing will tend to furnish this excuse more than anything else. On the other hand, carefully selected A., well within the capabilities of the Choir, devoutly and adequately rendered, are a great addition to the Ch. Service; and there should be no difficulty in fulfilling the purpose of Queen Elizabeth's Injunction, namely, "that the sentence of the Hymn may be understood and perceived."

(2) The words should be suitable to the particular Sunday or Ch. Festival, and should in every case be provided for the congregation. If Church funds cannot run to the purchase of Anthem Books or separate printing, then A. should be chosen with words taken from the Pss. or Hymns, to which the congregation can readily turn.

(3) Organists with small organs at their disposal should avoid A. with very elaborate accompaniments, e.g.:—"It came even to pass" (Ouseley). All the massive Choruses from the Oratorios should be avoided. Quite an erroneous impression of the composition is displayed by a Cathedral Choir of, say, 12 boys and 6 men, when they sing, with whatever technical correctness, such Choruses as "For unto us," or "Worthy is the Lamb" or the "Amen" Chorus from the Messiah. Only a large body of voices can give the proper effect.

(4) Always make use of good, wholesome music. The taste displayed in the selection of music by organists of some of the smaller churches is truly lamentable, for they seem quite content to limit the resources of their repertoire to the compositions of about two men, and use music which no thoroughly competent or cathedral-trained organist would even look at. Organists would do wisely to stick almost exclusively to the publications of Novello & Co., who issue a classified list of Services and Anthems which every choirmaster should possess.

(5) No A. which take longer than 6-8 minutes should be used in ordinary parish churches. In village churches, when a short Anthem is sung on a Festival, it is a good plan to follow this up by a Hymn given out at the same time with the Anthem. The congregation is not then deprived of a Hymn, and should therefore have no just cause for complaint.

An excellent selection of A. may be made from the Works of the following Composers:—Tye (1510-1572); Tallis (1520-1585); Palestrina (1524-1594); Farrant (1530-1580); Gibbons (1583-1625); Rogers (1614-1698); Wise (1638-1687); Creighton (1639-1736); Humphrey (1647-1674); Purcell (1658-1695); Clarke (1670-1707); Weldon (1676-1736); Croft (1678-1726); Greene (1695-1755); Kent (1700-1776); Hayes (1707-1777); Boyce (1710-1779); Nares (1715-1783); Attwood (1765-1838); Goss (1800-1880); Mendelssohn (1809-1847); Smart (1813-1879); Wesley (1814-1875); Walmisley (1814-1856); Elvey (1816-1893); Ouseley (1825-1889); Stainer (1840-1901); Sullivan (1842-1900); Martin (1844).

The following Classification of A. may be found useful by Precentors and Choirmasters. It contains selections for special seasons and occasions, the items being marked A, B, C, according as they are suitable for—(A) Village and Ordinary Town Choirs, singing Anthems on special occasions; (B) Better Town Choirs, with Choral Service on Sundays; (C) Cathedral and College Chapel Choirs, and others rendering a daily Choral Service.

4. Chief Composers.

5. Anthems Classified.

ADVENT.

- | | | |
|------|---------------------------|--------------|
| A. | Doth not wisdom cry | Haking. |
| A.B. | Hearken unto Me | Sullivan. |
| B. | Sleepers, wake | Mendelssohn. |
| B. | Prepare ye the way | Garrett. |
| B. | It is high time | Barnby. |
| B. | Rejoice greatly | Gadsby. |
| B.C. | Rejoice in the Lord | Purcell. |
| B.C. | Comfort ye, And the glory | Handel. |
| B.C. | Who is this | Arnold. |

ADVENT—contd.

- | | | |
|------|------------------------|----------|
| B.C. | Praise His awful name | Spohr. |
| B.C. | Awake, awake | Stainer. |
| B.C. | Hosanna in the Highest | Stainer. |
| C. | Rejoice in the Lord | Redford. |
| C. | Hosanna to the Son | Gibbons. |
| C. | Ascribe unto the Lord | Travers. |

CHRISTMAS.

- | | | |
|------|--------------------------|------------|
| A. | Let us now go | Hopkins. |
| B. | In the beginning | Thorne. |
| B. | While shepherds watched | Best. |
| B. | Drop down, ye Heavens | Barnby. |
| B. | Sing, O daughter | Gadsby. |
| B.C. | In dulci júbilo | Pearsall. |
| B.C. | Sing and rejoice | Harwood. |
| B.C. | God, Who at sundry times | Bairdston. |
| C. | Methinks I hear | Crotch. |

EPIPHANY.

- | | | |
|------|-----------------------|--------------|
| A. | Arise, shine | Elvey. |
| A. | From the rising | Ouseley. |
| B. | Behold the Lord | Thorne. |
| B.C. | Lo! star-led chiefs | Crotch. |
| B.C. | Say, where is He born | Mendelssohn. |
| B.C. | Send out Thy light | Gounod. |

SEPTUAGESIMA.

- | | | |
|------|-------------------------|---------------|
| B. | The glory of the Lord | Goss. |
| B.C. | Whoso dwelleth | Martin. |
| B.C. | It is a good thing | J. F. Bridge. |
| C. | The Heavens are telling | Haydn. |
| C. | The Lord is very great | Beckwith. |

SEXAGESIMA.

- | | | |
|------|---------------------------|----------|
| A. | Teach me, O Lord | Rogers. |
| A. | Teach me, O Lord | Attwood. |
| A.B. | How dear are Thy Counsels | Crotch. |
| B.C. | O where shall wisdom | Boyce. |

QUINQUAGESIMA.

- | | | |
|------|--------------------|--------------|
| B.C. | See what love | Mendelssohn. |
| B.C. | Blessed be the God | Wesley. |

LENT.

- | | | |
|--------|-----------------------------|--------------|
| A. | Lord for Thy tender mercies | Farrant. |
| A. | I will arise | Creighton. |
| A. | Incline Thine ear | Himmel. |
| A. | Turn Thy face | Attwood. |
| A. | Turn Thee again | Attwood. |
| A. | Comfort, O Lord | Crotch. |
| A. | God so loved the world | Goss. |
| A. | Lead me, Lord | Wesley. |
| A. | O Lord my God | Wesley. |
| A. | Lord I call upon Thee | Ouseley. |
| A. | Ponder my words | Colborne. |
| A.B. | God so loved the world | Stainer. |
| A.B.C. | O Saviour of the world | Goss. |
| B. | Come and let us return | Goss. |
| B.C. | By the waters of Babylon | Boyce. |
| B.C. | As pants the hart | Spohr. |
| B.C. | Judge me, O God | Mendelssohn. |
| B.C. | By Babylon's wave | Gounod. |
| B.C. | Remember now thy Creator | Steggall. |
| B.C. | Lead kindly light | Stainer. |
| B.C. | Yea though I walk | Sullivan. |
| C. | Give ear unto my prayer | Arcadelt. |
| C. | Bow Thine ear | Byrd. |
| C. | I wrestle and pray | Bach. |
| C. | Hear my prayer | Stroud. |
| C. | Call to remembrance | Battishill. |
| C. | My soul is weary | Beckwith. |
| C. | Hear my prayer | Mendelssohn. |

EASTER.

- | | | |
|----|---------------------|--------|
| A. | Christ our Passover | Goss. |
| A. | Christ is risen | Elvey. |

EASTER—contd.

A.	Why seek ye	Hopkins.
A.	They have taken away	Stainer.
B.	If we believe	Goss.
B.	O give thanks	Goss.
B.	The Lord is my strength	Goss.
B.	The Lord is my strength	Smart.
B.	Sing praises	Gounod.
B.	I will sing	Sullivan.
B.	Who is like unto Thee	Sullivan.
B.C.	Since by man	Handel.
B.C.	Thou wilt keep him	Wesley.
B.C.	The Lord will comfort
	Zion	Hiles.
B.C.	Thou wilt keep him	Jekyll.
B.C.	I will mention	Sullivan.
C.	I know that my Redeemer	Handel.
C.	Christ is risen	Ouseley.
C.	As we have borne	Barnby.
C.	Rejoice in the Lord	Martin.

ASCENSION.

B.C.	God is gone up	Croft.
B.C.	O clap your hands	Stainer.
C.	O God the King of glory	Walmisley.
C.	King all glorious	Barnby.

WHITSUNTIDE.

A.	Come, Holy Ghost	Attwood.
A.	O taste and see	Goss.
A.	O taste and see	Sullivan.
B.	The Lord descended	Hayes.
B.	O give thanks	Elvey.
B.C.	God is a Spirit	S. Bennett.
B.C.	God came from Teman	Steggall.
B.C.	O for a closer walk	Foster.
C.	Sing to the Lord	Smart.
C.	The Spirit of the Lord	Elgar.

TRINITY.

A.	Lord of all power	Mason.
A.B.	In humble faith	Garrett.
B.	Holy, Holy	Crotch.
B.	Come up hither	Spohr.
B.	I am Alpha	Stainer.
C.	I was in the Spirit	Blow.
C.	Blessing, glory	Bach.
C.	Ascribe unto the Lord	Wesley.
C.	I saw the Lord	Stainer.

ALL SAINTS' DAY.

A.	What are these	Stainer.
A.	O love the Lord	Sullivan.
C.	I beheld, and lo	Blow.
C.	These are they	Dykes.

HARVEST.

A.	Thou visitest the earth	Greene.
A.	Ye shall dwell in the land	Stainer.
B.	Fear not, O land	Goss.
B.	The Lord hath done	Smart.
B.	The Lord is loving	Garrett.
B.	While the earth remaineth	Tours.
B.C.	O praise the Lord of Heaven	Goss.

DEDICATION FESTIVAL.

A.	Blessed are they	Tours.
B.	I was glad	Elvey.
B.C.	How lovely are Thy dwellings	Spohr.
B.C.	Praise the Lord	Goss.
B.C.	It came even to pass	Ouseley.
B.C.	How goodly	Ouseley.
C.	I have surely built	Boyce.
C.	How lovely is Thy dwelling	Brahms.

THANKSGIVING.

A.	O praise God	Weldon.
A.	O praise the Lord, laud
	ye	Goss.
A.	Sing a song of praise	Stainer.
B.C.	They that go down	Attwood.
B.C.	The Lord is great	Best.
C.	O sing unto the Lord	Purcell.
C.	Give thanks, O Israel	Ouseley.
C.	Lord, Thou art God	Stainer.

EVENING.

B.	I will lay me down	Hiles.
B.	The radiant morn	Woodward.
B.C.	O gladsome light	Sullivan.
C.	O Lord the Maker	King Henry VIII.

BURIAL.

A.	Thou knowest, Lord	Purcell.
B.	Brother, thou art gone	Goss.
B.	I heard a voice	Goss.
B.C.	Blest are the departed	Spohr.
B.C.	Comes, at times	Oakeley.

GENERAL.

A.	Thine, O Lord	Kent.
A.	I will lift up (Confirmation)	Clarke-Whitfield.
A.	Sweet is Thy mercy	Barnby.
B.	How lovely are the messengers	Mendelssohn.
	(Ember Seasons and Saints' Days)
B.	Father of Heaven	Walmisley.
B.	The Lord is my shepherd
	(Morning)	Ouseley.
B.	Thou, O God	Stewart.
B.	The righteous shall flourish (Saints' Days)	Calkin.
B.	I will wash my hands	Hopkins.
B.	Come, my soul (Ember
	Days)	Martin.
B.	Bread of Heaven (Communion)	German.
C.	Plead Thou my cause
	(Missions)	Mozart.
C.	O praise the Lord
	(Michaelmas)	Elvey.

SERVICES. Suitable Settings. (These are not classified, as the range of variation in difficulty is not so great as in the case of anthems, and they are usually, and very properly, not attempted except by the better trained choirs.)

TE DEUM.

Alcock in B flat; Aldrich in G; Attwood in F; Barnby in E; Boyce in A, in A (with Verse), and in C; Calkin in B flat; Clarke-Whitfield in E; Croft in A; Dykes in F; Garrett in D, in E, in F, and again in F (small); Gibbons in F; Harwood in A flat; Hopkins in A, in C, and in F; King Hall in B flat; Lloyd in E flat; Mendelssohn in A; Nares in F; Noble in B mi; Ouseley in E; Rogers in D; Smart in F; Stainer in A, in B flat, and in E flat; Stanford in A, in B flat, and in C; Tours in F, also in F (Unison); Turlle in D; Wesley in F.

COMMUNION.

Barnby in E; Calkin in G; Dykes in F; Elvey in E; Eyre in E flat; Garrett in D, in E, in F, and in F (Unison); Harwood in A flat; Lloyd in E flat; Martin in C; Merbecke; Ouseley in C, and in E; Parker in E; Smart in F; Stainer in A, in E flat, and in F; Stammers in E flat; Stanford in B flat, and in C; Thorne in E flat; Tours in C, and in F; Wesley in E; Woodward in E flat.

MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS.

Arnold in A; Attwood in C, and in F; Barnby in E; Bennett in G; Bridge in C; Calkin in B flat; Chipp in A; Clarke-Whitfield in E; Colborne in A; Cooke in C; Dykes in F; Elvey in A; Foster in A; Gadsby in C; Garrett in D, in E flat (E Service), in F, and in F (small); Gibbons in F; Goss in E; Harwood in A flat; Hatton in E; Hopkins in F; Iliffe in G; Kelway in A mi, in B mi, and in G mi; King Hall in E flat; Lloyd in A; Macfarren in E flat; Nares in F; Noble in B mi; Ouseley in B flat, and in E; Reay in F; Rogers in A mi, and in D; Smart in B flat, and in F; Stainer in A, in B flat, in E flat, and in E; Stanford in A, in B flat, and in C; Steggall in C; Tours in F; Turle in D; Walmisley in C, and in D mi; Wesley in F.—Q2.

J. S. HEAP.

ANTINOMIAN.—Antinomianism had been advocated as early as the 14th cent. in Flanders by the "Brethren of the Free Spirit," and also at the time of the Reformation by the "Spirituals" in Flanders, and by John Agricola, a Lutheran divine; but it was not until the Commonwealth that a sect of Antinomians arose in England. They usually held an extreme and perverted form of Calvinism and their views varied. Some held that it was unnecessary to exhort Christians to obey the moral law of God, because the "elect" would, by a divine impulse, lead holy lives, and that those who were "reprobate" could not obey the law. Others taught that the elect cannot commit sin because they can do nothing displeasing to God. Their main contention was that, as Christ had taken the place of the elect and perfectly obeyed the law, it could have no further demands on them. These opinions were strongly condemned by the Westminster Assembly in 1643. Some of the more fanatical of the early Quakers also used their doctrine of special divine illumination as a cloak for licentiousness.

[The word A. (= one who is against law) was first coined by Luther to stigmatise Agricola, who, against Melancthon, taught that faith came before repentance and that not the knowledge of moral law, but the knowledge of the love of God, produced repentance. The accusation implied by it is however as early as St. Paul's days. St. Paul's teaching of justification by faith, of grace abounding and grace ruling, led him to be accused of saying: "let us do evil":—(1) that good may come, i.e., that God may be glorified and that grace may more abound, (2) because law is no longer our master (see Rom. 3 7, 8, 5 20-6 1, 6 14, 15). His answer (see Rom. 6 2-14, 16-23) is: To become a Christian means a great change like dying and rising again. We are alive in Christ, how can we live in sin? To obey sin is to own sin as master. We were made free, how can we go back to slavery? Charges of Antinomianism have been frequently made against Calvinists because of their disparagement of "deadly doing" and of "legal preaching." Cp. Fletcher's Checks to Antinomianism (A.D. 1771-1775).]

See Mosheim, Ecl. Hist., cent. 16, sect. 3, pt. 2, c. 1, § 25 and c. 2, § 38; and cent. 17, sect. 2, pt. 2, c. 2, § 23; Neal, Hist. of Puritans (1822 ed.) 3 55.—K1.

C. S. CARTER.

[J. BATTERSBY HARFORD].

ANTIPHON.—The word means "something said in reply," and it was originally used to denote the fixed phrase recited by the cong. aft. each verse of a Ps. or Cant. had been chanted by the reader, in the early Church services.

This repetition of the A. was in course of time gradually diminished in frequency, until at last it was only sung bef. and aft. each entire Ps., except in the case of the A. to Venite (INVITATORY). In the meantime the monks had early introduced the practice of having the Ps. chanted, not by a single reader, but by two choirs in alternate verses. To this the name of "antiphonal singing" is commonly applied, but this latter term has no connection with the original meaning of A. The As. were also made use of apart from the Ps. and Cants. to which they belonged, being sung in various parts of almost every service, and especially in processions. From this independent use of the A. has come the modern meaning of its English equivalent ANTHEM. At the Reformation the use of As. with the Ps. and Cants. was discontinued; but a good many are retained in the Burial Service. The "Offertory Sentences" in the Communion Service are in reality As. (vide rubric, 1549), and at the present day are not uncommonly sung as such. In 1549 they were balanced by another set of Post-Communion As. at the end of the Service. In the Lit. we find the A., "O Lord, arise," retained in connection with the first verse of Ps. 44, to which it belonged.—Q2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

3—(242:)

ANTIPHONAL SINGING.—In the worship of the Tabernacle and Temple, arrangements were made for the "service of song in 1 Origin the house of the Lord" according to some method of responsorial chant (1 Chron. 6 31 ff. and 25 1-7). The structure of Ps. 24 and 134 implies such a method of AS. Philo tells us that certain Jewish or Christian ascetics of his day at Alexandria sang their hymns, partly in alternation of men's and women's voices, and partly in unison: and Pliny (Ep. 10 96) writes of the Bithynian Christians chanting a hymn before sunrise by turns (secum invicem). In all probability this method of chanting was adopted by Christians in the earliest ages of the Ch., though tradition ascribes its introduction to St. Ignatius, who "saw a vision of angels hymning in alternate chants the Holy Trinity" (Socrates, HE 6 8). Socrates adds that Ignatius consequently adopted that mode of S. in the Antiochene Ch. "whence it was transmitted by tradition to all the other churches." Antioch seems, at any rate, to be the place where it was most in vogue and the centre from which it spread over the Churches of the East.

St. Augustine tells us that St. Ambrose, in the West, adopted his new method of chanting from the East ("secundum morem

2 Method. Orientalem"—Conf. 9 7). The meaning of this expression, according to some, is that the men and women singers at Milan chanted in their own registers in octaves, for Aristotle defines the word Antiphon as "the accord of an octave." But tradition is against this theory, and AS. may be defined, with St. Isidore, as "vox reciproca; duobus scilicet choris alternatim psallentibus ordine commutato" (Origines 6 18).

There are three ways of carrying out this A. method of chanting. (a) The alternate S. of Ps. or Cant., verse by verse, by two choirs. (There is a variation of this method employed in some churches of to-day, where only half the verse is sung by the Decani and the other half by the Cantoris section of the Choir.¹) (b) The insertion, between each verse, of an ANTIPHON or refrain, usually taken from the Ps. itself, which is an invariable comment of the second choir upon the verses sung by the first choir (cp. the Responses to the Commandments in the PB). In later times this Antiphon was sung only before and after the Ps. In our PB the only Antiphon to a Ps., out of the many that were sung in our services in Pre-Reformation times, is "O Saviour of the World" in VS. (c) As directed in the Rubric before the Cants. once appointed to be said instead of the Venite in the English STATE SERVICES; one verse by the priest and another by the clerk and people. This is a modern usage, not without justification in places where the Pss. are read and not chanted, but it is evidently contrary to the true spirit of AS. which calls for a balance of parts.—q2.

MAURICE F. BELL.

APOCRYPHA (Deutero-canonical Scripture).

—(1) The Meaning of the Term. It is necessary to distinguish between "the Apocrypha," by which the Ch. of Eng.

1. Introductory.

understands certain non-canonical books of the OT, and the adjective "apocryphal," used as equivalent to "spurious" or "rejected," and applying equally to NT or OT.

(2) History. The books of the Apocrypha are enumerated in Art. 6 [see ARTS. OF RELIGION, § 7, for detailed list]. They owe their place in the Christian Bible to the fact that, while not included in the Hebrew, or Palestinian, OT, they occur in the LXX, or Alexandrine Canon of Scripture. The Old Latin Versions were made from the LXX, and so the Apocr. came to be included in the Vulgate, as revised by St. Jerome. (There are, however, certain exceptions. The Roman Ch. regards 3 and 4 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses as apocryphal, and in the Vulg. they are printed as an Appendix after the NT.)

The term Apocrypha was not at first used in a derogatory sense. We know that the Jews possessed certain "hidden" books. These were either books of mystical or esoteric significance, such as Apocalypses, or books which were withheld by the Jewish authorities from public reading on account of their contents. Thus the Rabbis wished to "hide" Ecclesiastes because of its heresies. The Christian Ch. did not, in its early days, make books apocryphal by excluding them from the Canon, but decided that they were not to be considered as on the same level as the sacred Scriptures. The Apocrypha was really deutero-canonical. But, inasmuch as publicity and universality were regarded as marks of genuineness and truth, there was a tendency to consider all secret books as apocryphal or false. Thus the original significance of the term Apocrypha was forgotten, and it came to mean "not accepted by the Ch. as being of obscure or doubtful origin."

(3) Attitude of Ch. of Eng. towards Apocrypha. The position of the Ch. of Eng. is that of the primitive Ch. She regards the Apocr. as eccles., though non-canonical, and she gives it a place in her Bible. In Art. 6 she says: "And the other books (as Hierome saith) the Ch. doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine." The Homilies frequently quote from the Apocrypha.

The Roman Ch., in spite of St. Jerome, joins the books of the Apocr. with the other books of the OT as canonical. The Eastern Ch. has no consistent or formulated practice with regard to the Apocr. The Protestant Chs. have gradually tended to reject the Apocr., though both Luther and Calvin gave it a place in their Bibles. The Westminster Confession says it is "no part of the Canon of the Scripture, and therefore . . . of no authority in the Ch. of God." The Puritans in 1661 demanded the exclusion of the Apocr. from the English Bible, and from the services of the Church.

(4) Use of Apocrypha in PB. The desire of the Reformers for a "scriptural" PB led to an excision of all refs. to the Apocr. in the wording of the services. (In 1549 two such refs. remained, i.e., in Matr. and VS to Bk. of Tobit [RITUAL, M8² n. 2, N2² n. 1], but they were both removed in 1552.) As regards the Lectionary, the tendency has been to diminish the lessons from the Apocrypha. In the Calendars of 1561 and 1661, and down to 1872, there were more than 100 lessons, including portions of Bel and the Dragon, and the Story of Susanna, which can scarcely have been edifying for public reading. The new Lect. has lessons for 21 days only, exclusively from Wisdom, Eccclus., and Baruch. The Ch. of Ireland, in contrast with the Episc. Ch. of Scotland, has abolished all lessons from the Apocrypha. In any future revision of the PB the question will naturally arise as to how far the Apocr. is to be used. If we are to remain true to the traditional treatment of the Apocr. in the Ch. of Eng., we shall have to see that it retains a proper place in public reading, and we may listen to Hooker when he says, "Should the mixture of a little dross constrain the Ch. to deprive herself of so much gold?" (Ecccl. Pol. 5²⁰). [See also CANONICAL BOOKS.]

Cp. Apocrypha in DB, DB (1909), and Hook's Ch. Dict. (14th ed.); Gibson, Thirty-nine Arts., vol. i, 1896; Procter and Frere, New Hist. of BCP, 1901.—B5. E. F. MORISON.

APOSTLES' CREED (in MP, EP, Bapt., Cat., VS).—Several reasons have been assigned for the title which the AC. bears.

1. Title and Character.

(1) Rufinus of Aquileia, in his Commentary on the C. (c. 400), records the tradition that it was so called because each of the App. before leaving Jerusalem had contributed one of its twelve articles. The tradition is, of course, disproved by history, since some of the articles did not appear till several centuries after Apostolic times. (2) Others have found the origin of the title in the fact that the C. contains the body of doctrine taught by the App. (Schaff, Creeds 1 22). (3) A third theory is that, since this is the C. of the only church of the West founded by an Ap., it is called the Apostolic or AC., as the see was called the Apostolic see.

¹ [The aim of this is to reproduce the effect of the Hebrew parallelism, and it should therefore not be applied to the Te Deum or the Gloria.]

The English reformers did not accept the legend of the apostolic authorship. In the first PB the document is simply called "the creed" without further description. In the 42 Arts. of 1553 it is described as "that which is commonly called the AC." Not till 1662 was the title "the AC." given a place in the rubrics of the PB.

The AC. is a purely Latin Creed and is not recognised in the Greek Church to-day. It reflects the practical and unspeculative character of the W. Church and presents a sharp contrast to the Nicene Creed, the characteristic product of the E. Church. While the AC. confines itself strictly to the bare record of historical facts, the Nic. Cr. deals also with the "ideas" of Christianity and supplies a reason for the facts. Only in one art. does the AC. furnish a reason, namely, that on Christ's return hereafter, "From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead." "Very characteristic is it of the intensely practical W. that this thought of judgment to come should from the first find a prominent place in its Creed, and that this should be the single article in which it unites with the E. Church in giving a reason for the statement made" (Gibson, The Three Creeds, 1908, p. 34). It may be also noted that asyndeton is characteristic of the W. type of creed, polysyndeton of the Eastern.

Our present AC. is the final product of a varied and complicated history, whose beginnings go back into the earliest age of the Church.

2. Early Creed-Forms.

In its first stages the C. was growing in secret like the seed in the parable, and we can only trace its history dimly through hints and allusions. As it is a document of composite origin, we can only understand its history by reference to the earlier creed-forms out of which it has grown. Attempts have been made to find a definite Creed in the NT. Though there are many creed-like expressions, especially in the Pauline Eps. (Richmond, The Creed in the Epistles, 1909), there is no evidence of a fixed and formal Creed. Yet there were fairly defined types of preaching in Apostolic times, and it will be necessary to ascertain how these are related to the later creeds. It is clear that the Faith was stated in two quite different ways. (1) There was the brief confession made by the disciple at Baptism. (2) There was also the fuller statement of the truth in the deposit committed to the teacher. As regards (1) we know three simple forms of Bapt. confession. (a) "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor. 12 3, Rom. 10 9); this is the Pauline type. (b) "Jesus is the Son of God" (1 Jn. 4 13, Heb. 4 14); this is the Johannine type. (c) There is also the type found in Palestine; it is taken from the Baptismal commission of Christ in Matt. 28 19. (2) But beside these simple confessions there was a fuller deposit committed to the teachers of the Church (which St. Paul calls a "pattern of wholesome words" or the "tradition"); this fuller teaching was given to those under instruction before and after Baptism.

The enlargement of the Creed was mainly due to the gradual insertion of parts of this wider body of teaching into the shorter Creed which the Catechumens were required to confess at Baptism (Bp. Wordsworth, The Baptismal Confession and the Creed, 1904). The causes of this gradual expansion were probably various. Kattenbusch thinks the object was mainly catechetical, the desire for greater fulness and precision in teaching. But there is little doubt that the growth of heresy and the need of safeguarding the truth by further definition had also much to do with the process. It has been well said that every clause of the Creed marks the tombstone of a buried heresy. But at the root of all this development we can discern very definite lines of structure. The AC. "was clearly in origin a combination of the Trinitarian confession of the Church of Palestine with the Pauline and Johannine confessions of the central truth as regards our Lord. All existing Creeds have this double basis. All have the Trinitarian framework. All present the second part (the person and mission of the Son) in a more extended form than the first and third" (Bp. Wordsworth).

The first great landmark in the history of the AC. is the appearance of R., the local Creed of the early Church of Rome. Our present received text (T.) of AC. is a later recension of this earlier form, which runs thus:

3. The Old Roman Creed (R.).

"Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem; Et in Christum Jesum, unicum Filium eius, Dominum nostrum; Qui natus est de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria virgine, crucifixus sub Pontio Pilato et sepultus; tertia die resurrexit a mortuis, ascendit in coelos, sedet ad dexteram Patris; inde venturus est iudicare vivos et mortuos. Et in Spiritum Sanctum, sanctam ecclesiam, remissionem peccatorum, carnis resurrectionem."

This version of R. is taken from Rufinus of Aquileia (c. 400). An earlier authority for R. is the Ep. of Marcellus of Ancyra to Julius of Rome, A.D. 341. Following indirect evidence we can trace R. back to the writings of Felix, Bp. of Rome (A.D. 269-74), and Dionysius, Bp. of Rome (c. 259). Still earlier we can trace it back to Tertullian (c. 200), and through him (Adv. Marc. 5 4) to the Gnostic Marcion (c. 150). It is now generally agreed that R. cannot have been composed later than 150. Harnack puts it between 140 and 150, while Kattenbusch dates it a little before or after 100.

Some hold that R. is the work of a single hand, and was deliberately composed to meet a felt want of the Church (Kattenbusch, Bp. Gibson, op. cit., p. 50). Others maintain that it was a gradual compilation and represents the "crystallisation of floating formulae" in use in the Church (Harnack).

(1) I believe in God (the) Father Almighty. It is possible that "Father" (Patrem) was not found in the earliest form of R. 4. Clauses in Detail. Marcellus and Tert. appear to omit it, but it stood in the Creed known to Novatian and Cyprian. Probably therefore it was in symbolical use before the end of the 2nd cent. It seems likely (as Harnack thinks) that in the 2nd cent. the Fatherhood was understood chiefly of the paternal relation of God to the creation (i.e., Father of the universe). The personal Fatherhood (i.e., in relation to the Son and to members of the Church) was, however, also recognised, though it was natural that the cosmic Fatherhood should have been specially emphasised in opposition to the Gnostic doctrine of creation by the Demiurge or inferior deity. Almighty (omnipotens) is παντοκράτωρ, not παντοδύναμος, the All-Ruler rather than the Almighty (Swete, Ap. Cr., p. 21; the distinction is very fully dealt with by Westcott, Historic Faith, note V).

(2) And in Christ Jesus (note the order) His only Son our Lord. "Only" (unicum, for which unigenitum is sometimes substituted) represents τὸν μονογενῆ—"only-begotten" (as in English Bapt. Creed). This term refers clearly to a pre-existent sonship and not, as Harnack thinks, to a sonship by adoption predicated merely of His Incarnate life (Swete, p. 26).

(3) Who was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary. This clause belongs in substance to the earliest form of R. The belief itself is found (outside NT) in Ignatius (Eph. 19), Justin (Apol. 1 xi, Dial. 43).

(4) And in the Holy Ghost. It is noteworthy that, while in the arts. on the Father and the Son the name is followed by a further definition, the art. on the Holy Spirit does not go beyond the bare mention of the name. (On this point cp. the art. in the Constantinopolitan Creed.) The doctrine of the Holy Ghost was not elaborated in the Church till after the heresy of Macedonius (c. 380). Against Harnack's view that the Holy Ghost is to be interpreted in the Creed not as a Person, but as an impersonal gift, see Gibson, op. cit., pp. 87 ff.

(5) The Resurrection of the Flesh. In its allusions to the general resurrection, NT clearly favours the phrase, "resurrection of the dead" (ἀνδραῖς νεκρῶν), cp. 1 Cor. 15. In the contest with Docetism the idea of a physical resurrection was emphasised (cp. Ign., Smyrn. 3), and the more definite phrase forced on the Church. The creed of Aquileia went farther and prefixed huius to carnis—probably a relic of some sharper struggle with Gnosticism. "The resurr. of the dead" is the wording of the E. creeds ("σῶσις" is absent from all known revised E. Creeds," Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 91). The difference represents a characteristic divergence of E. and W. thought. The Eng. PB translation of the Creed in the Daily Offices substitutes the [more Biblical term "body" (for the significance of this vide Swete, op. cit., p. 97).

Our present AC. (T.) is a recension of R. It contains a number of new clauses: Maker of heaven and earth, conceived, suffered, dead, He descended into hell, God (the Father) almighty, catholic, the communion of saints, the life everlasting. In its present complete form T. meets us first in Priminus (c. 750). But we shall find that the added clauses taken singly are of very much earlier date.

(a) Where was this Recension made? Opinion is still divided on this point. Dr. Sanday (JTS 39) thinks we may most reasonably "connect the origin of T. with some such literary centre as the great school of Lerinum in Gaul, throughout all the first half of the 5th cent. the most active focus of learning in the W." T. would therefore be not Roman but Gallican in its origin. Kattenbusch inclines to the Church of Burgundy (Vienne or Lyons) as the place of origin. Burn (Introd. to the Creeds, p. 230) thinks Rome the more likely place. This fuller Creed (which was regarded not as a new Creed but as an expansion of R.) gradually superseded R., mainly through the influence of Charlemagne in the 8th cent. (for the work of the Celtic missionaries in disseminating T. see Barns, JTS 7 501 ff.). T. reached England c. 850.

(b) The Added Clauses. Several of the new arts. in T. were added simply in a catechetical interest: conceived, suffered, dead, God . . . Almighty, the life everlasting. The others will be dealt with singly.

(1) Maker of heaven and earth. This clause is found in the recently discovered Apol. of Aristides (c. 120). It was probably at first directed against the Gnostic doctrine of creation. It is difficult however to see why it should have been added in later days to the Creed of the W. Church when Gnosticism was no longer a danger. Possibly it was added to make the Baptismal Creed conform more closely to the Nicene (Gibson, op. cit., p. 62).

(2) He descended into hell. The first Baptismal Creed known to contain this clause is that of Aquileia (commented on by Rufinus c. 400), but we find it earlier in the conciliar Creeds of Sirmium (359), Nice (359), and Constantinople (360), and in the Fides Hieronymi (? c. 377), and the idea had been presented in Christian tradition from the earliest times (e.g., Ignatius, Magn. 9). Swete (op. cit., p. 61) thinks that in the Creed of Aquileia the clause must be much older than the time of Rufinus, and was probably adopted about the end of the 2nd cent. to guard against a Docetic view of Christ's humanity. Sanday thinks it arose simply out of a natural desire to complete the thought of burial (JTS 39). This is also Harnack's view (Ap. Creed, ET., p. 87).

This clause, while emphasising the obvious fact that Christ fulfilled all the conditions of death, may have had reference to 1 Pet. 3 19 concerning the preaching to the spirits in prison. Swete (p. 58), however, doubts this allusion. The clause was probably of E. origin. (For influence of E. Creeds on those of the W. by way of the Danube see Barns, JTS 7 50a ff.) The American Liturgy prefaces the AC. with this rubric: "And any churches may, instead of the words, 'He descended into hell,' use the words, 'He went into the place of departed spirits.'" This liberty however is said to be seldom taken. [Cp. Art. 3, text, note, under ARTS or RELIGION, § 7.]

(3) Catholic. This term (which is not found in NT) dates back to sub-apostolic days (Ign., Smyrn. 8). When adopted in Gaul as part of the revised Creed it was probably an importation from the E., where its use was very general. Its meaning (as Harnack points out) probably underwent a gradual change. By an inevitable development (in the face of heresy and schism) the word acquired the secondary meaning of "orthodox" in addition to its original sense of "universal." The term became exclusive as well as inclusive (Swete, p. 80).

(4) The communion of saints. Recent research has modified the old view that this article was not found anywhere until the 5th cent., and that it was to be met with only in the W. Creed. Now it seems certain that it is much earlier. It is also probable that it came originally from the E. It is found in the Creed of Niceta of Remesiana which belongs to the 4th cent. and may perhaps be dated c. 375 (vide Burn, Niceta of Remesiana, 1905). It is also contained in the recently discovered Fides Hieronymi, c. 377 (vide Dom Morin, Sanctorum Communionem, Macon, 1904).

There is some difference of opinion as to the meaning of the clause. (a) The genitive in sanctorum communionem (ἀγίων κοινωνίαν) may be neuter, "participation in the holy things," i.e., the Sacrament; this view has recently been revived by Zahn, and partly favoured by Kattenbusch. (β) The traditional interpretation is "holy persons," and the clause is taken as explanatory of sanctam ecclesiam.

Again, the exact meaning of "saints" is not easy to determine. (a) Harnack, connecting the introduction of the words into the Creed with the growing cultus of the saints (especially in Gaul, as witnessed, e.g., in Faustus of Riez who died c. 492), takes the clause to mean "communion with the martyrs and the chosen saints." (β) The traditional interpretation applies the word in the wider sense to the union of the faithful, living and departed. It is so explained in Niceta (De symb. 10). This view is the accepted one in England, and is found in the Sarum ordo ad visitandum infirmum, in which the priest is directed to say: "Dearest brother, dost thou believe . . . in the communion of saints, that is, that all men who live in charity are partakers of all the gifts of grace which are dispensed in the Church, and that all who are in fellowship with the just here in the life of grace are in fellowship with them in glory?" (Maskell, Mon. rit. 1, p. 76).

There is also doubt as to the reason for the insertion of the clause. (a) Some (Swete) think it was directed against the Donatists; (β) others (Dom Morin and Bishop Gibson) believe it was first aimed at the Novatianists and Montanists; (γ) Harnack holds that it is due to the rising cultus of the Saints and is anti-Vigilantian.

The primary use of the AC. was, of course, in connection with Baptism. As Infant Baptism spread, it became necessary however to teach the Creed after Baptism, and in course of time the AC. came to be regarded as one of the essential things which every Christian, as he grew up, ought to be taught. Thus Bede's letter to Egbert, Abp. of York (A.D. 734), enjoins this duty and states that the Creed has for this purpose been translated into English. (The Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747, and the canons of Aelfric, c. 957, bear similar witness.)

6. Use by the Church.

It is in the 9th cent. that we first meet the Creed in the Hour Services. It was first introduced into Prime, subsequently into Compline, and into the introduction to Mattins. In this last case it was said privately, while in Prime and Compline it was said privately up to the two last clauses which were said aloud. Being essentially "the people's Creed," it naturally found a place in the Primer, and was also known in a metrical form given in the Lay Folk's Mass Book (13th cent.).

From the Hour Services it passed into MP and EP. In the First PB of Edw. VI (1549) the AC. was introduced into VS. (The Sarum use had already introduced questions to be asked of the sick man somewhat on the lines of the AC.)

The translation of the Creed which we find in the Catechism and in MP and EP was probably the work of Cranmer, since it bears a close resemblance to the Creed set forth in the "King's Book" of 1543, a work with which Cranmer was connected.

The translation of the Creed (A) given in the Baptismal Office and in VS differs in some few points from that (B) found in MP and EP and Catechism. A. has "only-begotten," B. "only"; B. omits "(come) again at the end of the world"; A. has "the resurrection of the flesh," B. "the resurrection of the body"; A. has "everlasting life after death," B. "life everlasting." There are other minor differences.

The First PB directed in MP and EP that the Creed should be said "by the minister"; the Second PB "by the minister and the people." The reciting of the AC. in the public worship of the Anglican Church is thus a congregational act.

This Creed "is the only formulary of faith to which a formal assent is ever asked from the laity of the Church of England. To the AC. a definite act of assent is required as a condition of Baptism. This, too, is the final test proposed, when the hour of death draws near, that the sick man remains sound in the faith" (Bp. Gibson, op. cit., p. 84).

Burn, An Introduction to the Creeds* (1899).
† The Apostles' Creed (1906), a brief and convenient handbook; † Swete, The Apostles' Creed (last ed., 1908), gives succinct

7. Bibliography. reply to recent destructive criticism; Bp. Gibson, † The Three Creeds (1908), in the Oxford Library of Practical Theology, a very lucid account; † Westcott, The Historic Faith, short lectures; † Maclear, An Introduction to the Creeds (many editions), a concise text-book; † Callow, A History of the Creeds (1900), popular; McGiffert, The Apostles' Creed (1902), advanced criticism of tradition; * Harnack, art. in the 3rd ed. of Hauck-Herzog, Realencyclopädie (ET., The Apostles' Creed, 1901); † Zahn, The Articles of the Apostles' Creed (ET., 1899); Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole (3rd ed., 1897), gives valuable collection of material; Swainson, Nicene and Apostles' Creeds; Heurtley, Harmonia Symbolica; * Caspari, Quellen, and Alle und Neue Quellen; * Kattenbusch, Das Apostolische Symbol, a monumental work (Leipzig, 1900); * Clemen, Niedergefahren zu den Toten (Giessen, 1900); C. H. Turner, The History and Use of Creeds and Anathemas (1906); * Wiegand, Das Apostolische Symbol im Mittelalter (Giessen, 1904); * Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia, for early Eng. forms of Creed.—U.

J. SPENCE JOHNSTON.

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.—“The doctrine of Apostolic Succession means that, according to the institution of Christ, a ministry ordained in due form by (Episcopal) succession from the Apostles, and so from our Lord Himself, is an integral part of that visible Ch. of Christ upon earth to which Christian men are to be joined. It implies, further, that the ministry so ordained is not a merely external office of convenience and of outward government, but involves also the transmission of special gifts of grace, in order to the carrying on in the Ch. of the supernatural work of Christ by His Spirit” (Haddan, AS. in the Ch. of Eng., p. 1). The above represents the older Tractarian view; a more modern statement is found in Gore, The Ministry of the Christian Ch., p. 70: “It was thus intended that there should be in every Ch., in each generation, an authoritative stewardship of the grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ, and a recognised power to transmit it, derived from above by apostolic descent. The men who from time to time were to hold the various offices included in the Ministry and the transmitting power necessary for its continuance might, indeed, fitly be elected by them to whom they were to minister. In this way the Ministry would express the representative principle. But their authority to minister in whatever capacity, their qualifying consecration, was to come from above, in such sense that no ministerial act could be regarded as valid—that is, as having the security of the divine warrant about it—unless it was performed under the shelter of a commission, received by the transmission of the original pastoral authority which had been delegated by Christ Himself to His Apostles.” And he goes on further to define his meaning (p. 72): “It is a matter of very great importance. . . . to exalt the principle of the Apostolic Succession above the question of the exact form of the ministry. . . .” And again (p. 73): “No one, of whatever part of the Church, can maintain that the existence of what may be called, for lack of a distinctive term, monepiscopacy is essential to the continuity of the Church.” It will thus be seen that the later statement lays stress on the idea of succession only, the older statement emphasises also the form of the ministry. The doctrine as thus stated implies certain historical facts and a dogmatic position based upon these facts. It will be convenient therefore to treat it under two headings: (1) the historical basis of AS., (2) the doctrinal significance.

I. THE HISTORICAL BASIS OF APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. By the 4th canon of Nicaea

it is laid down that no fewer than three Bps. shall take part in the consecration of a Bp., and since then this has been the rule of the Church.

So Pelliccia, Eccles. Polity I. ii. 9 3 (Eng. Trans., 1883, p. 80): “According to the statutes of ancient Councils, the consecration of a Bp. ought to be conducted by the Metropolitan, or, if he is unable to take the service himself, he must issue his mandate of consecration to all the Bps. of the Province; of these (all if possible, but if not) three at least must be present at the consecrations, according to the most ancient rule of Ch. discipline; and it was also the rule in some places to summon the Bps. of the neighbouring Province. The reason of this was, that, if there were not so many as three Bps. belonging to the same Province, three of the neighbouring Province were to be called in to consecrate.” (See also Corpus Juris Canonici, Decret. 1 65.)

The original intention of this rule was probably to secure the presence of adequate witnesses representing the whole Ch., but its effect has been to give almost complete security to the fact of succession. It has been the generally received opinion (although some scholastic divines and controversialists have doubted it) that each of the Bps. joining in the service is a consecrator, and therefore joins in giving the succession; the result is that the preservation of the succession is guarded with almost mathematical precision. There is a well-known attack on the doctrine of AS. by Macaulay in his Essay on Gladstone on Ch. and State (extending, apparently, an argument of Chillingworth's) in which he maintains that the chances against the succession having been maintained are overwhelming. He points out the danger of some consecrating bishop having received no valid baptism, and therefore no Orders, or the possibility of the chain being broken by the presence of an impostor. Considering the carelessness with which Sacraments have been administered in many periods of Ch. History, such a contingency is not improbable. But that would not affect the continuity of succession, for the chances against any improperly consecrated bp. being associated with two others would be very remote, and the chances against the bp. thus consecrated who would have no valid orders being associated with two others without valid Orders would be so great as to be almost inconceivable. (See Gore, op. cit., pp. 107-9; Gladstone, Ch. Principles, pp. 235, 236; and a paper by Father Puller, SSJE, in The English Ch. Review 1 11.) The criticism implies a purely mechanical view of succession which is probably seldom held, but even on that basis it is quite valueless. It may be safely said that there is no reasonable doubt as to the historical character of the succession from the 4th cent. onwards.

It is necessary now to follow the succession back into Ante-Nicene times. Eusebius, the great depository of the tradition of the Ch. in his day, tells us that it was part of his purpose to give the eccles. successions. He gives lists of Bps. as successors of the Apostles in Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch and Rome, and we may take it as certain that at the beginning of the 4th cent. the Bps. were regularly looked upon as the successors of the Apostles. The evidence is equally clear for the 3rd cent. Cyprian speaks of the Bps. who succeed the Apostles by "vicarious ordination" (Ep. 66 4: "Christus dicit ad Apostolos ac per hoc ad omnes praepositos qui Apostolis vicaria ordinatione succedunt"). And similar language is used by Firmilian (Cypr., Ep. 75 16) and by one of the Bps. at the Council of Carthage, A.D. 256 (Sent. Episc. 79: "Apostoli quibus nos successimus eadem potestate ecclesiam Domini gubernantes"). Somewhat earlier, Hippolytus tells us how the Apostles had received the Holy Spirit and transmitted it to those who rightly believe, and then goes on, "but as being their successors and as participating in the same grace, high-priesthood and office of teaching" (Hippolytus, Refutatio, Prooemium). There is also evidence that the custom already prevailed, although it may not have been universal, of requiring the presence of at least three Bps. at a consecration. When Novatian was consecrated schismatic Bp. of Rome, the ceremony was, we are told, performed by three rural Bps., who, it was alleged, had been made drunk, and did not know what they were doing (Euseb., HE. vi, 43 8, 9). This proves that in Rome in the middle of the 3rd cent. three Bps. from other churches were required for a consecration. Cyprian also several times states that the presence of the Bps. of the province is requisite for a proper consecration (Cypr., Epp. 55 8, 59 11, 67 5).

2. The Ante-Nicene Period.

The evidence of the 2nd cent. requires more careful examination. From the year

4. The Second Century.

170 and onwards we have a considerable amount of information, and we may take it that at that time the Churches were governed by single Bps., that it was believed that this form of government had prevailed from the times of the Apostles, and that ambiguous passages in the NT were interpreted as implying it. For instance, Irenæus speaking of St. Paul's discourse at Miletus talks of the Bps. and Presbyters who came from Ephesus and the adjoining cities (Contr. Haeres. iii. 14 2). These Bps. were looked upon as the successors of the Apostles, and on that depended their authority. Irenæus speaks of the "successions of the Bps., to whom the Apostles delivered the Ch. in each separate place" (iv. 33 8). "We can recount," he tells us, "the number of those who were appointed by the Apostles as Bps. in the Churches and their successors to our own time" (iii. 3 1). "We must obey them who are the elders in the Ch., those who, as we have shewn, have the succession from the Apostles; who with the succession of the episcopate have received also the sure gift of truth (Charisma veritatis) according to the will of the Father" (iv. 26 2). The theory of Irenæus is that in each Ch. there was a visible series of Bps., going back in the case of Apostolic Churches to the Apostles themselves, and that this open succession is a guarantee of the truth of their teaching. The succession meant also the possession of spiritual gifts. He himself enumerates the succession of the Bps. at Rome, and refers to those of the churches of Asia, and we have evidence then, or shortly afterwards, of similar lists at Antioch, Alexandria and Jerusalem. This opinion of Irenæus is repeated with great emphasis by Tertullian, and prevailed generally at the end of the 2nd cent. We have no direct evidence as to the rule of consecrations, but Tertullian by his contrast with the actions of heretics claims that the consecrations of the Ch. were orderly and regular (De Praescr. 41).

Earlier than this our evidence is more fragmentary. Ignatius gives us no information as to the appointment of the Ministry which he exalts so high.

5. The Apostolic Fathers.

Great stress has been laid on the fact that he compares the presbyters with the Apostles: "the bps. presiding after the likeness of God, and the presbyters after the likeness of the council of the Apostles, with the deacons also who are most dear to me, having been entrusted with the diaconate of Jesus Christ" (Ad Magn. 6). Elsewhere the Bp. is given the authority of Christ (Ad Trall. 2). The idea in the writer's mind is apparently the Bp. sitting surrounded by his presbyters, as our Lord was surrounded by his Apostles, and the analogy does not exclude the idea of "succession" any more than Cyprian's statement that the Bp. was the antistes of Christ (Ep. 66 5). At the same time, although Ignatius exalts the ministry almost more than any other Christian writer, and although he probably looked upon their appointment as part of the ordinances of the Apostles (Ad Trall. 7, cp. Lightfoot in loc.), he is also conscious of the gulf between his own position and that of an Apostle (Ad Rom. 4).

The testimony of Clement of Rome is more definite.

In cc. 42, 44 he writes: "The Apostles received the Gospel for us from the Lord Jesus Christ; Jesus Christ was sent forth from God. So then Christ is from God, and the Apostles are from Christ. Both therefore came of the will of God in the appointed order. Having therefore received a charge, and having been fully assured through the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ and confirmed in the word of God with full assurance of the Holy Ghost, they went forth with the glad tidings that the kingdom of God should come. So preaching everywhere in country and town, they appointed their first fruits, when they had proved them by the Spirit, to be bps. and deacons unto them that should believe. . . . And our Apostles knew through our Lord Jesus Christ that there would be strife over the name of the bp.'s office. For this cause therefore, having received complete foreknowledge, they appointed the aforesaid persons, and afterwards they provided a continuance, that if these should fall asleep, other approved men should succeed to their ministration. Those, therefore, who were appointed by them, or afterward by other men of repute with the consent of the whole Ch., and have ministered unblameably to the flock of Christ in lowliness of mind, peacefully and with all modesty, and for a long time have borne a good report with all—these men we consider to be unjustly thrust out from their ministration. For it will be no light sin for us, if we thrust out those who have offered the gifts of the bp.'s office unblameably and holily. Blessed are those presbyters who have gone before, seeing that their departure was fruitful and ripe: for they have no fear lest anyone should remove them from their appointed place."

In this passage it is clear that the language is early, and that, as far as we can judge, the terms ἐπισκοπος and πρεσβύτερος were applied to the same persons. But the passage seems clearly to suggest that it was believed at the close of the 1st cent. that the existing Ch. order was established by the Apostles, and that those who held office did so by commission direct or indirect from Apostles or other men of authority.

The statement of Clement is corroborated by the NT. The Acts of the Apostles tell us how St. Paul appointed presbyters in the Churches (Acts 14:23), and there is sufficient evidence to show that the usual government of the local communities in Apostolic times was by a body of presbyters, who were also called ἐπισκοποι or ποιμένες. We also see how other men of repute such as Timothy and Titus (belonging probably to that body of missionaries called Evangelists) did the same. What we know of in particular instances we may assume was the general rule, and this alone will account for the conditions prevailing in the 2nd cent. The NT writings also show the importance ascribed to the laying on of hands, or, as we should call it, ordination. In three important instances it is referred to directly, in the case of the Seven, in the sending forth of Barnabas and Saul, and in the case of Timothy. We find here appointment to an office by solemn laying on of the hands of those in authority with prayer and fasting, and the belief that thus the gift of the Holy Ghost for the office or work was conferred. The LAYING ON OF HANDS was inherited from Judaism, where it had the authority both of the OT and of Rabbinical usage. Its establishment at so early a date (as proved by the NT) accounts for it being the eccles. custom of a later period. Without therefore at present touching in any way on doctrine, the above facts suggest that the custom of ordination and the original establishment of the Christian Ministry go back to the Apostles, and that since then there has been a succession of ministers in the Ch. always appointed by their predecessors, who had authority so to appoint them according to the Ch. rules of ordination.

It remains now to consider certain limitations of this statement and certain facts which are sometimes believed to be inconsistent with it. (a) There is no clear proof of the universal prevalence of the rule of episcopal ordination, as it was fixed apparently from the beginning of the 3rd cent. onwards, during the 1st or 2nd cent. Up to the time of Clement the succession may have been merely through the body of Presbyter-Bps., and this may have been continued to a later date, as for example in the Ch. of Alexandria, where the evidence possibly implies that the Bp. was consecrated by the presbyters. (See, on the Alexandrian ministry, Gore, op. cit., who does not, however, accept the statement of Eutychius, and Wordsworth, Ministry of Grace, 2nd ed., p. 135, who does.) These facts, which cannot, however, be considered firmly established, are inconsistent with the view of Apostolic Succession as defined above by Haddan, but not with the definition of Gore. (b) Emphasis has been laid on the special position of Confessors, i.e., those who had remained faithful under torture or danger of death. There is no doubt that in many churches they were, as is natural, treated with great respect, that they had a seat in Ch. amongst the clergy, and were looked upon almost as an Order. They claimed also certain spiritual privileges such as that of readmitting penitents to communion. In certain Ch. Orders it is definitely stated that the Confessor shall not be ordained, "his confession is his ordination," but the meaning of this statement varied. Normally, it meant that he could hold all the privileges of a Confessor without ordination, in certain cases he might be a presbyter without further ordination, in all cases it is stated that he must be ordained if he is to be a Bishop. There seems to be no evidence that this represents a primitive custom; it rather suggests the rise of a special body of men who are granted special privileges inconsistent with the established order. It also shows that the early Church did not apply its regulations in a rigid or mechanical way. (c) A point is also made of the position of the Prophets in the primitive Church. It is maintained that here we have a body of persons who were clearly not ordained, who owed their positions to purely personal gifts or χαρίσματα, and who exercised all the functions of an ordained ministry. There is a good deal of assumption in these statements, and the present writer has very grave doubts as to their correctness, but assuming that they are true it may be pointed out that they have little or no bearing on the present question. The Prophets, if this theory be true, owed their position and gifts to the special gifts of the Spirit which were given at the beginning of the Ch., just as the twelve and St. Paul had received a special appointment by Christ. They were associated with the Apostles and the "other men of repute" to whom the Ch. owes its Orders, and they ceased to exist as an order when the special gifts of the Spirit ceased.

7. Conflicting Facts.

So far as the historical facts go, it is reasonably certain that the officials of the Christian Church have from the beginning been appointed by laying on of the hands of those who have been themselves so appointed. The fact of historical succession going back to the Apostles or "other men of repute" of the Apostolic time is probably true. On the other hand, a succession through a monarchical episcopacy cannot be held to be proved. The language of Clement of Rome, while strongly supporting the fact of succession, is most naturally interpreted of succession through a body of Presbyter-Bishops.

II. THE DOCTRINAL SIGNIFICANCE OF APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

Anyone reading the somewhat cursory historical survey that we have just given will have noticed that, although the fact that Bishops are successors of the Apostles is almost universally held, the meaning of that fact varies considerably.

1. It is pointed out by Dr. Hatch (Bampton Lectures, p. 106) that the word succession may be used in the ordinary sense employed by civil historians to designate the succession of civil officers, "one officer being appointed in another's place, as governor succeeded governor in a Roman province, or as chancellor succeeds chancellor in our own University." He would apply this explanation to the language of Eusebius, and of Firmilian who speaks of the "vicaria ordinatio." There is no doubt this idea was prominent especially in Irenæus who contrasts the open succession of the Ch. with the secret succession of the heretics. Officials duly appointed had succeeded one another openly in the same Ch., and this was a guarantee of the due succession of true doctrine and apostolic custom. But it is not possible to believe that this was all he meant. They are not only the successors of the Apostles, but with the succession they have received the charisma veritatis, and the charismata Domini are associated with those who have the Church's succession from the Apostles. The essential point which to a certain extent distinguishes Irenæus from later writers is that what he lays stress on is the succession in a single Ch., while at a later date what is emphasised is the idea of transmission of gifts through a network (so to speak) of succession.

8. Succession as Ordinary Sequence.

2. A second idea may be that of commission derived ultimately from the Apostles. This seems to be the idea of Clement of Rome who considered that the Episcopi of Corinth had been appointed by the Apostles or after their death by "others of repute" in the Church. The idea is often present in modern writings where stress is laid on the continuity of an Apostolic ministry, namely, one which owes its commission ultimately to Apostolic appointment. The same idea may be present in Cyprian's phrase "vicaria ordinatio."

10. Succession as Apostolic Commission.

3. Thirdly, the Bps. may be the successors of the Apostles, because they have performed the functions of the Apostles in the Ch.

11. Succession as Continuity of Function.

since the Apostolic age. This is the normal and accepted meaning of the term.

It will be found laid down by Van Espen i. 161. He distinguishes two functions or powers of Apostles, the one abnormal and miraculous including the powers given them for their special work of founding the Ch., the other normal and necessary for the continuance of the Church. It is to these last that Bps. have succeeded, they have idem officium et mandatum, cum eadem potestate Ministros eligendi simili auctoritate instructos: idque continuata successione usque ad consummationem sæculi. This is also the opinion of the Council of Trent, Sessio xxiii, Cap. iv: Proinde sacrosanctus synodus declarat, præter cæteros ecclesiasticos gradus, episcopos, qui in Apostolorum locum successerunt, ad hunc hierarchicum ordinem præcipue pertinere, et positos, sicut idem Apostolus ait, a Spiritu Sancto super ecclesias Dei; eosque presbyteris superiores esse, ac sacramentum confirmationis conferre: ministros ecclesiae ordinare, atque alia pleraque peragere ipsos posse, quorum functionum potestatem reliqui inferioris ordinis nullam habent.

This claim certainly goes back to the time of Hippolytus, and has been the normal teaching since that time.

4. Fourthly, this idea is combined with a further one, that of the transmission of the 12. Succession as Transmitting Grace.

Holy Spirit from the Apostles' time to our own day through the due consecration of Bishops. The Apostles gave the Holy Spirit to the Bps. they ordained, and they have handed it on in the Church ever since. It is through Bps. and Bps. only that the Holy Spirit is given. This is the meaning which is generally attached to Apostolical Succession at the present time, and the form in which it is always attacked by its opponents. But it is not the meaning which ordinarily attaches to the term in the authoritative documents of the Church. There has been so much confusion that it is somewhat difficult to say how far it has been held at different periods. With the possible exception of the passage of Hippolytus quoted above, it does not seem to be held at all in the Patristic period, and is inconsistent with the theory of Orders then prevailing. Hatch quotes a Council of Paris held in 829 as the earliest date for the later theory of succession, but even here we do not find transmission definitely mentioned, although it may be implied: the words are "Solis Apostolis eorumque successoribus proprii officii tradere Sanctum Spiritum" (Mansi, Concilia 14 556; Labbe 9 719, Conc. Paris, 829, 1 37). How far the transmission theory prevailed in the Middle Ages the present writer is unable to say. At the Reformation the Council of Trent is, as we have seen, vague as to the subject of succession: and nothing is said of transmission. In Cranmer's Catechism of 1548, while Apostolic succession is not explicitly mentioned, Orders are made wholly to turn on the transmission of the Holy Ghost from the Apostles onward. But in the catena of Anglican writers given in Tracts for the Times, No. 74, while all mention succession, only once or twice is there any idea of transmission. It is in Anglican theology of the nineteenth cent., and even still more in the opponents of Anglicanism, that the idea of transmission occupies so prominent a place.

In order to arrive at a sound conclusion it will be convenient first to examine the Patristic theory of Orders. A careful and probably typical example is given in the form of consecration in Apostolical Constitutions 8 s. In the consecration prayer we have:

12. Patristic Theory of Orders.

"Thou who didst appoint the rules of the Church, by the coming of Thy Christ in the flesh, of which the Holy Ghost is the witness, by Thy Apostles, and by us the Bps., who by Thy grace are here present; who hast fore-ordained priests from the beginning for the government of Thy people. . . . Do Thou, by us, pour down the influence of Thy guiding Spirit through the mediation of Thy Christ, which is committed to Thy beloved Son; which he bestowed according to Thy will on the Holy Apostles of Thee the Eternal God. Grant by Thy name, O God, who searchest the hearts, that this Thy servant, whom Thou hast chosen to be a Bp., may feed Thy holy flock, and discharge the office of an high priest to Thee, and minister to Thee unblameably night and day; that he may appease Thee and gather together the number of those that shall be saved, and may offer to Thee the gifts of Thy holy Church. Grant to him, O Lord Almighty, through Thy Christ, the fellowship of the Holy Spirit, that so he may have power to remit sins according to Thy command, to ordain clergy (διδόναι κλήρους) according to Thy ordinance, to loose every bond according to the authority which Thou hast given unto the Apostles. . . ."

There can be no doubt that the writer would look upon the Bp. as successor of the Apostles, and that his idea of the ministry would be what we call "high," but there is no idea of transmission. The grace of Orders (if we may use the term) is given by God in answer to the prayers of the Ch. through the hand of the Bishops. This is probably the almost universal teaching of the Patristic period, it was only in the Middle Ages that the power of the Bps. was exaggerated.

According to Art. 23, the rule of the Ch. of Eng. as to Orders is that "those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent, which be chosen and called to this work by men who have publick authority given unto them in the Congregation to call and send Ministers into the Lord's vineyard." These words—apparently ambiguous, really quite explicit—state that all Ministers should receive their commission from those who have authority to give such commission in the Church. These, we have seen, are by universal Ch. law Bishops.

If we combine the Patristic theory of Orders with the rule of ordination, we shall be able to put the idea of Apostolic Succession into its right place. It is really a deduction from the right theory of Orders, and the mistake has been to make Orders depend upon Apostolic Succession and transmission.

The authority to consecrate and ordain, or to perform all spiritual offices, resides in and comes from the Ch., to which God gives his Holy Spirit. From the beginning this work of the Ch. has been exercised by those who have received a commission for it, and the rule of the Ch. has been that that commission should always be given by those who have received authority from others with a similar commission. The historical fact, therefore, of Apostolic Succession has resulted from the rule of the Church being always regularly carried out. If this be correct, the following further deductions may be made.

1. The idea of transmission is an additional and late conception which, instead of expressing the idea of Succession, has by its exaggeration of it led to a rigid and mechanical theory of the Ministry.

2. As the grace of Orders depends upon the authority of the Ch. and not upon a mechanical transmission, all objections from supposed irregularities of ordination are beside the point, and the opinions of churchmen and others who have maintained that in certain circumstances a presbyter may ordain are explained. Ordination depends upon the authority of the Ch., and not the Ch. on Ordination.

3. The idea of Succession, which results from the Church's rule of ordination, is an historical fact, and not a doctrine. It represents an external connection with the first beginnings of Christianity of infinite value for the Ch.; and nothing should be done to break such a connection, as it acts like a link for binding together the Churches as parts of a living whole.

4. One part of the work of Christian reunion should be to restore and secure the links of Succession throughout the whole Christian world; but no rigidity or mechanical theory of Orders need compel us to deny divine grace to those separated from us.

The principal works on Apostolic Succession in English are, among older ones:—Apostolical Succession in the Church of England, 18. Bibliography. by Arthur W. Haddan, 1869; among more recent ones:—The Ministry of the Christian Church, by Charles Gore, 1889, and Orders and Unity, by the same, 1909; Ministerial Priesthood, by R. C. Moberly, 1897; The Ministry of Grace, by John Wordsworth, 1901. Among works critical of the doctrine may be mentioned:—The Organisation of the Early Christian Churches, Bampton Lectures, by Edwin Hatch, 1880 (cp. the German edition of the same by A. Harnack, Die Gesellschaftsverfassung der Christlichen Kirchen im Alterthum, 1883); The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, by Thomas M. Lindsay, 1902. Amongst older works the most valuable probably is Morinus, De Ordinationibus. There is no really good history of the Christian Ministry, and the different theories that have been held about it. A catena of passages from Anglican writers will be found in Tracts for the Times, No. 74; and a useful selection of early passages on the Ministry has been edited by Dr. Darwell Stone in Pusey House Papers.—td.

A. C. HEADLAM.

APPARELS.—Pieces of silk or other rich material or embroidery attached to the amice and alb, and to other vestures, for the purpose of ornamentation. On the amice the apparel forms the collar, and on the alb the A. are fastened to the cuffs of the sleeves and on the skirt front and back. The "white albe plain" of the rubric of the PB of 1549 is held by some authorities (RIT. LAW, Table I 49, and Case for Incense, p. 124) not to exclude the A. See H. Ang. 1, Index; Deamer, P. H., pp. 156, 157, and Ornaments of the Ministers, Index.—R3.

V. STALEY.

APPARITOR.—(Lat. apparere, in the sense of "attend upon".) (1) In classics, an official attendant on some superior officer, e.g., a "licitor." (2) An official (Chaucer, "sompnour") of an eccles. court, whose business was to cite the parties to a suit, to serve any process of the court, and to execute its sentence. He was sometimes called "beadle" or "crier." (3) An official (in A.D. 1440 there were at Lincoln two "app. iurati") of the Dean of a cathedral, commissioned to summon to a meeting the members of the chapter. At the election of a Bp. (1885), "the A. made proclamation in the accustomed manner." (4) Sometimes used as equivalent to VERGER.—A3.

J. E. SWALLOW.

APPEAL.—See COURTS; ARCHBISHOP, § 7.

APSE.—A semicircular or polygonal SACRARIUM. The disposition of this, the traditional termination of the earliest Christian

1. Name. Churches, is probably derived from that of the semicircular tribunes which were attached to the secular basilicas of the later Roman empire and were used as law courts.

The primitive A. was surrounded with one or more rows of seats having an elevated bishop's THRONE behind the ALTAR, which

2. Position. stood free under a canopy. At first the A. was commonly at the West end of the Church, the celebrant facing eastwards, i.e., towards the people, across the altar, which was veiled with curtains during the consecration of the Sacrament. Subsequently the orientation of churches was reversed, the EASTWARD POSITION of the celebrant being retained, and, later still, the simple A. became, in Western Europe, a "chevet" encircled with its procession path and ring of chapels.

The earliest British churches were square-ended, probably because an A. is not easily built of rough logs or stones. And,

3. Usage. although many apses were built in England after the mission of Augustine and again after the Norman invasion, the native tradition eventually asserted itself, and thus the normal termination of an English church is rectangular and not apsidal.—R6.

C. A. NICHOLSON.

ARCHBISHOP.—The Archbishop is mentioned in the PB in two connections. (i) In the Ordinal, "the Archbishop, or some other Bishop appointed," is responsible for the consecration of a bishop. (ii) In Pref.², after provision made for the resolution of ritual doubts by the bishop, it is added: "And if the Bishop of the Diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop."

The title is one of prerogative, not of order, an A. being distinguished from an ordinary bishop by the possession of certain privileges and dignities attaching to his see. (See HIERARCHY.)

The term A. is ancient, but was not originally used in its present sense, nor is it so used in the Eastern Church. It first appears in the 4th cent. as a title of respect indeterminately conferred on the Bishop of the greatest Churches, as Rome and Alexandria. It is so used in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, as also in the disputed canons 28-30 of that Council where it is given also to the Bishop of Constantinople. It thus appears to correspond to the later title of PATRIARCH. It afterwards descended, in the Eastern Church, to the position of a mere honorific title attaching to certain sees, without any implication of superior authority, and this use still continues. In the Western Church it became the customary style of Metropolitans, and it is so used in the PB. We have, therefore, to consider the institution of Metropolitans. The organisation of the greater part of the Christian Church followed the lines of civil administration in the Roman Empire, which was divided, towards the end of the 3rd cent., into Provinces, each province containing a city known as the Metropolis, which was the chief seat of government. The bishops of the cities within a province naturally assembled for counsel, and the bishop of the metropolis as naturally took the lead. In the African provinces, the senior bishop (known as episcopus primae sedis) seems to have acted as Metropolitan, but he was forbidden by the Council of Hippo in 393 to assume any honorific title (Hefele, 2 399). The 4th, 6th and 7th canons of Nicaea recognised the provincial organisation and the prerogative of the Metropolitan bishop as actually existing, and the system was more definitely ordered by the 9th canon of the Council of Antioch in 341. The functions of an A. or Metropolitan may be traced from this beginning.

(i) First, in relation to the election and consecration of bishops. The 4th canon of Nicaea declares that a bishop

2. Archbishop as Consecrator. should be promoted by all the bishops of the Province; if they cannot all conveniently assemble, three at least should meet with the written consent of the rest, and proceed to election. "But," it is added, "the confirmation (κρίσις) of what is done should be committed to the Metropolitan." This seems to imply a further reference to the Metropolitan after the election, but it may mean only that his consent was required for a legitimate election, either at the time or afterwards. The 6th canon provides that no bishop should be recognised as such if promoted without the judgment (γρῶμῃ) of the Metropolitan. Nothing was here said about the election of the Metropolitan himself. The 7th canon of Sardica (343-4) in the extant Greek text appears to direct the assembly of bishops of a neighbouring province for this purpose; but the text is probably corrupt (Hefele 2 130). With the rise of the Patriarchal system it became customary for the Patriarch or EXARCH of one of the greater Churches to appoint the Metropolitans of the provinces subject to him. This practice was recognised by the Council of Chalcedon, which by its 28th canon assigned to the "Archbishop" of Constantinople the right in question throughout certain specified provinces. In Africa, it appears, from an obscure point in the Donatist controversy, that the Church of Carthage, which, in the absence of local Metropolitans, alone had any special eminence, was provided with a bishop by the neighbouring bishops, "as the Church of Rome is provided for, not by a Metropolitan Bishop, but by the neighbouring Bishop of Ostia" (Augustine, Brev. Coll. 3 16).

Hitherto we have spoken in general terms of the process by which a bishop or Metropolitan was chosen, approved and consecrated. For the further development of Western practice it is important to discriminate. The Bishop of Rome, as Patriarch, presided over the promotion of Metropolitans. It is difficult to discern the original limits of his patriarchate, if they ever were definitely settled, because the rapid extension of his authority in the 9th cent. established a fairly uniform system throughout Western Christendom. Distance made direct action impossible; the claims of princes to control elections could not be set aside, but the Roman Pontiff was able to insist on the necessity of his approval for the lawful appointment of a Metropolitan. The PALLIUM came to be regarded as the instrument of this approval; to take possession of a Metropolitan see without the receipt of this badge was considered an act of intrusion and schism. In England, the case of Stigand in 1052 was conclusive. In this way the Popes may be said to have secured the right of confirming the election of a Metropolitan; his consecration, if he was not already bishop, was usually received from neighbouring bishops at his own choice. The Metropolitan, or A., thus appointed, normally confirmed the election of bishops within his province and provided for their consecration, the Nicene requirement of the concurrence of all the comprovincial bishops having fallen into desuetude. The development of the Pontifical Canon Law in the Middle Ages drew this matter also to the immediate cognisance of the Pope, and the process of archiepiscopal confirmation was practically superseded by the issue of Bulls of Provision.

The older practice, however, was not forgotten. During the latter years of the Great Schism the English Church, like other Churches, refused to recognise any of the rival Popes, and in 1416 the Archbishop of Canterbury, fortified by a Royal Writ issued with the concurrence of 5. English Practice.

Parliament, confirmed the election of a Bishop of Norwich and some others (Rymer 9 337, 450, 539). The precedent then set was closely followed in 1533, when the papal authority was renounced; after a brief interval, it was revived in 1559, and the resultant practice still continues. The ELECTION of a bishop by a chapter is confirmed by the A. acting in his provincial court and usually by his VICAR-GENERAL; he afterwards, with at least two assistant bishops, consecrates the elect, either personally or by a bishop delegated. In the case of bishops elected directly by the Crown, the process of confirmation is not used, and the A. proceeds immediately to consecration. An A. elect is confirmed, and if necessary consecrated, by another A. with two bishops, or by at least four bishops of the province.

(ii) The Metropolitan, or the African PRIMATE, makes an early appearance as president of a synod of bishops. The 35th of the

6. Jurisdiction of Archbishops. code known as the Apostolic Canons forbids anything of common interest to be done without his approval. The 9th canon of Antioch adds the correlative that neither must the Metropolitan act without the advice of the other bishops. A principal function of such synods had been defined in the 5th canon of Nicaea, which orders a meeting twice a year for the purpose of examining and revising censures pronounced by the several bishops. The control of a single bishop by the collective episcopate, which in St. Cyprian's day involved much correspondence and mutual arrangement, was thus organised, and there grew up in consequence a regular system of ecclesiastical Appeals. In the 6th cent., as appears from the legislation of Justinian, appeals were in some cases carried to the Metropolitan alone, and he also received at first instance complaints against a bishop; but the control of the Provincial Synod seems to have gone on concurrently in a rather confusing manner. In the West appeals from the provinces to the Pope, whether in person or as presiding in a Roman Council, became general under a doubtful interpretation of the 6th canon of Sardica; and after the 9th cent. the acceptance of the Forged Decretals caused a great transfer of direct control to Rome as at first instance. During the succeeding centuries the policy of the Popes led to a multiplication of provinces and a diminution of the dignity and authority of Metropolitans, but simultaneously the codification of the sacred canons into a legal system (CANON LAW) established their remaining powers on a basis of regular jurisdiction which still subsists in England. The determining of appeals involves the interpretation of law, and a considerable defining power has thus accrued to Metropolitans and their judicial officers, apart from the Provincial Synod.

The power of determining ritual doubts, attributed by Pref.² to the A., rests on this foundation. It was due to the novel conditions of the 16th cent. Ritual rules appear to have been made from the first by each bishop for his diocese, and the almost universal spread of the Liturgies of Rome and Constantinople throughout the West and East respectively did not prevent local variations in points of detail; but the adoption of an uniform ritual for the two provinces of the English Church made it necessary to recognise a directive authority superior to that of the bishop. It is uncertain how far this authority of the A. extends. In 1899 the two As. of Canterbury and York jointly considered some points referred to them by bishops, and gave decisions which were received rather as advisory than as definitive, the several bishops making orders in consequence with considerable diversity.

7. Ritual Appeals.

England has two Metropolitans bearing the title of A. Ireland once had four, now two.

8. Anglican Metropolitans.

Scotland, once in the Province of York, was formed into two separate provinces in the 15th cent., but since the end of the 17th cent. the metropolitan system has been disused, the bishops of the country choosing one of themselves to preside, under the title of Primus, with limited functions. The Church of the United States of America has no provincial organisation, the bishops of the whole country acting together under the presidency of the senior by consecration. Other churches founded by mission from England have been organised in provinces, and most of their Metropolitans have within the last twenty years received the title of A., but the dignity is not in all cases attached to a particular see.

The actual functions of a Metropolitan may be summarised thus. He convokes the Provincial Synod and presides over it, 9. Summary. Bishop.

nothing being done therein without his consent; he confirms and consecrates bishops elect; he receives in his court appeals from the courts of the diocesan bishops; he can in certain cases hear complaints against a diocesan bishop, and admonish him accordingly, but it is doubtful whether he can, apart from the Provincial Synod, proceed to further censure; he can grant DISPENSATIONS in certain matters, including marriage, valid throughout the province; he can regulate or supersede the administrative functions of a bishop in certain matters as provided by law.

The ensign of an A. or Metropolitan is the Cross-staff carried erect before him within his own province. By special privilege, dating from 1350, the As. of Canterbury and York share this honour in both provinces. The Pallium, though no longer worn, is represented with the Cross-staff in the armorial bearings of Canterbury.

(Bingham, Antiquities; Barrow, Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy 5 10; Duchesne, Early Hist. of the Christian Ch., Eng. Tr.; Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. Tr.; Hefele, Hist. of the Christian Councils, Eng. Tr.; Robertson, Hist. of the Christian Ch.)—T. A. LACEY.

ARCHDEACON.—An A., as the name implies, was originally the chief of the deacons attached to the Bp. in what we should now call his Cathedral ch. He is referred to as such by St. Jerome (Ep. 140, ad Evangel.—PL 22 1194, Migne), where he says the A. is chosen by the deacons. In the Statuta Antiqua (commonly called the 4th Council of Carthage—398) the A. is spoken of as having the care of the poor and as assisting the Bp. in the conferring of Minor Orders. The functions of the A. were originally to attend upon the Bp. when he celebrated the Euch. and to superintend the other lesser ministers in the conduct of divine service. Evidence of this will be found in the Ordo Romanus I (Mabillon). To this was joined the care of the goods of the ch., including all the necessary accessories of divine worship; and also the care of the poor. The legend of St. Lawrence, A. of Rome, 258, as narrated by St. Ambrose, St. Maximus and St. Leo, illustrates these duties. The A. thus, as time went on, became the Bishop's right hand and naturally began to be employed by him in a variety of ecclesiastical business. We find As. present with their Bps. even in Ecumenical Councils. Little by little the power of the As. increased, until, from being only the servants of the Bps., they began to claim independent jurisdiction. They had their own tribunals and claimed almost episcopal authority, so that Devotus (Institutiones Canonicae i. 871) says "they at length, instead of mere delegated jurisdiction which left them absolutely dependent on the Bp., acquired a proper and ordinary jurisdiction of their own, and even invaded the rights proper to the Bps. themselves." One result of this was that A.'s, instead of remaining in the diaconate, began after the 10th cent. to be advanced always to the priesthood—see Hincmar's letters "ad archidiaconos presbyteros." By the 12th cent. matters had gone so far that it was found necessary to restrain the excessive claims of the As.; evidence of this is to be found in the Decretals. Alexander III tells the A. of Ely that he has no right to institute to benefices, and to the Bp. of Worcester he writes that an A. cannot of common right promulgate any sentence, he can only do so by direction of the Bp. Innocent III and Honorius III insist on other restrictions. It would seem that the English As. were particularly ambitious. Lyndwode has occasion to lay down that they cannot excommunicate with the freedom that they seemed to assume. There is evidence that the Archidiaconate in the Middle Ages failed indeed to obtain the respect that ecclesiastics should by their general conduct attract to themselves. It became the practice to appoint very young men to the office, who then went chiefly to Bologna to study the Civil and the Canon Law, and whose lives were anything but edifying, giving rise to the famous saying of John of Salisbury, "Can an A. be saved?" (See Bp. Stubbs' Lectures on Medieval and Modern Hist. 300 f.) The most effectual means by which the excessive claims of the As.

were curbed was the institution of the office of VICAR-GENERAL. To this office became attached those powers which the A. had wrongfully claimed. Added to this was the development of the scope of the Bp.'s own Court, which acted in the direction of restricting the judicial functions of the A. On the Continent this process of restriction proceeded to a greater extent than it did in England. The Council of Trent took away from As. the cognisance of matrimonial and criminal causes, and nearly all their privileges became transferred to the Vicars-General, so that now the A. is a dignitary and little else. When the Roman schismatic hierarchy was established in England in 1850 under Cardinal Wiseman, the archidiaconate was not revived.

The A. was originally, as has been said, a cathedral dignitary, and had no territorial jurisdiction, there being only one in each diocese. In England during the Saxon period there is no trace of more than the one attached to each Bp. But with the re-arrangements that took place in eccles. matters at the Norman Conquest a change was made. Thus Remigius, when he removed the see from Dorchester to Lincoln, divided his immense diocese, extending from the Humber to the Thames, into eight archdeaconries. Most other dioceses were similarly divided by the Norman Bps. into two or more archdeaconries. In consequence of this, the A. acquired a local or territorial jurisdiction. He had his own Court, his "official" or judge of the Court, his registrar and apparitor. To his Court both laity and clergy could be cited for criminal conduct, and even matrimonial causes were in time tried in it. From the A.'s Court there was an appeal to the Bp.'s Court. This was recognised by the Statute of Restraint of Appeals, 24 Henry VIII, c. 12, though at one time the A. claimed that the appeal should be to the Court of the Province. The A.'s Court was full of business up to the 18th cent., and even later. A recent monograph by S. L. Ware, (Johns Hopkins University Historical Studies, 267, 8. Baltimore, 1908) contains a large collection of such cases in the Elizabethan period. It would seem, however, from the Reformatio Legum that it was intended, had that project of law been adopted, to have abolished these Courts, as the A. (p. 101, ed. Cardwell) was forbidden to punish any matter himself, but was simply to report to the Bp. The Court still exists, though it has long since ceased to be used, except for the annual admission of churchwardens and the receiving of their presentments. This session of the Court is called the A.'s Visitation, though that expression is not strictly accurate. The jurisdiction of the As. and the Bp.'s Courts is concurrent; that is to say, a cause might be cited into either one or the other. Thus the proceedings indicated in the rubric concerning the repelling of notorious evil livers from communion might be taken in either Court. [See ORDINARY.]

The powers of an A. are, however, as Van

Espen points out, regulated by custom and by the authority of the Bp. rather than by law, and the Reformatio Legum (p. 200) speaks to similar effect. Thus it is the duty of an A. to visit his archdeaconry, but he does so not jure communi, but only by way of "simple scrutiny" as the Bp.'s delegate. Such visitation consists in his visiting each parish, inspecting the fabric of the ch. and ascertaining that all things necessary for Divine Service are duly provided, that the goods of the ch. have not been wasted, and that the incumbent is duly resident and in the performance of his duties. That is his visitation properly so-called. Besides this, as already said, As. hold what they call General Visitations; that is, they cite the churchwardens of the various parishes to meet them at a certain ch. within the archdeaconry and send them a paper of questions to answer, and at the place appointed admit the new churchwardens to office. They sometimes also cite the clergy to appear at such General Visitation, but their power to do so is, to say the least, exceedingly doubtful. This citation of the clergy is, in fact, a mere imitation of the episcopal visitation, which itself is a remnant of the now disused Diocesan Synod. In some Dioceses the A. could, however, cite the clergy to an Archidiaconal Synod. Practically speaking, the duties of an A. are now chiefly those of inspection, in this way enabling the Bp. to have a better knowledge of the condition of the diocese. To the A. appertains the duty of inducting an incumbent into his benefice after he has been instituted to office by the Bp. A mandate addressed to the A. for this purpose is issued by the Bp. in each instance. The A. does not always perform the function personally, but delegates it to any beneficed clerk of the diocese. As. also sometimes appoint SURROGATES for the purpose of granting marriage licences. In addition to this, there are duties he has to perform in connection with the working of the provisions of various Statutes relating to the administration of Ch. property and Ch. affairs. One other most important duty formerly was the examination into the fitness of candidates for Holy Orders and the presentation of them to the Bp. as provided in the Ordinal. This, however, is in practice largely, and sometimes entirely, superseded by the work of the Bishop's Examining Chaplains. As. are in all cases appointed by the Bp. and are by custom styled "Venerable."

—A3.

E. G. Wood.

ARCHITECTURE (ENGLISH CHURCH).—Christian missionaries came to England long before Christianity became the

1. Sources. established religion of Rome, and we derive several peculiarities of our national church A. from Asiatic and Greek sources, since the British Church, insulated from the rest of the civilised world after the conquest of the country by the English, preserved many old traditions of Church arrangement which had been discarded by other churches in closer touch with the centralising influence of Rome. Ireland and Western Britain are the cradle of this native ecclesiology, from which we derive our square-ended chancels and the custom of screening our chancels.

After the mission of Augustine many churches were built "in the Roman manner," that is, with fairly broad spacious interiors, wide chancel arches, crypts and apses. Such are the Saxon churches at Brixworth and Wing, while the older British ideals are illustrated at Deerhurst and Bradford-on-Avon, the latter example being a small square-ended aisleless church with rudimentary transepts and a very narrow chancel arch.

The architectural detail of all these early buildings, whether planned on British or on Roman lines, was debased Roman, the only style then used in Europe, and their workmanship is rustic and provincial, with imitation carpentry in stone as in Earl's Barton tower, and heavy turned balusters doing duty as shafts.

The Norman builders of the 11th and 12th cents. had evolved from this debased Roman work a distinct style of A. After

3. Norman Work. the Conquest they rebuilt practically all our English cathedral and abbey churches and many of our parish churches also. Here, as in Normandy, the larger churches had apses, an innovation which only lasted till the 13th cent. in England. But the Normans taught us to build central towers, a custom we preserved down to the time when Wren built the dome of St. Paul's. It is curious to observe that in our parish churches native traditions reasserted themselves quite early in the 12th cent., for at Winchfield (Hants.) and Adel (near Leeds) we have highly finished Norman churches conceived upon purely English lines with narrow chancel arches and square east ends. And after the 13th cent. our A., both in planning and in detail, had assumed a purely insular character.

Early Norman A. can best be studied at St. Albans where the material is plastered brickwork, in the transepts at Winchester, and in the Tower of London. These buildings are severely plain, but were probably once elaborately painted, and some of this decoration has been preserved at St. Albans.

Stout circular columns, or, as at St. Albans, rectangular piers, carry square-edged round arches. Aisles and crypts are vaulted in concrete without any diagonal ribs, the larger churches have galleries above the aisles and clerestories carrying flat wooden ceilings.

In the Tower of London the chapel nave has a stone tunnel-vault, but this is quite a small building.

Twelfth cent. Norman work is of richer character, the arches are moulded instead of square-edged, the columns are generally clustered, the walls ornamented with arcading, the doorways and often the windows enriched with zigzag mouldings, grotesque carvings and small columns, the latest Norman ornament, especially in the case of foliated capitals, being often of refined execution. Peterborough, Norwich and Durham Cathedrals, Tewkesbury Abbey, Melbourne Church, and St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, are mainly of late Norman work, and Iffley is about our best specimen of a late Norman village church.

The aisle vaults at Peterborough and Gloucester have diagonal projecting ribs, and this constitutes

4. Early Vaulting. an innovation upon the old Roman method of building vaults, but the Durham masons advanced a step further in planning a complete system of vaults over the central avenue of their cathedral with flying buttresses underneath the timber roofs of the triforia. These Durham vaults are of pointed form, the pointed arch having come into pretty general use by the middle of the 12th cent. in positions where great strength was required.

Three groups of buildings illustrate the transition from Norman to Early Gothic A. in England: (1) the Cistercian abbeys of the north, especially Fountains and Kirkstall; (2) the Benedictine churches of Glastonbury and Worcester (west end, 1180), the college of St. Cross Winchester and Wells Cathedral; (3) Canterbury and Rochester Quire, and the Presbytery at Chichester.

The first two groups show the native evolution of Gothic. Canterbury, the parent building of the southern group, was rebuilt (1175-1184) by William of Sens, a Frenchman. The central part of Wells cathedral may be taken as the best and completest example of the English Transition. Built between 1174 and 1191, the church was cruciform with aisles to all four limbs, and a square east end with a low procession path beyond the sacrum. The capitals are square or octagonal and carved in a bold and free manner, the windows are low broad lancets, and, although the whole church was designed for vaulting and has flying buttresses under the triforium roofs like those at Durham, the construction is very much heavier and simpler than that of contemporary French churches. Indeed the English never fully accepted the French Gothic method of building in which the walls were regarded as mere panels in a framework of piers, vaults and buttresses. The English churches, moreover, are longer and lower in proportion than the French, and, although far less cleverly constructed and less imposing internally, they possess the compensating advantages of internal mystery and beauty of external outline.

The local mannerisms of transitional work are well marked. Take, for instance, the form of the main pillars. The Yorkshire examples

5. Local Types. are tall clusters of equal-sized shafts, and are built up in coursed masonry.

The Wells piers are also built in courses, but are short and sturdy, divided into groups of small shafts arranged in threes. Similar piers are used at Llandaff, Lichfield, Abbey Dore, and Christchurch, Dublin. On the other hand, although in contemporary French work the piers generally take the form of plain round columns or solid clusters built in courses, and though Canterbury quire is a French design, we find in this work and in its imitations at Rochester and Chichester a type of pier in which detached marble shafts are used round a plain core of coursed freestone, and this fashion in the 13th cent. spread over the greater part of England, from Durham nine altars to the front of Wells.

Our earliest example of pure Gothic work is the quire of Lincoln, built between 1192 and 1200. The building is highly finished and vaulted throughout, with flying buttresses above the triforium roofs, a feature first used in this country at Canterbury. Marble shafting is also profusely used in the Lincoln work, which in this respect recalls the south country transitional work, although the carvings and mouldings differ from anything at Canterbury or in contemporary French work. The capitals, instead of being square, are round; the foliage consists of stalky conventional scrollwork; the mouldings are deeply cut and frequently enriched with dogtooth ornament; the window arches are sharply pointed.

7. Lincoln Quire.

The Lincoln style was followed in most of the secular cathedrals of the 13th cent., and also in the Benedictine abbeys, for example in the presbytery of Ely, the quire of Worcester, and the transept of York. It is also found in the parish churches of West Walton (Norfolk), and in a modified form at Hythe (Kent). A plainer version of the style, with moulded instead of carved capitals, was used at Salisbury and Westminster, while the Cistercian abbeys of Yorkshire and those of Netley and Tintern are in a severer manner, with little or no use of marble shafting.

8. 13th Cent. Architecture.

Many Norman parish churches had their chancels rebuilt at this period, and these, in spite of later alterations, often retain their original proportions. Sometimes, as at Havant, these chancels are vaulted, but more often they have waggon-shaped wooden roofs. The parish churches of this date, of which the best examples are in Northants., generally have plain round, octagonal, or clustered columns, and roofs continued in one great slope across nave and aisles. There is a very complete 13th cent. village church at South Hayling, which, though badly restored, retains its original wooden roofs and porch.

The east ends of our larger 13th cent. churches are of two types. In the South and West counties they have low rectangular ambulatories and Lady Chapels, as at Salisbury, Chester and St. Albans. In the North and Eastern counties high square east ends are the rule, as at Ely and Southwell. Lincoln originally had an apse. Westminster, too, is an exception to the English rule: here the plan, construction and proportions are borrowed from French work, the details, except in the window tracery, being purely English.

9. East Ends.

Westminster was begun in 1245, at which period the Decorated style of Gothic was coming into general use. This is characterised by broad mullioned windows with tracery composed at first entirely of circles and other simple geometric figures, afterwards of flowing forms. The carving now becomes very naturalistic in treatment and the use of detached marble shafts is discontinued. Occasionally, buildings of this period are planned with much fancy and originality, as the octagonal lantern at Ely and the Lady Chapel at Wells.

10. The Decorated Style.

Exeter Cathedral, Lincoln Presbytery, York Nave, and Selby Quire are all 14th cent. work. True to provincial tradition, Exeter terminates in low eastern chapels, while the northern quires have high flat eastern walls. Decorated work is rich and dignified in effect, although actually less costly to execute than the Early English style. Spacious and imposing parish churches were built in towns like Hull and Beverley, with light pillars and arches, ample clerestories, and flat timber roofs. Of "Decorated" village churches, Stone (in Kent), Pattrington (near Hull), Bilton and Dunchurch (near Rugby), Heckington (Lincs.), and North Mimms (Herts.) are good examples. The central tower of Lincoln, the spires of Salisbury and St. Mary's, Oxford, and several other of our best steeples are of the same period.

After the Black Death the Perpendicular style, first used at Gloucester, came into general use in England. In window tra-ceries, the vertical line became predominant, and the architectural detail became simpler of execution than before, but a rich effect was often produced by spreading ornament over a whole building. The eastern part of Gloucester and York Cathedrals and of Christchurch Priory and the naves of Winchester and Canterbury are perhaps our grandest perpendicular buildings, but the style is seen at its best in Wykeham's colleges at Winchester and Oxford, in the great parish churches of Somerset and the Norfolk Marshland, and in domestic buildings.

11. Perpendicular Architecture.

Provincial peculiarities are well marked in the Perpendicular period, the Cornish churches, for instance, forming a very distinct group by themselves with their parallel coved roofs, unbroken by chancel arches or clerestories, their rude granite traceries, and their Celtic wood-carvings. The grand steeples at Boston, Coventry, Canterbury, Gloucester, Taunton, and Magdalen College are all of "Perpendicular" style, so are our finest timber roofs, screens and stall-work, and excellent glass of the period remains at York, Fairfield and elsewhere.

English vaulting developed upon lines of its own from the very outset. Broadly speaking, our vaults are characterised by the number and closeness of their ribs, and by the general use of a longitudinal ridge rib. These singularities appear in the 13th cent. vaults at Lincoln, Ely and Westminster.

12. English Vaults.

In the 14th cent. work at Tewkesbury, Wells and Gloucester, the vaults are a close network of ribs arranged in intricate patterns with small intervening panels, and in the later "fan vaults" at King's College, Henry VII's Chapel and elsewhere, the ribs assume a trumpet-shaped form like a palm-tree in each bay of the building, and sometimes, as at Windsor and Westminster, are finished with pendants. Often these so-called fan vaults are not constructed of ribs supporting panels, but are built in continuous courses of masonry merely carved on the underside into panel-like forms.

The royal chapels at Cambridge, Westminster and Windsor are the latest expressions of English Gothic A., but the style lingered on in a modified form until the time of Charles II. St. Katherine Cree Church, London, and some of the Oxford and Cambridge chapels illustrate this Renaissance or semi-Gothic style; but after the fire of London the influence of Wren brought Italian A. into general use.

12.
Renaissance and Later Buildings.

Wren is seen at his best in the city churches, solidly built, handsomely furnished, and planned with the utmost fancy and originality. Wren's tradition was carried on worthily by Hawksmoor and Gibbs, but the Italian style soon became degenerate in the Georgian age and was superseded by a bastard imitation of Greek A., which produced few churches worthy of note except the destroyed Hanover Chapel and St. Pancras Church. This style in its turn gave way before a revival of Gothic forms, to which we owe many poor buildings and a few very fine ones, and, barring some occasional experiments in imitating Byzantine and other exotic forms of A., the vernacular manner of present day church building is based upon English Gothic work.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

ARCHIVES (PAROCHIAL), CARE OF.—Registers, churchwardens' accounts, and other parish papers—the value of these cannot easily be stated. The older ones are often full of historical interest, and the legal value of Parochial Registers earlier than 1837 is incalculable.

Parish Registers were first ordered to be kept in 1538. Royal Injunctions in 1597, and canon 70 in 1604 ordered existing paper registers to be copied into parchment books. Most of our earliest Register-books date from this time. The Ordinance of 1644 ordered the Parish Minister to record in a wellum book the birth-date as well as that of the Bapt. of each child. From 1653 to 1660 the books were to be kept by a lay parochial "Register," elected at a public parish meeting. In 1660 the books and duty of keeping them came back to the clergy, though sometimes the "Register" continued to act. The legal year was made to begin on Jan. 1 instead of March 25 in 1752. Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act (in force from 25 Mar., 1754) ordered the marriage entries to follow a prescribed form. Rose's Act ordered that from Jan. 1, 1813, separate books (by King's Printer) should be used for Bapts. and Burials, as well as for Marriages. Finally, the Registration Act (in force from July 1, 1837) ordered duplicate Marriage Registers, and copies to be sent quarterly to the Civil Registrar.

A Select Parliamentary Committee in 1833 found that many Registers were in a deplorable condition. A Treasury Committee reported in 1902 that matters had greatly improved. But further improvement is still possible. Churchwardens were originally joined with incumbent as custodians of Registers. They still are responsible for their safety during the voidance of a benefice. But Rose's Act (sect. 5, still unrepealed) made the incumbent sole custodian, and ordered that Registers should "be by him safely and securely kept in a dry, well-painted iron chest . . . constantly kept locked in some dry, safe and secure place within the usual place of residence of such rector . . . or in the parish church." This involves the use of a fireproof safe and a dry room. Registers should be plainly marked with the name of their parish. For want of this precaution many Registers have been lost. An Inventory of all Parish Records should be kept securely fastened in the safe, and revised from time to time. Old Registers needing re-binding should be entrusted only to an expert binder; the margins should not be cut. All Registers earlier than 1837 should be printed, the surest way of preserving their valuable contents.

Current Registers require legible writing, good unfading ink, and no blotting paper.

The incumbent must allow searches to be made of any Register at all reasonable times on payment of one shilling for a search of one year, and sixpence for every additional year, and of two shillings and sixpence for every entry certified under his hand as a true copy. He must be present, either personally or by a trustworthy deputy, when search is being made. For want of this "precaution" Registers have sometimes been interpolated, mutilated, or purloined.—R5. W. A. WICKHAM.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION, THE THIRTY-NINE.—The Articles of the Church of England

are a 16th cent. document and 1. 16th Century can only be understood aright

Confessions. when read in the light of contemporary history. The 16th cent. was an age of Confessions or Articles. These arose out of the necessities of the Reformation. The movement for reform met with strenuous opposition, and in the interests of that movement it was found expedient to draw up Confessions, in which were set forth in carefully balanced language the views of the Reformers upon the matters, both doctrinal and practical, which had formed the chief subjects of controversy. These Confessions were put forth in rapid succession by all the principal Reforming Bodies, including the Church of England itself, and were met by a counter-manifesto in the shape of "the Canons and Decrees" of the Council of Trent.

The first of these documents was put forth by the Lutherans in 1530, and is called the Confession of Augsburg. It is thus called, because it was presented by the Princes and States who favoured the new movement to the Imperial Diet of Augsburg, which had been summoned by the Emperor Charles V, with the object of restoring peace and unity to the Church and the Empire. It was drawn up by Melancthon and contained twenty-eight Articles, the first twenty-one being on doctrinal questions, and the last seven on ecclesiastical abuses.

The AUGSBURG CONFESSION was soon followed by others put forth by the Lutherans themselves and by other Christian Bodies. This process may be set forth in the table on next page.

The table does not profess to be complete; various subordinate Confessions are omitted. The WÜRTTEMBERG CONFESSION was a revised and Lutheran.	Reformed.	Anglican.	Roman.

1530	Augsburg	(a) Before Calvin Tetrapolitana Basiliensis Helvetica I (Calvin's " Institutes ," 1st ed. 1536, enlarged 1539, final ed. 1559)	The Ten Articles " The Institution of a Christian Man " (Thirteen Articles in MS.) The Six Articles " The necessary Erudition for any Christian man "	(Council of Trent, sat 1545-7, 1551-3)
1534
1536
1537
1538
1539	Württemberg	(b) After Calvin Gallicana Belgica	The Forty-two Articles (Eleven Articles) The Thirty-eight Articles	(C. of Trent, 1562-3) Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent (as finally published)
1543
1552
1553
1559
1562
1563
1564
1566		Helvetica II	The Thirty-nine Articles
1571

enlarged edition of the Confession of Augsburg. It was used by Archbishop Parker in his revision of the English Articles published in 1563. The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent were made known from time to time as they were passed, but were authoritatively set forth as a whole, in accordance with a Papal Bull, in 1564. (See CALVINISTS, LUTHERANS, ROMISH DOCTRINE.)

We have seen that the Thirty-nine Arts. are not an isolated phenomenon, but are the outcome of a common need, which pressed upon all sections of the Christian Church. But the consideration of the third column of the table given above brings out a second point of no less importance, viz.: that these Arts. have behind them thirty-five years of effort after doctrinal exposition within the Church of England itself.

The process begins in the reign of Henry VIII. Between 1532 and 1536 by a series of Acts of Parliament and of resolutions of Convocation the authority of the Pope of Rome was "extirpated" and that of the King substituted for it. One of the first acts of the King in the exercise of his new authority was the issue of (a) The Ten Articles of 1536. The need of some such action was felt on all hands. The Lower House of Convocation drew up a list of errors then publicly preached under sixty-seven heads. Thomas Cromwell assured the Upper House that "the King studieth day and night to set a quietness in the Church, and he cannot rest until all such controversies be fully debated and ended. . . ." "His special desire is to set a stay for the unlearned people, whose consciences are in doubt what they may believe." The Bishops were at one with the King and with the Lower House in feeling that something must be done, but what that something was to be was a matter not easily settled. As a matter of fact the Bishops were themselves divided into two nearly equal parties. One party, led by Abp.

Cranmer, was in favour of considerable changes, both in doctrine and ceremony; the other, led by Gardiner, Bp. of Winchester, was content with the repudiation of papal authority and desired to go no further. On one point, however, both were agreed, viz., that the "pestiferous" errors of the Anabaptists must be condemned (see ANABAPTISTS). Eventually ten "Articles to establish Christian quietness and unity amongst us and to avoid contentious opinions," in the composition of which the King had a hand, were agreed upon and published. Five were on doctrine (The Rule of Faith, the Sacraments of Baptism, of Penance, and of the Altar, Justification); five on ceremonies (Images, honouring of Saints, praying to Saints, Rites generally, Purgatory). These Arts. were transitional and conservative, condemning the grosser abuses both on the Roman and on the Anabaptist side, but retaining much that was afterwards abandoned. (See for these Arts. Hardwick's History of the Articles, App. I.)

(b) The Institution of a Christian Man, issued in the following year (1537), and generally known as "The Bishops' Book," consists of an Exposition of the Creed, the seven Sacraments, the ten Commandments, the Paternoster, Ave Maria, Justification and Purgatory. It was written on the same lines as the Ten Articles, and it virtually superseded them. Neither of these documents, however, contributes anything directly to the language of the Thirty-nine Articles.

(c) In 1538 Henry VIII was negotiating an alliance with "the princes of the Augsburg Confession." As the latter laid down the condition that he must approve the doctrine of the Confession, the King arranged a conference of Lutheran and Anglican theologians in England. The Articles of the Augsburg Confession were taken as a basis and eventually thirteen articles on doctrine were drawn up, a MS. copy of which exists at Lambeth Palace. On the reformation of abuses, however, agreement was less easy, the King and the reactionary party holding out strenuously for the mediæval rites, and the Conference broke up without accomplishing the purpose for which it had been called. The thirteen Arts. were never published, but a careful study of them shows that here, for the first time in an Anglican document, language is used which reappears in our present Articles. It has always been known that the compilers of our Articles drew largely from certain of the Arts. of the Confession of Augsburg, but we now know further that the material thus drawn from the Lutheran Confession was derived from it through the medium of the Thirteen Arts. (See Hardwick, App. II and p. 61; and art. LUTHERANS.)

(d) The turn of political events and the influence of the reactionary party led in 1539 to the enactment by Parliament of The Six Articles ("the whip withe sixe stringes"), and in 1543 to the issue of a revision of "The Bishops' Book," under the title of The necessary erudition for any Christian Man ("The King's Book"), with the authority of Convocation and with a preface by the King. Both these were reactionary and they had no influence upon our present Articles.

In the last year of the young King, Edward VI (1553), were published The Forty-two Articles.

2. Under Edward VI.

They were not intended to cover the whole range of Christian doctrine, but, like other contemporary Confessions, to treat certain points then in dispute, and to set forth the Church of England doctrine in opposition to (a) the Mediævalists and (b) the Anabaptists. Fourteen are clearly directed against Rome, twenty-three have in view Anabaptist errors.

They were drawn up by Cranmer, revised by the six chaplains of the King and again by Cranmer, and issued in May, 1553, with the title "Articles agreed on by the Bishops and other learned men in the Synod at London . . . for the avoiding of controversy . . . in certain matters of religion." The Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, an attempt to form a revised English code of Canon Law, was being prepared at the same time as these Articles. It was never promulgated, but the language is often identical with that of the Thirty-nine Arts., and valuable light is thus often shed by the Ref. Leg. Eccl. upon the exact reference and meaning of the Arts.

Under Queen Mary the Articles were involved in the general sweeping away of all that savoured of doctrinal reformation.

With the accession of Queen Elizabeth the Church of England once more lifted up her head.

4. Under Elizabeth.

To meet the immediate need Archbishop Parker set forth in 1559 or 1560 Eleven Articles (Hardwick, App. IV). Both in form and matter they differed widely from the earlier Articles, and dealt only with fundamental principles and practices of the English Church. But this was avowedly only provisional, and in 1563

Archbishop Parker presented to Convocation a set of thirty-nine Articles. These the bishops revised and signed (see Parker MSS. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge). The Queen made one addition (the first clause of Art. 20) and one omission (Art. 29) before publication, and we may therefore call these Arts. The Thirty-eight Articles of 1563. In these Arts. we find that the Forty-two Arts. of 1553 have been subjected to a very thorough and even drastic revision. Archbishop Parker added four Arts., and enlarged ten; he omitted seven, and curtailed seven; and he re-wrote five and altered four. Several additions were made from the Confession of Württemberg (see Arts. 2, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 20). By these changes the Arts. were made more complete, Arts. against the Anabaptists which were no longer needed were omitted, and the fidelity of the Church of England to the primitive Catholic faith and her protests against certain doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome were made more clear and definite.

In 1570 Pope Pius V openly published his Bull of deposition of Queen Elizabeth and the mass of Romanists forthwith withdrew from the national worship. This was met in the next year by the passing in Parliament of various Acts, of which one required subscription to all the doctrinal Articles of 1563 from (a) all clergy not ordained according to the form in the PBs of Edward VI or Queen Elizabeth, and (b) all future incumbents on admission to their several cures.

In view of this action of Parliament the bishops revised the Arts., making sundry emendations and restoring the Twenty-ninth Art., and passed a canon, which laid down that these Arts. should be signed henceforth by all candidates for Holy Orders. Here at last in 1571 we find in their present form The Thirty-nine Articles. They received the Royal sanction, were printed and published in Latin and English, and subscription to them in their entirety was forthwith required of all licensed preachers and all beneficed clergy. Although this latter requirement was not covered by the Act of 1571, it was enforced by the Queen's commissioners, and subscription has as a matter of fact always been made since 1571 to the Arts. as finally revised in that year. Various attempts were made under Puritan auspices to revise the Arts. in a Calvinistic direction, but in every case without success.

The Royal Declaration, prefixed to the Arts. in the PB, was drawn up in all probability by Archbishop Laud and was issued by Charles I in an attempt to allay the disputes then raging between Calvinists and Arminians.

The form of subscription has varied at different times. Prior to 1865 the form generally used was: "I, A.B., do willingly and
6. Subscription. from my heart subscribe to the Thirty-nine Arts. . . . and to the three Arts. in the Thirty-sixth Canon, and to all things therein contained." The present form is:

"I assent to the Thirty-nine Arts. and to the Book of Common Prayer and of ordering of Bishops, Priests and Deacons. I believe the doctrine of the Church of England as therein set forth to be agreeable to the Word of God: and, in public prayer and administration of the Sacraments, I will use the form in the said book prescribed and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority."

How is this "assent" to be understood? A careful study of the Articles and the PB reveals the fact that Anglican Theology moves along certain definite and distinctive lines (see esp. Arts. 6, 11, 19, 20, 23, 25, 29, 31, 36). These lines of doctrine distinguish it from Romanism on the one hand and from the extreme forms of Protestantism on the other. Subscription to the Articles should imply loyalty to these distinctive principles. It is not compatible with adherence to those opposing principles and practices which are distinctive of Rome on the one hand or of Anabaptism on the other. But within its own lines there is scope for a genuine evolution of Anglican theology in the light of present-day knowledge.

Theology is a living science. The immense progress made in other departments of thought in the 19th century could not fail to show itself also in Theology. Biblical Criticism and Natural Science have thrown new light upon the problems of Theology. Men think in new categories, and it is inevitable that the definitions and propositions of the 16th century should be inadequate to express the best theological thought of our own day. But it is one thing to recognise the need for re-statement and quite another to put forth any re-statement which would command universal assent. This may be possible some day. When that day comes, let the task be taken in hand in humble dependence upon the guidance of the Spirit of God. Meantime subscription to the Arts. must be regarded as made, subject to such qualifications as are necessitated by the new light thrown upon certain doctrines in recent times.

The Arts. may be divided into five groups: (i) the doctrine of God (including that of the Person of Jesus Christ) (1-5); (ii) the Rule of Faith—(a) the Scriptures, (b) the Creeds (6-8); (iii) the doctrine of Salvation, as it affects the individual (9-18); (iv) the same in relation to the Church, her ministry and Sacraments (19-31); (v) miscellaneous—Church discipline, etc. (32-39).

The Arts. are given below, as finally settled in 1571. The dates which immediately follow the text give first the date of composition and then dates of subsequent revision, preceded by signs which show the nature of the change, if any, made at such dates (= means "no change," + means "addition," - means "omission"). Reference numbers in the text to notes below are repeated at the beginning and end of the phrase whenever it consists of more than one or two words, e.g., in Art. 2, "begotten . . . Father." Abbreviations: C. of A. for Confession of Augsburg; C. of W. for Confession of Württemberg.

ARTICULI RELIGIONIS.

1. De Fide in Sacrosanctam Trinitatem.

Unus est vivus et verus¹ Deus, æternus, incorporeus, imparibilis, impassibilis, immensa potentia, sapientia, ac bonitatis, Creator et Conservator omnium, tum visibilium, tum invisibilium. Et in unitate hujus divinæ naturæ, tres sunt Personæ, ejusdem essentia, potentia, ac æternitatis, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus.

Text (1538) 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against Anabaptists.

¹ The words in Italics come from the Confession of Augsburg through the 13 Arts. of 1538.

2. ¹De Verbo, sive Filio Dei, qui verus homo factus est.

² Filius, qui est Verbum Patris,

³ ab æterno a Patre genitus, verus et æternus Deus, ac Patri consubstantialis⁴; in utero beatæ Virginis, ex illius substantia naturam humanam assumpsit;

ita ut duæ naturæ, divinæ et humanæ, integre atque perfecte in unitate Personæ fuerint inseparabiliter conjunctæ, ex quibus est unus Christus, verus Deus et verus homo, qui vere passus est, crucifixus, mortuus, et sepultus, ut Patrem nobis reconciliaret, essetque hostia, non tantum pro culpa originis, verum etiam pro omnibus actualibus hominum peccatis.

Text (1538) 1553 + 1563 = 1571. Against Anabaptists.

¹ Title 1553 = 1563, Verbum Dei verum hominem esse factum: That the Worde or Sonne of God was made a very man.

² The words in Italics come from the C. of A. (Art. 3) through the 13 Arts. (Art. 3).

^{3,4} Added in 1563 from the C. of Württemberg.

⁴ 1553, for all sinne of manne, bothe original and actual.

3. De Descensu Christi ad Inferos.

Quem ad modum Christus pro nobis mortuus est, et sepultus, ita est etiam credendus¹ ad Inferos descendisse.²

Text (1538) 1553 = 1563 = 1571.

¹ Words in Italics from C. of A. through the 13 Arts. (Art. 3).

² The following clause followed in 1553 but was omitted in 1563.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

1. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.

There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the Maker, and Preserver of all things both visible and invisible.

And in unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

2. ¹Of the Word or Son of God, which was made very Man.

The Son, which is the Word of the Father,

² begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father,³ took Man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance:

so that two whole and perfect Natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God, and very Man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice,⁴ not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men.

3. Of the going down of Christ into Hell.

As Christ died for us, and was buried, so also it is to be believed, that he went down into Hell.²

Nam corpus usque ad resurrectionem in sepulchro jacuit, Spiritus ab illo emissus, cum spiritibus qui in carcere sive in inferno detinebantur, fuit, illisque prædicavit, quemadmodum testatur Petri locus.

4. ¹De Resurrectione Christi.

Christus vere a mortuis resurrexit, suumque corpus, cum carne, ossibus, omnibusque ad integritatem humanæ naturæ pertinentibus recepit :

cum quibus in ^a cælum ascendit ibique residet, quoad, extremo die, ad judicandos ^a homines reversurus sit.

Text 1553 + 1563 + 1571. Against Anabaptists.

¹ Title 1553 and 1563, Resurrectio Christi: The Resurrection of Christe.

² The word and a half in Italics is also found in Art. 3 of the 13 Arts. and of the C. of A.

³ "All" was added in 1563 in the English Edition. Some modern texts read "omnes" in the corresponding place in the Latin text, but it is not in the editions of 1553 or 1563, nor in that of 1571, by John Daye.

5. De Spiritu Sancto.

Spiritus Sanctus, a Patre et Filio procedens ejusdem est cum Patre et Filio essentia, majestatis et gloria, verus ac æternus Deus.

Text 1563 = 1571. Against Anabaptists and to render the Arts. more complete. The wording is taken practically verbatim from the C. of W.

6. ¹De divinis Scripturis, quod sufficient ad salutem.

Scriptura sacra continet omnia quæ ad salutem sunt necessaria, ita ut quicquid in ea nec legitur, neque inde probari potest, ², ⁴ non sit a quoquam exigendum ut tanquam articulus fidei credatur, aut ad salutis necessitatem requiri putetur.

^a Sacra Scripturæ nomine eos canonicos libros Veteris et Novi Testamenti intelligimus, de quorum auctoritate in Ecclesia nunquam dubitatum est.

De nominibus et numero librorum sacra canonica Scripturæ Veteris Testamenti.

Genesis
Exodus
Leviticus
Numeri

For the bodie laie in the Sepulchre untill the resurrection : but his Ghoste departing from him was with the Ghostes that were in prison or in Helle and did preache to the same, as the place of S. Peter dooeth testifie.

4. Of the Resurrection of Christ.

Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature; wherewith he ascended into Heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge ^a all Men at the last day.

5. Of the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory, with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

6. ¹Of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation.

^a Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, ², ⁴ is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite necessary to salvation.

^a In the name of holy Scripture we do understand those canonical Books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.

Of the Names and Number of the Canonical Books.

Genesis
Exodus
Leviticus Numbers

Of the Names and Number of the Canonical Books—contd.

Deuteron

Josua

Judicum

Ruth

Prior liber Samuelis

Secundus liber

Samuelis

Prior liber Regum

Secundus liber Regum

Prior liber

Paralipomenon

Secundus liber

Paralipomenon

Primus liber Esdra

Secundus liber Esdra

Liber Hester

Liber Job

Psalmi

Proverbia

Ecclesiastes, vel

Concionator

Cantica Salomonis

Quatuor Propheta

Majores

Duodecim Propheta

Minores

Alios autem libros (ut ait Hieronymus⁷) legit quidem Ecclesia, ad exempla vitæ, et formandos mores: illos tamen ad dogmata confirmanda non adhibet; ut sunt.

^a Tertius liber Esdra

^a Quartus liber Esdra

Liber Tobia

Liber Judith

^a Reliquum libri Hester

Liber Sapientia

Liber Jesu, filii Sirach

^a Baruch propheta

^a Canticum trium

Puerorum

^a Historia Susannæ

^a De Bel et Dracone

^a Oratio Manasses

Prior liber Machabæorum

Secundus liber Machabæorum

Novi Testamenti omnes libros (ut vulgo recepti sunt) recipimus, et habemus pro Canoniceis.

Text 1553 + 1563 + 1571. Asserts a cardinal doctrine of the Church against (1) Anabaptists

Deuteronomy

Joshua

Judges

Ruth

The First Book of

Samuel

The Second Book of

Samuel

The First Book of

Kings

The Second Book of

Kings

The First Book of

Chronicles

The Second Book of

Chronicles

The First Book of

Esdra

The Second Book of

Esdra

The Book of Esther

The Book of Job

The Psalms

The Proverbs

Ecclesiastes or Preacher

Cantica, or Songs of Solomon

Four Prophets the greater

Twelve Prophets the less

And the other Books (as Hierome saith⁷) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine; such are these following:

^a The Third Book of Esdra

^a The Fourth Book of Esdra

The Book of Tobias

The Book of Judith

^a The rest of the Book of Esther

The Book of Wisdom

Jesus the Son of Sirach

^a Baruch the Prophet

^a The Song of the Three Children

^a The Story of Susanna

^a Of Bel and the Dragon

^a The Prayer of Manasses

The First Book of

Maccabees

The Second Book of

Maccabees

All the Books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive, and account them Canonical.

("Antibook religionists"), (2) Roman views on Canon and tradition.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563: Divinæ Scripturæ doctrina sufficit ad salutem.

² First par. 1553, alt. 1563.

³ There followed here in 1553 the following words, which were omitted in 1563:

Licet interdum a fidelibus, ut plium et conducibile ad ordinem et decorum admittatur, attamen

⁴ 1553:

A quoquam non exigendum est, ut (etc., as 1563).

The doctrine of holie Scripture is sufficient to salvation.

Although it be sometime received of the faithful as Godlike and profitable for an ordre and comeliness: Yeat

No manne ought to bee constrained to beleve it as an article of faith or repute it requisite to the necessitie of Salvation.

⁵ There is no authority for the "or" found in some modern texts. One English version of 1563 and a Parker MS. of 1571 read "as"; cp. the Latin.

⁶ The second and following para. were added in 1563, the list of apocryphal books being completed in 1571 (see note⁹). The words in italics are taken from the C. of W.

⁷ In his Preface in Libros Salomonis.

The titles in the Art. are mainly taken from the Vulgate, in which Esra and Neh. are called the 1st and 2nd books of Esdras. Consequently the Apocryphal books are enumerated as 3rd and 4th. The titles in our English Bibles are taken from the Hebrew. Consequently Esra and Neh. are called by these names and the Apocryphal books are called 1st and 2nd.

⁸ The names of these books were added in 1571.

7. ¹ De Veteri Testamento.

*Testamentum Vetus Novo contrarium non est,² quandoquidem, tam in veteri, quam in novo, per Christum, qui unicus est Mediator Dei et hominum, Deus et homo, æterna vita humano generi est proposita. Quare³ male sentiunt, qui veteres tantum in promissiones temporarias sperasse confingunt.⁴

Quoniam Lex a Deo data per Moysen (quoad cærimonias et ritus) Christianos non astringat, neque Civilia ejus præcepta in aliqua republica necessario recipi debeant;

nihilominus tamen ab obedientia mandatorum quæ moralia vocantur, nullus quantumvis Christianus est solutus.⁵

7. ¹ Of the Old Testament.

*The Old Testament is not contrary to the New²; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to Mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and Man, being both God and Man. Wherefore they are not to be heard, which feign that the old Fathers did look only for transitory promises.⁴

Although the Law given from God by Moses, as touching Ceremonies and Rites, do not bind Christian men, nor the Civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received in any commonwealth; yet notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the Commandments which are called Moral.⁵

Text 1553 ± 1563 = 1571. Arts. 6 and 19 of 1553 were combined by Archbp. Parker into one. Against two opposite Anabaptist errors.

¹ Title, 1553:

Vetus Testamentum non est rejiciendum.

^{2,3} 1553, Testamentum Vetus, quasi Novo contrarium sit, non est repudiandum sed retinendum.

⁴ 1553, Quare non sunt audienti. The Eng. text remains as in 1553.

⁵ Art. 7 of 1553 ended here. The rest of the Art. in the Latin

The olde Testament is not to be refused.

The olde Testament is not to bee put awaie as though it were contrarie to the newe, but to be kept still.

The Eng. text remains as in 1553.

text follows very closely the 1st par. of Art. 19 of 1553. The Eng. version of the same par. of Art. 19 ran as follows: The Lawe which was geven of God by Moses, although it binde not Christian menne, as concerning the Ceremonies and Rites of the same: Neither is it required that the Civile Preceptes and Ordres of it shoulde of necessitie bee received in any commune weale: Yet no manne (bee he never so perfecte a Christian) is exempte and lose from the Obedience of those Commandmentes, which are called Moral.

⁶ Art. 19 of 1553 continued as follows:

Quare illi not sunt audienti, qui sacras literas tantum infirmis datas esse perhibent, et spiritum perpetuo jactant, a quo sibi quæ prædicant suggeri asserunt, quoniam cum sacris literis apertissime pugnent.

Wherefore thei are not to be harkened unto who affirme that holie Scripture is given onlie to the weake, and do boaste themselves continually of the spirit, of whom (thei say) thei have learned soche things as thei teache, although the same be most evidently repugnant to the holie Scripture.

8. ¹ De tribus Symbolis.

Symbola tria, Nicænum, Athanasii, et quod vulgo² Apostolorum appellatur, omnino recipienda sunt,³ et credenda⁴; nam firmissimis⁵ Scripturarum testimoniis probari possunt.

8. Of the Three Creeds.

The Three Creeds, Nicene Creed, Athanasius's Creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, ought thoroughly to be received³ and believed⁴; for they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture.

Text 1553 + 1563 = 1571. Asserts the Catholic character of the English Reformation.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Symbola tria: The three Creeds.

² 1553 and 1563, Apostolicum.

^{3,4} Added in 1563.

⁵ 1553 had here "divinarum."

9. ¹ De Peccato Originali.

Peccatum originis non est (ut fabulantur Pelagiani)² in imitatione Adami situm sed est vitium, et depravatio naturæ, cujuslibet hominis ex Adamo³ naturaliter propagati; qua fit, ut ab originali justitia quam longissime distet, ad malum sua natura propendeat, et caro semper adversus spiritum concupiscat;

unde, in unoquoque nascentium, iram Dei, atque damnationem meretur.

Manet etiam in renatis hæc naturæ depravatio; qua fit ut affectus carnis (Græce φρόνημα σαρκός, quod alii sapientiam, alii sensum, alii affectum, alii studium⁷ carnis interpretantur) legi Dei non subjiciatur.

Et quoniam renatis et credentibus nulla, propter Christum, est condemnatio, peccati tamen

9. Of Original or Birth-sin.

Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk²;) but it is the fault and corruption of the Nature of every man, that naturally is ingendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from⁴ original righteousness,⁴ and is of his own nature⁵ inclined to evil, so that the flesh⁶ lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation.

And this infection of nature doth remain, yea in them that are regenerated; whereby the lust of the flesh, called in Greek φρόνημα σαρκός, which some do expound the wisdom, some sensuality, some the affection, some the desire, of the flesh, is not subject to the Law of God.

And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptised, yet the in sese rationem habere concupiscenciam, fatetur Apostolus.

Apostle doth confess, that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin.

Text 1553 - 1563 = 1571 (Eng. alt.). Against both Roman and Anabaptist views.

¹ Title 1553 and 1563, Peccatum originale.

² In 1553 the words followed:

Et hodie Anabaptistae repetunt. Which also the Anabaptistes doe now a daies renewe.

³ The words in Italics are found in "the 13 Arts." (Art. 2) of 1538.

⁴ 1553 and 1563: his former righteousness, which he had at his creation.

⁵ 1553 and 1563: given.

⁶ 1553 and 1563: desheath.

⁷ Carnis added in 1571.

10. De Libero Arbitrio.

¹ Ea est hominis post lapsum Adæ conditio, ut sese naturalibus suis viribus et bonis operibus, ad fidem, et invocationem Dei convertere ac præparare non possit.

Quare,¹ absque gratia Dei (quæ per Christum est) nos præveniente,² ut velimus, et cooperante, dum volumus, ad pietatis opera faciendam, quæ Deo grata sint, et accepta, nihil valeamus.³

Text 1553 + 1563 = 1571. Against Pelagian views (Anabaptist and Roman).

¹⁻² Added in 1563, the words in Italics being taken verbatim from the C. of W.

³ Cp. Aug., De gratia et libero arbitrio 17, "sine illo vel operante ut velimus vel co-operante cum volumus ad bonæ pietatis opera nihil valeamus."

⁴ 1553 and 1563 in.

⁵ Added in 1563.

⁶ In 1553 followed the then Art. 10, De gratia: Of grace, which ran as follows:

Gratia Christi, seu Spiritus sanctus qui per eundem datur, cor lapideum auferit, et dat cor carneum. Atque licet ex nolentibus quæ recta sunt volentes faciat et ex volentibus prava nolentes reddat voluntati nihilominus violentiam nullam infert. Et nemo hac de causa, cum peccaverit, seipsum excusare potest, quasi nolens aut coactus peccaverit, ut eam ob causam accusari non mereatur aut damnari.

This was omitted in 1563.

11. De Hominis Justificatione.

¹ Tantum² propter meritum Domini ac Servatoris nostri, Jesu Christi, per fidem, non propter opera et merita nostra, iusti coram Deo reputamur.

Quare, sola fide nos justificari doctrina est

10. Of Free-Will.

¹ The condition of Man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith, and calling upon God:

Wherefore¹ we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working² with us, when we have that³ good will.⁴

The grace of Christ or the holie Ghost by him given dothe take awaie the stonie harte, and giveth an harte of fleshe. And although those that have no will to good things he maketh them to will, and those that would evill things he maketh them not to wille the same: Yet nevertheless he enforceth not the will. And therefore no man when he sinneth can excuse himself as not worthy to be blamed or condemned by alleging that he sinned unwillinglie or by compulsion.

11. Of the Justification of Man.

¹ We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by Faith, and not for our own works or deservings:

Wherefore, that we are justified by Faith only saluberrima, ac consolationis plenissima, ut in Homilia de Justificatione Hominis fusiús explicatur.

is a most wholesome Doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the² Homily of Justification.

Text (1553) 1563 = 1571. Asserts one of the cardinal Reformation doctrines as against the Roman teaching (see art. JUSTIFICATION).

¹ The present text dates from 1563. The Art. in 1553 ran as follows (the words in Italics are retained in the present text):

Justificatio ex sola fide Jesu Christi, eo sensu quo in Homilia de justificatione explicatur, est certissima et saluberrima Christianorum doctrina.

Justification by onely faith in Jesus Christ in that sence as it is declared in the homilie of Justification is a most certain and wholesome doctrine for Christien menne.

² The words in Italics in the present text come from the C.'s of A. and W. C. of A.: "... non possunt justificari coram Deo propolis viribus, meritis aut operibus, sed ... propter Christum, per fidem..." "Non propter nostra merita, sed propter Christum" (Arts. 4 and 5). C. of W.: "Homo ... reputatur coram eo justus propter solum filium Dei Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, per fidem."

³ i.e. the 3rd Homily: "of Salvation": cp. the two following "of the true and lively faith" and "of good works."

12. De Bonis Operibus.

¹ Bona opera, quæ sunt fructus fidei, et² justificatos sequuntur, quamquam peccata nostra expiare, et divini judicii severitatem ferre non possunt;

Deo tamen grata sunt, et accepta in Christo; atque ex vera et viva fide necessario profiunt, ut plane ex illis æque fides viva cognosci possit, atque arbor ex fructu judicari.

12. Of Good Works.

Albeit that Good Works, which are the fruits of Faith, and follow after Justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's Judgment;

yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively Faith;

insomuch that by them a lively Faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit.

Text 1563 = 1571 (see SANCTIFICATION). Against Roman teaching.

¹ The words in Italics are taken from the C. of W.

² "Justificatos sequuntur" from St. Aug., de fide et operibus, cap. 14.

13. ¹ De Operibus ante² Justificationem.

Opera quæ fiunt ante gratiam Christi, et Spiritus ejus afflatum, cum ex fide Jesu Christi non prodeant, minime Deo grata sunt, neque gratiam (ut³ multi vocant)⁴ congruo merentur. Immo, cum non sint facta ut Deus illa fieri voluit et præcepit, peccati rationem habere non dubitamus.

13. ¹ Of Works before² Justification.

Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the³ School-authors say) deserve grace of congruity: yea rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against the scholastic theory of merit.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Opera ante justificationem: Works before justification.

² In text of Art. the phrase is "ante gratiam Christi," etc., "before the grace of Christ," etc.

³ Multi, but Eng. school-authors.

⁴ A servant may be said to deserve his wages "de condigno"; but to deserve support in sickness or old age "de congruo" (Hey.).

14. ¹ De Operibus Supererogationis.

Opera, quæ² supererogationis appellant, non possunt sine arrogantia et impietate prædicari.

Nam illis declarant homines, non tantum se Deo reddere, quæ tenentur, sed plus in ejus gratiam facere quam deberent; cum aperte Christus dicat: ⁴ Cum feceritis omnia, quæcunque præcepta sunt vobis, dicite, Servi inutiles sumus.

Text 1553 = 1563 (alt.) = 1571. Against mediæval teaching.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Opera supererogationis: Woorkes of supererogation.

² From "super" and "erogare"—payment over and above:—cp. Vulg., Lk. 10 35.

³ 1553, "Iniquity."

⁴ Luke 17 10.

15. ¹ De Christo, qui solus est sine Peccato.

Christus, in nostræ naturæ veritate, per omnia similis factus est nobis, excepto peccato, a quo² prorsus erat immunis, tum in carne, tum in spiritu. Venit, ut Agnus absque macula, qui mundi peccata, per immolationem sui semel factam, tolleret; et peccatum (ut inquit Joannes) in eo non erat: sed nos reliqui, etiam baptizati, et in Christo regenerati, in multis tamen offendimus omnes. Et, si dixerimus, quia peccatum non habemus, nos ipsos seducimus; et veritas in nobis non est.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against Anabaptists.

¹ Title, 1553, 1563, and John Daye's edition in 1571: Nemo præter Christum No man is without sinne, est sine peccato, but Christe alone.

² prorsus=clearly, i.e., completely, thoroughly.

14. ¹ Of Works of Supererogation.

Voluntary Works besides, over and above God's Commandments, which they call Works of Supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety:

for by them men do declare, that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake, than of bounden duty is required:

whereas Christ saith plainly,⁴ When ye have done all that are commanded to you, say, We be unprofitable servants.

15. Of Christ alone without Sin.

Christ in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things, sin only except, from which he was² clearly void, both in his flesh, and in his spirit. He came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world, and sin, as Saint John saith, was not in him. But all we the rest, although baptised, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

16. ¹ De Peccato post Baptismum.

Non omne peccatum mortale, post baptismum voluntarie perpetratum, est peccatum in Spiritum Sanctum, et irremissibile.

Proinde lapsi a Baptismo in peccata locus penitentiae non est negandus.

Post acceptum Spiritum Sanctum, possumus a gratia data recedere, atque peccare, denuoque per gratiam Dei resurgere, ac resipiscere:

ideoque illi damnandi sunt, qui se, quamdiu hic vivant, amplius non posse peccare affirmant, aut vere resipiscuntibus² veniæ locum denegant.

Text 1553, 1563 (alt.), 1571 (alt.). Against Anabaptist errors (cp. C. of A., Art. 12).

¹ Title, 1553:

De peccato in spiritum sanctum.

1563 De lapsis post Baptismum.

² 1553, place for penitentes; 1563, place for penitence.

³ 1553 and 1563, penitentia locum; 1553, place for penitentes; 1563=1571, place of forgiveness.

⁴ 1553 and 1563, and "and amend their lives."

16. ¹ Of Sin after Baptism.

Not every deadly sin willingly committed after Baptism is sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable.

Wherefore the² grant of repentance³ is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after Baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and by the grace of God we may arise again, and amend our lives.

And therefore they are to be condemned, which say, they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the⁴ place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.⁴

Of sinne against the holie Ghoste.

Of sinne after Baptisme.

² 1553, place for penitentes; 1563, place for penitence.

³ 1553 and 1563, penitentia locum; 1553, place for penitentes; 1563=1571, place of forgiveness.

⁴ 1553 and 1563, and "and amend their lives."

17. De Prædestinatione, et Electione.

Prædestinatio ad vitam est æternum Dei propositum, quo, ante jacta mundi fundamenta, suo consilio, nobis quidem occulto, constanter decrevit, eos, quos² in Christo elegit ex hominum genere, a maledicto et exitio liberare, atque (ut vasa in honorem efficta), per Christum, ad æternam salutem adducere.

Unde, qui tam præclaro Dei beneficio sunt donati, illi, Spiritu ejus opportuno tempore operante, secundum propositum ejus vocantur: vocationi per gratiam parent; justificantur gratis; adoptantur in filios Dei: unigeniti ejus Filii Jesu Christi imagini efficiuntur conformes: in bonis operibus sancte ambulant; et demum, ex Dei misericordia, pertingunt ad sempiternam felicitatem.

Quemadmodum prædestinationis et electionis nostræ in Christo pia

17. Of Predestination and Election.

Predestination to Life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his¹ counsel secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen² in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore,³ they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God⁴ be called according to God's purpose by his Spirit working in due season: they through Grace obey the calling: they be justified freely: they be made sons of God by adoption: they be made like the image of his only-begotten Son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.

As the godly consideration of Predestination, and our Election consideratio, dulcis, suavis, et ineffabilis consolationis plena est, vere piis, et his qui sentiunt in se vim Spiritus Christi, facta carnis, et membra quæ adhuc sunt super terram, mortificantem, animunquæ ad cælestia et superna rapientem; tum quia fidem nostram, de æterna salute consequenda per Christum, plurimum stabilit, atque confirmat, tum quia amorem nostrum in Deum vehementer accendit; ita hominibus curiosis, carnalibus, et Spiritu Christi destitutis, ob oculos perpetuo versari prædestinationis Dei sententiam, perniciosissimum est præcipitum, unde illos diabolus protrudit, vel in desperationem, vel in æque perniciosam impurissimæ vitæ securitatem.

Deinde ⁴ promissiones divinas sic amplecti oportet, ut nobis in sacris literis ⁵ generaliter propositæ sunt; et Dei voluntas in nostris actionibus ea sequenda est, quam in Verbo Dei habemus diserte revelatam.

Text 1553 ± 1563.

¹ 1553, omne iudgemente.

² In Christo, "in Christ," added 1563.

³ 1553 and 1563, soche as have so excellent a benefite of God given unto them.

⁴ 1553:

Licet prædestinationis decreta sunt nobis ignota, tamen.

Omitted 1563.

⁵ "Generally" = universally, i.e., as applying to the whole "genus humanum" :—cp. Art. 7, "Everlasting life is offered to mankind (humano generi est proposita)"; Catechism, Two sacraments "as generally necessary to salvation."

18. ¹ De speranda æterna salute tantum in Nomine Christi.

Sunt et illi anathematizandi, qui dicere audent unumquemque, in lege aut secta quam proficetur, esse servandum, modo juxta illam, et lumen naturæ, accurate vixerit, cum sacre literæ tantum Jesu Christi Nomen in Christ, is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh, and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love towards God:

So, for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's Predestination, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the Devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living, no less perilous than desperation.

Furthermore, ⁴ we must receive God's promises in such wise, as they be ⁵ generally set forth to us in holy Scripture: and, in our doings, that Will of God is to be followed, which we have expressly declared unto us in the Word of God.

"Although the Decrees of predestination are unknown unto us, yeat."

18. ¹ Of obtaining æternal Salvation only by the Name of Christ.

They also are to be had accursed that presume to say, That every man shall be saved by the Law or Sect which he profeseth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that Law, and the Light of Nature.

For holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the prædicent, in quo salvos fieri homines oporteat.²

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against certain Anabaptists. The position of the heathen is not dealt with in this Art.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563: Tantum in nomine Christi speranda est æterna salus.

² 1553. There followed here Omnes obligantur ad moralia legis præcepta servanda.

In 1563 this Art. was omitted here and part of it incorporated in Art. 7 (see Art. 7, notes 4 and 5).

Name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved.³

Wee must truste to obtaine eternal salvation only by the name of Christe.

Art. 19: All men are bounde to keepe the moral commaundments of the Lawe.

19. De Ecclesia.

¹ Ecclesia Christi visibilis est cõstus fidelium, in quo Verbum Dei purum prædicatur, et Sacramenta, quoad ea quæ necessario exiguntur, juxta Christi institutum recte administrantur.

Sicut erravit Ecclesia Hierosolymitana, Alexandrina, et Antiochena; ita et erravit Ecclesia Romana, non solum quoad agenda, et cærimoniarum ritus, verum in iis etiam quæ credenda sunt.

Text (Latin) 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against Roman and Sectarian views of the Church.

¹ Cp. C. of A., Art. 7: est autem Ecclesia congregatio sanctorum, in qua evangelium recte docetur et recte administrantur sacramenta.

² 1563, "and manner of ceremonies" added.

³ 1571, "their" (1553 and 1563) omitted.

20. De Ecclesiæ Auctoritate.

¹ Habet Ecclesia ritus statuendi jus, et in fidei controversiis auctoritatem; quamvis² Ecclesiæ non licet quidquam instituere, quod Verbo Dei scripto adversetur; nec unum scripturæ locum sic exponere potest, ut alteri contradicat.

Quare, licet Ecclesia sit divinorum librorum testis et conservatrix; attamen, ut adversus eos nihil decernere, ita, præter illos, nihil credendum de necessitate salutis debet obtrudere.

Text 1553 + 1563 = 1571. Affirms (a) the legislative power of the Church with regard to Rites (b) the judicial authority with regard to doctrine 19. Of the Church.

¹ The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

As the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch, have erred; so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living² and manner of Ceremonies, but also in matters of³ Faith.

20. Of the Authority of the Church.

¹ The Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies, and authority in Controversies of Faith:

And yet¹ it is not lawful for the Church to ordain any thing that is contrary to God's Word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another.

Wherefore, although the Church be a witness and a keeper of holy Writ, yet, as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so besides the same ought it not to enforce any thing to be believed for necessity of Salvation.

and (c) relation of Church to Holy Writ, as against (a) Extremists, (β) Romanists.

¹1 The first clause first appears in the Latin edition of 1563, printed and published by Wolfe under the direct authority of the Queen. Probably inserted by the Queen herself, as it is not in the Parker MS. signed by the Bishops in Convocation. However, the Art. as it now stands was ratified by Convocation in 1571, as was proved at Archbp. Laud's Trial in 1645. The wording was probably suggested by the C. of W.: De Ecclesia, "hæc ecclesia habeat jus iudicandi de omnibus doctrinis."

21. De Auctoritate Conciliorum Generalium.

Generalia concilia, sine jussu et voluntate Principum, congregari non possunt; et, ubi convenerint, quia ex hominibus constant, qui non omnes Spiritu et Verbo Dei reguntur, et errare possunt, et interdum errarunt, etiam in his quæ ad Deum pertinent; ideoque, quæ ab illis constituuntur ut ad salutem necessaria, neque robur habent, neque auctoritatem, nisi ostendi possint e sacris literis esse desumpta.

Text 1553 - 1563 = 1571. The Council of Trent, called together by the Pope alone and consisting only of bishops of the Roman obedience, was now sitting.

¹ 1553, insert here "not only in worldly matters but also"; omitted 1563.

22. De Purgatorio.

Doctrina ¹Romanensium de purgatorio, de indulgentiis, de veneratione et adoratione, tum imaginum, tum reliquiarum, necnon de invocatione Sanctorum, res est futillis, inaniter conficta; et nullis Scripturarum testimoniis innitur: immo Verbo Dei contradicit.

Text 1553, 1563 (alt.) = 1571.

¹ 1553, Scholasticorum: "Of Scholastic hours"; altered 1563.

² 1553, "feigned"; altered 1563.

23. De Vocatione Ministrorum.

Non licet cuiquam sumere sibi munus ²publicæ prædicandi, aut administrandi Sacramenta in Ecclesia, nisi prius fuerit ad hæc obeunda legitime vocatus et missus.

Atque illos legitime vocatos et missos existimare debemus, qui per 21. Of the Authority of General Councils.

General Councils may not be gathered together without the commandment and will of Princes. And when they be gathered together (forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and Word of God), they may err, and sometimes have erred,¹ even in things pertaining unto God.

Wherefore things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture.

22. Of Purgatory.

The ¹Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration, as well of Images as of Reliques, and also invocation of Saints, is a fond thing vainly ²invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

23. Of Ministering in the Congregation.

It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of publick preaching, or ministering the Sacraments in the Congregation, before he be lawfully called, and sent to execute the same.

And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent, which be chosen, homines, quibus potestas vocandi ministrorum, atque mittendi in vineam Domini, publice concessa est in Ecclesia co-optati fuerint, et adsciti in hoc opus.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against the Anabaptists.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Nemo in ecclesia ministrat nisi vocatus: No man male minister in the Congregation, except he be called: altered 1571.

² The words in Italics have come from the 14th Art. of the C. of A. through the 13 Arts. of 1538.

24. De loquendo in Ecclesia lingua quam populus intelligit.

² Lingua populo non intellecta publicas in Ecclesia preces peragere, aut Sacramenta administrare, Verbo Dei, et primitivæ Ecclesiæ consuetudini, plane repugnat.

Text 1553, 1563 (alt.) = 1571. Against the mediæval practice.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563: Agendum est in Ecclesia lingua quæ sit populo nota.

² The present form of the Art. was substituted in 1563 for the earlier form of 1553, which ran as follows:

Decentissimum est et verbo Dei maxime congruit, ut nihil in Ecclesia publice legatur aut recitetur lingua populo ignota, idque Paulus fieri vult, nisi adesset qui interpretaretur.

and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the Congregation, to call and send Ministers into the Lord's vineyard.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against the Ana-

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Nemo in ecclesia ministrat nisi vocatus: No man male minister in the Congregation, except he be called: altered 1571.

² The words in Italics have come from the 14th Art. of the C. of A. through the 13 Arts. of 1538.

24. Of speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the people understandeth.

² It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the Primitive Church, to have publick Prayer in the Church, or to minister the Sacraments in a tongue not understood of the people.

Text 1553, 1563 (alt.) = 1571. Against the Menne must speake in the Congregation in soche tounge, as the people understandeth.

² The present form of the Art. was substituted in 1563 for the earlier form of 1553, which ran as follows:

It is most semelle, and most agreeable, to the woordes of God, that in the congregation nothing be openlie readde, or spoken, in a tongue unknowne to the people, the whiche thinge S. Paule didde forbidde, except some were present that should declare the same.

25. De Sacramentis.

¹ ² Sacramenta, ² a Christo instituta, non tantum sunt notæ professionis Christianorum, sed certa quædam potius testimonia, et efficacia signa gratiæ atque bonæ in nos voluntatis Dei, per quæ invisibiliter ipse in nos operatur, nos- tramque fidem in se non solum excitat, verum etiam confirmat.

Duo a Christo Domino nostro in Evangelio instituta sunt Sacramenta, scilicet Baptismus, et Cena Domini.

Quinque illa, vulgo nominata Sacramenta, scilicet, Confirmatio, Pœnitentia, Ordo, Matrimonium, et Extrema Unctio, pro Sacramentis Evangelicis habenda non sunt, 25. Of the Sacraments.

¹ Sacraments ordained of Christ be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace, and God's good will towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our Faith in him.

There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called Sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and extreme Unction, are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, ut quæ partim a prava Apostolorum imitatione proflexerunt, partim vitæ status sunt, in Scripturis quidem probati; sed Sacramentorum eandem cum Baptismo et Cena Domini rationem non habentes,⁴ ut quæ signum aliquod visibile, seu cæremoniam, a Deo institutam, non habeant.

Sacramenta non in hoc instituta sunt a Christo, ut spectarentur, aut circumferrentur, sed ut rite illis uteremur; et, in his duntaxat qui digne percipiunt, salutarem habent effectum.⁵ Qui vero indigne percipiunt, damnationem (ut inquit Paulus) sibi ipsis acquirunt.

being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures; but yet have not like nature of Sacraments with Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The Sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them.

And in such only as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation:⁵ but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as Saint Paul saith.

Text 1553 ± 1563 - 1571. In distinction from both Anabaptist and Roman views and practices, the Church of England position is set forth.

¹ The order and contents of the Art. were considerably altered in 1563. In 1553 the Art. ran as follows:

(a) Dominus noster Jesus Christus sacramenta numero paucissimis, observatu facilissima, significatione præstantissimis, societatem novi populi colligavit, sicut et Baptismus et Cena Domini (this is from St. Aug., Ep. 54);

(b) the present 4th paragraph, with a passage omitted in 1563 (see note⁴); (c) the present 1st paragraph. In 1563 (a) was omitted, (b) was shortened and put last, (c) was put in the forefront, and two new paragraphs were placed between (c) and (b).

² The words in Italics come from Art. 9 of the 13 Arts. of 1538, and this drew largely from Art. 13 of the C. of A.

³ 1553, "per verbum Dei"; 1563, "a Christo."

⁴ 1563, inserted here "quomodo nec Pœnitentia"; omitted 1571.

⁵ In 1553 these words were read here:

Idque non ex opere (ut quidam loquuntur) operato; quæ vox ut peregrina est et sacris literis ignota, sic parit sensum minime pium sed admodum superstitiosum. (See SACRAMENT, § 7.)

And yet not that of the worke wrought, as some men speake, whiche worde, as it is straunge and unknown to holie Scripture: so it engendred no godlie, but a very superstitious sense.

26. ¹ De vi Institutionum Divinarum, quod eam non tollat malitia Ministrorum.

² Quamvis, in Ecclesia visibili, bonis mali semper sint admixti, atque interdum ministerio Verbi et Sacramentorum administrationi præsent:

tamen, cum non suo, sed Christi Nomine agent, ejusque mandato et auctoritate ministrent, illorum ministerio uti licet, 26. ¹ Of the Unworthiness of the Ministers, which hinder not the effect of the Sacrament.

Although in the visible Church the evil be ever mingled with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the Ministration of the Word and Sacraments, yet forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and cum in Verbo Dei audiendo, tum in Sacramentis percipiendis.

Neque per illorum malitiam, effectus institutorum Christi tollitur, aut gratia donorum Dei minuitur, quoad eos qui fide et rite sibi oblata percipiunt; quæ, propter institutionem Christi et promissionem efficaciam sunt, licet per malos administrantur.

Ad Ecclesiæ tamen disciplinam pertinet, ut in malos ministros inquiratur, accusenturque ab his, qui eorum flagitia noverint, atque tandem, justo convicti judicio, deponantur.

authority, we may use their Ministry, both in hearing the Word of God, and in receiving of the Sacraments.

Neither is the effect of Christ's ordinance taken away by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such as by faith and rightly do receive the Sacraments ministered unto them; which be effectual, because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men.

Nevertheless, it appertaineth to the discipline of the Church, that inquiry be made of evil Ministers, and that they be accused by those that have knowledge of their offences; and finally being found guilty, by just judgment be deposed.

Text 1553 + 1563 + 1571. Asserts, against an Anabaptist view, that Sacraments are effectual although ministered by evil men.

¹ Title, 1553 = 1563: Ministrorum malitia non tollit efficaciam institutionum divinarum.

The wickednesse of the Ministeres dooeth not take awaie the effectuall operation of Goddes ordinances.

² The words in Italics come from Art. 5 of the 13 Arts. of 1538, which is in its turn based upon Art. 8 of the C. of A.

³ 1553, "eos"; 1563, "malos ministros."

⁴ 1553 = 1563, "soche"; 1571, "evil ministers."

27. De Baptismo.

Baptismus non est tantum professionis signum, ac discriminis nota, qua Christiani a non Christianis discernantur; sed etiam est signum regenerationis, per quod, ² tanquam per instrumentum, recte baptismum suscipientes, Ecclesiæ inseruntur; promissiones de remissione peccatorum, atque adoptione nostra in filios Dei per Spiritum Sanctum, visibiliter obsequantur, fides confirmatur, et vi divinæ invocationis gratia augetur.

³ Baptismus parvulorum omnino in Ecclesia retinendus est, ut qui cum Christi institutione optime congruat.⁴

27. Of Baptism.

Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from other that be not christened, but it is also a sign of Regeneration or new Birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive Baptism rightly are grafted into the Church;

the promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God¹ by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; Faith is confirmed, and Grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God.² The Baptism of young Children is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ.³

Text 1553 + 1563 = 1571. States the teaching of the Church in view of Anabaptist teachings.

¹ "By the Holy Ghost" added in 1563.

² The words in Italics seem to be taken from the C. of A.,

Art. 5, which says that "per verbum et sacramenta, tanquam per instrumenta, donatur Spiritus Sanctus."

2.3 1553:

Mos Ecclesie baptizandi parvulos et laudandus et omnino in Ecclesia retinendus.

Altered 1563.

28. De Cena Domini.

Cena Domini non est tantum signum mutue benevolentie Christianorum inter sese; verum potius est Sacramentum nostrae, per mortem Christi, redemptionis.

Atque adeo, rite, digne et cum fide sumentibus, Panis, quem frangimus, est communicatio Corporis Christi; similiter Poculum benedictionis est communicatio Sanguinis Christi.

Panis et vini transubstantiatio in Eucharistia ex sacris literis probari non potest, sed apertis Scripturæ verbis adversatur; ¹Sacramenti naturam evertit, et multarum superstitionum dedit occasionem.

²Corpus Christi datur, accipitur, et manducatur, in Cena, tantum coelesti et spirituali ratione. Medium autem, quo corpus Christi accipitur et manducatur in Cena fides est.

Sacramentum Eucharistiae, ex institutione Christi, non servabatur, circumferebatur, elevabatur, nec adorabatur.

Text 1553 \mp 1563 = 1571. Sets forth the teaching of the Church and Roman error.

¹⁻² Added in 1563.

³ This par. was substituted in 1563 for that of 1553, which ran as follows:

Quum naturæ humanæ veritas requirat, ut unus ejusdemque hominis corpus in multis locis simul esse non possit, sed in uno aliquo et definito loco esse oporteat, idcirco Christi corpus, in multis et diversis locis, eodem tempore, præsens esse non potest.

Et quoniam, ut tradunt sacrae literæ, Christus in Cælum fuit subleatus, et ibi usque ad finem seculi esse permansurus, non debet quisquam fideliū carnis ejus et sanguinis Realem et Corporalem (ut loquuntur)

The custome of the Church to christen yonge children is to bee commended, and in any wise to bee retained in the Church.

28. Of the Lord's Supper.

The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather is a Sacrament of our Redemption by Christ's death;

insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith, receive the same, the Bread which we break is a partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of Bread and Wine) in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, ¹ overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, ² and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

³ The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the Body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is Faith.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

Text 1553 \mp 1563 = 1571. In view of Anabaptist

Forasmuch as the truth of mannes nature requirith that the body of one and the self-same manne cannot be at one time in diverse places, but must needs be in some one certaine place: Therefore the bodie of Christ cannot bee presente at one time in many and diverse places.

And because (as holie Scripture doeth teache) Christ was taken up into heaven, and there shall continue unto the ende of the worlde, a faithfull man ought not, either to beleve or openlie to confesse the reall and bodilie præsentiam in Eucharistia vel credere vel profiteri.

29. De Manducatione Corporis Christi, et impios illud non manducare.

Impii, et fide viva destituti, licet carnaliter et visibiliter (ut Augustinus loquitur¹) Corporis et Sanguinis Christi Sacramentum dentibus premant, nullo tamen modo Christi participes efficiuntur.

Sed potius tantæ rei Sacramentum, seu symbolum, ad judicium sibi manducant et bibunt.

Text (1563 MSS.) 1571. Asserts that the thing signified can only be received by the faithful and repudiates the Roman theory. This Art. is found in the Parker MS. signed by him, Jan. 29, 1563, and in two English MSS. of the same date, but it is not in the printed edition of 1563, and was probably omitted by the authority of the Queen for conciliatory reasons. It was reintroduced at the revision of 1571 after the schism with Rome had become complete.

¹ In Joann. Tract. 28 18.

30. De utraque Specie.

Calix Domini laicis non est denegandus; utraque enim pars Domini Sacramenti, ex Christi institutione et præcepto, omnibus Christianis ex æquo administrari debet.

Text 1563 = 1571. Repudiates the Roman practice.

31. De unica Christi Oblatione in Cruce perfecta.

Oblatio Christi, semel facta, perfecta est redemption, propitiatio, et satisfactio pro omnibus peccatis totius mundi, tam originalibus, quam actualibus. Neque præter illam unicam, est ulla alia pro peccatis expiatio; unde Missarum sacrificia, quibus, vulgo dicebatur, sacerdotem offerre Christum in remissionem poenæ aut culpæ, pro vivis et defunctis, ² blasphemæ figmenta sunt, et perniciosæ imposturæ.

Text 1553, 1563 (alt.), 1571 (alt.). Asserts the uniqueness and sufficiency of the one oblation of Christ and repudiates "the sacrifices of masses."

¹⁻² Title, 1553, "perfect . . . made."

presence (as thel terme it) of Christes fleshe and bloude, in the Sacramente of the Lordes Supper.

29. Of the Wicked which do not eat the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper.

The Wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as Saint Augustine saith¹) the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ; but rather, to their condemnation, do eat and drink the sign or Sacrament of so great a thing.

Text (1563 MSS.) 1571. Asserts that the thing signified can only be received by the faithful and repudiates the Roman theory. This Art. is found in the Parker MS. signed by him, Jan. 29, 1563, and in two English MSS. of the same date, but it is not in the printed edition of 1563, and was probably omitted by the authority of the Queen for conciliatory reasons. It was reintroduced at the revision of 1571 after the schism with Rome had become complete.

¹ In Joann. Tract. 28 18.

30. Of both kinds.

The Cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the Lay-people:

for both the parts of the Lord's Sacrament, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike.

Text 1563 = 1571. Repudiates the Roman practice.

31. Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross.

The Offering of Christ ²once made is the perfect redemption, ³ propitiation, and satisfaction, for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said, that the Priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or ⁴ guilt, were ⁵ blasphemous fables, and dangerous deceits.

- ¹ 1553 and 1563, "made ones for ever."
² 1553 and 1563, "the pacifying of Goddes displeasure."
³ 1553, "sinne."
⁴ 1553, "figmenta," "forged fables"; "1563, "blasphema" added in Latin; 1571, "blasphemous fables."

32. ¹ De Conjugio Sacerdotum.

² Episcopis, presbyteris, et diaconis, nullo mandato divino præceptum est, ut aut coelibatum voveant, aut a matrimonio absterneant. Licet igitur etiam illis, ut ceteris omnibus Christianis, ubi hoc ad pietatem magis facere judicaverint, pro suo arbitratu matrimonium contrahere.

Text 1553, re-written 1563 = 1571. Asserts the liberty of the clergy and repudiates the Roman rule of celibacy.

¹ Title, 1553, Coelibatus ex verbo Dei præcipitur nemini: The state of single life is commanded to no man by the worde of God; altered 1563.

² 1553, the text of the Article was as follows:

Episcopis, Presbyteris et Diaconis non est mandatum ut coelibatum voveant: nequa jure divino coguntur matrimonio abstinere.

32. ¹ Of the Marriage of Priests.

² Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, are not commanded by God's Law, either to vow the estate of single life, or to abstain from marriage: therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve better to godliness.

33. ¹ De Excommunicatis vitandis.

Qui per publicam Ecclesiæ denuntiationem rite ab unitate Ecclesiæ præcisus est, et excommunicatus, is ab universa fidelium multitudine (donec per poenitentiam publice reconciliatus fuerit arbitrio judicis competentis) habendus est tanquam ethnicus et publicanus.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Asserts the right of the Church to exercise discipline.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563: Excommunicati vitandi sunt.

33. ¹ Of excommunicate Persons, how they are to be avoided.

That person which by open denunciation of the Church is rightly cut off from the unity of the Church, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful, as an Heathen and Publican, until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the Church by a Judge that hath authority thereunto.

Excommunicate persones are to bee avoided.

34. ¹ De Traditionibus Ecclesiasticis.

² Traditiones atque caeremonias easdem non omnino necessarium est esse ubique, aut prorsus consimiles. Nam et varia semper fuerunt, et mutari possunt, pro regionum, temporum, et morum diversitate, modo nihil contra Verbum Dei instituitur.

34. ¹ Of the Traditions of the Church.

It is not necessary that Traditions and Ceremonies be in all places one, and utterly like; for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word.

Traditiones et caeremonias Ecclesiasticas, quæ cum Verbo Dei non pugnant, et sunt auctoritate publica institutæ atque probatæ, quisquis privato consilio, volens, et data opera, publice violaverit, is, ut qui peccat in publicum ordinem Ecclesiæ, quique lædit auctoritatem Magistratus, et qui infirmorum fratrum conscientias vulnerat, publice, ut ceteri timeant, arguendus est.

⁴ Qualibet Ecclesia particularis, sive nationalis, auctoritatem habet instituendi, mutandi, aut abrogandi caeremonias, aut ritus Ecclesiasticos, humana tantum auctoritate institutos, modo omnia ad ædificationem fiant.

Text 1553 + 1563 = 1571. Asserts (1) the right of the national church, as against the Romanists, to make changes, (2) the duty of loyalty to the Church on the part of all her members.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Traditiones ecclesiasticæ: Traditions of the Church.

² The words in Italics come from Art. 5, De ecclesia, of the 13 Arts. of 1538.

³ "Temporum," "times," added in 1563.

⁴ The last par. was added in 1563. Cp. a set of 24 Arts. in Latin drawn up by Parker in 1559 (see Hardwick, p. 118, note 4).

35. ¹ De Homiliis.

² Tomus secundus Homiliarum, quarum singulos titulos huic articulo subjunximus, continet piam et salutarem doctrinam, et his temporibus necessariam, non minus quam prior tomus Homiliarum, quæ editæ sunt tempore Edwardi sexti; itaque eas in Ecclesiis per ministros diligenter, et clare, ut a populo intelligi possint, recitandas esse judicavimus.

35. ¹ Of Homilies.

² The second Book of Homilies, the several titles whereof we have joined under this Article, doth contain a godly and wholesome Doctrine, and necessary for these times, as doth the former Book of Homilies, which were set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth; and therefore we judge them to be read in Churches by the Ministers, diligently and distinctly, that they may be understood of the people.

³ DE NOMINIBUS HOMILIARUM.

*Of the right Use of the Church
 Against peril of Idolatry
 Of repairing and keeping clean of Churches
 Of good Works: first of Fasting*

OF THE NAMES OF THE HOMILIES.

1. Of the right Use of the Church
2. Against peril of Idolatry
3. Of repairing and keeping clean of Churches
4. Of good Works: first of Fasting

OF THE NAMES OF THE HOMILIES—contd.

Against Gluttony and Drunkenness
 Against Excess of Apparel
 Of Prayer
 Of the Place and Time of Prayer
 That Common Prayers and Sacraments ought to be ministered in a known Tongue.
 Of the reverend Estimation of God's Word.
 Of Alms-doing
 Of the Nativity of Christ
 Of the Passion of Christ
 Of the Resurrection of Christ
 Of the worthy receiving of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ
 Of the Gifts of the Holy Ghost
 For the Rogation-days
 Of the State of Matrimony
 Of Repentance
 Against Idleness
 Against Rebellion

5. Against Gluttony and Drunkenness
 6. Against Excess of Apparel
 7. Of Prayer
 8. Of the Place and Time of Prayer
 9. That Common Prayers and Sacraments ought to be ministered in a known Tongue.
 10. Of the reverend Estimation of God's Word
 11. Of Alms-doing
 12. Of the Nativity of Christ
 13. Of the Passion of Christ
 14. Of the Resurrection of Christ
 15. Of the worthy receiving of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ
 16. Of the Gifts of the Holy Ghost
 17. For the Rogation-days
 18. Of the State of Matrimony
 19. Of Repentance
 20. Against Idleness
 21. Against Rebellion

Text (1553), re-written 1563 + 1571. Makes provision for the instruction of the people in sound doctrine.

¹ Title, 1553, Homiliae, Homilies; 1563, Catalogus Homiliarum.

² 1553, the Text ran as follows:

Homiliae nuper Ecclesiae Anglicanae per Injunctiones regiae traditae atque commendatae, plae sunt atque salutares, doctrinamque ab omnibus amplectendam continent: quare populo diligenter, expedit, clareque recitandae sunt.

Thomelies of late geven and set out by the kinges authoritie, be godlie and wholesome, containing doctrine to be received of all menne, and therefore are to be readde to the people diligente, distinctlie and plainlie.

³ 1563, Catalogus Homiliarum. Titles given in Latin.

⁴ Added in 1571 (the homily having just been issued).

36. ¹ De Episcoporum et Ministrorum Consecratione.

Libellus de Consecratione Archiepiscoporum et Episcoporum, et de Ordinatione Presbyterorum et Diaconorum, editus nuper temporibus Edwardi VI et auctoritate Parliamenti illis ipsis temporibus confirmatus, omnia ad ejusmodi consecrationem et ordinationem necessaria continet; et nihil habet, quod, ex se, sit aut superstitiosum, aut impium.

Itaque, quicunque juxta

36. ¹ Of Consecration of Bishops and Ministers.

The Book of Consecration of Archbishops and Bishops, and Ordering of Priests and Deacons, lately set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth, and confirmed at the same time by authority of Parliament, doth contain all things necessary to such Consecration and Ordering:

neither hath it any thing, that of itself is superstitious and ungodly.

And therefore whosoever ritus illius libri consecrati aut ordinati sunt, ab anno secundo praedicti regis Edwardi, usque ad hoc tempus, aut in posterum juxta eosdem ritus consecrabuntur, aut ordinabuntur, rite, ordine, atque legitime, statuimus esse, et fore, consecratos et ordinatos.

Text (1553), re-written 1563 = 1571. Asserts the validity of Anglican Orders against (1) extreme Reformers, (2) Romanists.

¹ Title, 1553, De Libro Precationum et caeremoniarum Ecclesiae Anglicanae: Of the booke of Pralers and Ceremonies of the Church of Englande.

² The text in 1553 ran as follows:

Libro qui nuperrime auctoritate Regis et Parliamenti Ecclesiae Anglicanae traditus est, continens modum et formam orandi, et sacramenta administrandi in Ecclesia Anglicana: similiter et libellus eadem auctoritate editus de ordinatione ministrorum Ecclesiae, quoad doctrinae veritatem, plii sunt et salutaris doctrinae Evangelii in nullo repugnant sed congruunt et eandem non parum promovent et illustant, atque ideo ab omnibus Ecclesiae Anglicanae fidelibus membris, et maxime a ministris verbi cum omni promptitudine animorum et gratiarum actione, recipiendi, approbandi et populo Dei commendandi sunt.

are consecrate or ordered according to the Rites of that Book, since the second year of the fore-named King Edward unto this time, or hereafter shall be consecrated or ordered according to the same Rites;

we decree all such to be rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated and ordered.

The booke whiche of very late time was geven to the Church of Englande by the Kinges authoritie, and the Parliamente, containing the maner and fourme of pralyng and ministring the Sacramentes in the Church of Englande, likewise also the booke of ording Ministers of the Church, set forth by the foresaied auctoritie are godlie and in no poyncte repugnant to the holosome doctrine of the Gospel but agreeable ther-unto, furthering and beautifying the same not a litle, and therefore of al faithful members of the Church of Englande, and chieffe of the ministers of the Worde, thei ought to be received and allowed with all readnesse of minde and thankesgeving, and to be commended to the people of God.

37. De Civilibus Magistratibus.

¹ Regia Majestas in hoc Angliae regno, ac ceteris ejus dominiis, summam habet potestatem, ad quam omnium statuum hujus regni, sive illi Ecclesiastici sint, sive Civiles, in omnibus causis, suprema gubernatio pertinet: et nulli externae jurisdictioni est subjecta, nec esse debet.

² Cum Regiae Majestati summam gubernationem tribuimus (quibus titulis intelligimus, animos quorundam calumniatorum offendi), non damus Regibus nostris aut Verbi Dei, aut Sacramentorum, administrationem; quod etiam Injunctiones, ab Elisabetha Regina nostra

37. Of the Civil Magistrates.

¹ The King's Majesty hath the chief power in this Realm of England, and other his Dominions, unto whom the chief Government of all Estates of this Realm, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Civil, in all causes doth appertain, and is not, nor ought to be, subject to any foreign Jurisdiction.

Where we attribute to the King's Majesty the chief government, by which Titles we understand the minds of some slanderous folks to be offended; we give not to our Princes the ministering either of God's Word, or of the Sacraments, the which thing the Injunctions also lately set nuper editæ, apertissime testantur :

sed eam tantum prærogativam, quam in sacris Scripturis, a Deo ipso, omnibus piis Principibus videmus semper fuisse attributam; hoc est, ut omnes status atque ordines, fidei suæ a Deo commissos, sive illi Ecclesiastici sint, sive Civiles, in officio continentur; et contumaces ac delinquentes gladio civili coerceantur.

Romanus pontifex nullam habet jurisdictionem in hoc regno Angliæ.¹

Leges civiles possunt Christianos, propter capitalia et gravia crimina, morte punire.

Christianis licet et ex mandato magistratus arma portare, et iusta bella administrare.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Asserts Royal as opposed to Papal supremacy.

¹ 1553, the first par. ran as follows :

Rex Angliæ est supremum caput in terris, post Christum, Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ et Hibernicæ.

1563 and 1571, "the Queen's majesty," and so throughout.

² The 2nd par. added in 1563.

³ Here followed in 1553 the following :

Magistratus civilis est a Deo ordinatus atque probatus, quomobrem illi, non solum propter iram, sed etiam propter conscientiam, obediendum est.

forth by Elisabeth our Queen doth most plainly testify;

but that only prerogative, which we see to have been given always to all godly Princes in holy Scriptures by God himself; that is, that they should rule all estates and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evildoers.

The Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this Realm of England.¹

The Laws of the Realm may punish Christian men with death, for heinous and grievous offences.

It is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the Magistrate, to wear weapons, and serve in the wars.

The King of Englands is supreme head in earth, nexte under Christe, of the Church of Englands and Irelande.

and so throughout.

The civile Magistrate is ordeined and allowed of God: wherefore we must obeie him, not only for feare of punishment, but also for conscience sake.

38. ¹ De illicita Bonorum Communicatione.

Facultates et bona Christianorum non sunt communia, quoad jus et possessionem, ut quidam Anabaptistæ falso jactant.

Debet tamen quisque, de his quæ possidet, pro facultatum ratione, pauperibus eleemosynas benigne distribuere.

38. ¹ Of Christian men's Goods, which are not common.

The Riches and Goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast.

Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesseth, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against Anabaptists.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563:

Christianorum bona non sunt communia.

Christien mennes gooddes are not commune.

39. ¹ De Jurejurando.
Quemadmodum juramentum vanum et temerarium a Domino nostro Jesu Christo, et Apostolo 39. ¹ Of a Christian man's Oath.

As we confess that vain and rash Swearing is forbidden Christian ejus Jacobo, Christianis hominibus interdictum esse fatemur :

ita Christianorum Religionem minime prohibere censemus, quin, jubente magistratu, in causa fidei et caritatis jurare liceat, modo id fiat juxta Prophetæ doctrinam, in justitia, in judicio, et veritate.²

Text 1553 = 1563 = 1571. Against the Anabaptists.

¹ Title, 1553 and 1563, Licet Christianis jurare :

Christien menne male take an Othe.

² Four Arts. followed in 1553, which were omitted in 1563:— viz. 39. The Resurrection of the dead is not yet brought to passe. 40. The soules of them that departe this life doe neither die with the bodies nor sleep idle. 41. Hereticks called Millenarij. 42. All men shall not bee saved at the length.

CONFIRMATIO ARTICULORUM.

Hic liber antedictorum Articulorum jam denuo approbatus est, per assensum et consensum Serenissimæ Reginæ Elisabethæ, Dominae nostræ, Dei gratia, Angliæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ Reginæ, defensoris fidel, etc., retinendus, et per totum Regnum Angliæ exsequendus. Qui Articuli lecti sunt, et denuo confirmati, subscriptione D. Archiepiscopi et Episcoporum superioris domus, et totius Cleri inferioris domus, in Convocatione, Anno Domini, MDLXXI.

THE RATIFICATION.

This Book of Articles before rehearsed, is again approved, and allowed to be holden and executed within the Realm, by the assent and consent of our Sovereign Lady Elisabeth, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, etc. Which Articles were deliberately read, and confirmed again by the subscription of the hands of the Archbishop and Bishops of the Upper-house, and by the subscription of the whole Clergy of the Nether-house in their Convocation, in the Year of our Lord 1571.

—U4.

J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

ARTS AND CRAFTS.—There can be no doubt that a spirit of understanding the worth of an old parish ch. as enshrining the life of bygone generations and the spirit of the times past is now abroad. Men who find their old houses of pr. in need of repair do not now set about restoration, but attempt to conserve the old. Very slowly too the ch. furniture shop, as a kind of forlorn hope of the decorators of new ch. buildings, is giving way to the idea that ch. furnishings are not so much to be matters of catalogue and contract as matters of careful thought, and, if possible, should be the work of local hands, or hands at any rate with personal feeling for the beauty of God's house in the particular place where it has been built. In many parts of the country nowadays, the carving of some part of the interior of a ch. is the work of a carving class in the village. The village smith is called upon for a bit of iron-work here, the village stone-mason for the shaping of altar steps or font there, the frontal is embroidered by some lady of the parish. All this is as it ought to be; but how has it come about?

It has come about because of a revival of interest in the forms and spirit of mediæval architecture which began to take place at the end of the 18th cent., but did not become active till near the middle of last century. The Tractarian movement, though in the first place it was an ecclesiastical revival dealing with religious theory and Ch. doctrines, soon began to concern itself with the externals of religion. The æsthetics of public worship were revolutionised; mediæval usage became the recognised standard of taste, and as an effect of this the study of the art and architecture of the Middle Ages was not only largely increased, but also lost much of the character of dilettantism it had possessed as long as no practical result was expected from it. Placed on a more scientific basis by architects, it spread amongst the clergy and educated classes of the community in ever-widening circles until an interest in Gothic art became a popular form of refined enjoyment. In the year 1846, the Ecclesiological Society was formed out of the Cambridge Camden Society; it had as its objects the study of all matters relating to ch. architecture, ritual, music, wall-paintings, and in short whatever might be held to contribute to the greater dignity and beauty of churches. Other archaeological societies with kindred aims were founded in many places, and this influence rapidly spread and gathered strength. The interest in mediæval art was thus brought out of the theoretic stage.

2. Its Origin and History.

The result of this was a desire to rescue from dilapidation and decay a large number of parish chs. But zeal outran knowledge. Nothing would serve but to bring back the buildings to perfect completeness, and the restorer instead of the repairer was let loose, to the destruction of much of the real life and vitality of the buildings. Men were content with modern copies of what they believed the original builders had intended, and vital and most valuable records of the past gave way to modern reproductions that were often of little value. These restorers were academic in their knowledge, and often prejudiced in favour of this or that particular style of Gothic. They forgot that these village chs. were records of the life of workmen whose conditions made the buildings what they were, and who had left behind only the stones to tell us of that life. As William Morris put it in his address to the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings in 1884:—"We know the beauty of the weathered and time-worn surface of an ancient building, and have all of us felt the grief of seeing this surface disappear under the hands of a 'restorer.' But though we all feel this deeply enough, some of us perhaps may be puzzled to explain to the outside world the full value of this ancient surface. It is not merely that it is in itself picturesque and beautiful, though that is a great deal; neither is it only that there is a sentiment attaching to the very face which the original builders gave their work, but dimly conscious all the while of the many generations which should gaze on it; it is only a part of its value that the stones are felt to be, as Mr. Ruskin beautifully puts it, speaking of some historic French building, now probably changed into an academic model of its real self, that they are felt to be 'the very stones which the eyes of St. Louis saw lifted into their places.' That sentiment is much, but it is not all; nay, it is but a part of the especial value to which I wish to-day to call your attention, which value briefly is, that the untouched surface of ancient architecture bears witness to the development of man's ideas, to the continuity of history, and, so doing, affords never-ceasing instruction, nay education, to the passing generations, not only telling us what were the aspirations of men passed away, but also what we may hope for in the time to come."

It is thus that Morris preached and we must plead for letting well alone. For not only do we feel that the surface of an ancient building, the handling of the old handicraftsman, is so invaluable to us, but we also feel that the work done under the conditions in which the old handicraftsman lived cannot be done now, and that any attempt to reproduce it must result in a lifeless imitation, and at the same time destroy for us the charm of art and the historic memorial of bygone times. "No man," adds Morris, "and no body of men, however learned they may be in ancient art, whatever skill in design or love of beauty they may have, can persuade or bribe or force our workmen of to-day to do their work in the same way as the workmen of King Edward I did theirs." If only the restorers of our cathedrals and chs. during the last sixty years had realised this, we should have had our cathedrals and chs. put into sound repair, kept stable and durable, but we should not have had to mourn the irreparable harm done to them as records of life, and thought, feeling, and history, of bygone generations of men.

3. Repair, not Restoration.

If it be asked what are the differences between those who desire the restoration of our ancient buildings and those who desire their conservation, we can but reply as Mr. Thackeray Turner replied in his valuable Introduction to the Notes on the repairs of ancient buildings issued by his Society:—"The restorer professes to be able to bring an ancient building back to its original condition and appearance by faithfully and minutely reproducing all that has been lost and destroyed, and by making the new work resemble the old as nearly as possible. Now we know that the result of putting this doctrine into effect has been to rob the majority of our ancient chs. of their true expression, and to make some of them caricatures of the old inspiration. They resemble pictures which have been repainted and improved until the beautiful evidences of age and the power of the master's hand have been almost obliterated." It is not too much to say that the restorer is a forger, and the cleverer the restoration the cleverer the forgery. And to forge demoralises, just as to oblige a man to go on making copies he does not understand demoralises the workman.

But the chief reason against this craze for restoration is one William Morris, by his careful survey of the conditions of a workman's life throughout the Middle Ages to the present day, showed clearly enough, viz. :—that the essential and joy-producing fact of a real artistic work is the personal touch of the warm hand and warm heart of the workman. This personal touch is the outcome of the spirit of the age the workman lives in, and is conditioned by his manner of life and his surroundings. The qualities and influences that made a good workman in the 13th and 14th cents. have passed away, and, till they return, the good work of that time, with its power to impress us and inform our spirits, cannot return either. If we are asked why we cannot possibly reproduce the work of the Middle Ages, we answer that the workers did their work not knowing many of them that they were artists, but having real joy in their work, and real power and freedom to express themselves and their individualities in it by the work of their hands. They understood as craftsmen what they were about. They worked not so much for pay as for love of the work and for the glory of God and the praise of their fellow-men. They worked with tools that have been superseded by machinery; they left the impression of their minds each day upon the work of their hands. But things have altered. The workman paid by contract, as the builder is paid by contract, knows nothing of the joy of putting his own soul into wood or stone, but works blindly to pattern by the piece as the architect supplies him the working drawings. It does not matter to him if the work is base or noble, beautiful or ugly. All he has to do is to get through a certain amount of work in a given time, and get his pay at the week end. We cannot then under such altered conditions reproduce mediæval originality. What we can do is to see that what is repairable or conservable of the old work should be carefully put into repair, and for any new addition that is to be made we must face the altered conditions of life and labour and leave to after generations as vital a record as may be of our own times.

And to the conserving of old buildings without restoration a very powerful adjunct has of late been introduced by using, as has been done at Winchester Cathedral, at the ch. of Holy Trinity in Hull, and on the towers and walls of Chester, the grouting machine. By means of this machine, without touching the outside skin or wall coating, there can be blown under hydraulic pressure into the wall, which is so decayed in its interior as to be about to fall, a jet or jets of fine Portland cement of the consistency of cream, which percolates through the mass, and when it sets turns the whole fabric into a solid monolith of stone. If certain conditions of cleaning the wall stones by hydraulic pressure of water are first observed, this method, so far as the report of one of our ablest engineers goes, has never been known to fail.

But why should we so care to preserve the beauty of our old parish chs.—why should we care to have beautiful chs. at all?

4. Office of Beauty in Religion.

The answer is that the instinctive love of the beautiful in man given to us by God is conjoined with the gift of his own nature to us that makes us desire to create the beautiful, and to offer it to him who is the fountain-head of "all things bright and beautiful." Thus, men desiring to praise God feel that they can best do this by giving of their best to him in praise of the Creator. David's desire to build a temple at Jerusalem exceeding magnifical, notwithstanding that "God. . . dwelleth not in temples made with hands," and that the "heaven of heavens cannot contain" him, is linked on to the desire of Pheidias and Praxiteles when the Parthenon rose in honour of the goddess on the Athenian hill. And the desire of the merchants of Liverpool who are building their cathedral embodies one thought, to give the most beautiful things they can imagine or achieve as the works of their hands to the glory and praise of the Divine and the help of the people. It does not need to be a sacred building, that is, a building for worship, that embodies this thought. The building for the Rylands Library at Manchester, as much as the building of the chapel for the Order of the Knights of the Thistle at St. Giles', Edinburgh, is the outcome of the same desire, praise to God and the service of men.

Where the gift of the Parthenon to the people differed from the gift of the ch. of St. Pudenziana at Rome in the 4th cent., and of the Baptistery and Sant' Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna in the 5th cent., was, that in the one the work of a slave class had reared the building at the inspiration of a master architect mind and at the cost of the leisured classes with the idea not only of honouring the goddess but of winning great glory for the city; while in the case of the chs. and those glorious mosaics of St. Pudenziana at Rome, the Baptistery and Sant' Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna, the workers, still probably in the condition of slaves to wealthy masters, worked at a building in which they felt, as one in Christ, they had a common interest, and whose glory should not be for the municipality but for the great invisible Lord Christ, whose they were and whom they worshipped as brothers one of another. The whole idea of that early decoration was to show the Lord in glory, and to honour the saintly lives of those who being recalled to mind might inspire the worshippers to follow in their steps.

The liturgical, doctrinal and allusive combination which began in the Catacombs was carried right through to the Middle Ages with a distinctly didactic purpose. This was sometimes mysterious and symbolic, while sometimes mere representation of facts in the life and death of the Lord predominated; but the idea of a Gospel message to the heart of the worshipper was never absent.

The old saying of Quintilian that "pictures are the books of those who cannot read" was really the foundation of the decoration of all the chs. from the 5th cent. onward. The movement begun by St. Nilus, of making the walls of a ch. a kind of picture Bible, gained impetus from St. Gregory the Great in the 6th cent., and his recommendation that "paintings in chs. should be used that the illiterate might behold upon the walls what they were unable to read in a book" was the basis for this decoration of chs. right up to and on through the mediæval period. The colour scheme led up to the east end and was subordinated to the glories of Paradise that were thereon depicted. It was not till the 10th cent. that the western wall was decorated, and then it was generally utilised for display of the Last Judgment and the terrors of Hell. It is to be noted that in all the early mosaics the Christ is not represented as suffering but as triumphant.

5. The Teaching Power of Art.

It was left for painters of the 12th and 13th cents. to depict the agonies of the Christ and to magnify the horrors of Hell. The fact was that, as religion became unhealthy, pictures became unhealthy, too. And it was not till the revival of a truer teaching by the mystics in Germany and by St. Francis of Assisi in Italy, not till Meister Wilhelm and Giotto were inspired by God to help their time, that the decorative pictures and carvings in the chs. became again healthy in tone and tender and human and true. I do not forget that Orcagna could paint, as he did in the Campo Santo at Pisa, an impressive scene of the Last Judgment that offends against no canon of taste, but I am bound to remember that Luca Signorelli at Orvieto, by his depicting of the physical torture of the damned, makes one wish that he had never been commanded to paint the subject and carry out the wishes of a hierarchy who honestly enough believed that men could be scared to Heaven by fear of Hell, though they could not be led thither by love.

One of the great helps to the decoration of chs., the building and beautifying of the houses of God throughout Europe, was provided that artisans who entered the order were to continue working at their crafts, and one historian of the same period, Ordericus Vitalis, tells us that, when the founder of a certain monastery bade all who joined it continue the practice of their arts, "there gathered about him freely craftsmen both in wood and iron, carvers and goldsmiths, painters and stonemasons, and others skilled in all manner of cunning work." Anyone who has visited the cells of San Marco at Florence knows how the monastic life as shown us by the hands of Fra Angelico realises the need of art and the naturalness of its demand upon the lives of men. "The mediæval artist's work," as has been well said, "exalted the practice of the crafts that produce beautiful things as not only a function of human nature, but a law of the universe at large."

6. Monks often Artists.

the fact that the monastic life from the first, for all its austerities and sometimes for all its Puritanism, as in the case of the reformed Benedictine orders beginning with the Cluniacs of the 10th cent., insisted on using its hands. Bede tells us that in the Celtic monastery at Bangor near Chester two thousand inmates lived by the work of their hands. St. Bernard in the 12th cent.

The monkish craftsmen of the 11th cent. and the Gothic masons and carvers of the 13th cent. offered all they could make or do on the altar of Christian service. Theirs was the gift of beauty to the Creator of all beauty—a grateful rendering back of the boon so lavishly bestowed, the gift of skill and care to the inventive brain and cunning hand. Life without art appeared to those men impossible, and herein lies the great gulf that divides them from us; and the fact that we are content to worship in unlovely buildings, or at most to fill them with cheap upholstery and machine-made fittings, is not the result of a Puritan revolt against Romish doctrines, but arises from the fact that with us artistic work and artistic decoration are a kind of extra, a sort of varnish that rich men can pay for, and are not felt to be an inevitable and necessary part of the worshippers' lives.

We are enabled to know from the writings of an 11th cent. Ruskin, a certain German Benedictine monk, Theophilus, who was a practical craftsman in metal and wood and stone, and who expounded his views of art and artistic culture and practice in a treatise of three books entitled Schedula Diversarum Artium, something of the spirit to which we owe the art movement which culminated in the glories of the Gothic cathedral and the masterly perfection of mediæval workmanship. "Man," says he, "was made in the image of God, in the similitude of the Divine Artist who fashioned the world, and he is bound to make his resemblance to the Divine as real and effective as he can." Knowledge of art "is not the private possession of any one individual, but is a trust from God which the skilled person holds for the benefit of his fellows." For which reason, Theophilus declares he is ready to offer to all who desire humbly to learn, as freely as he has himself received it, all the gift of the Divine grace—this gift being the knowledge of the technical processes of the arts which he then goes on to unfold. He urges the artist "to believe that the Spirit of God has filled his heart, and will direct him by the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost."

7. A Mediæval Craftsman.

No more effective apologia for the cultivation of art has appeared till Ruskin's day than the assertion of the monk Theophilus, that the love of what is beautiful is part of human nature and that the creation of what is beautiful is part of the law of the universe at large. Look at creation, he says. "It is the work of an artist, who has made all things beautiful in their season. He has gifted you, too, with a portion of His own nature, has formed you an artist, and you are bound in service to Him to exercise your creative power and make the most of your affinity with what is beautiful. In the name of religion take up the brush and tongs and mallet, and spare not cost nor labour till the House of God that you build shall shine like the very fields of Paradise." He is urging that an abbey ch. ought in its beauty to be a match, as it were, to the beauty of the universe. "The ch.," he says, "is to be so decorated on ceiling and walls as to present the appearance of the Heavenly Garden. It will seem to be blooming with all kinds of flowers, and green with leaves and grass like the celestial fields where the blessed ones receive their crowns. The ceiling will be flowered like an embroidered robe, the wall resemble a garden, the windows send in a flood of variously coloured light." Nor will the fabric alone be decorated. The fittings and apparatus, including all the vessels for the service of the sanctuary, will be as beautiful as can be made. Theophilus is so preoccupied with his desire for beauty in decoration that his treatise speaks little about art as representative. Notwithstanding, upon the walls will be displayed, he suggests, the passion of the Lord, touching the heart of the worshipper, or the suffering of the saints will be movingly depicted. If the joys of Heaven are displayed at one end of the building, and at the other the torments of the regions of the lost, he hopes that the spectator will take cheer from the thought of good actions and be terrified at the remembrance of his sins.

Those of us who have visited the French cathedrals of Chartres, or Amiens, or Rheims, will see that Theophilus' conception of Christian art was realised with completeness and splendour in the French Gothic cathedral in the age of St. Louis, and, though we can have little conception to-day of the glory of the interiors glancing with golden colour and hung with gorgeous eastern stuffs, as St. Louis would see them, we know enough from the decorative sculpture that still remains to us in these cathedrals, or in such effigies in stone or bronze as were achieved by English craftsmen in the 14th cent.—the Queen Eleanor at Westminster Abbey, and King Edward II at Gloucester—that the idea which underlay all the magnificent work of the best mediæval time was not so much to be purely representative, as by its dignity and beauty to bring before our minds the noblest forms and the most spiritual conception of earthly beauty that could be imagined. It would be true to say that at the best time the representative element in art work was always subordinate to direct artistic expression.

We sometimes think that the destruction of the artistic beauty of our places of worship was a necessary part of the Reformation.

8. The Reformation and Art.

The facts are against us. The vandalism that in Switzerland in Luther's time swept the Swiss chs. bare of their pictures, and in Great Britain under the title "monuments of superstition" ruthlessly destroyed artistic treasures of indescribable beauty and perfect innocence, had little or nothing to do with the art feeling of the time. The mere fact that the beauty of this art had been in the service of Rome was enough to make it anathema. And, though it was certain that to the Presbyterian and the Independent whatever of art was embodied in priestly vestments or altar ornament would be anathema, and a too literal interpretation of such a saying of Christ as "Seest thou these great buildings? There shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down," tended to a very narrow view of the dignity and service of art, on the other hand it is to be noticed that in Holland a national art of scriptural pictures was the immediate sequel to the adoption in that country of the principles of the Reformation. No one who has studied the paintings of Rembrandt, his pictures on religious themes from both the OT and NT, or his Christ and Mary Magdalene at Brunswick, or his Christ at Emmaus in the Louvre, or the Return of the Prodigal Son at St. Petersburg, or his Christ Healing the Sick, can help feeling that Protestantism quod Protestantism was not against religious art, and that it was possible, and is possible still, for a great painter to treat the person and the acts of Christ "in a spirit as far removed from mysticism on the one side as from rationalism on the other," in such a way as that the divine majesty of Christ may be as convincingly apparent as his humanity.

Doubtless with Protestantism there has come a change over the minds of men in the matter of what is and what is not healthy religious art. The "liturgical, doctrinal or allusive compositions," which began in the Catacombs and flourished in the form of pictures of the Last Things in the later mediæval period, have ceased largely to have didactic or religious significance, and are looked upon to-day chiefly of value as the embodiment of poetic thought and interpretation. Notwithstanding, we find enshrined in the pictures in St. Paul's by the late G. F. Watts that which will always appeal to the imaginative side of man and not seem out of place in our chs. Devotional pictures such as Fra Angelico painted, and in which the great Christian virtues of humility, purity and devotion are inculcated, will always speak to the hearts of men; and, though it is very unlikely with the fear upon us of Mariolatry that we should ever welcome to our chs. the great devotional pictures of the early schools of religious art in Italy, it is a distinct loss to us that the pictures expressing the special Christian temper of humility and dependence, and revealing to us innocence and love and the spirit of service embodied in Virgin Mother and in saint and angel, which help us in our homes should be banished from our houses of prayer. Nevertheless, we are bound to remember that these paintings belong to a time whose range of religious idea and whose atmosphere has passed away perhaps for ever.

When we come to a third series of paintings, the historical representations of the life of Christ or of OT or NT scenes, we

9. Art in our present Churches.

we feel that here the Ch. of our day might specially find help and helpers. In Post-Reformation as surely as in Pre-Reformation times, to bring home, with convincing force to the spectator, the personality, the significance of the acts of Christ, the deeds of OT heroes and NT saints, is surely part and parcel of the duty of Ch. teaching. Our continually increasing interest in the facts of the past and our desire to bring before the worshippers the actualities of the scenes with which the Gospel narrative was connected demand this. And, whilst, of course, a great artist cannot do this without so secularising or modernising the scene as to rob it of its air of remoteness from the ordinary world, it is more possible for the painter of to-day, with the knowledge of history at his command, to present to us the Christ and his disciples or the heroes of Hebrew history as they were seen and known upon earth than probably has been possible at any other time. What can be done in this direction has been shown to us by the members of the Pre-Raphaelite school, Millais, Rossetti, and Holman Hunt. Anyone who enters St. Paul's and watches the crowds pause before Holman Hunt's great replica of the Light of the World must feel that the Ch. of our time, if it would only make an appeal for such help as the artists of our time might give, would find in such pictorial representations of OT and NT scenes a handmaid to the religious teaching of our day.

Meanwhile it is for us to do what we can, to urge upon other people to look upon a ch. interior as having a message for the souls of the worshippers. A restful sense of quiet harmony of colouring should prevail throughout; whatever of ornament is attempted should have thought in its making and be hand-worked rather than machine-made. Efforts should be made to enlist the handicraft of the neighbourhood in any decorative work. Instead of being content with some costly gift of an altar frontal from a London shop, it should be our aim to show that an altar frontal of great artistic beauty can be made of simple material in our own village. In many parts of England we now have our wood-carving classes. The work of our young men might very well be called forth under proper supervision and design to give richness to some portion of ch. furniture. One thing we must avoid, and that is sham. To plaster the walls of a ch. and to rule lines in the plaster to make it look like blocks of stone ought to be no more possible than the pasting of transparent pictures upon the glass to make pretence of stained-glass windows. But those who have the care of our ch.'s may very well be called upon to provide that whatever is of beauty in them should be visible. I have seen glorious glass in an East End window hidden or the design entirely marred by the determination of a Vicar in charge to erect a reredos against it. I have seen altar candlesticks so placed upon a re-table as entirely to destroy the effect of a fresco by a leading artist of our time and to make the whole decoration appear ridiculous.

Nor will it be out of place to urge the clergy to preserve very carefully whatever possessions of artistic merit or historic handicraft their chs. contain. Not only here, but in America, men are always on the look-out to obtain for museums or for their own collections such valuables. On more than one occasion I have heard of clergymen, urged by pressing need of funds for some parochial purpose, seriously considering an offer for the purchase of a precious Elizabethan Chalice. A real love of handicraft and a reverence for the work of former ages would, of course, make any consideration of such a money bribe impossible. Nor are words too strong to condemn the thoughtlessness that would for present gain entirely put out of court the deed and faith of the donors of past times.

Whilst we do what we can to add to the beauty and the dignity of the interior of a ch., we are also bound to see that our churchyards

10. Art in Churchyards. are properly cared for. As matters are now, for want of this proper care, our graveyards are filled with costly monuments of stone that vie with one another in vulgarity and ugliness. No one with any sense of the beauty of line or carving, or knowledge of proportion, can help being offended as they pass through these machine-made monstrosities, for which the illustrated catalogue of the monument maker is chiefly responsible. Side by side with these, in place of living flowers, one sees grotesque floral wreaths of glass or pottery beneath glass shades that not only disfigure the churchyard but destroy the grass upon which they are laid. It ought to be possible to teach, and have the teaching accepted, that we only dishonour our friends by putting up to their memories anything that is either vulgar in suggestion or ugly in shape. Further, so far as possible, the stones used should be stones of the countryside. Thus, for example, it is neither common sense nor artistic to put up staring white marble which is perishable (for it is only glorified chalk) in a Cumberland or Westmoreland churchyard, whose hills would provide material for tombstones that are harmonious in colour with the countryside, and are in texture everlasting—for the Borrowdale slate never weathers, and a thousand years hence any lettering or carving upon it will be as clear as to-day. Nor can we too often insist that the clump of snowdrops, or daffodils, or primroses, or hyacinths, or a climbing rose, or a rose bush with its yearly gift of beauty of new life, is infinitely more honourable to the dead, and more touching as a memorial from the hand of those who plant it, than the lifeless sham flowers beneath their glass globes.

The best that we can give ought to be given to church and churchyard, if God who gave us the sense of beauty to be used to his praise is to be rightly honoured.—R4.

H. D. RAWNSLEY.

ASCENSION DAY.—See FESTIVAL, § 21; ASCENSION-TIDE (RATIONALE), § 1.

ASCENSION-TIDE, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.

The Ascension of Christ is the climax and completion of His Resurrection. He could not be holden of death, and He could not be withheld from His place unto the Father: when He was risen from the dead this was His message to the Apostles, "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God." He tarried upon earth for forty days for definite purposes—to give proof of the Resurrection, and in the light of that victory to instruct His apostles concerning the Church. The Epistle (Acts 1 1-11) and Gospel (Mark 16 14-20) for Ascension Day tell us simply of the Ascension itself: in both narratives we have the command of the Lord as He is about to be received out of sight: He lays upon His Church the duty of converting the world. The Proper Psalms of this day give praise to God for the exaltation of Christ into the Heavens. The OT Lessons (MP, Dan. 7 9-14; EP, 11 Kings 2 1-13) gather from prophecy and history the promise and type of Christ's Ascension and dominion. In the NT Lessons (MP, Luke 24 44-53; EP, Heb. 4) again we have the narrative of the Ascension, and then the consequent exhortation, "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest," "Let us hold fast our profession," "Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." The Ascension of our Lord is the assurance of our future place in glory: where He is, there we shall also be.

1.
Ascension
Day.

The nine days that follow Ascension Day and bring us to Whitsunday are called days of Expectation. As our Lord on Olivet bade His Apostles tarry in Jerusalem till they should receive the Holy Ghost, so when we reach after.

2.
Sunday

this period of the year we are called to follow our Lord in heart and mind into the Heavens, and then to desire earnestly, and confidently expect, the outpouring of the Holy Ghost. The ministry of the Holy Ghost in the soul is the application to the personal life of the powers and influences of Jesus Christ. In the Epistle (1 Peter 4 7-11) for the Sunday after Ascension Day, St. Peter enjoins that the spiritual gift of every man should be so occupied and exercised as to glorify God. The OT Lessons (MP, Deut. 30; EP, Deut. 34 or Josh. 1) promise mercy to the penitent, and show us that the choice of good or evil lies within our power: by the right use of will we may claim life. It is not God that condemns or forgets any man: the gift of God is offered to our capacity to receive it: the Comforter will dwell in all hearts that have been opened to the love of the Redeemer (Gospel John 15 26-16 4). It is necessary that we learn that the upward look of the expectant soul is away from the things of this world; it is a rejection of all that would divert the heart or will from God. We must be one with the Psalmist, "I will direct my prayer unto God and will look up."—G36.

J. WAKEFORD.

ASCETICISM.—A. is a word employed in two senses. In the broader sense it means "the theory . . . of the means . . . by which a complete conformity with the Divine will may be attained" (Cent. Dic.). In this sense it is "nothing else than an enlightened method adopted in the observance of the law of God through all the various degrees of service, from the obedience of the ordinary believer to the absorbing devotion of the greatest saint" (Cath. Encyc., s.v.). Thus, A. is contrasted with FASTING as a principle is with a practice. A. is ethical and has to do with the moral virtues, fasting is a practice adopted among others as a means in the effort to attain perfection. Moreover, A. as a principle is permanent and constant, fasting is temporary and occasional. The use of the word in this sense is found in the Fathers. Clemens Alex. calls Christianity an ἀσκησις, so, too, Lucian the Martyr is termed a great ἀσκητής (Syn. Scr. Sacr.). Cyril of Jerusalem gives this name to persons frequent and earnest in pr., while in Cyril of Alexandria ἀσκησις is synonymous with self-denial (In Joan. 13 35). Thus, A. in its broader sense is practised by all who through desire to follow more perfectly the way of God, or for the sake of the extension of the Kingdom, practise self-control whether by fasting or abstaining from alcohol or certain forms of entertainment, or by perseverance in pr. and devotional exercises.

More properly, however, the word designates a special withdrawal from the world in order to

2. In narrower sense.

cultivate a higher degree of sanctity (see Lecky, Europ. Morals 1 136), and the adoption of austere practices, such as celibacy, insufficiency of food, warmth, sleep, etc.

Such withdrawal was practised in other systems than the Christian, as e.g., by the Ebionites, Buddhists. It became common in Christianity after about 150, when the Church was largely influenced by the Gnostic idea of the inherent evilness of matter. The Apostolic Canons, however, strongly oppose this sentiment as a ground for Asceticism.

The result was the growth of Monasticism, which tended to an individualistic cult of soul development. In the 4th cent. the coenobitic life became popular, and such communities were called ἀσκητήρια (Socrates, HE 4 23).

In its narrower sense A. "rests upon a two-fold morality, one expressed in precepts of universal obligation for the multitude, and one expressed in counsels of perfection intended only for those more advanced in holiness" (DCA, s.v.), leading to two doctrines, (1) of distinction between ordinary and advanced Christians, which is foreign to the NT (see Gwatkin, Early Ch. Hist. 1 244 f.), and (2) that the passions are to be extirpated rather than controlled. It is self-control that is aimed at in fasting (see Homily on Fasting, pt. 1). Undoubtedly A. in its more rigid sense is often adopted as productive of merit, while the Church of England in the Homily quoted states that to fast "with this persuasion . . . that our fasting and our good works can make us perfect and just men . . . is a devilish persuasion." Fasting, in a word, differs from A. as a practice from a principle, as what is occasional differs from what is constant, and as a means of promoting self-control, prayerfulness and penitence from a method of acquiring merit or perfection.—K3'.

J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

ASCRPTION.—The Act of Praise with which it is usual to conclude a Sermon. The custom of concluding a Sermon with an Act of Praise is very ancient. In St. Chrysostom's time the Sermon was prefaced with the versicle and response, V. "Peace be with all," R. "And with thy Spirit," and was closed with a doxology to the Holy Trinity (see Chrysostom in Col. 33, and conclusions of his Homilies).—X2.

LUCIUS SMITH.

ASH-WEDNESDAY.—See LENT, § 3; LENT (RATIONALE), § 1.

ASSESSOR.—One who sits with a judge to advise him as to questions of fact and usage. The history of the subject was discussed by Abp. Benson in Read v. Lincoln, L.R., 14 P.D. 88. The judicial Committee of the Privy Council is not to hear any eccles. case save in the presence of three episcopal A.'s. A.'s sit with the Bp. in proceedings under the CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840, § 1, and three clerical and two lay As. sit with the Chancellor under the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 2, 3. For rules, see Stat. Rules and Orders (1904) IV. Ecc. Court, E. 61-109.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

ATHANASIAN CREED.—See QUICUNQUE VULT.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION.—This was the first of all the Reformed Confessions of Faith, and is a universally authorised formulary in all Lutheran Churches to-day. It was drawn up by Philip Melancthon, on the basis of the Schwabach Arts., which had been compiled by Lutheran divines in 1529, after the failure of the Conference at Marburg had shown the irreconcilable differences between the Swiss and German Reformers on the subject of the Eucharist. After having been carefully revised by Luther, it was signed by all the German Protestant princes who were assembled for the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, and there read in the presence of the Emperor Charles V. It consisted of 29 Arts., which are divided into two parts, the first dealing with the cardinal doctrines of the Christian faith, and the second with ecclesiastical abuses. Its tone was most moderate, aiming at a return to the faith of the Early Fathers, while protesting strongly against the innovations of the mediæval Schoolmen on the one hand and of the sectaries on the other.

It exerted an indirect but important influence on our English Articles of Religion, for the "13 Arts.," which were published in England in 1538 as a result of a conference between English bishops and Lutheran envoys, were based almost entirely on it, and these again formed the groundwork of many of the 42 Arts. of 1553, which are so largely identical with the Elizabethan Articles now in force. Thus, the teaching contained in the recognised standard of doctrine of the English Church, with the notable exception of that on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is largely based on the Lutheran Confession of Augsburg; as many as eight of our present ARTICLES being distinctly borrowed from it, while in some cases the phraseology is almost identical.—U4.

G. FOSTER CARTER.

AUMBRY.—A cupboard, generally on the gospel side of an altar, used to contain the altar plate, etc., vestries being seldom provided in ancient parish churches. The aumbries sometimes found in the east walls of old chancels may have been designed to keep relics in; it is less probable that they were used for the Reservation of the Sacrament.

A few churches have tall narrow aumbries, usually in the nave, suitable to contain banner staves and the staff of the processional cross; other examples of aumbries are long and low, as if intended to hold spare altar candles.—K5.

C. A. NICHOLSON.

AUTHORITY.—One of the "notes" of Religion is A. The word of the prophet or preacher, the ritual formula or ceremonial act or semi-judicial utterance of the priest, the dogmas, rules and customs of churches and religious orders, the doctrines and precepts of sacred books, the shrines and temples hallowed for worship—all these variously illustrate the claim that Religion properly carries with it A. Even where no religious system exists, only an unorganised religiosity, the beliefs which it reflects exert a solemnising influence, however vague they may be or infrequent in practical effect. If we extend our idea of Religion so far as to define it as a reverential relation to a Being above ourselves, the element of A. persists up to the vanishing point of Religion itself.

1. A. a Note of Religion.

In the sense in which the word has just been used, A. is that august force discerned as resident within the true and the good, constraining the mind and binding the conscience. It is an inner power influencing belief and action. But besides this use of the term A. (without any article), we also speak of "an authority" or "authorities," and of "authority" in a lower sense, as a general term for the influence of various external authorities. And most of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with A. have sprung from a confusion between the two kinds, or an illegitimate identification of one with the other. The two may be contrasted as inward and outward, as absolute and relative, as final and provisional, as divine and human, the first immediately recognised, the second mediately communicated.

2. Two kinds of Authority.

But, before elaborating further this contrast, it is important to observe that although Religion

3. Spheres of Authority.

(and under RELIGION [see that art.] Morality is included as implicit religion) has a peculiar A., yet the other sides or directions of man's fourfold activity as a spiritual being are not without their appropriate foundation in A. of the higher kind. Beauty dominates the soul of the artist, the poet, the musician. Truth masters the mind of the historian and philosopher. Utility speaks to the inventor, the trader, the statesman, with an authoritative accent, "This works better than that." All discussions and controversies in these realms are meaningless unless the disputants possess faculties which can, after proper training and upon sufficient data, obtain the judgment of a Supreme Court of the spirit, from which there is no appeal. So Religion only has transcendent A. because its sphere transcends the spheres of Business, Research, and Art. At the call of Duty, that is to say, a man is bound to renounce pleasure or gain, enlargement of knowledge, or æsthetic cultivation, which without such higher call would have made unhindered appeal to his will.

It may be useful next to notice that A., in the lower sense of an external regulative force, is an indispensable factor over the whole range of man's life of thought and action. Without this all-pervading atmosphere of A. civilisation would crumble to pieces in a generation. So it is in no exclusive sense that A. must be pronounced indispensable to the Christian religion. Some of its uses may be indicated.

1. First of all, it is educative. The achievements of the past can only be safeguarded by summarising them in propositions and rules which can be readily taught, or by embodying them in traditional practices and observances which can be easily imitated.

2. It also economises effort. We cannot all investigate everything or test it experimentally for ourselves. So we take all sorts of things on trust, on the A. of others. A. is a labour-saving device, by which we are able to use the results of many toilers' work. We rely on the A. of the experts.

3. It makes co-operation possible. If people are to work together, some basis must be settled on which they are to act. Political and business organisations are absolutely dependent on the formation of laws and institutions possessing recognised Authority.

4. It is a uniting influence. We have only to think what social life would be without any accepted code of manners, bearing real if undefined A., to pass to the inference that in worship, for example, some measure of uniformity required by A. will be necessary if Christian fellowship is to be a reality.

5. It is an agency for peace. If there be no tribunal, the A. of which is generally recognised, disputes and differences, which in their earlier stages might have been settled, will harden into party badges separating hostile camps.

6. A. is needed for discipline. It must needs be that offences come, but woe betide the society in which offences against morals or good order are committed with impunity, because no executive A. has sufficient power to intervene.

Something more needs to be said in order to make clear the essentially practical nature of all external A. It is a non-rational, though by no means necessarily irrational, force. It acts as such within the personal life of the individual. He may bow to A. in advance of, or as a labour-saving substitute for, or in opposition to, his intelligent judgment upon the situation. As a learner he constrains himself by an act of will to assume that as true or useful which he expects he will soon prove to possess the quality of truth or utility. He frames or adopts rules, and forms or picks up habits, which enable him to come to conclusions or take action without thinking out afresh the steps on which they were based. All he asks is that the course he follows shall work. We are all in this sense pragmatists over large tracts of life. Finally, the ordinary person constantly allows custom or prejudice—both forms of A.—to outweigh plain reasoning which, if the balance had not been loaded by A., would have determined the decision. We save our reasoning powers for new and important questions by confining caprice within a close network of authoritative regulations, self-made or borrowed. Then, one fine day it may be, we wake up to find ourselves prisoners.

It is even more obvious in the case of organised societies, such as a Church is, that this kind of

A. is a practical and non-rational force.¹ Just because it is external, it can only affect the outside of the persons whom it affects. Fear of the stake may force a written or spoken recantation, but will not alter the heretic's views of truth. A rubric can only require the recitation of the Qui-cunque Vult, it cannot secure agreement. The Elizabethan bps. might enforce the wearing of the surplice, but they could not ensure approval of it; indeed, several of them were personally opposed to it on rational grounds. The fact simply is that, when a form of words has to be drawn up to express the common convictions of many, or an order of service or a ceremony or an ornament has to be sanctioned as a channel or instrument of common devotion, or some administrative or financial scheme has to be resolved upon for general adoption, or a particular style of architecture has to be chosen for a new church in which many subscribers are interested, in each and all of these cases a resort to A. is necessary. It may be a single arbitrator, or a majority of some body, or a pair of expert assessors, or the King in Council, or the bp. of the diocese, who is the deciding A., but the principle is the same. The grounds of the decision may be entirely rational, but, when the decision has been made, the appeal of external A. as such is to the will.

If, however, it is important to distinguish between the two forms of A., it is equally necessary to see that there is an intimate relation between the two, and to understand clearly what that relation is. That there is such a relation is proved by the decay of A., where doubt or disbelief has arisen as to whether some external A., sacred book or rite or priesthood, rests on any higher A. The Gods of Hellas are now but names, because the stories about them came to be recognised as untrue and directly or indirectly immoral. Dissenters join the Ch. of Eng., not always because their religious and eccles. convictions compel the step, but not infrequently because the forms of worship sanctioned by the A. of custom or prescription in the chapel seem æsthetically unworthy, or because the denominational system does not work well in practice. The criterion of intrinsic worth, that is to say, is applied in one direction or another.

¹ Cp. Thorndike on The Service of God at Religious Assemblies (Works I 225), where he points out that though St. Paul gave reasons for rules about worship, yet "because it is not possible that matters of this nature should be put past contradiction and dispute by constraining reasons issuing from the mere nature of things, and yet the quiet of the Ch.—on which the edification of it dependeth—requireth that this should be out of dispute," he states (1 Cor. II 16) "a general rule for the Ch. to follow, that in matters of this indifference the custom of the Ch. is to be preferred before our own reasons."

External A. is then always ostensibly based upon internal A., and in the long run can only hold its ground, if it can establish, in response to challenge, its claim to echo the inward voice. The appeal lies to the experience of reality. After broadening the basis of judgment, and bringing the point in doubt into comparison with the most relevant data available, the question has to be asked whether it authenticates itself to the judge who sits within the soul. Only when authorities can be at suitable times and by fitting persons arraigned before the bar of Authority, can these be trusted wholesomely to influence belief and conduct. The appeal must be at suitable times. All questions cannot secure satisfactory treatment simultaneously. Problems grow ripe for solution. There is a time to rest in venerable human authority: there is a time to go behind it to the ultimate Divine Authority. So the appeal must be made by suitable persons. There are broad issues which average minds can properly judge when they have been sifted by trained minds of special capacity and knowledge, but not before. There must be a proper trial, and the jury must be fit.

2. Appeal to Experience.

The appeal lies to the experience of reality. And the starting-point must be the experience of reality by the individual. If we press back our thought about the rise into consciousness of any new revelation of truth or goodness, we arrive at a moment or a period in the life-experience of some elect soul, in which the vision has been vouchsafed. Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, St. Paul, St. Athanasius, St. Francis—these may serve as representative names. But what they have received, they must share. So around each gathers a group of imitators or disciples. The prophet, hero, or saint inspires the Ch., and in this way the revelation grows in certitude, and becomes lodged in history. Yet the process is essentially the same. The disciples do not see the vision till the masters depict it. But, when it has been shown them, they—if they be genuine disciples—recognise it sooner or later as authoritative, just as the masters did. Here, however, a risk arises. They who have been shown some constraining vision by one whom they hail as master are tempted to fall into hero-worship. They set him on a pinnacle, and take all his sayings for true, and all his counsels for right. At this point comes in the testing value of the wider Ch. Those who are not under the glamour of the master's personality and presence, sift out the gold from the dross in the crucible of their experience, and so the best only prevails; unless, indeed, the uninspired dicta gain from a powerful organisation an A. for the time irresistible. It may then be long ages before the error be eliminated. Another risk arises from the necessarily imperfect form in which the vision is both perceived and communicated. There is no heavenly language of perfection, in which the soul can recognise and receive infallible messages from God. As the Rabbis used to say, "The law speaks with the tongue of the sons of men." The resources of an undeveloped language have to be strained to express what no one has tried to express before. The risk is obvious that the husk may be mistaken for the kernel, the necessary wrappage of illusion and defective expression for the final embodiment of a perfect vision. A long line of inspired interpreters is, accordingly, needed to rescue truth from the distorting hands of well-meaning A.; and the function of the contemporary Ch. in welcoming the convincing interpretations and rejecting the unsound is equally obvious, whether its A. be expressed by undefined acceptance or refusal, or by synodical or other pronouncement.

3. Master and Disciple.

That successive generations of disciples shall have any confidence in going back to the original utterances of the masters is made possible by the art of writing. A sacred literature is, indeed, a necessity to a religion in which revelation has become articulate. Such a literature is itself a product of A. The master or one of his disciples collects his words into a book, with the intention that they shall carry weight. An adherent gathers the memories and traditions of the community or of some well-informed individual or circle, and records them in a connected narrative, in which the being of God can be discerned through His saving deeds, and the nature and calling of man taught by pattern. So, too, those usually less immediate products of inspiration, the ordinances and rules of law-givers and administrators, and the maxims and reflections of sages, find permanent record, that their authoritative guidance may mould later lives. Presently this combined record gains A. of a general and inclusive kind for itself. The influence of tradition and the direct kindling power of parts of the material so preserved create a presumption that the whole is equally authoritative.

10. Function of Literature.

The OT is a library of sacred books which illustrates this description. It is not unique as a record of the religious experience of a people, for other races and countries have their Bibles. But even the earlier Testament of the Christian Bible is supreme and unapproachable in value, at once for its actual contents and intrinsic worth and for its providential relation to the NT. It was the concentration of the leaders of Israel on the religious life of the people which humanly determined the Divine impress left upon the surviving literature of Israel. Hellenic Art, Roman Order, and Hebrew Religion, each represented the efflorescence of some real factor in the human spirit. The finest fruit of OT religion is by common consent found in the Psalter, which serves still as the constant vehicle of Christian devotion. Those who cannot recognise that the Hebrew psalmists have received a real revelation from God will never be persuaded about any revelation. (For some remarks on the religious value of the OT narratives, see HISTORY.) But for the Jew it was the Law which first gained regulative A. in his religious life, and which has ever since retained the supreme place in his regard.

11. The OT.

Yet for Christians large tracts of the Law, regarded by the Jews of our Lord's time with the profoundest veneration, have lost 12. The A. of all binding A. and possess only historical and illustrative value.

The reason is that in between the two Testaments came He who spake with "A., and not as the scribes." Now the scribes were always quoting Scripture, so this contrasted A. could not be derived from the OT. Indeed, Christ's treatment of the OT was always marked by reverent freedom, the freedom being at least as noticeable as the reverence. Moreover, when challenged with the question, "By what A. doest thou these things?" he pointedly avoided naming any external A., however august, as the ground of his teaching or work. Throughout He seemed to rely on the self-evidencing nature of truth and right to authenticate His words and acts to all who had ears to hear and eyes to see. He simply said things, and they went home. His own A., even, was rather that of an unimpeachable witness than of an ultimate A. And if he used such an expression as, "But I say unto you," in contrast with, "It was said to them of old time," it is not because he meant to stifle doubt by an ipse dixit, but to call attention sharply to the contrast of substance. In the latest, the spiritual Gospel as it has been called par excellence, Christ says emphatically, "The words that I say unto you, I speak not from myself" (John 14 10); but He gives the clue to the meaning of this when He says with equal emphasis, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life" (John 6 63). With other leaders and teachers the words and acts which carry any peculiar A. stand out as exceptional, from a background of ordinary life carrying no special weight. But all the Gospels present to us our Lord as investing his lightest act and word with an A. which His disciples never thought of questioning after they had once accepted Him as Master; and one of the evangelists reports Him as crystallising this implicit claim in the words, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." After His Ascension this unbounded A., already recognised, found its justification in the growing fulness and clearness of the apostolic teaching as to His Person. The living, actual A. of the historical Jesus, reflected in the whole-hearted faith and devotion—in the life, that is to say—of His followers, was found to carry with it conclusions to which it imparted its own note of certitude. There were controversies in the Apostolic Church, but there is no trace of any dispute about the supreme A. of Jesus Christ, or about the reality of that Incarnation of the Son of God which all saw behind the spiritual force of Love and Wisdom that had entered so unmistakably into their experience.

It has not been necessary to have recourse to any conception of A. differing in kind from that 13. His A. previously described in order to represent the A. of Christ. He came not to destroy, but to fulfil.

He preached no new God, but manifested more fully to His countrymen the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He set up no new ideal of goodness, but disentangled the supreme principle of Love to God and man from all minor or temporary applications and embodiments of it, and He lived out the ideal in its perfection. By successive instalments of revelation (πολυμερῶς), and by widely differing forms of idea and institution (πολυτρόπως), God had long ago spoken unto the fathers of the Jewish Church by means of the awakened ears and cleansed lips of a line of elect souls (ἐν τοῖς προφήταις), men of imperfect life, and of partial and intermittent vision. Now, in the apostolic days, at the culminating epoch of the whole earthly dispensation (ἐπ' ἰσχύου τοῦν ἡμερῶν τούτων), He had spoken unto the faithful in the words and deeds of One who was no servant among many, but a Son without peer (ἐν υἱῷ), the Heir of the future (κληρονόμον πάντων), the supreme Actor in Creation (ὃς οὐ καὶ ἐποίησεν τοὺς αἰῶνας) and History (φέρων τε τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ), the Radiance of the Divine perfection (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης) and the very Mould of essential Godhead (χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ), who could make purification of sins for others (καθαρισμὸν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ποιησάμενος, Heb. 1 1-3), because he needed none for Himself, though tempted like the rest (πειρασμένον κατὰ πάντα καθ' ὁμοιότητα χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, Heb. 4 15). Here in compact fulness of expression we find the witness of the NT summed up.

According to this witness, with which it is hardly necessary to prove that the PB is through-

14. Function of the NT. out in explicit agreement, God gave to the world in the Person of His Incarnate Son a perfect Mediator or Expression of His Being and Will within the self-imposed limitations of His real Humanity. But, for us in the 20th cent. after Christ to be in a position to rely upon His A. to reveal God to man and to reconcile man to God, we need, in accordance with the rule stated above (§ 9), trustworthy records. This is what gives its supreme importance to the Bible. In the NT is contained very nearly all that is known of the Historical Jesus and His immediate followers. In another art. (BIBLE IN PB) something is said of the reverent dependence of the compilers and revisers of the PB upon the Bible in every part of their work. Here it is enough to remark that the Eng. Ch. has never attempted to give or lend A. to the Bible. It has simply recognised in it the A. of Him who not only shines out in the NT as the Light and Life of the world, but, having been discovered there, can also be discerned in the OT as mysteriously active during the time of preparation.

The A. of the Bible is then undeniable and indispensable. But it has yet to be related to two other seats of A., the Church and the individual. Here, as elsewhere, mischief has resulted from pressing the different meanings of convenient terms so as to create an unreal opposition. The Bible is but a collection of extracts from the book of universal experience: it is an anthology from the endless roll of unfolding reality. Its value lies in its being a selection of what man needs most and longest to remember. The experience which it records is the experience of individuals. But these individuals made up a Church. The Bible is the Word of God in the form given to it by the individuals who received it for communication to others, and containing just those books which the Church recognised as entitled to Canonical A. Its supreme A. is not distinct in kind from the A. of the Church or the individual, but arises from real, historical causes. The OT, as a matter of fact, records the direct historical preparation for the Christ, it was used and built upon by our Lord Himself, and it was taken over as authoritative by the Christian Ch. It can therefore never be superseded. Other sacred books may be found to carry with them a certain amount of A. from the occasional value of some of their contents. But the OT has a necessary place among the authorities to which Christians turn.

15. A. of the Bible.

It is clearer still that the NT must rank highest of all external authorities. It reflects, with a degree of fidelity very rare in literature of a similar kind, the impression made by Christ upon the eye and ear-witnesses of His acts and words. It records what the first generation of disciples reported that He said and did. But it goes further than this. Though our Lord is never described as writing, except in the dust, He made unmistakable allusion to the Spirit of God as continuing and completing His work of guidance and revelation. And the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, however much they add to the Gospels in the way of application, interpretation and supplement, are for the most part obviously regarded by their authors as truly conveying teaching and testimony received from above, and are expected to be received as authoritative by the readers. The doctrines, the ethics, the ritual, and the organisation of the entire historic Christian Ch. have been based upon the assumption that the apostolic writings have this authoritative character.

16. A. of the Church.

Any exaggerated claims to A. on behalf of the Ch., as compared with Holy Scripture, are implicitly and explicitly rejected in the PB and Arts.

"God's word written" (Art. 20), so far as it has settled anything, cannot be overridden by the Church.

So Bp. Gore (The Body of Christ, 2nd ed., p. 224) has pointed out that "Christ has guaranteed the permanence in the world of the grace and truth which came by Him. But He never came near to guaranteeing His Ch. against misuses of eccles. A. akin to those which rendered the scribes and Pharisees and chief priests so wholly inadequate for the fulfilment of their Divine function. Thus, when we see the authorities of the Christian Ch. at any period ignoring the real appeal to Scripture as at once the motive and the limit of their dogmatic action, we are much more than justified in appealing back behind them to that on which we all alike rest—the foundation of the apostles and prophets. And if we find cause to mistrust eccles. A. in a few instances, this tends to modify our whole attitude towards it. It comes to occupy a place in our minds—in our whole idea of religion and the Ch.—proportionate to that which it seems to occupy in the mind and teaching of Christ—that is to say, we recognise its reality and its function in the order of the Ch.; but we can never regard it as absolute and final, except when it can justify its action or utterance by the appeal behind itself to the Word of God—the record of the original apostolic teaching."

We have already seen that this need not involve any disparagement of the kind of A. possessed by the Ch. It may be taken as merely a frank recognition of the overwhelming degree of A. possessed by the apostolic Ch., as:—(a) closest to the fountain head of A., Christ Himself; (b) receiving and transmitting the revelation from leaders chosen by the Master Himself; (c) exercising a unique formative influence upon the Ch. of all the ages; and (d) in a peculiar sense "unspotted from the world." The A. of the Ch. has still an immense range over all matters not settled in terms by Scripture. It is not however infallible in any sphere, for great historic Churches have "erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of Faith" (Art. 19). Art. 34 also expressly reserves to the local Ch. (cp. RITUAL, § 6) full A. in regard to rites and ceremonies. From the reference to particular local Churches in Art. 19, it might be inferred that "the Church" of Art. 20, which "hath power to decree Rites or ceremonies, and authority in Controversies of Faith," is also the local Ch., as in Art. 34, but the point is not made clear. (See further, DOCTRINE.)

Few things are more desirable than a better understanding as to the A. of the Ch., but on few points has there been wider diversity of opinion. On the one hand, such solemn words as those of our Lord, "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you," have been interpreted as lodging in the apostolic body and their successors a plenary power to define truth, control the dispensation of grace, make laws, and govern the faithful, all this being from above, with or without some more or less effective synodical system for securing the assent of the main body of the Ch. On the other hand, any little group of persons, professing and calling themselves

Christians, and meeting together in virtue of the promise to the "two or three," has been declared to possess, as a religious democracy, full autonomous A. The question is further complicated by the necessity, not peculiar by any means to "established" churches (see ESTABLISHED CH.), of relating together the State and the Ch. as co-existent authorities.

It is perhaps enough to point out:—(1) that the PB is one long assertion of A.; (2) that as such it is in the main the re-assertion of the A. of the Bible and of the older Ch. of which the Eng. Ch. is by unbroken continuity of life the direct heir; (3) that its characteristic use and encouragement of learning and references to antiquity express a profound reverence for A. as garnering the experience of the past; (4) that the actual freedom exercised in relaxing, modifying and supplementing the authoritative mediæval system in all spheres constitutes a very powerful claim of A. for the living Ch. in those groupings in which at any time it finds itself historically organised; (5) that, large as may be the scope of matters to be settled on grounds of policy, the controlling grasp of principles is recognised as a fundamental condition of the valid exercise of A. (see, e.g., RITUAL, §§ 2-5); and (6) that it is judged expedient, wherever practicable, to associate together the authorities of the Ch. and the State. It may be added that, though the Eng. Ch. no longer claims to enforce her A. upon all the citizens by coercive jurisdiction, she has never formally withdrawn her assertion of that A. as a moral and spiritual force.

17. The PB's Claim to A.

At this point it is necessary to call attention to certain qualifications, forgetfulness of which has caused difficulties only second, if second, to those occasioned by confusions about the kinds of A.

18. Degrees of Authority.

referred to in § 2. These qualifications relate to the degrees of A. That such degrees exist has been already implied in the general distinction drawn in § 9 between master and disciple, in the descending scale—Christ, the Bible, the later Ch.—and in the discretion exercised in the retention or rejection of different elements in the mediæval system. But the recognition of degrees must be carried further. If the express words of Christ may properly be set apart from the rest of the NT, are all His words, as they stand, of equal A.? Can disputable deductions from enigmatic phrases have equal weight with the "first and great commandment"? Can doubtful interpretations of parables outweigh clear unfigurative sayings? Can single sentences bear the same weight of A. as large groups of repeated or consentient utterances? Again, seeing that our Lord disclaimed the function of pronouncing judicial decisions, are we to suppose that His utterances about divorce were meant as legislative enactments binding those to whom His Spirit was promised? These are important questions, to which different answers are being given. Similar questions would bring out the existence of degrees of A.,

not only between one A. and another, but within the dicta of all the other several authorities.

For the individual Christian the matter may easily appear more difficult than it is. When once it is seen to be illusory to seek for an external infallible A. (see further, KNOWLEDGE), whether book, person, or society, the foundations may seem to be shaken. But when it is remembered that in all other realms of human thought and life we get on without any such infallible A., and only find occasional inconvenience from the lack of it, when we deal with unsettled points of detail or novel problems, we are reassured. The English Churchman is in a somewhat peculiar position. On the one hand, no Ch. in Christendom has ever sheltered so wide a variety of doctrinal types. Its customary standards of ceremonial are diverse. Its members differ largely on current moral issues. On the other hand, all find in the Catholic Creeds the accepted expression of their common faith. All start from the same definition of duty to God and man. All reverence and use the Bible. All nourish their devotional life upon the PB. All carry on their work, their worship and their studies under a continual current of criticism, only partly unfriendly and injurious, which ensures that, by a wide and searching appeal to the experience of reality, the sound is being increasingly sifted out from the unsound. So the individual is well advised, who rests his soul firmly upon those great rock-foundations of faith and duty to which the Incarnate Word, the written Word, and the Spirit-bearing Ch. point with consentient witness, and to estimate other parts of the structure of his religion according to the degree of A. which they derive from the more or less clear teachings of his authorities. On minor points of belief and practice he will gladly adopt, as the basis of his thinking and acting, guidance offered him in books or sermons and instructions by men whom he has learned to know and trust. As he grows older, he will find that increasingly he believes and lives as he does, not merely or mainly because any human A. has told him, but because he has found the witness within himself. He will also probably have come to hold his judgment in suspense about many points on which he was once confident.

19. A. and the Individual.

The PB makes reference to the A. of the Sovereign as derived from God, to the A. of Royal officers and of Parliament, and to the A. of the Ministry. The Arts. refer to the A. of the Canonical books (Art. 6), and of the Ch. (Art. 20).

For A. in matters of faith, cp. DOCTRINE, KNOWLEDGE, SCRIPTURE; for the A. of the Ministry, see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION and ORDERS (HOLY); for A. over worship, cp. RITUAL, CEREMONIAL, etc.; and for the exercise of A., see ORDER. Hooker's EP, bk. i, is still the best older treatment of the general question. There is no standard modern work on the subject, but cp. Strong A. and the Principle of Obedience; Headlam, A., Reason and Revelation; Illingworth, Divine Transcendence.—U.

G. HARFORD.

AVE MARIA.—See MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN, § 2.

BANDS.—Two small oblong pieces of white linen fastened round the neck and falling under the chin upon the breast; originally, the falling collar of olden time. In France, under K. Louis XV, they were changed to black bordered with white, and are so worn in the present day abroad as part of the outdoor dress of the secular clergy. B. are not confined to the clergy.—R3. V. STALEY.

BANDS, CHURCH.—In the early Christian Ch. the instruments employed for accompanying the voice were the ten-stringed Psallery and the Kithara, a development of the lyre. For these, no doubt, the use of somewhat similar stringed instruments in the ritual of Solomon's Temple furnished sufficient precedent; but at the close of the 7th cent. the organ was adopted for eccles. purposes by Pope Vitalian, and throughout the Middle Ages was recognised by Holy Ch. as "the only instrument of musyk in proses, sequences, and ympnes," though on solemn and festal occasions the minstrels and waits were also permitted to exercise their craft, materialising, in fact, the thought of universal praise expressed in the quaint carvings of angels and musicians still to be seen on corbel, gallery, and screen.

To the Reformers of the 16th cent. such displays were naturally distasteful, and according to Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions (1559) a "modest and distinct song" was to be used in all parts of the Common Prayer, "so that the ditty may be plainly understood." To these requirements Tallis, Byrd, Bull, Gibbons, and other distinguished composers of Elizabethan and early Stuart times, conformed their music. It is interesting, however, to observe that in many of the new statutes granted to cathedral bodies by Henry VIII provision was made for payment of wind instrument players as well as of an organist. At Canterbury, for instance, two cornett¹ players and two sackbut players were appointed to support the voices of the singers. The same appears to have been the case at York, Westminster Abbey, and Durham; while payments for such instruments—as in 1595 "for the Chappell of Trinity College, Cambridge"—show that their use was not confined to cathedral purposes.

The Puritanical zeal of the Commonwealth vented itself with unrestrained fury against all such abominations, and organs as well as the humbler accompaniments of ch. music were scattered or destroyed. So thoroughly was the work carried out, that in the majority of our parochial chs. more than a cent. elapsed before instrumental music was again heard within their walls. With the cathedrals and large town chs. the case was somewhat different, and, upon the restoration of the Anglican service, skilful organ-builders like Dallam, Loosemore, "Father" Smith, and Harris were busily employed in repairing the mischief. The old cornett was also used for a time, partly to assist the boys' voices, which were inadequately trained; but the Gay Monarch with his taste for French fashions could not appreciate the stately English music, and, in 1662, Evelyn, after attending the Chapel Royal, notes in his Diary: "Instead of the ancient, grave and solemn wind music accompanying the organ, was introduced a concert of twenty-four violins between every pause after the French fantastical light way, better suiting a tavern or a playhouse than a church. This was the first time of change, and now we no more hear the Cornett which gave life to the Organ; that instrument quite left off in which the English were so skilful." Such instrumental accompaniments were introduced into several of the cathedrals, as St. Paul's and Lichfield, and, although Purcell's anthems with short symphonies for stringed instruments were mainly written for use in the Chapel Royal, Boyce and the Ch. composers of the first part of the 18th cent. were often able to command the services elsewhere of a large orchestra as well as the organ.

In the country chs., however, no such opportunities existed. Thomas Mace, when speaking of Parochial Musick in his Musick's Monument (1676), laments the want of organs and the difficulty of procuring organists, as well as "the whining, tooting, yelling and screeking there is in many country congregations." As he does not recognise the use of any instrument to pulse or strike the psalm tune, but allots it to the vocal powers of the clerk, it is evident that the singing, such as it was, was unaccompanied, though in later times a pitch pipe was provided. The great revival in religious life during the 18th cent., due to the labours of the Wesley family, to whom we are indebted for two of our greatest Ch. organists and composers, brought singing into greater prominence, and sought to consecrate to higher purposes the musical talent of village and town. It is probably for this reason that the fiddlers, who had usually frequented the taverns, or as Christmas waits had perambulated the streets, were in the later half of that cent. placed in the West gallery of our chs., and with their instrumental efforts sustained the harmonies of Ps. and anthem. It seems at first that stringed instruments alone were admitted, but in the early years of the 19th cent. flute, clarionet, hautboy, bassoon, and serpent had been added to their number, to be followed afterward by trombone, bass horn, ophicleide, and keyed bugle. Even the megaphone, under the name of vamp-horn, was employed in some village chs. to increase the volume of vocal sound. Detailed accounts of these bands, as they existed in South Dorset, where the last ch. band lingered till 1895, have been given in the Musical News (1893) and the Antiquary (1906) by the present writer; and Thomas Hardy's descriptions of the old players in Under the Greenwood Tree and Life's Little Ironies are well known. Toward the middle of the 19th cent. they began to be superseded at first by the barrel-organs, and then by the small organs and harmoniums which appeared to provide a more suitable accompaniment for sacred music. But there is now a tendency to over-organise our country chs., and it is preferable, while keeping the size of the organ within reasonable bounds, to supplement it on great festivals with such competent instrumentalists as the parish can produce, and thus afford those whose singing powers, maybe, are limited, the opportunity of rendering their meed of praise with strings and pipe.—Q3.

¹ The old cornett is distinct from the modern cornet.

FRANCIS W. GALPIN.

BANGOR USE.—See USE, § 16.

BANNERS.—The use of B., ensigns, standards, flags, etc., has come down from early times.

They were originally introduced for military purposes. The vesillum and labarum of the Romans consisted of a square piece of cloth fixed to a cross bar at the top of a spear. So, on through the cents., in one form or another, the use of B. has been continuous. The Church adopted their use in her functions, and B., "banner-staves," "banner-cloths," "streamers," are mentioned in inventories among the ornaments of our churches. They were carried in processions and were also set up in churches.

The processions referred to are those on Ash-Wednesday and Maundy Thursday, when a hair-cloth banner took the place of the processional cross; on Palm Sunday and on Corpus Christi; on Rogation Days, with the special B. of the lion and the dragon; and on Ascension Day. The devices on B. were various, e.g., coats of arms, figures of saints, badges, and texts. "Flags" are known to have been used on certain days, e.g., the Dedication Festival, on church towers.

B. were also used at the funerals of important personages. At the funeral of Bp. Cosin, in April, 1671, "banner-rolls" were borne on each side of the hearse, also the "great banner." The same are recorded as having been carried at Bishop Trelawney's funeral in 1721. The "great banner" is again mentioned in the account of the funeral of the Duke of Marlborough in 1722.

B. are set up in the chapels of orders of Knighthood over the stalls of the Knights with their coats of arms upon them. Well-known examples of this custom are to be seen in the chapels of St. George, Windsor, of Henry VII in Westminster Abbey, and of St. Michael and St. George in St. Paul's Cathedral, where the B. are those of the Knights of the Garter, of the Bath, and of St. Michael and St. George respectively.

It is well to remember with regard to B. that what is of more importance than all else is the design, and to get this the right person should be resorted to, that is, one who understands the art and will not produce what is pretentious and showy.—R4.

H. D. MACNAMARA.

BANNS.—Canon 62 on this subject is confirmed by Statute. By 4 George IV, c. 76, s. 2 (the present Marriage Act), it is enacted that "All banns of matrimony shall be published in an audible manner in the parish ch. or in some public chapel in which chapel Banns of matrimony may now or may hereafter be lawfully published or belonging to such parish or chapelry wherein the persons to be married shall dwell according to the form of words prescribed by the rubrick prefixed to the office of matrimony in the book of Common Prayer upon three Sundays preceding the solemnisation of marriage during the time of morning service or of evening service (if there shall be no morning service in such church or chapel upon the Sunday upon which such banns shall be so published) immediately after the second lesson; and whensoever it shall happen that the persons to be married shall dwell in divers parishes or chapelries the banns shall in like manner be published in the ch. or in any such chapel as aforesaid belonging to such parish or chapelry wherein each of the said persons shall dwell; and all other the rules prescribed by the said rubrick concerning the publication of banns and the solemnisation of matrimony and not hereby altered shall be duly observed; and that in all cases where banns shall have been published the marriage shall be solemnised in one of the parish churches or chapels where such banns shall have been published and in no other place whatsoever."

It will be observed that "Sundays" only are named in the Act as in the Latin version of canon 62, and publication on any "holy-day" will not now suffice. By s. 6 of the same Act Banns must be published from a Book provided by the Churchwardens and each publication signed by the Officiating Clergyman.

By s. 7 no Clergyman is obliged to publish banns unless a written notice stating the particulars mentioned in the section, e.g., full names and houses of abode and time "dwelt inhabited or lodged" in such houses respectively, shall be delivered to him at least seven days beforehand. In practice this notice is generally waived, but it is obvious proper inquiry should be made where practicable as to residence. No doubt in populous parishes the making of inquiries is attended with great difficulty, nevertheless any Clergyman who married all persons representing themselves to be his Parishioners when in fact they were not resident in his Parish without taking any steps to test the truth of their statements would render himself liable at least to ecclesiastical censure.

There is a conflict of opinion as to the proper place in the service in ch. at which Banns should be published. The rubric as altered at the last review says

2. Rule as to Publication.

"immediately before the Sentences for the Offertory," the Marriage Act states "after the second lesson," and about the year 1809 the rubric was altered by the Curators of the Press at Oxford with the object of bringing it into conformity with the supposed meaning of the Act of Parliament, but apparently without lawful authority. Inasmuch as sect. 2 set out above (re-enacting sect. 1 of the first Marriage Act) contains no indication of any intention to alter the direction of the rubric as to the time for publication of Banns at morning service, but on the contrary enforces the provisions of the rubric so far as they are not expressly altered, it is thought that the proper time for publication at morning service is immediately before the Offertory Sentences and that the words "immediately after the second lesson" refer only to Evening Prayer. Plainly, the spirit and object of the rubric is to secure publication to a full congregation, and it may be that publication after the Nicene Creed when Morning Prayer has been read including the two lessons is good. But publication at an ordinary early Communion Service, as is sometimes the case, is of doubtful validity.

The words "dwelt inhabited or lodged" have never received judicial interpretation, but in the opinion of Sir R. Phillimore (1861) they would be "satisfied by a lodging taken for 15 days in which the persons taking it occasionally sleep and reside—and that they would not be satisfied by the mere hiring of the lodgings without any residence therein"; and he also says, "I do not believe the true intent of the law was to enforce more than 15 days' bona fide residence in a parish in which the parties did not usually reside. If they usually dwell therein, 15 days' residence before the banns are published I hold to be unnecessary—the object is to give persons legally interested in preventing the marriage a certain amount of notice that it is about to be contracted." A false description of residence has been held to impose upon the Clergyman, if the fact be known to him, the duty of not proceeding with the marriage ceremony.

1. Where parties dwell in Different Parishes. Banns must be published in each. On no account should a Clergyman proceed unless the certificate required by the rubric be forthcoming and apparently in order. No form of certificate is prescribed, but the following is sufficient: "I hereby Certify that the banns of marriage between A.B., Bachelor, of the Parish of Liverpool in the County of Lancaster, and C.D., Spinster, of the Parish of Walton on the Hill in the same County, were duly published in the Parish Ch. of St. Peter, Liverpool, on three several Sundays namely March 6th, 13th and 20th, 1910, and no objection was declared."

4. Other Points. "Dated this 21st day of March, 1910. J.A.K., Rector of Liverpool."

2. How Banns may be forbidden. Banns may be forbidden or objected to in any manner whether openly and publicly or by communication directly to the Clergyman. The Clergyman must inquire into what is alleged and satisfy himself if the objection be valid or otherwise, and act accordingly. A public objection by parent or guardian renders the publication void.

3. As to Names to be used. The native and original name in full of the parties ought to be used, but, if the original name be not the name of repute, the latter should be used—in other words, the names the parents or guardians, relations and friends, are best acquainted with.

4. Time. Marriage can only be solemnised within three calendar months after complete publication.—
ma. T. H. ARDEN.

BAPTISM.—The doctrine of B., as held in the Ch. of Eng., is to be found in the 27th Art. and the Cat., with which should be compared the language of the three BAPTISMAL OFFICES. B. is one of two "Sacraments of the Gospel." For those general features which it has in common with HC see SACRAMENT. In this art. it will be taken for granted that the above-mentioned; art. has been read, and attention will be concentrated upon those features which are peculiar to Baptism.

The definition of B. in Art. 27 should also be carefully noted (see text under ARTICLES OF RELIGION). How was this statement arrived at?

The doctrine presupposes a precedent usage. It is evident from the NT that the practice of receiving new-comers by B. prevailed in the Ch. universally from the days of Pentecost onwards (Acts 2:38-41; Jerusalem, 8:12-16; Samaria, 8:36; Judæa, 9:18; Damascus, 10:47, 48; Cæsarea, 16:15, 33; Philippi, 18:8; Corinth, 19:5; Ephesus). This practice was not peculiar to Christianity, and, in order to understand it, it is necessary to inquire into the historical antecedents of Christian Baptism.

In the art. SACRAMENT illustrations and initiatory rites, prevailing among many nations and in connection with various religious mysteries, have been referred to. Interesting as they are, they do not throw much light upon the actual evolution of B. in the Christian Ch. The Ch. arose out of the bosom of Judaism, and the customs of the Jews are historically the true antecedents of the Christian custom.

(a) Ceremonial washings were enjoined in the Levitical Law (Lev. 11:28, 40, 13:58, 14:8 f., 52, 15:5, 8, etc.; Numb. 19:7, 8, 10, 17-19). The word Barritzein was used of these washings in NT times (Mk. 7:4; RVm., Lk. 11:38; Heb. 9:10). It was used not only of washings of the hands, but also of cups and pots and brazen vessels.—(b) The prophets foretold a Divine cleansing from sin in the days of the Messianic kingdom, e.g., Ezek. 36:25.—(c) It became the custom among the Jews long before St. John's time to receive proselytes into the Jewish Ch. by B. (see Schürer, Hist. of Jewish People, ii. 2:323; Edersheim, Life and Times of J. the Messiah, 2:747).—(d) "The Baptism of John." St. John Baptist dealt with the Jew, as the Jew dealt with the Gentile proselyte. Although a son of Abraham, he needed cleansing ere he could enter the kingdom of God. St. John was a prophet and herald of Messiah and, as such, he summoned to "the B. (1) of repentance (2) unto remission of sins" (Mark 1:4), i.e., (1) of preparation for the coming of Messiah, (2) of promise of the great Divine Cleansing.—(e) Our Lord's disciples (acc. to St. John 3:22 and 4:1, 2) baptised in the early days of our Lord's ministry. This seems to be a continuation of St. John's method and it was apparently afterwards abandoned. It is not mentioned at all in the Synoptic Gospels even in instructions to the twelve (Mark 6:7 ff.; cp. Lk. 10).

To sum up this section, the word "baptise" had a clear meaning and the practice was a well-known one, before Christian B. was instituted.

Our Lord's Commission to B. is to be found in Mt. 28:19 (cp. Mk. 16:16, but see RVm. to ver. 9; Lk. and Jn. are silent).

4. Instituted by Christ. (a) The integrity of the text was called in question by F. C. Conybeare in the Hibbert Journal, No. 1, on the ground that Eusebius, when quoting Mt. 28:19, either omits altogether the clause "baptising . . . Holy Ghost" or (seventeen times) quotes it in the form

"make disciples of all the nations in my name." Chase (JTS 6 24) replied that (i) theological writers in all ages omit in quotations clauses irrelevant to their immediate purpose; (ii) the Western Text was fond of assimilation of parallel passages, and Eus. may have used such a text or invented the reading himself (see Westcott, Canon, p. xxx, on Chrysostom's quotations); (iii) Eus. thrice explicitly quotes clearly or alludes to the clause "baptising . . . Ghost," where they are relevant to the argument; (iv) the Church habitually exercised reticence with regard to such specifically Christian doctrines as B. and the Trinity (cp. Chrys. on St. Matt., etc.).

(b) The wording of the clause and its relation to the main structure of the verse require attention. "Make disciples": this is the main "commission"—a Missionary Commission. The word "disciple" is used frequently in Gospels and Acts (not found in OT, Eps. or Rev.) to express the relationship to Jesus of his first followers. How Jesus "made disciples" we may see from the Gospels. For the Apostolic practice, see Lk. 24 47, Acts 14 21.—"Baptising them." The order was: (i) preaching; (ii) belief, acceptance of the message as true; (iii) baptism, which symbolised cleansing and initiated into the society of the disciples.—"In" or "into the name." Chase (ib. 6 24), following Westcott, urges the importance of translating "into." Our Lord is not prescribing the use of a formula, but revealing the spiritual significance of the rite (viz., incorporation into God as revealed in His Triune Nature). J. Armitage Robinson (JTS 7 26) urges reasons for taking the clause rather as a solemn authorisation to act "in" the Divine name. The ancient versions all read it in this way.

Our assurance that Christian B. is based upon our Lord's own authority is not, however, based solely upon one text. The universal practice of B. in the Ch. from the beginning seems most intelligible on the supposition that it had the Master's authority. The passages quoted in § 2 should be carefully studied from this point of view.

Acts not only records the universal practice of B., but here and there we come across phrases which throw light upon the meaning of B., such as 2 38, "unto the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive"; 22 16, "arise and be baptised and wash away thy sins, calling on his name."—The Eps. of St. James, St. Jude and 2 Peter do not mention B.—There is one reference to B. in 1 Peter. It occurs in a passage which is difficult, because the figure is involved and the construction complicated. The water of the Flood, through which the family of Noah was safely brought, suggests the water of B., but that which saves is "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the inquiry (or appeal) of (or for) a good conscience toward God" (1 Pet. 3 21 RVm.).—The Ep. to the Hebrews refers to B. in 6 1, 2, where "the teaching of B.'s" may mean teaching as to the distinction between Christian and earlier B.'s, and probably also in 6 4, 5 (or to the laying on of hands). The phrase in 10 22, "our body washed with pure water," may be a reference to B., the outward washing embodying and guaranteeing the inward sprinkling.—St. Paul provides us with a larger body of doctrinal statements. "As many of you as were baptised into Christ did put on Christ" (Gal. 3 27), "were baptised into His death" (Rom. 6 3, 4), and "buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith" (Col. 2 12), "were all baptised in one Spirit into one body" (1 Cor. 12 13, Eph. 4 5), "cleansed by the washing (or laver) of the water, conditioned by an utterance" (Eph. 5 26), "saved through the washing (or laver) of new birth and renewal of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. 3 5).—There is no direct reference to Christian B. in the Apocalypse or in the Gospel or Epistles of St. John. The words of John 3 5, "born of water and the spirit," read in their historical situation must refer primarily to the B. of preparation (see 1 26, 31, 33 and 3 22-26, 4 1, 2). Verse 5 is intended to explain ver. 3, and refers to two things which Nicodemus might be expected to know: (a) John's B.; (b) the Messianic B. in the Spirit, which St. John had foretold. We may now apply the words to Christian B., but we cannot deduce from them a doctrine with regard to Christian B., which would not hold good of the earlier B.—1 John 5 6-8 must similarly refer to actual events in our Lord's earthly life (note aor. part.), i.e., most naturally His B. and His Death. There may be a reference to the incident recorded in Jn. 19 34, and possibly also to the sacramental symbols, as testifying to Christ's continuous power to cleanse and to redeem. Note also the contrast drawn between the B. of John and that of Jesus, the one in water, the other in the Holy Spirit (Mt. 3 11, Mk. 1 8, Lk. 3 16, Jo. 1 33, Acts 1 5, 11 16, 19 3-6; cp. 1 Cor. 12 13); the analogy of B. unto Moses in the Cloud and in the Sea (1 Cor. 10 1, 2); the baptism for the dead at Corinth (1 Cor. 15 29); and the B. of suffering (Mk. 10 39, Lk. 12 50).

In weighing the NT references to B. we must note (1) the connection in which they occur and the proportional place which B. occupies in the doctrinal scheme of the writers, (2) the absence of reference to B. where according to some doctrinal schemes we should have expected to find it. If we observe the NT proportion, we shall approach the doctrine of the Sacraments of grace through the doctrine of grace, and not vice versa.

Adults only are explicitly mentioned in the NT as the subjects of B., and the absence of any explicit command to baptise infants and of any explicit record of the B. of Infants has been interpreted by many as showing that the practice of Infant B. was not apostolic. There is, however, a good deal which points in the opposite direction.

(a) The argument from silence is precarious. The keeping of Sunday instead of Saturday and the presence of women at the HC are neither of them explicitly commanded in the NT. It may in fact be interpreted in favour of Infant B. on the ground that Jews, who were accustomed to the admission of their male infants into the Old Covenant by Circumcision, would expect a similar admission into the New Covenant by B. The children of proselytes were thus admitted into the Jewish Ch. If the children had been excluded from membership in the Christian Ch. there would have arisen strong protests on the part of Jewish believers.—(b) The analogies with circumcision (Rom. 4 11-13, Gal. 3 6-29) and with the passing through the Red Sea (1 Cor. 10 2, note "were all baptised") point in the same direction.—(c) The words of St. Peter in Acts 2 38, 39 seem to mean actual children and not merely posterity, and the households recorded as baptised (Acts 16 15, 16 33, 1 Cor. 1 16) may well have included infants.

Passing to the Post-Apostolic Ch. we find the Didache (§ 7), an ancient Ch. Manual written about the end of the 1st cent., laying down rules for the instruction and preparation by fasting of candidates for B., which clearly refer to adults; and Justin Martyr (I Apol. 61), about A.D. 155, gives an account of the administration of B., in which he speaks of the baptised as those "who are fully persuaded that what we have taught them is in accordance with the truth and who have devoted themselves to a Christian life." Probably the B. of converts in that missionary age so overshadowed that of infants that these two writers thought it sufficient to deal with the former only (cp. Reports of Missionary Societies to-day). Irenæus (Adv. Haer., ii. 22 4), about A.D. 180, uses language which clearly points to the prevalence of Infant B. in his day, while Tertullian's plea (De Bapt. 18) for delay until years of discretion ipso facto implies that in his day (about A.D. 200) the B. of infants was the rule. In the 4th cent. it is possible to cite what appears at first sight to be instances of Christian parents delaying the B. of their children, but in each case (with the exception of Gregory Naz.) the father seems to have been a heathen at the time of the child's birth. St. Augustine (De Bapt. con. Donat. 4 23) bears witness that in his day (about A.D. 400) Infant B. was "that which the whole Church practises, and which has not been instituted by Councils but was ever in use," so that it "is very reasonably believed to be no other than a thing delivered by authority of the Apostles." From St. Augustine's days onwards, the B. of Infants has been the rule of every section of the Christian Ch. with the exception of the Baptists and the Plymouth Brethren. The position of the Ch. of Eng. is set forth with studied moderation in the last sentence of Art. 27.

(a) The word βαπτίζω primarily meant "immerse," but in the Greek version of the OT, and therefore in the NT, it was used in a technical religious sense of an act of ceremonial cleansing (see § 3 a above). Hand-washing was by pouring water over the hands, not by immersion. B. "in the Holy Spirit" was by outpouring (Acts 2 17, 18, 33; 10 44, 45; and see 1 Cor. 10 2). (b) B. in a river (Mk. 1 5, etc.) might be by immersion, or by pouring upon the head while standing in the water (as seen in early Catacomb paintings). The house of the jailor at Philippi is not likely to have contained a bath or tank permitting of total immersion (Acts 16 33). (c) St. Paul twice speaks of B. as a burial and resurrection with Christ. The idea of cleansing is, however, the primary NT idea of the significance of B., and that of a mystical death and resurrection, although strikingly illustrated by immersion, is secondary and does not demand literal immersion in water as essential to the validity or regularity of the rite.

The Didache (l.c.) speaks of B. in running water, if possible, or in other water, cold or warm, or by pouring water thrice upon the head. In Cyprian's time (about 250) B. by pouring or sprinkling was given only to the sick, but is defended by him (Ep. 69 12-16) as under the circumstances perfectly adequate.

Immersion of infants was the rule until the 13th cent. in the Church of the West, and in England it remained the rule until towards the end of the 16th cent., although Affusion was allowed "if the Child be weak." (See Rubric, and BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 19.) In the 17th cent. the Baptists began by using affusion, but in 1642 the practice of immersion was introduced amongst them and it speedily became the rule. All other Western Christian bodies in the present day, who baptise at all, use sprinkling or affusion (pouring over the head).

B. in the NT is said to be "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" (Mt. 28 19), but more often "in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 2 38, 10 48), "into Christ" (Gal. 3 27; cp. Rom. 6 3), or "into the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 8 16, 19 5). These phrases may however be intended, not to give us any form of words used at the moment of B., but merely to declare that it was Christian B. (and see § 4 b above).

The Didache enjoins B. "in (or "into") the name of the F. and of the S. and of the H.Gh.," and Justin Martyr and Tertullian (De Bapt. 13) speak of a similar usage but in varying language. But Stephen, Bp. of Rome, successfully contends, against Cyprian, that those who have been baptised simply "into the name of Christ" do not need to be rebaptised, and Ambrose takes the same line. This seems to point to a double tradition in the Ch.; at any rate the question of the formula was not regarded as of first-rate importance.

The NT nowhere lays down or suggests that Ordination was a necessary qualification for the proper performance of the rite.

8. The Administrator. The words in the Didache, "baptise ye thus," seems as general as directions to fast or pray. Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 8 2) insists that B. shall not be administered without the authority of the bp., but, like Justin Martyr a few years later, lays down no rule as to who shall administer it. Tertullian (De Bapt. 17) says that ordinarily the officers of the Church only should baptise, but, when they cannot be obtained, laymen may baptise. (See ORDERS, HOLY, § 14; and LAY-BAPTISM.)

The teaching of the Ch. of Eng. on B. is found in its simplest form in the Ch. Cat. (cp. Art. 27). B. is one of two Sacraments of the Gospel. A Sacrament has two parts, one outward, one inward. The outward visible sign or form in B. is "Water, wherein the person is baptised in the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" (see § 8). The inward and spiritual grace is "a death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness: for . . . we are hereby made the children of grace." So far all Church teachers are agreed. Disagreement unfortunately arises over the question: What is the relation between the two parts? Agreed that to every baptised person Regeneration is "formally" or "sacramentally" given, (a) Is it in every case actually received? (b) Is it always received at the moment of administration of the rite? In the discussion of these points the preliminary question arises: What is Regeneration? For this last point, see REGENERATION.

Here we can only say that in the NT, while the word "Regeneration" only occurs once of spiritual regeneration (Tit. 3 5), the thing itself is described in a number of ways, all of which convey the idea of a new birth issuing in a new life, e.g., begotten again (1 Peter 1 3, 23), begotten of God (1 Jn. 3 9, etc.), children of God, sons of God, begotten of the Spirit (Jn. 3 5-8), new creation, newness of life. The same meaning prevails in the usage of the Fathers, the Schoolmen, and the Church Catechism as above. For other and secondary uses of the word, see § 11 (last part) and § 12.

The only hope of disentangling these knotty questions is to take the cases of (a) adults and (b) infants separately.

The Cat., Pt. II, Q. 6, takes the case of adults first, and we shall do well to adopt the same order. The first point is: (a) Is

11. Baptismal Regeneration: Regeneration in every case actually received? We note at the outset

(a) Adults. that there are conditions attached to the donation, "conditions precedent" to the enjoyment of the gift. "What is required of persons to be baptised? Repentance . . . and Faith. . . ." What then happens, if the baptised person be not penitent and believing at the moment of administration? B. is an initiatory rite and cannot be repeated. Has such a person lost for ever the grace of Regeneration owing to his lack of receptivity at the moment? The answer of the Ch. from the first has been: No. He has received the Sacrament of the Grace, and has thus received a title to the Grace of the Sacrament upon fulfilling the conditions. He is introduced into a covenanted state. He has "the baptismal character." The liberal rule of admission into the Early Ch. is only intelligible on such a supposition. Grace could not thus be tied to one particular moment. The Ch. has therefore always held that the "Fictus" (i.e., the person who receives the rite of B. in a state of unworthiness) has the inward grace conditionally made over to him, and that this becomes actually his as soon as he repents and believes. The "title" which he received at B. holds good throughout life. The same rule was applied to those who lapsed into sin and to those who were baptised in schism and heresy.

Cp. Waterland 4 443. (1) ". . . God never fails as to His part . . ." (2) The Holy Spirit is in some sense offered to all that receive Christian B. . . . (3) The Holy Spirit . . . consecrates the persons (baptised) in an outward and relative sense . . . , which consecration is for ever binding (4) Even the unworthy are by their B. put into a Christian state. . . . Therefore . . . they must be supposed to have pardon and grace and gospel privileges conditionally made over to them, though not yet actually applied by reason of their disqualifications. If they do repent . . . then that conditional grant, suspended as it were before with respect to any saving effects, begins at length to take place effectually. . . ." See Mozley, Review of the Baptismal Controversy, pt. I, chap. 3.

The answer, therefore, as to the first point is: Regeneration, in the sense of an actual death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness, is really received in the case of an Adult if, and when, and only when, the conditions upon which the "title" is given in the rite of B. are actually fulfilled.

When we pass on to the second point and ask, (b) Is Regeneration always received at the moment of administration of the rite, we see that we have already partially answered that question. In the case of the Fictus, Regeneration in the full sense does not pass to the unworthy recipient of the Sacrament. It is "suspended" for the time being. But what about the penitent believing adult; does not he receive Regeneration at the moment of administration? Well, does he? Does not many a catechumen in heathen lands to-day show every sign of having "passed from death unto life" before the hour of his B. arrives?

By a series of steps Ch. theologians arrived at the "obsignatory theory," and decided that the believing Adult was regenerate before B., though this did not relieve him from the obligation to receive the outward seal of the Sacrament. (i) It was recognised that an unbaptised catechumen dying a martyr's death must have received the "res sacramenti," "the thing signified" (so Cyprian; and Aug., c. Don. 4 29). (ii) But a catechumen dying unbaptised might have the spirit of a martyr, though his death might be due to accident not to martyrdom: must not he too be recognised as having received regeneration? Ambrose answered: Yes. Finally, (iii) it was realised that on the same principle all faithful catechumens possessed the grace of regeneration before B. Tert. and Aug. in an incidental way admit this, and the Schoolmen adopt it methodically. Peter Lombard treats it as universally recognised (4 4, 6, 7). "B.," he says, in the case of a believing adult, "is the Sacrament of the Thing which has preceded, i.e., of the remission of sins given before through faith. . . . Do not wonder that sometimes the Thing precedes, when sometimes it follows long after."

But how then are we to understand the language of the Office of B. for such as are of riper years, which like that of all ancient Offices implies that the person baptised is unregenerate up to the moment of B., and regenerate immediately after? The answer is, that the historical doctrine of the Ch. upon the subject of B. proves that this PB language is the recognised language of ceremonial, and does not imply a doctrine to that effect. The rite of B. is the ceremonial counterpart of the spiritual fact of a new birth, and its language is framed accordingly. As having received the Sacrament or sign of regeneration all the baptised may be said to be "sacramentally" regenerate; they are then formally incorporated into Christ's body, the Ch.; but the actual inward new birth "may be granted before, in, or after B." (see Mozley, ib., pt. I, c. 9).

(c) The preceding discussion will have sufficiently shown that Regeneration in its primary meaning, as defined in the Ch. Cat., can, in the case of adults, be actually enjoyed only by penitent believers, although in a secondary sense, by a common usage, "all that are baptised may be called by man regenerate . . . as having received the Sacrament of regeneration, and thus being sacramentally regenerate" (Goode, Effects of Infant B., p. 22). See SACRAMENT, § 9.

In the case of infants, as in the case of adults, we have to answer the same two questions:

(a) Is Regeneration in every case received? (b) Is it in every case received at the time of administration?

(b) Infants. These questions we cannot answer until we have dealt with three preliminary points. (1) We saw that in the case of adults there were "conditions precedent" to the reception of the inward grace and therefore of the complete Sacrament, viz., repentance and faith. Are these conditions set aside in the case of infants? The answer of our Ch. is clear. "Why then are Infants baptised when by reason of their tender age they cannot perform them? Because they promise them both (i.e., both repentance and faith) by their sureties; which promise, when they come to age, themselves are bound to perform." The performance then is essential to the reception in the full sense of the grace of the Sacrament. The conditions are postponed, not over-ridden. (2) Many persons, baptised in infancy, show no signs to the day of their death of any new life, such as would follow a real "death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness." Many others do not appear to enter into newness of life until many years after their reception of the outward rite. Our theory of Baptismal Regeneration must be such as will do equal justice to the teaching of Scripture and to the facts of experience. (3) Scripture cannot directly decide these questions, because it "only explicitly mentions such conditions as adults can fulfil" (Mozley, Baptismal Controversy, p. 22 f.). The bearing of its teaching on Infant B. must therefore be a matter of inference, not of direct statement.

Let us now attack these questions (a) and (b) as given above. In the Baptismal Office, the priest, after the B. and reception into the Ch., uses these words (added in 1552): "Seeing now . . . that this Child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Ch., let us give thanks . . . and . . . make our prayer that this child may lead the rest of his life according to this beginning." All the clergy of the Ch. of Eng. use these words, but the exact meaning of the words is a matter of dispute.

The following five explanations have been given.

(i) "This child is regenerate." This is true, in the full sense of actual new birth, of all baptised infants unconditionally (so the Roman Schoolmen). But, to square this with actual facts, they watered regeneration down to mean "infused good habits implanted by divine grace," and went on to contradict their own definition of a habit as "a quality of the mind not easily removable, by which one acts easily and pleasurably" by laying down that these "infused good habits" only acted when set in motion either by man's will assisted by special grace or by special and sovereign grace alone, and that these habits were frequently so hindered by concupiscence that they never acted at all. This theory is artificial and false. Habits which never act are not habits at all. In modern days the same theory seems implied when it is taught that in B. a "germ" of eternal life is in every case implanted, though it may never afterwards come to fruition. This phraseology is borrowed from biology. It seems to suggest a semi-materialistic, almost physical, embodiment of life which is alien to the spiritual reality. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and the two births take place after the laws of the respective spheres, flesh and spirit, to which they belong.

(ii) "This child is regenerate." Yes, all baptised infants are "sacramentally" regenerate as having received the sacrament of regeneration, but "really and truly" only when and if they are baptised with the Holy Ghost (so Mayer's Catechism, published under Laud's primacy, etc., quoted in Mozley, ib., pt. I, chap. 11, pp. 172-3). Such a use, as we have already seen (see SACRAMENT, § 9), is common among the Fathers and the Reformers, and it is legitimate so long as it is plain that the regeneration of all baptised infants is meant in this secondary sense, and not in the full scriptural sense of actual new birth showing itself necessarily in a new life. Even an infant born dead may be said to be "born," but regeneration in its full sense means "born alive" (see Dimock, The Doctrine of the Sacraments, note v).

(iii) "This child is regenerate." Yes, but a distinction must be made between regeneration and renovation. Regeneration is a change of state, whereby the baptised is introduced into the sphere of grace, into new spiritual surroundings. This is true of all infants. Renovation, on the other hand, is that inner change of heart wrought within by the operation of the Spirit of God (see Harold Browne, On the Articles, p. 615, and quotation from Waterland in note). Using regeneration in this eccles. sense, Bp. Wilberforce speaks of "the regenerate man, who will not be converted, as the most fearful spectacle of obstinate rebellion" possible (Addresses to candidates for Ordination, pp. 45-46).

(iv) "This child is regenerate." Yes, regenerate in the full sense of the word, if elect (so the Calvinists). "Baptism," says Calvin, "is God's ordinary instrument to change and regenerate us." "We deny that infants cannot be regenerated" (i.e., in the full sense of the word) "by the power of God. . . . It is true that faith and repentance are not yet formed in them, but they have implanted in them, by the secret operation of the Spirit, the latent seed of both" (Institutes 4 14, 12, 16, 18-20). This seminal faith and repentance, according to the Calvinist, is indefectible and is given only to elect infants. But he cannot tell who have this "prevenient" grace. Some certainly are regenerate, and he therefore proceeds on the hypothesis for the time being that the child baptised is elect and therefore regenerate.

(v) "This child is regenerate." Yes, we can say this in the full sense, by anticipation, on the supposition that the answers made by the sponsors will be made good by the child, when it has come to years of discretion. The title is now given. The grace is conditionally made over to the child. We trust that the child will by fulfilment of the conditions actually appropriate the grace thus given. The child is, therefore, spoken of as regenerate by anticipation and hypothesis. He is potentially, but not actually, such, until signs of spiritual life are manifested.

Augustine seems to hold this view (De Bapt. con. Donat. 4 24): "As in Isaac, who was circumcised the eighth day, the seal of the righteousness went before, and (as he was a follower of his father's faith) the righteousness itself . . . came after: so in infants baptised the sacrament of regeneration goes before, and (if they put in practice the Christian religion) conversion of the heart, the mystery (i.e., sacrament) "whereof went before in their body, comes after" (cp. Ussher, Body of Divinity: "The righteousness of Christ and all the promises of grace were in my B. estated upon me and sealed up unto me on God's part: but then I come to have the profit and benefit of them, when I come to understand what grant God in B. hath sealed unto me, and actually to lay hold upon it by faith"—see whole passage quoted in Goode's Effects of Infant B., pp. 316-7).

It will be seen that these different ways of understanding an apparently straightforward statement may be divided into two

14. Criticism of Interpretations. "regenerate."

1. Those who insist that every baptised infant "is" regenerate unconditionally do so at the expense of the word "regenerate," which they are compelled by the logic of the facts to water down until regeneration means (i) an infusion of good habits which do not necessarily act, or (ii) the reception of the sacrament of regeneration, or (iii) the introduction into new spiritual surroundings.

2. Those who feel that they cannot thus empty the word "regeneration" of its full scriptural sense as a new birth, ushering in a new life, are compelled in like manner to qualify the word "is" and to say that, while it is either (iv) true at the time of those infants who have already seminal faith, or (v) true, by anticipation, of those who will hereafter appropriate the sacramental donation, it is not true of all. There are conditions attached which all do not and will not fulfil, and therefore the statement must be taken as one of charitable presupposition. The sponsors have spoken "in the name of" the child, and the statement assumes that the sponsors truly represent the child. These two lines of explanation can each of them claim to be in accordance with recognised linguistic usage. On the one hand, such words as "Christian," "saint," "elect," etc., have both a lower and a higher sense (cp. St. Paul in Rom. 2 28, 29: "He is not a Jew who is one outwardly . . . but he is a Jew who is one inwardly"), and therefore we may use "regeneration" in the lower sense, if we carefully make clear that it is in that sense that we use it.

On the other hand, the language of supposition is a recognised use of language, pervading ordinary literature, the Scriptures and the PB (cp. the language of the Burial Service and of the office of Adult Baptism), and those who wish to be true to the scriptural definition of the inward grace as given in the Cat. will prefer to resort to this line of explanation (Mozley, ib., pt. II, cc. 2-5, esp. 4). It will now be seen that the answers to questions (a) and (b) above depend upon which of the definitions of regeneration we accept. Every infant at the moment of B. receives regeneration as defined in par. 1, (ii) and (iii), but not regeneration in its full scriptural sense as defined in par. 2. The danger of statements using the word "regeneration" in one of the senses of group 1 is that they may be (and often are) understood in one of the senses of group 2, and the impression conveyed that all baptised persons, although they have never fulfilled the conditions of repentance and faith, are necessarily and in the fullest sense "born again." That danger is avoided by treating the case of infants as subject to the same laws as the case of adults, the only difference being that in the case of infants the fulfilment of the conditions is postponed until "they come to age."

There are a few phrases which require brief elucidation. (1) In Article 27. (a) "A sign of profession." Zwinglians and Anabaptists would go thus far. Cp.

15. Supplementary Notes. closing Exhortation in Bapt. 1, 2, 3.—(b) "A sign of regeneration." Art. 25 calls Sacrs. "effectual signs"; "regeneration" is defined by the addition "or new birth."—(c) "Whereby," i.e., by which sign (Latin per quod); "instrument" here = a grafting tool; "rightly" (Latin recte) = worthily: B. is effectual in all who receive "rightly."—(d)

"The promises . . . are visibly signed and sealed." Cp. the obnoxious view (as in Ussher, quoted § 13).—(e) "Forgiveness," "adoption": the two Baptismal gifts, as in the Confirmation Service: "who hast vouchsafed to regenerate . . . and hast given unto them forgiveness of all their sins."—(f) "By the Holy Ghost" may be connected with either the words that precede or the words that follow, but the former seems preferable.—(g) "Faith is confirmed and grace increased," i.e., in the typical case of the believing adult. In those who have been baptised in infancy the same result follows believing retrospect.

(2) In the Catechism, Pt. I. The Catechism presumes that every child who uses it is "in the spiritual condition in which a Christian child ought to be." The same child who says, "Wherein I was made a member of Christ . . ." says also, "By God's help so I will (believe and do, as promised). And I heartily thank our heavenly Father . . . and I pray unto God. . . ." And again, "I learn to believe in . . . God the Holy Ghost, who sanctifieth me and all the elect people of God." Those who remember what "elect" meant at the time when the Cat. was compiled and who notice the present tense, "sanctifieth," will realise that the last quoted answer must have been understood hypothetically, and that the answer first quoted must equally have been understood at that time either in the "hypothetical" or the "sacramental" sense, § 142 (iv), (v), or 141 (ii), (iii). Apart from their historical setting the words are of course susceptible of other meanings. The Questions and Answers in Part II have been sufficiently dealt with in § 14.

(3) In the Baptismal Services. In the 2nd Pr. in Bapt., the words "remission of his sins by spiritual regeneration," imply that the whole service has an anticipatory character. The infant cannot yet have committed "sins," but B. certifies forgiveness of "sins" to the baptised on repentance and faith.

Other doctrinal phrases have been sufficiently dealt with in §§ 11 and 12.

Arts. in Hastings' Dict. of the Bible, Enc. Brit., and esp. the Enc. of Religion and Ethics (Bartlet, Lake and Wood); Hooker, Ecl. Pol.

18. Bibliography. 538-66; Mozley, Review of Baptismal Controversy; Dimock, Doctrine of the Sacraments; F. W. Robertson, Sermons 4 and 5 (2nd series); Darwell Stone, Holy Baptism; W. Wall, History of Infant Baptism.—id.

J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

BAPTISM, LAY.—See LAY BAPTISM.

BAPTISM, PREPARATION FOR.—See PREPARATION.

BAPTISMAL OFFICES.

- I. THE THREE BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 1.
- II. PRELIMINARY, § 2-5.
- III. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.¹, § 6-24.
- IV. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.², § 25-31.
- V. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.³, § 32, 33.
- VI. PRACTICAL HINTS, § 34-37.
- VII. COMPARATIVE TABLE, § 38.
- VIII. BIBLIOGRAPHY, § 39.

I. THE THREE BAPTISMAL OFFICES. There are three Bapt. Offices in the PB, entitled

1. The Three Baptismal Offices. (1) "The Ministration of Publick Baptism of Infants, to be used in the Church" (Bapt.¹);

(2) "The Ministration of Private Baptism of Children in houses" (Bapt.²);

(3) "The Ministration of Baptism to such as are of riper years, and are able to answer for themselves" (Bapt.³).

Bapt.³ was drawn up in 1662. Up to that date the same office had served for the Bapt. of children and of adults. Bapt.² is merely an adaptation of Bapt.¹ for cases of necessity, and, as far as may be, follows on its lines. Thus Bapt.¹ is the proper PB representative of the Bapt. Offices of the early and mediæval churches, and hence it will form the main subject of the present article.

II. PRELIMINARY. In the Sar. Manual the Bapt. Service was divided into three parts, all of which might be, and sometimes

2. The Three Divisions of the Service. were, used at separate times:

(a) The Order for Making a Catechumen, said at the church door;

(β) The Blessing of the Font, used only on Easter and Whitsun Evens, and whenever the water needed to be changed;

(γ) The Rite of Baptising.

These distinctions were retained in the PB of 1549, though the special names for the various parts were omitted. In 1552 and ever since all three parts are still represented, though the distinctions have been removed. The service now forms one harmonious whole, said at the Font and at the same time.

The problem which faced the compilers of the Bapt. Offices of 1549 was a comparatively simple one. Bapt. was not a subject

3. Principles of the PB Compilers. of much controversy at that time, and it would not be easy to find much doctrinal difference between the teaching of the Sar. Bapt. rite and that of the PB. The principles which guided the Reformers in this part of their work were three: (i) turning the service into English; (ii) simplifying it by omitting the less important and less edifying ceremonies; (iii) making the earlier part of the service more appropriate to the circumstances of the time. Most of the Sar. formulæ and prs. in this part had reference to a course of pre-baptismal teaching and preparation. They were highly appropriate while heathenism was still rampant, but had ceased to be suitable in a Christian country where practically all were baptised in infancy.

Much of the Bapt. Offices of the PB of 1549 was composed by the compilers. This is especially the case with the Exhortations. But still more was derived

4. Sources. from pre-existing sources. These sources were four: (a) the Bible; (b) the Sar. Manual, which contained the Bapt. services; (c) various German Reformed Offices, more especially HERMANN'S CONSULTATION, published in 1543 and translated into Latin in 1545 (it is from this Latin translation that we quote below); (d) some Gallican rite, probably the Mozarabic, the only one then in print.

The influence of (b) is visible all through the Bapt. Offices of 1549, and in particular it is practically the only source of (γ). (c) is the main source of (α). (d) is used in the Blessing of the Font (β) only. Thus we see the influence of the German books chiefly in the less important parts of the rite. The more solemn parts follow the ancient forms.

As is well known, the PB of 1549 was considerably altered in 1552, mainly through the influence of Bucer. In the Bapt.

5. Alterations in 1552. Offices he objected to the following particulars: (1) the earlier part of the service being said at the church-door; (2) the Exorcism; (3) the white Vesture; (4) the Unction; (5) the Blessing of the Water; (6) the Sign of the Cross on the child's forehead and breast, and the words which accompanied it because addressed to the child; (7) the addressing of the Questions to the child instead of the godparents (Bucer wished them to take some such shape as this: "Will you for your parts take diligence that this infant when he grows up, etc. ?"); (8) certain expressions in the first two prayers—"by the Bapt. of thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ thou didst sanctify the flood Jordan and all other waters to this mystical washing away of sin," "they coming to thy holy Bapt." The first five of these were accordingly omitted, and partial concessions were, as we shall see, made in (6) and (7). But the expressions in (8) were retained; and in 1662 (5), the Blessing of the Water, was re-introduced. Otherwise the service remains in all its main features the same as in 1552.

III. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.¹ The Office begins with three Rubrics. The first of these comes from the PB of 1549, in which it was preceded by a notice (omitted in 1662) to the effect that in the old time Bapt. was publicly administered at Easter and Whitsuntide only. The idea of bringing Bapt. into greater prominence by ministering it chiefly on Sundays and holy-days is probably derived from Hermann. In practice this Rubric is seldom carried out, Bapt. usually forming a separate service, and taking place in presence of the relations and friends only. There are no doubt difficulties in the way of obeying the Rubric. But the spiritual loss is great, as the teaching contained in the Bapt. service is too often forgotten or ignored. It is an excellent plan to have Public Bapts. on certain fixed days, e.g., Easter Even, Whitsun Even, and the Eve of the Epiphany, the days commonly appointed for that rite in the early Church.

The second Rubric which regulates the number of godparents was added in 1662, but probably represents earlier custom. By the 29th canon of 1604 parents are forbidden to stand as sponsors to their children, and no one is allowed to be a godparent until he has first received HC. (The former part of this canon was repealed informally by Convocation in 1865.) On the other hand, in the Irish and Amer. PB's parents are expressly allowed to be sponsors, and a canon of the Scotch Episcopal Church (canon 34 of 1876) gives the same permission. These authorities likewise allow fewer than three sponsors in cases of necessity.

The third Rubric is derived with some alterations from the PB of 1549, the main point of difference being the direction that the Font is then to be filled with pure water. In the 1549 book the water needed to be changed only once a month.

The question as to whether the child has been already baptised or not comes from the Sar., and is intended to guard against the possibility of a sacrilegious repetition of Bapt. (see RE-BAPTISM). It is followed by the first Exh., one phrase in which ("all men are conceived and born in sin") is taken from Hermann, while the rest was drawn up in 1549. The object of this Exh. is to point out (from John 3 5) the necessity of Bapt., and to ask the prs. of the congregation for the child.

The Pr. following is based on 1 Peter 3 20, 21 and 1 Cor. 10 1, 2, and was in all probability originally composed by Luther. The translation

8. 1st Prayer. of 1549 was re-modelled and improved in 1552. "Pater omnipotens Deus, qui olim impium mundum horribili iudicio tuo per diluvium perdidisti, et solam familiam pii Noe, octo tantum animas, pro ineffabili misericordia tua conservasti, et qui obduratum Aegyptiorum Regem Pharaonem cum omnibus copiis et virtute ejus bellica submersisti in Mari Rubro, populumque tuum Israeliticum siccis pedibus transire fecisti, et in his lavacrum regenerationis sacrum baptismi adumbrare voluisti; praeterea baptisate Filii tui Christi Jesu Jordanem et caeteras aquas ad sanctam demersionem atque ablutionem peccatorum consecrasti: rogamus te pro immensa misericordia tua infantem hunc propitius respice, veram illi fidem et Spiritum sanctum tuum dona, ut per hoc sacrosanctum diluvium in eo submergatur et pereat quicquid ex Adamo sordium contraxit, ut ex impiorum numero segregatus, in sancta ecclesiae tuae arca tutus servari possit et nomen tuum alacri et ferventi spiritu semper confiteri et sanctificare et regno tuo constanti fiducia et certa spe inservire, quae tandem cum piis omnibus promissionem aeternae vitae asequatur per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum" (Hermann).

This Pr. was followed in 1549 by the Sign of the Cross made on the child's forehead and breast with an appropriate form of words, but these were removed in 1552 (with some modifications) to a later point in the service (see below § 23).

Next comes the Pr., "Almighty and immortal God, etc." This Pr. (based on Matt. 7 7, 8) has remained unaltered since 1549 and is

9. 2nd Prayer. translated from Sar. It is found in Greg., but does not occur in Gel.:

"Deus, immortale praesidium omnium postulantium, liberatio supplicum, pax rogantium, vita credentium, resurrectio mortuorum: te invoco super hunc famulum tuum N. qui, baptisati tui donum petens, aeternam consequi gratiam spirituali regeneratione desiderat. Accipe eum, Domine: ut quia dignatus es dicere, Petite et accipietis, quaerite et invenietis, pulsate et aperietur vobis, petenti prae-mium porridge, et januam pande pulsanti: ut aeternam coelestis lavacri benedictionem consecutus, promissa tui muneris regna percipiat. Qui vivis et regnas cum Deo Patre in unitate Spiritus Sancti, Deus per omnia saecula saeculorum" (Sar.).

It will be noticed that in the original this Pr. is addressed to our Lord, but in the English to God the Father.

Here in 1549 came the EXORCISM, omitted in 1552.

Next follows the Bapt. Gospel, the purpose of which is to take away all doubts as to the lawfulness of Infant Bapt. Just as the foregoing prayers are the modern representatives of the prayers said over Catechumens in the early Church, so the Gospel is the modern representative of the doctrinal and

7. Preliminary Question and 1st Exhortation.

6. Preliminary Rubric of Bapt.¹

10. The Baptismal Gospel.

moral teaching given to them. Very naturally, the subject is Christ blessing little children. But while in the Sar. this was taken from Matt. (19 13-15), in the PB it is taken from Mark (10 13-16). The reason for the change is obvious. Mark's account is so much fuller and more appropriate than Matthew's. Here again the Reformers followed German authorities, the passage from Mark occurring in Hermann.

The Gospel is followed by a second Exh. in which the priest enlarges on its teaching and applies it to the present infant. This Exh. owes the

11. 2nd
Exhortation and Prayer
following.

following clauses to Hermann: "commanded the children to be brought unto him," "doubt ye not therefore, but earnestly believe that . . . he will embrace him with the arms of his mercy, that he will give unto him the blessing of eternal life, and make him partaker of his everlasting kingdom," "nothing doubting but that he favourably allowed this charitable work of ours in bringing this infant." The remainder was composed in 1549. It then led up to the recitation (from the Sar.) of the Lord's Pr. and the Creed, a relic of the Redditio Symboli, the solemn public repetition of the Creed by the Catechumens before Bapt. This was omitted in 1552, and the Exh. was thus immediately followed by the Pr. "Almighty and everlasting God, heavenly Father, etc.," which is partly a thanksgiving to God for having called his people to a state of grace, and partly an intercession for the infant. Like a former Pr. it was composed by Luther, and is taken from Hermann:

"Omnipotens et aeternae Deus, Pater coelestis, gratias agimus tibi aeternas, quod ad hanc agnitionem gratiae tuae et fidei erga te nos vocare dignatus es. Auge et confirma hanc fidem in nobis perpetuo. Da huic infanti Spiritum Sanctum tuum quo regeneretur et haeres fiat aeternae salutis quam ecclesiae tuae sanctae, pueris simul et senibus, propter Christum ex gratia et misericordia tua promissisti, per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum qui tecum vivit et regnat nunc et in perpetuum."

The wording of the Exh. at its close has given rise to the idea (embodied in a rubric of the Irish PB) that the above Pr. was intended to be said by the people together with the priest. That this is not so is shown by the fact that the Pr. is not divided into paragraphed sentences, as all prayers intended for joint repetition (e.g., the General Conf.) are, and by the Amen at the end being printed in italics.

In 1549 the priest was then directed to take the child by the right hand and bring him to the Font. This ceremony (from the Sar.) ended the first part of the Office, and was of course omitted in 1552, when the whole service was directed to be said at the Font.

The more solemn part of the service now begins with an address to the godparents leading up to the

12. Address to Godparents.

Answers they are to make in the child's name. The latter part of the address is the work of the compilers of 1549, but the former is derived from Hermann:

"Dilecti in Christo, hesterno die gratia Dei audivimus quam immensa et ineffabilis misericordia in baptismo exhibetur. Satanæ et mundo renuntiastis, fidem Christi estis confessi et obedientiam Christo et ecclesiae promissistis, et petistis a Deo Patre, ut propter Filium suum Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum infantes hos eripiat e regno tenebrarum et constituat in regno Filii sui dilecti. Horum meminisse vos oportet, et non dubitare nos haec omnia quae petimus certo esse accepturos, si credimus."

We now come to the Bapt. Questions. Bapt. involves a covenant between God and man. Man promises faith and obedience—a belief in the Christian religion, and a life in accordance with God's commandments. God on his part

13. The Baptismal Questions and Answers.

covenants that, if man keeps his promises, he shall obtain everlasting life. The promises are expressed in the Answers made to the priest's Questions, and the custom of expressing them bef.

Bapt. in this manner, by Question and Answer, is very old—probably as old as Christianity itself. It was of immemorial antiquity in Tertullian's days, c. 210 (De Cor. Mil. 3), and is possibly referred to by St. Peter when he speaks, in connection with Bapt., of "the interrogation (ἐπερώτημα) of a good conscience towards God" (1 Pet. 3 21 RV). Originally, the Questions and Answers were made twice—once in the presence of the Church—and a second time immediately before the actual Bapt. (Tertullian, l.c.). In the case of an infant, the Answers are made on his behalf by the GODPARENTS, a custom likewise mentioned by Tertullian (De Bapt. 18). The Questions and Answers are four in number: (a) the Renunciation of the Devil, the World and the Flesh; (b) the Confession of Faith; (c) the Desire for Bapt.; (d) the Promise to keep God's Commandments. (d) was added in 1662, the other three being based, though with considerable modifications, on the Sar. (a) and (b) require special mention.

(a) The Renunciation is of primitive antiquity, being mentioned by Tertullian, De Spect. 4, De Cor.

Mil. 3 (in the latter place as an immemorial custom even then); by Origen, Exhort. Mart. 17; and by Cyprian, Ep. 13 (6) 5, De Laps. 8. Its form, according to Tertullian, was to renounce "the devil, his pomp and his angels." The Sar. is very similar: "Dost thou renounce Satan? And all his works? And all his pomps? (Abrenuntias Satanæ? Et omnibus operibus ejus? Et omnibus pompis ejus?). The addition of "the world" is first found in Cyprian (l.c.). It appears also in the Gallican rites, from which, either directly or through Hermann's influence, it has found its way into the PB. The mention of "the flesh" is due to the compilers of 1549.

(b) The Bapt. Confession of Faith follows the Renunciation, and is likewise of immemorial antiquity. It is mentioned by Irenaeus,

14. The Confession of Faith.

c. 185, Contra Haeres. i. 94; Tertullian, De Spect. 4; Cyprian, Ep. 70 2; and, if the textus receptus may be trusted, Acts 8 37. (This verse, whether genuine or not, was found in some copies of Acts before the end of the 2nd cent., as we learn from Irenaeus, Contra Haeres. iii. 12 8.) The PB form differs from that in the Sar. in two respects. (1) In the Sar. it is divided into three questions, each with its answer. So too in 1549. But in 1552 all was thrown into one question. (2) In the PB the whole Ap. Creed is given. The form was shorter in the Sar., though the use of the whole Creed in this place was not unknown in mediæval England (Missal of Robert of Jumièges, p. 99, HBS). Some of the German books contain the whole Creed, e.g., the Brandenburg Nürnberg Kirchen Ordnung of 1533,¹ though not Hermann. And from them it may have come into the PB. (With regard to the peculiarities in the version of the Creed here see APOSTLES' CREED, § 4, 6.) The Amer. PB, with questionable wisdom, compresses all into one sentence: "Dost thou believe all the Articles of the Christian Faith, as contained in the Apostles' Creed?"

We now come to the Blessing of the Water. This again is a custom of great antiquity, being mentioned by Tertullian, De Bapt. 4, and Cyprian, Ep. 70 1. In the PB of 1549 it might be used (as in the Sar.) as a separate Office, and it then consisted of two 16. The Blessing of the Water.

¹ I owe this fact to the kindness of the late Bp. Dowden.

Colls., with eight short petitions between them. In 1552 the first Coll. was omitted, and the short petitions (reduced in number to four) with the second Coll. (based on John 19 34, Matt. 28 19) were made an integral part of Public Bapt.; but everything directly referring to the Blessing of the Water was left out. In 1662 however, the Blessing was restored, the words "sanctify this water to the mystical washing away of sin" being added. We append, from the Mozarabic, the original Latin of the four short petitions, and from the Sar. Benedictio Fontis a passage reproduced in the Coll. following.

"Sepeliatur hic ille Adam vetus, resurgat novus. Moriatur hic omne quod carnis est, resurgat omne quod est Spiritus. . . . Quicumque hic renuntiat Diabolo, da eis triumphare de mundo. . . . Quicumque hic tuus esse coeperit, tuus esse non desinat; ut per ministerium nostrum tibi consecratus, aeternis ad te virtutibus, aeternis praemiis consecratur: per misericordiam ipsius Dei nostri qui est benedictus et vivit et omnia regit in saecula saeculorum" (Moz.).

"Qui te una cum sanguine delatere suo produxit: et discipulis suis jussit ut credentes baptizarentur in te dicens: Ite, docete omnes gentes, baptizantes eos in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti" (Sar.).

The Blessing of the Water is immediately followed by the naming and baptising of the child. The custom of giving the name at Bapt., 17. The Naming of the Child.

which thus becomes the Christian name, has been for centuries universal. But, though of great antiquity, it can hardly be considered primitive. In the Sar. the name was mentioned several times during the service, but in 1549 thrice only—at the signing with the cross, at the Renunciation, and at the actual Bapt. The PB of 1552 retained only the last of these, thus bringing out prominently the baptismal character of the name. (See NAME, CHRISTIAN.)

The form of Bapt. need not detain us long. The language of the NT (e.g., Acts 8 16) has caused some to believe that at first Bapt. was sometimes, at any rate, administered in the name of the Lord Jesus only. But the mention of all three Persons of the Trinity (based on our Lord's words as recorded in Matt. 28 19)¹ has been universal since at least the beginning of the 2nd century. It is found in Didache 7 (early 2nd cent.); Justin Martyr, c. 155, 1 Apol. 61; Tertullian, De Bapt. 13; to say nothing of a host of later writers and service-books.

18. The Baptismal Formula.

We must however say something about the manner of baptising. The PB of 1549 has this curious rubric: "The Priest shall take the child in his hands, and ask the name. And naming the child, shall dip it in the water thrice. First dipping the right side: Second, the left side: The third time dipping the face toward the font: so it be discreetly and warily done."

19. The Manner of Baptizing.

¹ In view of statements made in certain quarters, it may be well to point out that the testimony in favour of this verse as it stands in the TR (omitting slight and unimportant variations) is simply overwhelming, and that there is practically no evidence to the contrary.

This, though differently worded, comes practically to the same thing as the corresponding rubric in the Sar., which prescribes dipping, first with the child's face turned northwards and his head eastwards, then with his face southwards, and finally with his face downwards. Then in 1549 comes the alternative rubric: "If the child be weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." That, too, was allowed by the Sar. In 1552 the rubric was simplified:—"Naming the child," he "shall dip it in the water. . . . And if the child be weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." So the rubric has remained ever since, except that in 1662 the caution was inserted that IMMERSION is to be used "if they shall certify that the child may well endure it." But AFFUSION is prescribed "if they certify that the child is weak." As a matter of fact, immersion was the ordinary use in England till towards the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Then affusion, which had always been practised in cases of sickness, came to be customary. The wording of the rubric, and the size of the old Fonts in this country (large enough to immerse an infant), are memorials of the original rule.

Under present circumstances, if the child be brought to church fully clothed, the minister has a right to assume, without actually putting the question, that the child is too weak to endure immersion.

With regard to the antiquity of Bapt. by affusion, we find it allowed in cases of necessity by the Didache 7 ("pour water thrice on the head in the name of the Father, etc."), and by Cyprian, Ep. 69 (76) 12. As an example of its actual use we may adduce Novatian, a leading presbyter of the Church of Rome, who had been baptised (before 250) in this manner (Eusebius, HE. vi. 43 14). Then, too, in the ancient pictures of the Bapt. of Christ to be found in the Catacombs and on the walls of Baptisteries, some dating from the 4th cent. if not earlier, immersion is never represented. Our Lord is always depicted standing in the water, and St. John pouring water on his head. Into the NT meaning of the word βαπτίζω we cannot now enter. Suffice it to say that in one place at least (1 Cor. 10 2) it cannot possibly mean "immerse."

20. Antiquity of Baptism by Affusion.

We have now to speak of Threefold Immersion or Affusion. This, in ordinary cases, was prescribed by the Sar. and the PB of 21. Threefold Immersion or Affusion.

1549, and is of enormous antiquity. It is mentioned by Tertullian, De Cor. Mil. 3, among customs which even in his days (c. 210) reached back beyond the memory of man. And, as we have seen, it is, in the case of affusion, commanded still earlier in the Didache (7). Hence it must date back almost, if not quite, to the Apostles' days. In the 6th cent. the practice of a single immersion began in the Spanish Church and was confirmed by the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633). Of course both methods of baptising are equally valid, but there is much greater authority in favour of the threefold use. And, though since 1552 this is not commanded, there is nothing in the rubrics of the PB to forbid it.

For Infant Bapt. in general see art. BAPTISM, § 6, 12, 13. The only point which needs to be mentioned here is the very strong evidence as to the practice of Infant Bapt. in early days. The NT thrice makes mention of the Bapt. of households (Acts 16 15, 16 33, 1 Cor. 1 16), and the following 2nd and 3rd cent. writers speak of Infant Bapt.: Irenaeus, Contra Haeres. ii. 22 4; Tertullian, De Bapt. 18; Origen, In Levit. 8 3, Hom. in Luc. 14; Cyprian, Ep. 64 (59). There is also the case of Polycarp, who at his martyrdom, being still in full vigour, had been a Christian (and therefore baptised) for 86 years (Martyr. Polycarp 9). Since his martyrdom took place in the year 155 (see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, Part II, 1 629 ff.), he must have been baptised as an infant or very young child about the year 70.

In the PB of 1549 the Bapt. was immediately followed by the putting on of the CHRISM or white baptismal vesture, and by Unction (see CHRISM), each accompanied by an appropriate form of words. Both these ceremonies are of great antiquity, but were omitted in 1552, as we have seen, through the influence of Bucer.

The gap left by their omission was filled up by the public reception of the newly baptised child into Christ's flock, accompanied by the SIGN OF THE CROSS made on its forehead. This had occurred at an earlier point of the service in 1549 and also in the Sar. There is early testimony to the sign of the Cross in both places. For its use on Catechumens bef. Bapt. we may take the instance of Augustine (c. 360—Confessions 1 11). For its use immediately aft. Bapt. we have 2nd cent. evidence (Tertullian, De Resurr. Carn. 8). The PB formula which accompanies the signation contains reminiscences of both Sar. and Hermann, but is mainly the work of the compilers of 1549 and 1552. In the 17th cent. the Puritans were most anxious to have the sign of the Cross removed from the PB. To answer their objections canon 30 of 1604 was drawn up, giving reasons for its retention (see SIGN OF CROSS, § 4). And in 1662 the rubric referring to this canon was inserted at the end of Bapt.¹ This rubric is omitted in the Amer. PB, but in the Irish PB it is considerably amplified, and the canon referred to is printed in full at the end of the Irish canons. The Amer. PB allows the omission of the sign of the Cross, if those who present the child so desire, "although the church knoweth no worthy cause of scruple concerning the same."

All that follows, consisting of Thanksgiving for the regeneration of the child, down to the Exh. to the Godparents (with the exception, of course, of the Lord's Pr.) is the work of the revisers of 1552, who also moved the Lord's Pr. from an earlier point in the service to its present position. The Exh. to the Godparents enforcing their duties with regard to the child was composed in 1549, and has remained practically the same ever since. The substance of the concluding Exh. was in 1549 expressed as a rubric, and was brought into its present shape in 1662. In the Amer. PB it has been greatly improved by the omission of the words "in the vulgar tongue."

The Office ends with two rubrics, the former of which (asserting the salvation of baptised infants who die before committing actual sin) is taken from an earlier rubric which from 1549 to 1662 immediately preceded the Cat. The latter of the two has been already discussed (see § 23).

IV. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.² Bapt.² ("The Ministratio[n] of Private Baptism of Children in Houses") consists of two parts: (A) Private Bapt., with its special Rules; (B) Office of Public Reception into the Church of those who have been privately baptised. (A) and (B) are in some parts at least of England (e.g., Lancashire) popularly distinguished by the names of Baptism and Christening.

Private Bapt. in case of necessity is a custom of great antiquity. Probably the earliest recorded instance is that of Novatian—before A.D. 250 (Eusebius, HE vi, 43 14)—though still earlier we have mention of Bapts. taking place in prisons (ib. vi. 5 6).

(A) The preliminary Rubrics of Bapt.², directed against delay of Bapt. and against Bapt. at home except in cases of great necessity, remain almost the same as in 1549, and have their counterparts in the Sar. Manual. But the succeeding Rubrics ran as follows from 1549 to 1604: "And when great need shall compel them so to do, that then they minister it" (i.e., private Bapt.) "on this fashion. First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace and say the Lord's Pr., if the time will suffer. And then one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words: N. I baptise thee in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. And let them not doubt, but that the child so baptised is lawfully and sufficiently baptized, and ought not to be baptised again in the church." The substance of this is to be found in the rubrics of the Sar. Manual. But the direction to "call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Pr." is from Hermann.

The sanction thus given to Bapt. by laymen and women, though traditional in England, as may be seen by the Sar., was disliked by the Puritans and others including King James I, through whose influence it was withdrawn in 1604, and express permission to baptise was confined to "lawful ministers." In 1662 the directions for the minister to say as many as possible of the Colls. from Bapt.¹ bef. baptising the child, and the Pr. of Thanksgiving aft., were added. (For further information re the Minister of Bapt. see LAY-BAPTISM.)

(B) The second part of Bapt.² contains the Office to be used when a child privately baptised is brought to be publicly received into the Church.

From 1549 to 1604 it began with six questions intended to ascertain whether the child had been validly baptised or not. The Sar. directed a similar examination to take place, but before the child was brought to the church. It provided, however, no form of questions, and the compilers of 1549 to some extent followed Hermann. In 1604 five of the six questions were still retained, in spite of the fact that no one but a lawful minister was now authorised to baptise. The last of the five was omitted in 1662.

The validity of the Bapt. being duly ascertained, the service proceeds. Naturally, it is modelled on the Public Bapt. Office, and the older English use (Langton's Constitutions) directed the priest to say only those parts of it which followed the actual Bapt. The later use (Sar. Manual) required the repetition of everything except the 28. Office of Reception into the Church.

28. Examination into Validity of Baptism.

27. Alterations made in 1604.

26. Private Baptism in 1549.

25. Private Baptism (Bapt.²).

24. Conclusion of the Office.

23. The Sign of the Cross.

22. Antiquity of Infant Baptism.

actual Bapt. and the two Questions immediately preceding it. The PB of 1549 steers a middle course between the two. The Office in it consists of:—Certification (from Hermann); Gospel (from Mark); Exh. following (from Bapt.¹ with slight necessary variations); Lord's Pr.; Creed; Questions (as in Bapt.¹ with necessary omission of last two); putting on of the Chrisom (with formula from Bapt.¹); Pr. of Thanksgiving (adapted from 3rd Pr. in Bapt.¹); and the final Exh.'s to the godparents. The omission of the Exorcism (so inappropriate, not to say profane, after the child has been baptised) is a great improvement on the Sar.; but it is not clear why the Unction (prescribed in Bapt.¹) is also omitted.

In 1552 the Office was altered by the omission of the Creed (?) and of the Chrisom with its accompanying formula. The Questions addressed to the godparents now began "Dost thou, in the name of this child, etc."—an expression not adopted in Bapt.¹ till 1662, and then (in both Bapt.¹ and Bapt.²) in the first Question only.

In 1662 the following changes were made. (a) What had hitherto been the final Thanksgiving was transferred to the same place as in Bapt.¹ (b) The Question "Wilt thou then obediently keep, etc." was added (as likewise in Bapt.¹). (c) The concluding part of the Office was conformed to Bapt.¹, the sign of the Cross (with accompanying words), the short Exh. and Pr. of Thanksgiving following being added in their respective places. (d) Curiously enough, the last Exh. to the godparents was omitted—a mistake rectified in both Irish and Amer. PBs. The latter somewhat modifies also the language of the opening Certification.

Bapt.² has retained one or two early features which have been altered in Bapt.¹, e.g., the position of the Lord's Pr. and of the naming of the child.

Bapt.² concludes with a direction as to what is to be done if the priest cannot find out whether the child has been validly baptised or not.

In this case the whole of Bapt.¹ is to be used, but at the actual baptising the following form is to be said: "If thou art not already baptised, N. I baptise thee in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." This (taken in substance from the Sar.) is done to ensure the child's Bapt. and at the same time to avoid the possibility of a sacrilegious repetition of the Sacrament. Bapt. performed in this manner is commonly termed Hypothetical (or Conditional) Baptism. The first known mention of it occurs in the 8th century and is made by Boniface, Archbishop of Mainz. The earlier custom was to baptise unconditionally in cases of doubt—so 7th canon of the sixth Council of Carthage (early 5th cent.), and 84th canon of the Council in Trullo (691).

V. HISTORY AND SOURCES OF BAPT.² In the Middle Ages and down to the 17th cent. no need was felt of an Office for the Bapt. of Adults.

Every one in England had been baptised in infancy, and the Church of England had not, since Anglo-Saxon days, been a missionary Church.

But in the 17th cent. things were changed. Early in the 16th cent. Anabaptism had arisen in Germany, and later on it had spread to England. Its adherents (commonly called BAPTISTS in this country) rejected Infant Bapt., and consequently, in 1662, England contained a number of unbaptised adults. Further, Colonies (then called Plantations) had been formed, and in this way Christianity had begun to affect a number of native races. Hence the Pref. to the PB (drawn up in 1662) explains the necessity for the compilation of Bapt.² as due on the one hand to "the growth of Anabaptism," and on the other to the necessity of providing an Office "for the baptising of natives in our Plantations and others converted to the Faith."

The structure of Bapt.² follows the lines of Bapt.¹ In particular the prayers are practically the same with the exception of the last¹

33. Structure of Bapt.² which is taken from Bapt.¹ The first rubric however prescribes a course of instruction and preparation which is impossible in the case of infants; the Exh.'s, though occasionally coinciding with those in Bapt.¹, are usually different; the Gospel is John 3 1-8 (Christ and Nicodemus); the candidate answers the Questions himself, the godparents being merely witnesses; and the priest is directed to take him by the right hand and place him conveniently by the Font bef. the actual Bapt. Finally, one of the two concluding rubrics points out the expediency of the newly-baptised being confirmed as soon as possible.

VI. PRACTICAL HINTS. (a) According to the rubric the Font is "to be filled with pure water."

34. Practical Hints before the Service. This rubric forbids the indecent custom, common a generation or two ago and still not altogether obsolete, of having a basin in the Font and putting the water into the basin.

Further, there is to be not merely a little water at the bottom of the Font; it is "to be filled." When the Font is decorated for Festivals (a custom more honoured in the breach than the observance), no flower-pot or anything else should be allowed inside it, and any decoration intended for the top should be placed on the Font-cover, so that it may easily be removed before a Bapt. In addition, the side of the Font (usually the West) on which the priest stands should be left entirely without decoration.

(b) In arranging the Bapt. party, the godparents should be placed together, a little apart from the rest, and the godmother who holds the child should stand next to the priest on his left.

(c) Notwithstanding the rubric, if there be only one child to be baptised, it is well, for the avoiding of mistakes, for the priest to inquire privately before the service whether the child be a boy or a girl.

(d) During the service all persons in church should face the Font. Not to do so is to show disrespect to the Sacrament of Baptism.

35. Hints during the Earlier Part of the Service. (e) There is no direction for the congregation to kneel during the first two Prs., and it is more convenient for all to stand. The rubric bef. the Gospel is designed simply to ensure all standing while it is being read.

(f) The custom which prevails in some churches for the congregation to repeat the third Pr. with the priest rests apparently on a misunderstanding (see § 11).

(g) In ascertaining the child's name, the priest should take care that he has the Christian name only, and not the surname also.

(h) With regard to Immersion or Affusion, see § 19.

36. Hints with regard to the Act of Baptism. (i) In taking the child the priest should carefully place it on his left arm with its face upwards and its head pointing to his left. Unless it is held in this position, it cannot be baptised in a seemly and reverent manner. In the case, which occasionally happens, of the Bapt. of a child two or three years old, it is well for the parents or friends to assist the priest in holding it.

(k) It must be carefully noted that the custom of sprinkling the water on the child's head is a breach of the rubrics, which prescribe either dipping or pouring. It has done much harm to the Church of England, and has been the cause of many leaving her communion either for the Baptists, or for the Church of Rome. There is probably nothing which has been of so much use to the latter body in this country as the custom in question, for it has given a handle to the casting of doubts on the validity of English Baptisms. The priest should fill the baptismal SHELL, or, if there be no shell, the hollow of his right hand, with water and pour it thrice or once (see § 21) on the child's forehead. While he is pouring, he of course pronounces the sacramental words: "I baptise thee, etc."

¹ In the Amer. PB this, too, is taken from Bapt.¹

(l) It is the English custom, and in accordance with early Christian precedent, for the sign of the Cross to be made with the thumb, and not the forefinger. Before handing the child back to the godmother, it is well to wipe its head with a clean napkin provided for that purpose.

(m) With regard to the question as to whether the words "all kneeling" include the Priest, see POSITION AND POSTURE OF MINISTER AND PEOPLE, § 4.

(n) Immediately aft. the conclusion of the service, the plug in the Font should be lifted and the water allowed to drain out. If there be no plug, the Font should be emptied by means of a siphon.

VII. COMPARATIVE TABLE OF RITES OF BAPTISM AND CONFIRMATION. (This Table gives the general outlines. Many minor points, particularly in the Sarum, have been omitted for the sake of brevity. In the first column all details given in italics can be traced back to the 2nd cent. at latest; the rest are as old at least as the 4th cent. The details are numbered in the Sarum; the numbers in the other columns point out parallels. The 8th cent. Roman rite will be found in the first column of the similar Table in Procter and Frere. It must be remembered that in the Sarum and the PB of 1549 the earlier part of the service, down to the bringing of the child into church, was said at the church door, and that the Blessing of the Water took place only when the water in the Font was changed, and usually apart from an actual Baptism.)

EARLY CHURCH.	SARUM.	PB OF 1549.	PB OF 1662.
	1. Inquiry as to baptism and name.	1. Inquiry as to baptism.	1. Inquiry as to baptism (= 1549).
		First Exhortation (to people).	First Exhortation (= 1549).
2. Sign of Cross.	2. Sign of Cross (on forehead and breast).	3. First Prayer.	3. First Prayer (= 1549, nearly).
3. Prayers for Catechumens.	3. Prayers (three in number).	2. Sign of Cross (on forehead and breast), with naming.
4. Giving of Salt (in West only).	4. Giving of Salt.
5. 6. Exorcisms.	5. Prayers and Exorcisms (each three in number, the 2nd Pr. being Deus, immortale praesidium).	5. Second Prayer (= Deus, immortale praesidium).	5. Second Prayer (= 1549).
7. Instructions.	6. Final Exorcism.	6. Exorcism.
8. Ephphatha (in West only).	7. Gospel (Matt. 19 13-15).	7. Gospel (Mark 10 13-16).	7. Gospel (= 1549).
	8. Ephphatha.	Second Exhortation (to people).	Second Exhortation (= 1549, nearly).
	9. Lord's Prayer.	9. Lord's Prayer.
11. Repetition of Creed (Redditio Symboli).	10. Hail Mary.	11. Creed.
	11. Creed.	Third Prayer.	Third Prayer (= 1549).
	12. Sign of Cross (on hand).	13. Child brought into church.
	13. Child brought into church.
14. Blessing of the Water.	14. Blessing of the Water, comprising: (a) Litany. (b) Collect. (c) Solemn Blessing (in form of Eucharistic Preface). (d) Pouring of Oil and Chrism into the Water.	14. Blessing of the Water, comprising: (c) Prayer of Blessing. (e) Eight short Petitions. (f) Collect (for such as shall be baptised).
15. Renunciation of Satan (and, in some churches, of World. The Renunciation was twice made, once in Church, a second time immediately before Baptism).	15. Threefold Renunciation of Satan.	Third Exhortation (to Godparents).	Third Exhortation (= 1549).
		15. Threefold Renunciation of devil, world and flesh (with naming).	15. Renunciation (= 1549, but single, not threefold).

EARLY CHURCH.	SARUM.	PB OF 1549.	PB OF 1662.
16. Unction (with exorcised Oil).	16. Unction (with Oil).
17. Confession of Faith.	17. Threefold Confession of Faith.	17. Threefold Confession of Faith.	17. Confession of Faith (= 1549, but single, not threefold).
	18. Desire for Baptism.	18. Desire for Baptism.	18. Desire for Baptism (= 1549, in substance). Promise to keep Commandments.
			14. (e) Four short Petitions (selected from the eight of 1549).
			14. (c, f) Collect for such as shall be baptised (= 1549, but with Blessing of Water added).
20. Baptism (by threefold Immersion, or by threefold Affusion, with Formula " . . . in the name, etc. ").	19. Naming of child. 20. Baptism (by threefold Immersion, with Formula, Ei ego baptizo te in nomine, etc.).	19. Naming of child. 20. Baptism (by threefold Immersion, or by Affusion, with Formula, I baptise thee in the name, etc.).	19. Naming of child. 20. Baptism (by Immersion, or by Affusion, with Formula, I baptise, etc. = 1549, except that Immersion not ordered to be threefold).
21, 28. Uction (with Chrism).	21. Unction (with Chrism—in form of Cross).	22. Putting on of the Chrism.	2, 21. Sign of Cross (= 1549, but on forehead only).
21, 28. Sign of Cross.	22. Putting on of the Chrism.	21. Unction.	Preface to 9. Lord's Prayer.
22. White garments.	23. Delivery of the Taper.		Post-Baptismal Thanksgiving.
	24. Final Directions. 25. Final Gospel (or Gospels).	Fourth Exhortation (to Godparents). 24. Final Directions.	Fourth Exhortation (= 1549). 24. Final Directions (= 1549, nearly).
	CONFIRMATION.	CONFIRMATION. Questions asked from Catechism.	CONFIRMATION. Preface.
	26. Versicles.	26. Versicles (= Sarum).	Renewal of Baptismal Vows.
27. Prayer for Holy Ghost.	27. Prayer for Holy Ghost (Omnipotens, sempiterna Deus).	27. Prayer for Holy Ghost (= Omnipotens, sempiterna Deus).	26. Versicles (= 1549, nearly). 27. Prayer for Holy Ghost (= 1549, nearly).
Laying on of the Hand.	28. Sign of Cross and Unction (with Chrism, and Formula, Consigno te N. signo crucis, et confirmo chrismate salutis; in nomine, etc.).	28. Sign of Cross, and Laying on of Hand (with Formula, N. I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and lay my hand upon thee; in the name, etc.).	Laying on of Hand (with Formula, Defend, O Lord, etc.).
The Milk and Honey (possibly not till after First Communion).	29. Post-Confirmation Collect.	29. Post-Confirmation Collect.	Lord's Prayer. 29. Post-Confirmation Collect (= 1549). Collect (= 2nd of the Six after HC).
	30. Blessing.	30. Blessing.	30. Blessing (= 1549).
31. First Communion.	31. First Communion.	31. First Communion.	31. First Communion.

VIII. BIBLIOGRAPHY. (A) Service Books.—Euchologion (Goar's ed. best), for the Greek rite; Rituale Romanum, for the present Roman rite; Gelasian Sacramentary (Clarendon Press), bk. I, for the 8th cent. Roman rite; Martene, De Antiq. Eccles. Rit. i, i and iv, 24, gives a large collection of Western Bapt. formulae; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus 1 171-196, gives a smaller do.; Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia 1 1-32, for the Sarum rite; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus 2 183-270, for the German Post-Reformation forms; First PB of Edward VI compared with successive revisions (Parker, 1877) exhibits conveniently the Bapt. Offices in the various PB's; Fallow, The Bapt. Offices Illustrated (Oxford, 1838), gives the text of the PB sources. (B) Ancient Authorities.—Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 61; Tertullian, De Bapt.; Cyprian, Eps. 64 (59), 69 (76), 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75; Acts of 7th Council of Carthage; De Rebaptismate (3rd cent.); Cyril Jer., Catechetical and Mystagogic Lectures; Peregrinatio Silvae; also the early Ordines.—Didache, Canons of Hippolytus, Egyptian Church Order, Testament of our Lord, Apostol. Constitutions; and Sarapion's Sacramentary. (C) Modern Writers.—Bingham, Antiquities, bk. xi; Augusti, Christ. Archæol., vol. 7; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten 1; Duchesne, Christian Worship, c. 9; Stone, Holy Baptism; Maclean, Early Christian Worship, p. 59 ff., gives a popular account of the early Bapt. rites. (D) Arts. in Dictionaries.—art. Baptism in DCA, Hastings' DB, Dict. of Christ and Gospels, and Encyclopæd. Biblic.; Encyclopæd. of Religion and Ethics, art. Baptism (early Christian); Cabrol, DAC, arts. Baptême, Baptême de Jésus, Baptistère.—lb.

J. W. TYRER.

BAPTISTERY.—In the earliest ages of the Ch., there was no special place set apart for Bapt. It was customary to baptise wherever water could be found (Acts 8 36; Tertullian, De Bapt. 4). But, owing to the prevailing practice of IMMERSION, it soon became necessary to have a building specially devoted to that purpose. Probably the oldest existing Baptistery (as such a building is called) is in the Catacomb of Pontianus at Rome. From the 4th cent. onwards, Bs. were built in each city near the cathedral ch. The earliest ch. of which we have any detailed description, that at Tyre erected by Bp. Paulinus c. 315, possessed such a B. (Eusebius, HE. x. 4 45). Many Bs., some dating from at least the 5th cent., still exist in Italy. They are almost invariably circular or octagonal, and contain a large font in the centre, sunk two or three steps below the floor of the B., so as to allow total or partial immersion. As examples, we may mention the Bs. at Florence, Pisa, and Ravenna, and the Lateran B. at Rome.

1. In Ancient Times.

Bs. of the foregoing type were not unknown in Eng. bef. the Norman Conquest. But for many cents. it has been usual to place the FONT, not in a B., but in the body of the ch.; and this position is assumed in the rubrics of the PB, which imply that Bapt. will normally take place in the face of the congregation during MEP. The font generally stands at the west end of the ch., near the main door, and this is its best position, as signifying that Bapt. is the

Sacr. of entrance into the Ch. In modern chs. an attempt is sometimes made to revive Bs. by putting the font into a separate chapel in order to ensure reverential treatment for it. It is difficult to see any objection to this, provided the font be plainly visible from the main body of the ch. (For further information, see arts. Baptistry in DCA, and Baptistère in Cabrol's DAC.).—R6

J. W. TYRER.

BAPTISTS.—The Particular Baptists were the last stage in the evolution of Protestant, Puritan, Separatist. Henry Jacob was silenced for nonconformity in 1604; in twelve years he founded a Separatist Church, many of whose members became convinced twenty years later that Bapt. was not for infants but for professed believers; by 1642 several churches had adopted this principle and had also restricted themselves to the legal practice of Bapt. by immersion only. Confounded popularly with the continental Anabaptists of a century earlier, they published in 1644 a strongly Calvinist confession which repudiated anarchist views. On the Long Parliament and the Assembly of Divines they were not represented; but about twenty incumbents adopted Baptist views and yet held benefices in Cromwell's time, five even being on the boards of Tryers for the ministry. No attempt was made to influence the revision of the PB in 1662, and it is not likely that the Office for the Ministration of Bapt. to such as are of Riper Years was provided to conciliate them. Their fundamental principle, that a church must be composed solely of those who make profession of their faith, however well it agrees with Art. 19, is irreconcilable with the idea of a National Church. In 1689 a revision of the Westminster Confession was adopted by a large assembly. Retaining the general Calvinistic features, it contemplates no organisation beyond a local congregation, whose members are "saints by calling, visibly manifesting and evidencing (in and by their profession and walking) their obedience unto that call of Christ." "The officers appointed by Christ to be chosen and set apart by the Church . . . are bishops or elders, and deacons." To each church the Lord Jesus Christ "hath given all that power and authority which is in any way needful for their carrying on that order in worship and discipline, which He hath instituted for them to observe." From this conviction, that worship is in some respects divinely prescribed, follows the insistence on the Bapt. of believers only; and immersion is adhered to because of the Lord's command and apostolic precedent, in accord with the principle of Art. 20 that it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written.

In America about five million communicants are gathered in 47,000 churches which adhere generally to these tenets. In England most B. have studied Scripture to further purpose, and disuse the epithet "Particular," believing heartily that all men can be saved; thus,

430,000 British Baptists emphasise such principles as: "The Lord Jesus Christ, our God and Saviour, is the sole and absolute authority in all matters pertaining to faith and practice, as revealed in the Holy Scriptures; and each Church has liberty to interpret and administer His Laws. It is the duty of every disciple to bear personal witness to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to take part in the evangelisation of the world."

Baptist churches are found in nearly every country of Europe, those in Russia apparently outnumbering the British. Mission work began in 1789, and is maintained in many parts of China, Japan, the Philippines, Ceylon and India, with South, West and Central Africa. In 1905 was founded the Baptist World Alliance, representing about 6,700,000 members or communicants. Habitual worshippers number perhaps twenty millions.

There is another group of B. which also originated in the 17th cent., and still remains utterly distinct. The General B. were founded in 1609 by John Smith, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. They had an order of diocesan bishops, called Messengers, and insisted on Confirmation by the laying on of hands. With the Continental Anabaptists they agreed that Atonement was for all men. From Oxford came an impulse resulting in a general adoption of Unitarian views by 1800. The Assembly to-day, though of historic interest, represents only about thirty congregations.

[The above art. is written from the standpoint of the Baptists. For the Church of England standpoint, see arts. BAPTISM, CHRISTIAN RELIGION, and CHURCH.—A1. W. T. WHITLEY.

BARNABAS, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 32; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 12.

BARTHOLOMEW, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 36; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 16.

BASILICA.—The secular Roman B. was a late development of the ancient forum, a hall of assembly for the citizens where all kinds of business might be transacted, possessing a partially enclosed semicircular tribune used as a law court. A superficial resemblance to these basilicæ caused the term to be applied to the early Christian churches of the Roman empire.

The essential features of such churches are the APSE surrounded with the seats of the bishop and clergy, the ALTAR in the middle of the apse furnished with its veils and canopy, the NAVE for the faithful, and an open PORCH or courtyard for the catechumens. Later developments added an enclosed CHOIR in front of the altar, on either side of which were the ambones or lecterns for gospel and epistle. The earliest basilican altars were built above the actual graves of saints.

Later on, a CRYPT containing relics was usually provided beneath the altar.

A basilican church, being essentially a place for the solemn public celebration of the Eucharist, was not planned to contain side altars or even a font, detached baptisteries being generally provided for the latter purpose; the larger basilicæ, however, generally had aisles and sometimes a transept also.—R6.

C. A. NICHOLSON.

BASON.—According to the PBs. of 1549 and 1552 the "devotions of the people" at the Offertory were to be placed in the "poor men's box." But according to the Scottish PB of 1637, followed herein by the revisers of 1662, they were to be received "in a (decent) bason . . . provided . . . for that purpose," which the Priest was then to set "upon the holy Table." Since this introduction of Offertory-Basons in the 17th cent., they have generally been made of metal, most commonly of brass, but sometimes of silver. During the earlier part of the service, the B. should stand on the Credence (or on the holy Table, if it be a silver one); while in use the inside should be covered with a piece of cloth or some other soft substance, so as to avoid unseemly noise; and, when it has been placed, with the offerings in it, on the holy Table, it should not be removed until the end of the service.—R3.

J. W. TYRER.

BEADLE.—A B. is, or was, "an inferior parish officer appointed by the vestry to keep order in church, punish petty offenders, and act as the servitor or messenger of the parish generally" (NED).—A3. G. HARFORD.

BEARD.—In earliest Christian times the beard was worn by clergy and laics alike, and in the case of the former this has been the rule in the East. From the beginning of the Middle Ages in the West the beard has generally been shaved, exceptions being permitted.—re. V. STALEY.

BELFRY.—(i) A bell-tower or campanile; (ii) the bell-chamber, in which bells are hung; (iii) (now most commonly) the

1. Name. ringing-chamber or, where bells are rung from the ground level, the part of the church floor below the tower where the ringers stand. The word has no etymological connection with "bell," being a corruption (about 15th cent.) of mediæval Latin berefriidus; Old Eng. barfray, berfrey; Old Germ. berefrut, berchfrut; originally = a movable tower or pent-house for attacking fortifications, then any watch or guard-tower, and then more especially a bell-tower.

For the fittings of a bell-chamber, see art. BELLS. Those of a ringing-chamber should be a few chairs or benches with backs; a locker or

2. Fittings. cupboard for keeping tools, spare ropes, a lantern, etc.; some simple washing appliances with a looking-glass, coat and hat pegs; and a notice-board for notices, rules, etc. The floor should be covered with matting or linoleum, and at each ringer's feet there should be a soft mat on which the bight of the rope may fall in ringing. The walls should be plastered and distempered, to be neat and clean, and the ceiling plastered, not boarded. For lighting, a central suspended light for lamp or gas is best, high enough not to dazzle the eyes of the ringers.

Belfry rules are often a difficulty. Where ringers are volunteers, it is not easy to enforce many rules other than the unwritten laws of

3. Rules. courtesy, sobriety and good behaviour. Where they are paid, some system of fines may check the two common faults of irregularity and unpunctuality. Better than all rules is the frequent presence of the clergy. Their personal influence is the best guarantee for order and harmony. The law gives to an incumbent absolute control over the tower; and if he is a man of tact—above all, if he is a ringer himself—he is master of the situation. (A Model Code of Rules, issued by the Central Council of Church Bell Ringers, price 3d., is published by Bemrose & Son, 4 Snow Hill).—R6.

T. L. PAPILLON.

BELLS.—Of all the adjuncts of a parish ch. least, as a rule, is known about, and least interest taken in, the church

1. History of Bell Associations connected with them.

Bells. Yet, to say nothing of their intrinsic value (£500-£1,000 for a ring of eight B.), they are often as historically interesting as any part of the ch., and their connection with English life since the Norman Conquest touches its ecclesiastical, national, municipal, and parochial life at many points. The Curfew (couvre-feu) was a note of conquest under the first two Norman kings. The B. of monasteries or cathedrals sounding the Hours of prayer, or those of parish churches reminding people of the Ave Maria to be said daily, of Mattins and Evensong, or of the solemn Mass for the dead, expressed the faith and religious life of the Middle Ages. The common bell of the municipality, in days of struggle for civil liberty, told of political and commercial emancipation: and, as time went on, church B. became associated with many details of ordinary life. The chime, or peal, summoning men to worship God in their parish church; the passing-bell calling them to pray for some departing soul; the death-knell telling that all was over; the weird echoes of a muffled peal at a funeral; or the joyful wedding bells—these enlisted, and still enlist, the sympathy of all for the weal or woe of their neighbours. The market-bell regulated hours of business; the gleaning-bell ensured a fair start for all in the gleaning field; the fire-bell summoned help against a common danger; the vestry-bell called the inhabitants of town or village to settle the affairs of their community; and, before the days of steam and electricity, the first news of victory on sea or land was brought by the sound of the Bells. Some of the old customs here referred to have died or are dying out, but the B. still have their part in national as well as in Church life; and the revival of change-ringing in the latter half of the 19th cent. has directed fresh attention to their proper uses and the care necessary for their preservation.

B. once hung, or rehung, by a competent bell-hanger (no local blacksmith or ironmonger should be allowed to touch them) require very little attention to keep them in order; but that little is imperative, though too often neglected from sheer ignorance on the part of ch. authorities. The B. are generally difficult of access; the sexton or steeple-keeper, unless he is a keen ringer and personally interested in their ringable condition, does not take the trouble to inspect them; the churchwardens are only too glad not to have to spend money on repairs; and so matters go on, till at last it becomes necessary to spend far more than would have been needed, had defects been looked into and remedied at once. Nowhere is it more true than in the case of church B. that "a stitch in time saves nine." The B. and their fittings should, as a rule, be overhauled once in five years by a competent bell-hanger, and necessary repairs attended to at once. All openings from the bell-chamber to the outer air should be protected by wire netting of $\frac{1}{4}$ inch mesh, to exclude birds; no dirt or rubbish should be allowed to accumulate on the floor, or on the timbers of the bell-frame; and generally, everything should be kept in a manner befitting the place where valuable machinery is erected. Special care should be taken to prevent B. becoming cracked, which is generally due to carelessness. If the clapper, by striking always in the same place, wears too deep a hole, the bell should be quarter-turned, so as to bring the clapper into contact with a fresh part of the rim or sound-bow. Chiming hammers or clock hammers, if carelessly fixed or if their gear gets out of order, will sometimes crack a bell: and innumerable B. have been cracked by the mischievous practice of clocking, i.e., chiming by a rope hitched round the clapper. This saves the trouble of moving the bell itself, but it should be sternly forbidden by clergy and churchwardens, and a sexton or steeple-keeper who persists in it after due warning deserves dismissal. A bell properly hung and fairly used will never crack; but once cracked, the only remedy is to take it down and re-cast it—a great and preventable expense.

2. Care of Bells.

The first and most essential use of church B. is to summon people to ch. This can, no doubt, be done by one bell, or by a ting-tang of two or three, as well as by a peal of six or eight or ten B.; and now that clocks and watches are so common, it is sometimes argued that church B. are unnecessary. But the sound of "the church-going bell," or of the tuneful peal, has deep and time-honoured associations for English Churchmen, and the day has not yet come when B. can be dispensed with as a useless adjunct to our churches. The revival of change-ringing, which is the scientific use of B., standing to ordinary round-ringing as the performance of a master organist to the exercises of a learner, has led not only to better care of B., but to an increase in their number, and to marked improvement in the character and conduct of ringers. Wherever there are five B. or more in a church tower, some effort should be made to encourage change-ringing; the difficulty of which is much exaggerated because so little is known about it. But, where it is found difficult or impossible to keep up a band of change-ringers, a chiming apparatus (the Ellacombe for choice) can be installed at no great expense (from £1 to £2 per bell), and can be worked by one man. The effect is pleasing, though it falls far short of the sound of B. properly rung: but it is preferable to a jangle of two or three B., and obviates the risk of destructive clocking. Tubular B., sometimes advertised as a cheap substitute, cannot be recommended; nor can hemi-spherical gongs. Such quasi-bells are seldom audible beyond the immediate neighbourhood of the tower; nor is their tone comparable with that of even a light ring of ordinary bells. Where space or lack of funds precludes a ring of five B. or more, it is better to be content with a single bell of good tone.

3. Use of Bells.

The best number of B. in a church tower is eight, both for musical effect and for scientific change-ringing. The cost of such a ring, including frame and fittings, varies with the weight and current price of metal required, the cost of transport, the condition of the church tower, etc.; and only an approximate estimate can be given—at least £600 for a ring of eight B. with a tenor of 16-18 cwt. Five is the lowest number on which any change-ringing is practicable, but, as this number admits only 120 changes without repetition, the addition of a sixth bell, enabling 720 changes to be rung in about 25 minutes, is very desirable in the interest both of ringers and parishioners. On ten or twelve B. change-ringing is more difficult and complicated, and it is harder to keep up a band of competent ringers.

4. Number of Bells.

Inscriptions upon church B. are an interesting branch of bell-lore, to which only brief allusion is possible. Such works as North's English Bells and Bell Lore (Leek, 1888), and Monographs on the church B. of different counties, e.g., Suffolk by Dr. Raven (Jarrold, 1890), Warwickshire by Messrs. Tilley & Walters (Cornish, Birmingham, 1910), may be consulted for further information. The oldest B. have usually no inscription, or a very short one giving the name of the bell, or its dedication to one of the archangels (Gabriel, Michael, Raphael), the Virgin Mary, the Holy Trinity, or some saint in the calendar; or the name of the founder. "Johannes," "Ave Maria," "Vocor Petrus," "Ricardus de Wimbish me fecit," are specimens of such early bell inscriptions. Then came rhyming (leoline) hexameters in monkish Latin, e.g., "Protege virgo pia quos convoco Sancta Maria," "Missi de celis habeo nomen Gabrielis," "In multis annis resonet campana Johannis."

Later, in the 17th cent., we find moral or religious maxims substituted for the invocation of saints on mediæval B., e.g., "Benedictum est nomen Domini," "Soli Deo gloria," "Praise not thyself"; or on tenor B., with reference to their use for the passing bell or at funerals, "Defunctos ploro, vivos voco, funera claudio," "I to the church the living call, And to the grave do summon all."

With the substitution of English for mediæval Latin begins a deterioration in the quality of bell-inscriptions, which are apt to degenerate into mere doggerel, e.g., "I was made in hopes to ring At the crownation of our King"; or at best uninteresting platitudes, as may be verified from any list of inscriptions supplied by modern bell-founders. A notable exception is the inscription on "Great Paul" of London (said to have been suggested by Canon Liddon)—"Vae mihi si non evangelisavero," "Great (more correctly, "Mighty") Tom" of Oxford, recast in 1612 and 1680, now bears a commonplace Latin inscription recording the date with names of the reigning Sovereign, Bishop, Dean and Treasurer, in place of the original monkish Latin verse, "In Thomae laude resono Bim born sine fraude," which might well have been preserved.

The musical harmony of a ring of church B. depends partly upon the quality of the metal, partly upon the 6. Harmony of Bells.

B. being in tune with each other. A good bell, fairly struck, should give out three distinct notes—a fundamental or tonic note; the octave above or nominal; and the octave below or hum note, which is the general tone of the whole mass of metal. The practice of founders, in turning a ring or series of B., has been to take one set of notes (in England usually the nominals), and put these into tune, ignoring the others. But in recent years the practical application of scientific research has resulted in mechanical improvements whereby the largest B. can be tuned into harmony not merely with each other, but with themselves. It is now recognised that first of all the fundamental note of each bell must be brought into true octave with its nominal (the hum-note being also in tune with the others), and then the whole series of B., thus rectified, can be put in tune with each other. "Great Paul" in St. Paul's Cathedral and the great bell of Beverley Minster are examples of large B. put into as perfect tune as possible; and, with the improved machinery now used by leading bell-founders, this should be the case with all new bells.

Bell metal is a mixture of copper and tin in certain proportions—generally about 4 to 1, but each foundry has its traditional recipe.

7. Bell Metal.

The popular notion that a mixture of silver adds purity to the tone has little foundation, and perhaps arose from a practice in mediæval times of throwing coins or silver ornaments into the molten metal while a bell was being cast, with prs. for a successful result.

The literature of B. and bell-ringing consists chiefly of scattered treatises or pamphlets upon the B. of particular counties or districts, or upon the science and art of change-ringing. A convenient summary of available information may be found in the Encyclopædia Britannica (9th ed.), arts. Bell and Campanology (vol. xxvi), and, in the 10th ed. now published (1911), arts. Bell and Carillon. A series of arts. on Church Bells and Bell-Ringing, which appeared in The Guardian, were republished by that journal in pamphlet form. The Central Council of Church Bell-Ringers has published (G. Allen & Sons, 44 Rathbone Place, Oxford St., W., 4d.) an excellent report upon the preservation and repair of B., frames and fittings, which should be in the hands of all church authorities responsible for the care of church Bells.—23.

8. Literature.

T. L. PAPILLON.

BENEDICITE.—The Cant. B. (the TE DRUM being strictly a hymn) is the only one in the PB drawn from a source not fully canonical: it forms part of the LXX additions to the book of Daniel, along with the Stories of Susanna and Bel and the Dragon, which are also included in the Vulg., Syriac and Arabic versions, but in the English are related to the APOCRYPHA. It is a hymn of praise put into the mouths of the Three Children as they stand unconsumed in the furnace. Rabbinic references make it clear the deliverance of the Three had struck Jewish imagination, with the result that considerable additions of the nature of Midrash grew up round it; the song and preceding prs., together with the above stories, seem to have been incorporated into a longer Aramaic (or possibly Hebrew) recension of the book of Daniel, from which the LXX translation was made.

1. Origin and Nature.

The song has been called "an expansion of Ps. 148," a Ps. which it closely resembles in its general plan. The invitation to praise which is its simple theme is worked out in great detail; first the heavenly powers are invoked (vv. 1-5), then the heavenly bodies and atmospheric phenomena (vv. 6-17), then the earth and sea (vv. 18-22), then living creatures (vv. 23-25), and finally man (vv. 26-32), progressing from humanity in general, through the Chosen Race and its inner circle of devout souls, up to the Three whose wonderful deliverance is supposed to have called forth the outburst of rejoicing.

The liturgical use of the B. (Benedictio Trium Puerorum is an earlier title) can scarcely be treated without reference to the preceding pr., often used in combination with it, but in separation known as the Benedictus es.

2. Liturgical Use. (a) Early References. Rufinus (Apol. ii, c. 400) says that "omnis ecclesia per orbem terrarum" sings the B.; it appears separately in the collection of Cants. following the Pss. in Cod. A (5th cent.), and, combined with the Benedictus es, in the 6th cent. African list of Verecundus; and it was used at Lauds in the monastery of Abbot Nilus on Mt. Sinai. Evidence for its early use is also seen in the fact that it is found in Eastern and Western liturgies alike; and also possibly in the frequency of the representation of the Three Children in the catacombs, many of the subjects common there being apparently suggested by liturgical references.

(b) Definite Use. (i) In the Mass. The 4th Council of Toledo (633), mentioning the neglect of the Cant. on Sundays and the commemoration of martyrs (an earlier use), decreed for the Churches of Spain and Gaul that it was to be said at every Mass (aft. the prophetia and bef. the Epistle). This general use was afterwards restricted to special days, Christmas and Easter Eves; while on the first Sun. in Lent and on Easter Day an abbreviated combination of the Benedictus es and the Benedicite was sung. A slightly different use prevailed in the Gallican Church, in which, according to St. Germanus and the Lectionary of Luxeuil, it was used between the Epistle and the Gospel. In the Roman rite it was sung on the Saturdays of Ember-tide.

(ii) In the Daily Offices. The Greek Church uses this Cant. at Lauds (ὄρθρος) daily. In the Roman use it is sung at Lauds on Sundays and Festivals; in the Ambrosian, combined with the Benedictus es, on Sundays only; and in the Mozarabic on Sundays and Festivals and daily through Lent; according to the Bangor Antiphonary, it was used at Mattins on Saturdays and Sundays, and apparently also on Festivals.

The position of the B. as an alternative to Te D. at MP is probably accounted for by the fact that Mattins ended with the

3. Position in the PR. Te D., while Lauds began with Pss. and this Cant. In 1549 it was ordered to be used instead of the Te D. during Lent, an arrangement suggested possibly by the Mozarabic use: this direction disappeared in 1552, when Pss. were added as alternatives to the NT Cants., apparently for the sake of uniformity.¹

(C. J. Ball, Speaker's Commentary on the Apocrypha;

¹ [The still frequent custom of using B. in Lent (and sometimes also in Adv.) is deprecated by Bp. Dowden, under TE DEUM, §3. Sept. Sun. and 21st aft. Trin. seem obvious occasions for its selection. If it were also sung ordinarily on the 5th Sun. in the month, and on the Sun. set apart for Harvest Thanksgiving, its fitness to mark the seasons would be duly utilised.—G. H.J.] [On the other hand, the use of the B. in Lent has the three following advantages. (1) It allows the observance of the good old rule, not to sing Te Deum during Lent. (2) The B. is specially appropriate to early spring. (3) The renewed use of the Te Deum, after a six weeks' interval, is a great addition to the joyful character of the Easter services.—J. W. T.]

Cabrol, DAC, art. Benedicite; Duchesne, Christian Worship, c. 7; DCA, art. Benedicite.—D2.
M. LINTON SMITH.

BENEDICTION, or BLESSING.—By a B. in the liturgical sense of the word is meant the invoking of God's blessing on some person or thing. A distinction is sometimes drawn between B. on the one hand, and Dedication or Consecration on the other, the latter implying a permanent setting apart to the service of God, which is not of necessity implied in the former. In the present art. no distinction is drawn between the two.

The B. of things is a custom of great antiquity in the Christian Church. Basil (c. 370) says: "We bless the water of baptism and the oil of unction" (On the Holy Ghost 27 66—a passage in which he is giving a list of Church customs so old in his days that they were believed to have been of apostolic origin). In the Middle Ages nothing from a church down to the smallest article of clerical dress was used in the service of God until it had received a blessing.

There were, besides, other Bs. recurring periodically on certain fixed days. Of these we may mention, in the East, the Blessing of the Waters on the Epiphany, and of the Holy Chrism on Maundy Thursday.

Among the more important in the West are the Blessing of Holy Water every Sunday before Mass, the Blessing of Candles on the Purification of B.V. Mary, of Ashes on the first day of Lent, of Palms, etc., on Palm Sunday, of the Holy Oils on Maundy Thursday, of the Paschal Taper and the Font on Easter Even, and again of the Font on Whitsun Even.

The only Bs. of things to be found in the PB are the blessing of the bread and wine in the Pr. of Consecr. (see COMMUNION, HOLY, §10) and that of the water in the BAPTISMAL OFFICES, though some others, such as the CONSECRATION of Churches and Churchyards, have always been and are still in use in the Church of England. There is a tendency in the present day to revive the custom of blessing things, and forms, more or less suitable, may be found in The Priest's Prayer Book and similar compilations.

Under the head of B. of Persons we must distinguish between the special benedictive

3. Benediction of Persons. services by which men are dedicated to some office or position (see arts.

BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, MARRIAGE SERVICE, ORDINAL, INSTITUTION, CORONATION, etc.), and ordinary Benedictions. It is of the latter that we treat here. Many prayers are in their purpose and meaning benedictive. But to constitute a B. proper, three things are necessary.

(a) The person who gives it must possess authority. "Without any dispute the less is blessed of the better" (Heb. 7 7 RV). In liturgical use this is carried out by putting Bs. in the mouth of a bishop, if present, or, in his absence, of a priest (see Clemens Alex., Paedagog. iii. 11 63; Apost. Constit. 8 28). (b) The recipients of the blessing must be addressed directly in the second person. (c) The blessing must be couched in the imperative or optative mood.

Many such Bs. are to be found in the Bible, e.g., in the OT, Gen. 28 3-4, Num. 6 24-26, and, in the NT, 1 Cor. 16 23, 11 Cor. 13 14. The natural liturgical position of a B. of this kind is at the end of a service, or of some special part of a service. That was the case among the Jews (Ecclus. 50 19-20), and in the early Church (see Conclusions of St. Paul's Epistles).

There are twelve Bs. proper in the PB: (1) Absol. in HC, (2) first half of Absol. in VS, (3) and (4) first half of Words of Administration. 4. Benedictions of Elements in HC, (5) and (6) in the Marriage Service, (7) and (8) in Offices of Ordering Priests and Consecrating Bishops immediately after questions addressed to Ordinands, (9) and (10) at end of VS, (11) first half of final Blessing in HC, (12) second half of final Blessing in HC, repeated (with slight variations) at end of Confirmation Service. (See further, respective arts.) All of these except (10) occurred in PB of 1549, and have remained the same ever since except for minor changes. (10) was introduced in 1662. (1), (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6) are based on Sarum forms. This is possibly the case with (7) and (8) also. (9), (10) and (11) are taken from Scripture:—(9) from Ps. 61 3, Phil. 2 10 and Acts 4 12; (10) from Num. 6 24-26; (11) from Phil. 4 7. (12) is the mediæval episcopal or abbatial blessing, "Benedictio Dei omnipotentis, Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, super vos descendat et maneat semper" (Westminster Missal, HBS, 2 572). The Amer. PB contains a thirteenth B. occurring in Office of Institution of Ministers, and taken from Heb. 13 20-21.

Besides these formal Bs. there are in the PB one or two quasi-Benedictions, as at end of MP and EP, and of Communion Office. These differ from Bs. proper in the use of the first person instead of the second, owing to the speaker being likewise included among those who are to receive the blessing.

It is natural for the priest who pronounces a blessing to stand in token of authority with his face towards the recipients, and for them to kneel. And this is usually ordered, explicitly or implicitly, in the rubrics of the PB. Two other acts of ritual are often associated with Benediction:

(a) The lifting up of the hand. This has Scriptural sanction (Lev. 9 22, Luke 24 50). (b) The sign of the cross. This was constantly used in mediæval Bs., and is of considerable antiquity, as we see from James of Edessa's letter to Thomas the presbyter (c. 700—Brightman's Eastern Liturgies, p. 493). In the PB of 1549 it was retained in the Blessings of the Marriage Service, but was omitted in 1552. According to the Lincoln Judgment it is not now lawful, at any rate in the Bs. of the Communion Office.

DCA, art. Benedictions; Cabrol, DAC, arts. Bénédiction, Bénédictions Episcopales, Bénir (Manière de); Martene, De Antiq. Eccles. Rit., Bk. 2, 6. Liturgie. De Sacris Benedictionibus; Mediæval Benedictionals, e.g., Benedictional of Abp. Robert (HBS).—B2. J. W. TYRER.

BENEDICTUS.—The Song of Zacharias (Luke 1 68-79) falls into two main divisions:

1. Literal Meaning.

Vv. 68-75, celebrating the fulfilment of God's promises, and vv. 76-79, foretelling the child's work.

In the former division are three strophes: (1) Vv.

7—(2422)

68, 69: The acknowledgment of Israel's present redemption, springing from David's line. (2) Vv. 70-72: The correspondence between this redemption and God's promises made of old, manifesting His faithfulness in the remembrance of a covenant of mercy. (3) Vv. 73-75: The purpose of this redemption to give freedom for a pure and righteous worship.

The second division falls into two strophes: (1) Vv. 76, 77: The child's future work as the Lord's forerunner and the preacher of His salvation to Israel. (2) Vv. 78, 79: The cause of that salvation in the merciful heart of God, which brings light and peace.

The priestly tone of this canticle appears in the references to ransom (v. 68), covenant (v. 72), worship (v. 75), and forgiveness (v. 77, the earliest NT reference).

It is redolent of the OT (cp. Plummer, Luke, p. 39) and at first sight scarcely seems to go beyond it; its salvation is from external foes, is not brought about by suffering, and is not extended to the Gentiles—characteristics which mark it as primitive; yet it rises above contemporary writings (e.g., the Psalms of Solomon) and the OT, in the absence of exultation over defeated foes, and in its belief that salvation, not merely external, has come, to set men free for a pure worship by the forgiveness of sins.

(a) Early References. Combined with the Magnificat, it formed one of the nine chief canticles of the Church, and occurs in the collection following the Pss. in Cod. A.; it is included in Verecundus' 6th cent. African list, and Sophronius (prob. patriarch of Jerusalem, 7th cent.) says that the Church used along with the Psalms καὶ τὴν τῆς ὕψους ὑμνόν.

(b) Definite Use. (1) In the Mass: in the Gallican rite, and probably the Ambrosian, it was sung (under the name "prophetia") before the Collect, a position given it by the Mozarabic rite on the Sunday before the Nativity of St. John B., and probably on Easter Day. In all these cases it was gradually superseded under the influence of the Roman rite by the Gloria in excelsis. (2) In the Daily Offices: in the Eastern Church it is frequently used as a morning hymn; in the West it was the opening hymn at Lauds in the Ambrosian use, in the Bangor Antiphonary, and on certain feasts in the Mozarabic rite also. In the rule of St. Benedict it formed the climax of Lauds, a position, possibly due to him, which it also occupies in the Roman use.

The compression of the Daily Offices at the Reformation made Lauds the middle of the three services (Mattins, Lauds, and Prime) out of which the new Mattins was composed; yet the position of the B. is scarcely less dignified in the modern than in the mediæval use; for it is (1) the climax of the morning act of praise, (2) the thankful acknowledgment of the fulfilment of God's promises in the NT from which the second lesson has just been read.

T. D. Bernard, Songs of the Holy Nativity, and Comment. in loc.; Cabrol, DAC, art. 4. Bibliography. Cantiques Évangéliques; Bäumer, Geschichte des Breviers.—Dz.
M. LINTON SMITH.

BENEDICTUS QUI VENIT.—The ancient termination of the SANCTUS in the HC Office: now sometimes sung as a separate anthem at its close. The words in general use are "Blessed is he that cometh in the Name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest": the latter half being already represented by the "Glory be to thee, O Lord most High" of the SANCTUS. In the PB of 1549 the SANCTUS ran as follows: "Holy, holy, holy, Lorde God of Hostes: heauen and earth are full of thy glory: Osanna in the highest. Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lorde: Glory to thee, O Lorde in the highest." It was altered to its present form in 1552.—H2.

MAURICE F. BELL.

BENEFACTION.—"The bestowal of money for a charitable purpose; a grant, gift, bounty, endowment" (NED).—A6. G. HARFORD.

BENEFACORS, COMMEMORATION OF.—The earliest post-Reformation form of this service (held periodically in the Universities and the several Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge) is given in Haddon's Latin PB, published in 1560 with Queen Elizabeth's authority (see VERSIONS OF THE PB, OLDER, § 3). It is as follows:—(a) Lord's Pr.; (b) Pss. 144, 145, 146; (c) Lesson (Ecclus. 44); (d) Sermon, in honour of Founders, etc.; (e) Benedictus; (f) 2 Versicles and Responses; (g) special Coll. The general run of the above form has usually been followed in later times; but the Commemoration Service frequently begins with the Lesson (Ecclus. 44 r-15) followed by the Sermon; Te Deum is substituted for Benedictus, and Pss. 148, 149, 150 for the three in Haddon.—S9.

J. W. TYLER.

BENEFICE.—A B. is a perpetual right, arising out of some spiritual office, to certain fruits of a temporal nature, such right being inalienable (Barbosa, Jur. Eccles. Univ. 2 4). In other words, the B. is the right to enjoy the temporalities with which a spiritual office is endowed. The holder of the B. cannot be deprived of it except by process of law on the ground of either crime, neglect, or incapacity. B.'s are of two kinds, those having cure of souls, and those which have no such duty attached to them. The first kind are either Rectories, Vicarages, or Perpetual Curacies. Anciently all B.'s with cure of Souls were Rectories. RECTOR is the normal title of the person who holds the office of parish priest. When the practice arose of granting rights of Patronage to monasteries, the Rectory was also granted, so that the monastic body was under no obligation to present a Clerk to be the Parish Priest. The Benefice was then termed a "regular" Benefice (others were called "secular"), because the members of the monastic body were styled regulars, as being bound to follow a certain rule of life. In such cases the parish might be served either by the monks themselves or, as was generally the case, by a Priest permanently appointed and paid by them. In most instances the grant of the Rectory was conditional on the appointment of such a Priest. If the endowment consisted of an allocation of a certain portion of the tithes, the Priest was called the Vicarius—VICAR—as being the deputy of the monastic body. A B. was thus created of an inferior grade; the monastery held the B. called the Rectory, the parish priest had the B. called the Vicarage. In some cases a Vicar was not appointed, but a Priest was licensed by the Bp. on the nomination of the monastery as a PERPETUAL CURATE, a fixed payment being assigned to him. This arrangement created a third form of B. with cure of Souls. The spiritual rights of a Vicar and of a Perpetual Curate are the same. They differ as regards temporals, a Vicar but not a Perpetual Curate being a Corporation sole; a Rector or Vicar enters on his office by INSTITUTION and on his Benefice by INDUCTION; a Perpetual Curate is simply licensed to his office and thereby acquires a right to his fixed emoluments. Perpetual Curates are now called titular Vicars.

A B. without cure of Souls is the right to the endowments and temporalities of the office of a Dean of a Cath. or Collegiate Ch., or of the holder of a Canonry or of an Archdeaconry. In the case of a Canon the B. is properly called a prebend. In respect to his office he is a Canon, in respect to his Benefice he is a Prebendary. An honorary Canonry is not a B. The holding of a B. involves on the incumbent the performance of certain duties and the discharge of certain obligations as defined by the nature of the particular office to which the B. is annexed. The right of the incumbent to the fruits of the B. depends upon his fulfilment of those duties and obligations. The person holding a B. is called the INCUMBENT of it. The term "Benefice," according to Barbosa, first occurs in canon 42 of the Council of Mayence, 813, but the wording of this canon seems to indicate that it was by that time usually employed. The principle of apportionment of the goods of the Ch. to the holders of certain offices had previously been acted on by Councils at Agde and Orleans. That as already stated is the essential idea of B. in its eccles. sense. [For ANNUAL CHARGES on, and ANNUAL VALUE of, a Benefice, see special arts.]—T2. E. G. WOOD.

BEQUEST.—"That which is bequeathed; a legacy" (NED). Welcome as a B. is, it is sometimes forgotten that a BENEFACTION escapes the serious curtailment of legacy duties.—A6. G. HARFORD.

BIBLE IN THE PB.—Nothing in the PB is more striking than its copious and frequent use of the Bible; even the casual reader cannot help noticing this. We find passages of Scripture, sometimes longer, sometimes shorter, introduced into the PB services in different ways and for different purposes. They occur as: (a) SENTENCES (MEP, HC, Burial); (b) VERSICLES and Responses (MEP, Lit., Confirm., Marriage, VS, Churching, Commn.); (c) Psalms (MEP, Marriage, VS, Burial, Churching, Commn.);

(d) CANTICLES and Hymns (Benedicite, Benedictus, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, Sanctus); (e) Lections (MEP, HC, Bapt., Marriage, Burial, Ord.); (f) BENEDICTIONS (MEP, Lit., HC, VS, Burial, Commn.); (g) Prayers (Lord's Pr., Kyrie); (h) Rules of Conduct (10 Comms.); (i) Forms of Sacraments and Sacramentals (Bapt., HC, Ord.^{2, 3}). Put together, these probably occupy about half the time taken up by the PB services as used in an ordinary parish church.

But this is by no means all. Those parts of the PB which are not direct quotations from the Bible are simply saturated with Bible words, Bible expressions, and Bible ideas. We might illustrate this from every service of the Ch., but, for brevity, we will take as an example only one, the Communion.

2. PB Saturated with Bible.

The Commn. opens with an Exh. which, though full of Bible thoughts, contains only two clear echoes of Bible words: "that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord" (1 Cor. 5:5); "others . . . might be the more afraid to offend" (1 Tim. 5:20). But the Sentences which it introduces are, as we are expressly told, taken from the Bible, esp. from Deut. 27. The long Exh. which follows has a continuous chain of thought running through it, and reads like the composition of a single mind; yet it is almost entirely a mosaic of texts made up in the most wonderful way from different parts of Scripture (Ps. 119 21, Matt. 3:8, 10, Heb. 10:21, Ps. 11:7, Is. 28:21, Mal. 3:2, Matt. 3:12, 1 Thess. 5:2, 3, Rom. 2:5, 4, Prov. 1:28-30, Matt. 25:10, Matt. 25:41, 11 Cor. 6:2, John 9:4, 12:36, Matt. 25:30, Rom. 2:4, Joel 2:12, Is. 1:18, Ezek. 18:30-32, 1 John 2:1, 2, Is. 53:5, Ps. 119:3, Matt. 11:29, 30, Gal. 3:13, Matt. 25:41, 33, 34). The Psalm, Gloria, Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., and Preces are (with the exception of the Gloria) taken verbatim (or nearly so) from various parts of the Bible. The Preces are followed by two Colls., and a Pr. for pardon said by the people aft. the Minister. The first of these, though full of Scriptural thought, has little in the way of coincidence with the actual language of Scripture. It is otherwise, however, with the other two, as the following instances will show: "hast compassion upon all men and hatest nothing that thou hast made" (Wisdom 11:23, 24); "wouldest not the death of a sinner, but that he should rather turn from his sin and be saved" (Ezek. 33:11); "to thee only it appertaineth to forgive sins" (Mark 2:7); "spare us, therefore, good Lord, spare thy people" (Joel 2:17); "thy people whom thou hast redeemed" (Deut. 21:8); "enter not into judgment with thy servants" (Ps. 143:2); "make haste to help us" (Ps. 70:1); "turn thou us, O good Lord, and so shall we be turned" (Jer. 31:18); "turn to thee in weeping, fasting and praying" (Joel 2:12); "thou art a merciful God, full of compassion, long-suffering" (Ps. 86:15); "in thy wrath thinkest upon mercy" (Hab. 3:2); "spare thy people, good Lord, spare them, and let not thine heritage be brought to confusion" (Joel 2:17); "after the multitude of thy mercies" (Ps. 51:1). The final Benediction comes from Num. 6:24, 26.

In 1549 the Great Bible (published in 1539) was the authorised Version, and from it were of necessity taken all the passages of Scripture contained in the First PB. Convocation in 1571 gave its sanction to the use of the Bishops' Bible— a sanction which could only be followed publicly in the Lessons of MEP, as all other selections from Scripture formed part of the text of the PB. When the so-called Authorised Version came out in 1611, it soon succeeded, by its evident superiority, in taking the place of the Bishops' Bible; and in the revision of 1662 it was adopted for all Lections printed in full in the PB (HC, Bapt., Marriage, Burial, Ord.), and for the introductory SENTENCES of MEP and the Burial Office. The text of the Pss., Cants., Lord's Pr., Comms., etc., however, remained unchanged: in some cases, because the wording was so familiar that it could not well be altered; in others, because the old Version was felt to be smoother and better fitted for singing. The present use of the AV for the Lessons of MEP appears to rest on no authority of Convocation, King, or Parliament, but only on custom; and hence some have considered it lawful to read the Lessons from the Revised Version.

3. Versions Employed.

(For further information as to the use of the Bible in the PB, see The Liturgy compared with the Bible, by H. I. Bailey, 1848, SPCK.; for a criticism of the PB text of the Pss., see PSALTER, § 3, 4; and for the doctrinal side of the subject, see SCRIPTURE.) —85.

J. W. TYRER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE PB.

- I. VERNACULAR SERVICES PRIOR TO THE FIRST PB OF EDWARD VI, § 1, 2.
 - II. THE TWO PBS OF EDWARD VI, § 3-6.
 - III. THE PBS OF 1559 AND 1604, § 7-9.
 - IV. THE PB OF 1662, § 10.
 - V. THE PB IN IRELAND, § 11.
 - VI. THE PB IN SCOTLAND, § 12.
 - VII. THE PB IN AMERICA, § 13.
 - VIII. THE STATE SERVICES, § 14.
 - IX. WORKS OF REFERENCE, § 15.
- I. The first step towards the provision of liturgical services in the vernacular was the publication of the English Litany in 1544. This was issued with the title, "An exhortation unto prayer, thoughte mete by the kinges maiestie, and his clergy, to be read to the people in every church afore processions. Also a Letanie with suffrages to be said or song in the time of the said processions." The Colophon runs, "Imprinted at London in Flete-Strete by Thomas Berthelet printer to the kinges highnes, the XXVII. day of May, the yere of our Lorde. M.D. XLIIII." (Processions here mean simply prayers of a supplicatory character, not necessarily said in procession.) On the 11th of June King Henry VIII issued a letter to Abp. Cranmer enforcing the use of this form (Private Prayers, Qu. Elizabeth, Parker Society, 1851, pp. 564-576).
 - Meanwhile Cranmer and certain other Bps. had been at work in the revision of the service books. Various drafts were prepared, but nothing further took place till Edward VI came to the throne. In his first year it was decided that Communion should henceforth be administered in both kinds, and, to carry this out, a Form had to be provided. This Form was "The Ordre of the Communion": "Imprinted at London, the eyght daie of Marche, in the second yere of the reigne of our souereigne lorde Kyng Edward the VI: By Richard Grafton printer to his moste royall Maiestie. In the yere of our lorde. MDXLVIII." The Order of the Communion has been reprinted many times; the earliest reprint was in Hamon L'Estrange's Alliance of Divine Offices (1659), and the last and best that by H. A. Wilson (HBS, vol. 34), with critical notes and a comparison of the variations in the editions. The book appeared in two forms, quarto and octavo. The former appears to have been set up four times, and part of it, at any rate, a fifth time; the latter was probably a "pirated" edition from one of Grafton's impressions. Other reprints are:—Bishop Sparrow's Collections of Articles, etc. (1661); Wilkins' Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae (4 vols., 1737); Cardwell's Two Liturgies of Edward VI (1838); the edition of L'Estrange's work in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (1846); Liturgies of K. Edward VI (Parker Society, 1844); BCP Illustrated by W. K. Clay (1841); the Surplice (vol. 1, part 1, 1846); First Prayer Book of Edward VI by H. B. Walton (1869 and 1883); and Maskell's Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England (1882). For further information, see the HBS reprint, p. xxvii; on p. xxvi a list of all known copies of the original editions is given; it also contains contemporary Latin and German Versions, the former of which is by Aless.

1. The Litany of 1544.

2. "The Order of the Communion."

II. But this was only an instalment of more sweeping changes, and in the next year a complete English PB was issued. This

3. The First PB. Edward the Sixth, published with the title, "The booke of the common prayer and administracion of the Sacramentes, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church: after the use of the Church of England. Londini in officina Edouardi Whitchurche. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. Anno Do. 1549. Mense Martii." This date is further defined by the colophon as March 7th. In this edition the Litany was omitted from the table of contents, but was inserted without foliation between Holy Communion and Baptism. (In later editions this was corrected.) No Psalter was supplied, but a table at the beginning showed the order in which the Pss. were to be said through the month. The Ordinal formed no part of this book. The First PB of Edward VI has been frequently reprinted:—by L'Estrange (ut supra); by the Parker Society (Liturgies of K. Edward VI); in the Library of Liturgiology and Ecclesiology (vol. 2); and elsewhere.

The reformed Ordinal was published by Grafton in March 1549 (really 1550, as the year then began on March 25th). It is reprinted by the Parker Society in Liturgies of K. Edward VI.

As the First PB was without a Psalter, the Pss. had to be sung from some other book. They might be said from the Grete English Bible, or from special books, specimens of which have survived. In July 1548 a translation was issued of the Pss., Canticles at Lauds and other offices, and the Quicunque Vult, together with the Litany. In this book the Psalter is numbered according to the Vulgate, and the Canticles and Quicunque vult are in a translation different from that of the First PB. It was printed by Roger Car for Anthoni Smyth, and the only surviving copy is in the British Museum (C. 25, b. 2).

In August 1549 was published an edition of the First PB, which is called The Clerk's Book. As its name suggests, it is a book adapted for the use of clerks in churches. The contents are:—I and II, The distribution of the Psalter; III, The Calendar; IV, Mattins and Evensong; V, The Litany; VI, "All that shall apperteigne to the Clerkes to saie or syng at the ministracion of the Communion and when there is no Communion. At Matrimonie. The visitacion of the Sicke. At Buriall of the dedde. At the Purificacion of women. And the first daie of Lent"; VII, The Psalter. All the contents are founded on the First PB of Edward VI. Only one copy is known to exist; it is in the British Museum (C. 36, d. 1). A reprint by Dr. Wickham Legg forms the 25th vol. of the HBS's publications. In Durham University Library is a book the press mark of which is Routh Collection, XVII E. 28 (2). It consists of the first five parts of The Clerk's Book, with the Introits, Collects and certain other Prs. from the First PB.

These books dealt with the words of the service. But if the services were to be sung, as the rubrics enjoin, books would be required with the words to be sung fitted to music. This was done for the First PB by John Merbecke, who prepared "The Book of Common Praier Noted," containing "so muche of the Order of Common Prayer as is to be song in Churches." It was published by Grafton in 1550, and included Mattins, Evensong, Communion Service and Burial of the Dead, with a special Mass for the funeral; the Litany was omitted. A reprint was published by Pickering in 1844.

In 1552 appeared the Second PB of Edward VI. In August two editions were printed by Grafton; two also came from the press of Whytchurche. The editions of the Second PB contain the Ordinal; hitherto it had been published separately.

III. In 1558 an unauthorised Litany was published, based on Henry VIII's Primer of 1545 or on Edward VI's Primer of 1547, not on that in the PB (Parker Society, Liturgical Services, Qu. Elizabeth; cp. Maskell, Mon. Rit., vol. 2, p. 98, note 74). In 1559, "The Letanye, used in the Quenes Maiesties Chappel, according to the tenor of the Proclamation," was published by Rychard Juge (the Proclamation is that of Dec. 27th, 1558). For the existing copies of these, see Lit. Serv. Eliz., ut supra, pp. x-xii. In 1559 were published the Elizabethan PB and the Ordinal.

Although an Act of Parliament had laid down that the Second PB of Edward VI was to be followed, with certain alterations, yet the printed texts show a good many additional variations, not only at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, but right through it (cp. Parker Society ed., pp. xii-xv). Two of the most important of these were the changes in the Calendar and in the tables of Lessons. The former was revised in 1561, in accordance with a letter addressed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by the Queen on Jan. 22nd in that year. Fifty-seven BLACK-LETTER Festivals were added, so that the Calendar assumed almost its present appearance.¹

During Elizabeth's reign something was done for the musical parts of the service. In 1560 appeared "Certain moles set forth in foure and three parts to be song," and in 1565 "Morning and Evening Prayer and Communion, set forth in foure partes to be song in Churches."

The Puritans thoroughly disliked the PB, and all through Elizabeth's reign they made use, as far as they could, of special editions embodying their views in various ways. The Calendar came out as early as 1576 (Lewis's History of Translations of the Bible), the PB in 1578. Editions continued to be published till 1616, i.e., as long as the Geneva Version of the Bible was printed, to which every scriptural quotation had been adjusted. After 1589, however, these books were brought much nearer to the authorised PB. It is remarkable that they were always printed by the houses which had the privilege of printing the PB. After 1616 copies continue to appear for about twenty-five years, which show much dislike to the word priest, and often change it to minister.

In 1604, early in the reign of James I, a Conference was held with the Puritans at Hampton Court. After the Conference a small committee was appointed to make alterations in the PB. Accordingly the name of Enurchus was inserted in the Calendar, some new Prs. were added, and a number of changes made in the rubrics and lessons. These alterations are alluded to and authorised by canon 80 of 1604.

The 1636 edition of the PB is important, as it was the basis for the work of the revision of 1662. A facsimile, with the alterations of the revisers, was published by Pickering in 1844.

IV. The return of Charles II, the Savoy Conference, and the revision of the PB by Convocation, are not the province of this article. The result was that on the 20th of December, 1661, the MS. of the Revised BCP was adopted and subscribed in Convocation by the Clergy of both Houses and both Provinces. The Bill, by which this book was annexed to the Act of Uniformity, was passed by both Houses of Parliament, and received the Royal Assent on May 19th, 1662. The 1636 PB was the basis of the revision, and about 600 alterations were made. On March 8th, 1662, Mr. Sancroft was appointed by Convocation to superintend the printing, with Mr. Scattergood and Mr. Dillingham to correct the press. Certain printed copies, having been examined and carefully corrected by Commissioners appointed for the purpose, were certified by them, and exemplified under the Great Seal. These are the "Sealed Books," which were sent to all cathedral and collegiate churches and other places to be preserved as standard PBs. The PB of 1662 includes the Ordinal.¹

¹ The PB first appeared in Welsh in 1567 (translation by W. Salesbury and Bp. Richard Davies).

The "Book Annexed" to the Caroline Act of Uniformity was lost from 1819 to 1867. In the latter year it was discovered after a diligent search by Dean Stanley. A facsimile of it was published in 1891, and a verbatim and literatim copy in 1892, with collations.

Since the revision of 1662, there has been little change. In 1871, however, a new Lectionary was brought out, and the PB altered accordingly.

V. The First PB of Edward VI was not introduced into Ireland till 1551, being first used in Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, on Easter Sunday (March 29th) in that year, and in the same year an edition was published for use in that country. The Second PB never had any authorisation in Ireland, though it was doubtless used in the English circles. The Elizabethan PB was forced on Ireland by an Act of the Irish Parliament (January 1560), permission being given to use Latin where English was not understood, and for that purpose Haddon's version was probably employed.² The PB in the Irish language was brought out in 1608, the translator being William Daniel, Abp. of Tuam. The PB of 1662, which had been accepted by the Irish Convocations in the same year, was annexed, as in England, to an Irish Act of Uniformity in 1666. The Irish Church was united to the Ch. of England in 1800, and thenceforward, till the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Irish Ch. in 1869, the two Churches had a common PB. In 1877, after the Disestablishment, a Revised Irish PB was issued.

[For further information with regard to this latter book, see art. IRELAND, PRAYER BOOK HISTORY IN.]

VI. The First Scottish PB was published in the reign of Charles I, its title being "The Booke of Common Prayer, and Administration of The Sacraments. And other parts of divine Service for the use of the Church of Scotland." Edinburgh, Printed by Robert Young, Printer to the King's most Excellent majestie MDCXXXVII." It was reprinted in 1712 by James Watson (Edinburgh), and the Communion Office from it in 1723 by Bishop Gadderer (or Rattray, as is supposed) and in 1724 by Ruddiman (Edinburgh). Many subsequent editions of the Communion Office were published, with sundry variations, every Bp. putting out a text prepared according to his liking. None of these, however, until Skinner's in 1800, contained the name of the editor; the attributions therefore are conjectural. The first re-fashioned edition was that of 1735, followed by others in 1743 and 1752. In 1755 an edition with still further alterations came out; and in 1764 the edition (Drummond, Edinburgh) which has been the basis of all subsequent ones, and which is usually known as The Scottish Communion Office. The only later editions which need to be mentioned here are Bp. Abernethy-Drummond's

¹ The Act of Uniformity of 1662 ordered that the Bps. of Hereford, St. David's, St. Asaph, Bangor, and Llandaff, should have the PB translated into Welsh bef. May 1st, 1665. The first edition of this translation accordingly appeared (from the press of Edward flowkes) in 1664.

² See VERSIONS OF THE PB (OLDER), § 3.

(Moir, Edinburgh, 1796) and Bp. Torrey's (in his BCP. . . according to the use of the Church of Scotland, Lendrum, Edinburgh, 1849). From 1723 to 1844 the editions of the Scottish Communion Office began with the Exhortation "Dearly beloved in the Lord" and the Offertory, the earlier part of the Service being left out; and from 1844 to 1906 the Commandments were printed as in the English PB. In 1889 a revised Scottish Communion Office was proposed by the Bps. to the Provincial Synod, but it was not adopted. (For further information, see Dowden, Annotated Scottish Communion Office, 1884, and P. A. Lempriere, The Scottish Communion Offices, etc., 1909; both works are published by Grant & Son, Edinburgh.)

VII. In the American colonies and in the United States up to 1786 the English PB was used. On April 1st in that year the "Proposed Book" appeared without authority, but never came into general use. Meanwhile

Bp. Seabury put forth for his diocese a Communion Office almost identical with the Scottish Office of 1764. At the end of 1789 an authorised American recension of the PB was issued, and the American Ordinal appeared in 1792. Of the many editions of this American PB the most noteworthy is that of 1845, by Dr. Thomas Winthrop Coit, called the Standard. In 1877 alterations were made in the Lectionary; other changes were introduced in 1886, 1889 and 1892; and in the last-named year the General Convention ordered a Standard of the Revised PB to be printed and replicas to be sent to the various dioceses, to important libraries, and to churches in communion with the American Church. The greatest care was taken with the Standard; all future editions were ordered to be compared with it, and all ordinary editions above 24mo. size were to keep uniform pagination.

VIII. The State Services, as they are called, are not properly part of the PB, but are annexed to it by authority of the Crown, Convocation, or Parliament, or some combination of these authorities. (A) Several forms of service have, at various times, been issued for the King's (or Queen's) Accession. These (till 1901) rested on Royal authority only. The Elizabethan form is given in Lit. Serv. Qv. Eliz. (Parker Society), pp. 548 ff. After a period of disuse the service was revised by James II, and a new form provided. This was altered in Anne's reign, and again at the accession of George I. On Nov. 9th, 1901, a Royal Warrant gave authority to the form now printed in the PB; this had been drawn up by Convocation. (B) The commemoration of Gunpowder Treason was ordered by the authority of an Act of Parliament (3 Jac. I, cap. 1), and a form compiled by the Bps. received Royal authority in 1606. This, with alterations by Bp. Cosin, was adopted by Convocation on April 26th, 1662, and attached to the PB by a Royal Proclamation, May 2nd, 1662. Another Royal proclamation in William III's reign (Oct. 18th, 1690) authorised the use of an altered service for the day. (C) The Death of King Charles on Jan. 30th, 1649, was commemorated by a service which had the authority of Parliament, Convocation and the Crown. Alterations were made in it in James II's reign and authorised by him on Dec. 23rd, 1685. (D) The Restoration Service (May 29th) had a similar history to the last.¹

¹ Other forms of Prayer were issued from time to time and attached to the PB, e.g., a Commemoration of the Great Fire of London (in some Oxford PBs between 1681 and 1683); Touching for the King's Evil (in some editions from 1707 to 1732, and in Parsell's Latin PB). This latter also contains a Form for the holding of Convocation, as does likewise Bagster's Liturgia Anglicana Polyglotta (1825).

The last three services were abolished by Royal Warrant, Jan 17th, 1859, and thenceforth ceased to be attached to the PB. They do not appear in the Book Annexed or the Sealed Books.

One small change in the PB, which takes place from time to time, must be mentioned here—the alteration of the names of the Sovereign and Royal Family. This was authorised by the Act of Uniformity of 1662.

IX. It will, of course, be understood that only the principal editions of the PB have been given in this article, the number of editions being simply innumerable, as will be seen by the fact that the Catalogue of them in the British Museum extends to 421 pages; but the variations are in most cases very slight. For further information the following works may be consulted:—(1) Anglo-Catholic Theology, Library of (containing the works of L'Estrange, Cosin, etc.); (2) Blunt, J. H., Annotated BCP (revised ed., 1895); (3) Book Annexed, Facsimile of Original MS. of BCP (Eyre & Spottiswoode, C. J. Clay, 1891); (4) Cardwell, E., Synodalia, Documentary Annals, History of Conferences; (5) Hall, P., Reliquiae Liturgicae (1847), Fragmenta Liturgica (1848); (6) Keeling, W., Liturgiae Britannicae (1851); (7) Maskell, W., Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1847); (8) Parker Society publications; (9) Pickering, Facsimiles of various PBs; (10) Procter and Frere, New History of the BCP; (11) Pullan, L., History of BCP (1900); (12) Stephens, A. J., The BCP with Notes (3 vols., 1849); Blakeney, R. P., The BCP 13th, 1870.

[For the various Versions of the PB in different languages, see arts. VERSIONS OF THE PB (MODERN), VERSIONS OF THE PB (OLDER), WELSH VERSION OF THE PB.]—32. T. THOMPSON.

BIDDING PRAYER.—This is the form of prayer which all preachers are directed by the 55th canon (1604) to use before their sermons. It has its origin in an extremely ancient method of devotion. Mgr. Duchesne, in his Origin and Evolution of Christian Worship (c. 4), says that in the early Christian Ch. public pr. was offered in three different ways; there were Eucharistic prs., Litany prs., and Collective prs. He describes Collective pr. as follows: The President of the congregation invited the faithful to pray to God, sometimes using a general formula of invitation and sometimes specifying the objects for which they were to pray. They then prayed in silence for a time, after which the President collected or summed up their devotions in a pr. called Collectio, and they associated themselves with him by the response Amen. As this method of devotion was of a somewhat informal character there are not many specimens of it preserved. The following, however, taken from the solemn prayers of Good Friday (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. 1 560), may serve as an example.

"Let us pray, dearly beloved, first for the holy Church of God, that our God and Lord would vouchsafe to grant to her peace and unity and protection throughout the whole world, subduing under her principalities and powers, and that he would grant unto us that living a peaceable and quiet life we may glorify God the Father Almighty. Let us pray!" The Deacon proclaims: "Let us bow the knee!" Again he says: "Rise up!" "Almighty and Eternal God, who hast revealed Thy glory in Christ to all nations, preserve the works of Thy mercy, that Thy Church spread throughout the whole world may persevere with steadfast faith in the confession of Thy name: through the same Christ our Lord. Amen."

The words "Let us pray," which occur so frequently in the various Forms of Service of the Western Ch., are probably the relics of a longer invitation to prayer in which various objects of prayer were specified. Bidding Prs. continued to be used in mediæval times. Ivo Carnotensis, who flourished about A.D. 1080, cites a canon of a Council of Orleans to this effect: "It is fitting that on Sundays and Holy-days, after the Sermon at Mass, the Priest should admonish the people to pour forth their prayers to the Lord all together for their manifold needs, according to the apostolic institution; for the king and the bishops and the rulers of the churches, for peace, for (deliverance from) pestilence, for those who in the parish lie upon the bed of sickness, for those who have recently died; for each of which particular objects of prayer let the people silently say the Lord's Prayer. And let the Priest add prayers suitable for the several matters for which he has bidden prayer. After which let the holy oblation be offered." In the Procesional of Sarum and in the Manual of York similar prayers are to be found, which are directed to be said on all Sundays throughout the year.

These prs. may perhaps have passed from France into England. They were at first intended, as appears by the canon quoted above, to follow the sermon, but in the period preceding the Reformation, when there were few clergy qualified to preach, they were often used without any sermon. This was called in England the bidding of the bedes, the word bede meaning a prayer. A Form of bidding the common prayers is given in the Injunctions of Edward VI (1547), and also in the Injunctions of Elizabeth (1559). The Form now used is that enjoined by canon 55 (1604). It is as follows.

The Form of a Prayer to be used by all Preachers before their Sermons. Before all Sermons, Lectures, and Homilies, the Preachers and Ministers shall move the people to join with them in Prayer in this form, or to this effect, as briefly as conveniently they may: Ye shall pray for Christ's holy Catholic Church, that is, for the whole congregation of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world, and especially for the Churches of England, Scotland and Ireland: and herein I require you most especially to pray for the King's most excellent Majesty, our Sovereign Lord James, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Governor in these his realms, and all other his dominions and countries, over all persons, in all causes, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal: ye shall also pray for our gracious Queen Anne, the noble Prince Henry, and the rest of the King and Queen's royal issue: ye shall also pray for the Ministers of God's holy Word and Sacraments, as well Archbishops and Bishops, as other Pastors and Curates: ye shall also pray for the King's most honourable Council, and for all the Nobility and Magistrates of this realm; that all and every of these, in their several callings, may serve truly and painfully to the glory of God, and the edifying and well-governing of his people, remembering the account that they must make: also ye shall pray for the whole Commons of this realm, that they may live in true faith and fear of God, in humble obedience to the King, and brotherly charity one to another. Finally, let us praise God for all those which are departed out of this life in the faith of Christ, and pray unto God, that we may have grace to direct our lives after their good example; that this life ended, we may be made partakers with them of the glorious resurrection in the life everlasting; always concluding with the Lord's Prayer.—x2. LUCIUS SMITH.

BIGAMY.—By the law of England (9 Geo. IV, c. 31) bigamous persons are guilty of felony; but this does not apply "to any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time." This exemption from the guilt of felony does not give the person any right to demand Marriage of the Church, and, before any such Marriage is solemnised, the circumstances should amount to moral certainty of the death of the first partner. In the event of his or her return after the second Marriage, such second Marriage is null and void, civilly and ecclesiastically.—MA. O. D. WATKINS.

BIRETTA.—A stiffened four-cornered cap, worn by ecclesiastics and others abroad. There is no authority for wearing the foreign biretta in the case of the English clergy or laymen, either in church or out of it, canon 74 of 1604 prescribing "the square cap" as the outdoor head-covering of the clergy, and canon 18 forbidding the covering of the head in church except in case of infirmity. For discussion of this point, see Staley, Studies in Ceremonial, c. 11. (See CAP.)—R3. V. STALEY.

BIRTH, VIRGIN.—See VIRGIN BIRTH.

BISHOP.—See DIOCESAN BISHOP.

BISSEXTILE.—See CALENDAR, § 2.

BLACK-LETTER DAYS.—The Calendar of the PB contains two classes of commemorations, commonly known as the Major and 1. Preliminary. the Minor Holy-Days. The latter are frequently described as Black-Letter Days, to distinguish them from Red-Letter Days: these designations are due to the colour of the ink used in writing or printing the Calendar. In the original MS. of the PB, known as the Book Annexed, and also in the Sealed Books, this colour-distinction is marked to the eye. A further distinction is indicated in regard to the two classes of commemorations named: the Red-Letter Days are "to be observed in the Church of England through the year," and a liturgical Proper (Lessons, Collect, Epistle and Gospel) is provided for each occasion; whilst, on the other hand, no directions whatever are given, or special liturgical features appointed, in regard to observance of the BL. Days or Minor Holy-Days. It is of this latter group of commemorations of the Calendar of the English PB that this article treats.

In the First PB of Edw. VI, issued 1549, no BL. Holy-Days are found. In K. Edward's Second Book of 1552, as also in the PB of Q.

Elizabeth of 1559, there were but four such commemorations—April 23, St. George; August 1, Lammas; August 10, St. Lawrence; November 23, St. Clement.

2. PB History. The reason for these four additions is at present unknown. In 1561 a Commission was appointed by the Queen to reconsider the arrangements of the Lectionary, and incidentally the commemorations contained in the Calendar (Cardwell, Doc. Annals, 55: ex Reg. Parker, 1, fol. 215a; see also Parker Correspondence, Parker Soc., 94 and 95). As a result of this Commission, a revised Calendar was issued in 1561, the great feature of which was the appearance therein of all the BL. commemorations, or Minor Holy-Days, found in our present Calendar of 1662, with three exceptions, namely, (1) September 7, St. Evurtius, introduced into the Calendar of the PB of 1604; and (2) May 27, Ven. Bede; (3) June 17, St. Alban; both the latter first appearing in the Calendar of the PB of 1662. It is clear that the source of the BL. commemorations of the present Calendar is, with the three exceptions just named, the New Calendar of the PB of 1561; which, in turn, was almost certainly compiled from the Calendars of the Sarum Missal and Breviary (see Staley, The Liturgical Year 37-40, 506, ff.; Warren, in Hierurgia Anglic., new ed., Delamore Press, 1904, 3 250 ff.). The sole addition of St. Enurchus, properly "Evurtius," to the Calendar in 1604 is a strange problem: in all probability the name of this obscure Gallican bishop, with no connection with England, was added in order to mark the birthday of Q. Elizabeth as a holiday in the succeeding reign, without any intention of honouring the memory of the saint chosen (see Staley, Liturgical Studies, St. Enurchus—a Liturgical Problem, Longmans, 5 58 ff.). The persons responsible for this solitary and strange addition in 1604 appear to have taken the commemoration from the Calendar of the Preces Privatae of 1564, where the misspelling "Enurchus" for Evurtius occurs—the entry "Enurchi epi.," opposite September 7, being literally translated and abbreviated in 1604 "Enurchus Bish." It is to be noted that the Cambridge University Press has recently corrected the misspelling to "Evurtius Bishop" in current copies of the PB. In the Calendar of the Preces Privatae of 1564, Ven. Bede is commemorated on May 27, and St. Alban on June 17, an unusual date, but deliberately chosen in 1662 (see Lord Aldenham, St. Alban's Day . . . in Trans. St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. 4 32ff.); and it seems highly probable that the revisers in adding these two commemorations to the Calendar in 1662 derived them from that source also: all three additions (in 1604 and 1662) are identical as to dates of the months, and one as to misspelling and abbreviation. Thus, the origin of the 67 BL. commemorations of the Calendar of the PB of 1662 is satisfactorily accounted for. The addition of King Charles the Martyr in 1662 is not referred to above, since it appeared as a

Red-Letter commemoration. (See STATE HOLY-DAYS.)

Another possible connection of the Calendar of 1662 with that of 1564 is suggested by the commemoration of St. Cyprian of Carthage on an unusual date, September 26. In the Sar. Calendars this saint is commemorated with St. Cornelius on September 14. Tracing back the Calendar of 1662 through that of the PB of 1604, the St. Cyprian commemorated in the latter on September 26 appears to be, not the Archbp. of Carthage, but St. Cyprian of Antioch, who conjointly with St. Justina occurs on September 26 in the Calendar of the Preces Privatae of 1564, as also in the Sar. Calendars. To the simple entry "Sept. 26, Cyprian" of the Calendar of the PB of 1604, there was added in that of 1662 the description "Ar. B. of Carth. & M." By this means a transfer of the commemoration of Cyprian of Antioch to that of his namesake Cyprian of Carthage appears to have been effected, the date of the former name being inaccurately retained. This confusion between the two Cyprians is of early origin (see J. W. Legg, Notes on the day assigned to St. Cyprian of Carthage, in Trans. of St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. 4 47 ff.).

The theory of Nicholls (Comment on the Book of Common Prayer, Lond., 1710, January, sub Lucian), and Wheatly (A Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, Lond., 1840, 1 2 54), that the Minor Holy

2. Purpose. Days were inserted in the Calendar merely for the sake of local associations and from secular considerations, apart from the loftier idea of honouring the memories of saintly persons and commemorating other events of religious significance, is contradicted by the action of the revisers in 1662; for none of the reasons given by these two writers apply to Ven. Bede or St. Alban, deliberately introduced by the said revisers; and the same may be said likewise of certain other of the minor commemorations. O Sapientia, December 16, affords another proof in the same direction—the entry being purely by way of a liturgical note. The true estimate of the motives which prompted the restoration and retention of the BL. Days is probably to be found in the answer which the bishops in the year 1662 made to the Puritans, who desired that these days should be excluded from the Calendar: "The other names are left in the Calendar, not that they should be so kept as holy-days, but they are useful for the preservation of their memories, and for other reasons, as for leases, law-days, etc." (Cardwell, Hist. of Conferences 306, 341).

It is to Bishop Cosin that we owe certain large additions, by way of explanation and description of

4. PB Descriptions. the Minor Holy-Days, which were made to the Calendar in 1662. To his Collection of Private Devotions or Hours of Prayer, which first appeared 1627, and which was very frequently reprinted in following years, is prefixed a Calendar in which descriptions of BL. saints are given; and it was from Cosin's Calendar that, at the last revision in 1662, his descriptions were bodily transferred to the Calendar as we now have it. The addition of these descriptions affords first-rate evidence on a large scale of intention in the retention and enrichment of the Minor Holy Days in 1662. In the Calendar of Cosin's Devotions there are three cases of confusion of identity of saints of similar names: (a) the Valentine commemorated on February 14 as "a Priest of Rome and Mart." is not the Bishop of the Sar. Missal and our present PB (see Eeles, Which St. Valentine is commemorated in the PB Calendar? in Trans. St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. 5 158); (b) the Cyprian commemorated in the Calendar of the PB of 1604 on September 26 is apparently the Cyprian who, together with Justina, is commemorated on that day in the Sar. Books and the Calendar of the Preces Privatas of 1564, as referred to above; in the Calendar of Cosin's Devotions Cyprian of Carthage is specified as the saint intended; (c) Dionysius the Areopagite, October 9, St. Paul's distinguished Athenian convert, is confused with St. Denys, Bishop of Paris, who lived 200 years later. In the twelfth cent. Abelard evoked a storm of indignation among the monks of St. Denys in Paris by pointing out the confusion of identity and chronology then prevailing in regard to their patron saint. In the Calendar of 1662 it is the Areopagite and not the Bishop of Paris who is commemorated.

The following is a complete list of the sixty-seven minor commemorations of the Calendar of the PB. The dates given are those of the deaths of saints, or of the events commemorated. In some cases doubt exists concerning identity, in other cases as to places and dates, any discussion of which space forbids. In such cases the generally received opinion is stated. For fuller information see Staley, The Liturgical Year 137-156; also The Minor Holy-Days.

(Abbreviations: abb., abbot; abp., archbishop; bp., bishop; conf., confessor; deac., deacon; doct., doctor; k., king; mart., martyr; pr., priest; trans., translation or removal of relics; virg., virgin.)

JANUARY.

8. Lucian, pr., mart. at Nicomedia, c. 311.
13. Hilary, conf., bp. of Poitiers, 368.
18. Prisca, virg., mart. at Rome, 270.
20. Fabian, bp. of Rome, mart., 250.
21. Agnes, virg., mart. at Rome, 304.
22. Vincent, deac., mart. at Valentia, 304.

FEBRUARY.

3. Blasius, bp. of Sebaste, mart., 316.
5. Agatha, virg., mart. in Sicily, 251.
14. Valentine, bp., mart. at Rome, 270.

MARCH.

1. David, bp. of Menevia, patron saint of Wales, c. 600.
2. Chad, or Cedde, bp. of Lichfield, 672.
7. Perpetua, matron, mart. with Felicitas at Carthage, 203.
12. Gregory the Great, bp. of Rome, 604.
18. Edward, k. of West Saxons, mart., 978.
21. Benedict, abb., founder of Benedictine Order, 543.

APRIL.

3. Richard, bp. of Chichester, 1253.
4. Ambrose, bp. of Milan, 397.
19. Alphege, abp. of Canterbury, mart., 1012.
23. George, later patron saint of England, 303.

MAY.

3. Invention (Finding) of the Cross, 326.
6. St. John Evan., before the Latin Gate, c. 95.
19. Dunstan, abp. of Canterbury, 988.
26. Augustine, abp. of Canterbury, 604.
27. Ven. Bede, pr., historian, 735.

JUNE.

1. Nicomede, pr., mart. at Rome, c. 90.
2. Boniface, bp. of Mentz, mart., 775.
17. Alban, first mart. of Britain at Verulam, 304.
20. Edward, k. of W. Saxons, mart., trans. of, 980.

JULY.

2. Visitation of B.V. Mary to Elizabeth.
4. Martin, bp., conf., trans. of, c. 470.
15. Swithun, bp. of Winchester, trans. of, 971.
20. Margaret, virg., mart. at Antioch, c. 278.
22. Mary Magdalene.
26. Anne, mother of B.V. Mary.

AUGUST.

1. Lammas, or St. Peter's Chains.
6. Transfiguration of our Lord.
7. Name of Jesus.
10. Laurence, archdeacon of Rome, mart., 258.
28. Augustine, conf., doct., bp. of Hippo, 430.
29. St. John Bapt., beheading of.

SEPTEMBER

1. Giles, abb., conf., of France, 725.
7. Evurtius, bp. of Orleans, 340.
8. Nativity of B.V. Mary.
14. Holy Cross Day (Exaltation of the Cross), 335.
17. Lambert, bp. of Maestricht, mart., 709.
26. Cyprian, abp. of Carthage, mart., 258.
30. Jerome, pr., doct., 420.

OCTOBER.

1. Remigius, bp. of Rheims, c. 530.
6. Faith, virg., mart. at Agen, c. 290.
9. Denys the Areopagite, St. Paul's convert.
13. Edward the Confessor, k., trans. of, 1163; formerly patron saint of England.
17. Etheldreda, virg., queen, abbess of Ely, 679.
25. Crispin, mart. with Crispinian at Soissons, 285.

NOVEMBER.

6. Leonard, conf., abb. of Noblac near Limoges, 559.
11. Martin, conf., bp. of Tours, evangeliser of Gaul, 397.
13. Britius or Brice, bp. of Tours, successor of Martin, 444.
15. Machutus or Malo, bp. of Aleth in Brittany, 564.
17. Hugh, bp. of Lincoln, 1200.
20. Edmund, last k. of E. Anglia, mart., 870.
22. Cecilia, virg., mart. at Rome, c. 230.
23. Clement I, bp. of Rome, mart., St. Paul's fellow-worker, c. 100.
25. Catherine, virg., mart. at Alexandria, c. 307.

DECEMBER.

6. Nicholas, bp. of Myra in Lycia, 342.
8. Conception of B.V. Mary.
13. Lucy, virg., mart. in Sicily, c. 303.
16. O Sapientia, beginning of the Greater Antiphons sung Dec. 16-23.
31. Silvester, bp. of Rome, 335.

V. STALEY.

BLACK RUBRIC.—The name given to the Declaration on kneeling at the reception of the Sacrament often printed in inverted commas and ordinary black type after the rubrics at the end of HC, but separated from them by a line. It is not properly a rubric because it gives no direction, but only an explanation of a practice elsewhere enjoined. It is, as the quotation-marks suggest, substantially a citation. Originally published with a preamble by royal authority, but without the sanction of the Act of Uniformity, as an addition to the PB of 1552, being found in most, though not all, extant copies, it was removed without comment, probably on the ground of its illegality, from the printed Prayer Books of Elizabeth's reign from 1559 onwards. Strangely enough, it was left to the Convocations of 1661 to reintroduce it, this time as a substantial part of the PB, though the trend of changes then made is generally in the opposite direction. Its presence is one of the few clear concessions to the objections of Presbyterians at the Savoy Conference. But there is a significant alteration of phrase, the words "real and essential presence" (1552) being exchanged for "corporal presence" (1662). Though the adjectives, applied as they are to "Christ's natural Flesh and Blood," are identical in meaning, there is no doubt that in the age succeeding the controversies of the Reformation, when scholastic terminology was forgotten, the use of the words "real and essential" would have been misconstrued, as they would be to-day, into a denial of the true and spiritual presence of Christ in the holy Sacrament. The word "corporeal" was therefore adopted, so as still further to emphasise the materialism of the phrase "Christ's natural Flesh." (See further, TRANSUBSTANTIATION.)—ED.

J. G. SIMPSON.

BLESSING.—See BENEDICTION.

BODIES, REMOVAL OF.—The removal of bodies for the purpose of re-interment is exclusively of eccles. cognisance and is authorised by FACULTY issued in the name and under the seal of the Chancellor of the Diocese. In addition, if the removal be from consecrated ground to unconsecrated ground, the consent or licence of the Home Secretary is also necessary. The Faculty is usually granted ex parte upon a Petition (verified by affidavit) setting out the necessary facts and particulars and reasons why the removal is desired. The grant of a Faculty is in the discretion of the Court, and each case is considered with reference to its attendant circumstances. Application should be made in the first instance to the Diocesan Registrar. The Court Fees are £5 5s. In the case of interments in public graves in Cemeteries it is believed smaller fees are accepted if application be made for removal to a private grave in the same Cemetery, provided that not more than six months have elapsed since the interment, and the removal involves no interference with any subsequent interment in the same grave.—OA. T. H. ARDEN.

BODY.—The word B. occurs frequently in the PB, both in its ordinary sense, and in various derived meanings. The grouping of the material and spiritual sides of man's complex nature under the phrase 'B. and soul,' in distinction from God who is 'without B.' Art. 1, is very common (see RITUAL, C25, 60, H1⁸ 2⁹ 4³, M8⁴, O8; cp. 'souls and bodies' H3³, K4, 'as well for the B. as the soul' D1⁴, 'soul shall depart from the B.' N8, 'adversities . . . to the B. and evil thoughts . . . hurt the soul' G22, making 13 occurrences). Similar phrases are 'hearts and bodies' H4³, 'hearts and all our members' C9, 'reasoning soul and flesh is one man' QV.37. (a) All these instances imply the distinct coexistence of B. and soul within the unity of man's earthly being. (b) They further imply a belief in the fatherly care of the Creator for the bodies of His children, whom He will specially remember when 'afflicted in mind, body or estate' F18, and an obligation to take proper care of the B. (c) Death ends this close association, for then the 'soul shall depart from the B.' N8, and accordingly at burial 'earth is cast upon the B.' which is then committed 'to the ground' O5 (or 'to the deep' S6). (d) But 'the sure and certain hope' is held fast of 'the resurrection of the dead' K2⁸, when 'all men shall rise again with their bodies' QV.40, and when Christ 'shall change our vile B. that it may be like unto his glorious B.' O5. (e) Meanwhile it is each Christian's duty 'to keep (his) B. in temperance soberness and chastity' K3, and 'to use such abstinence that the flesh (may be) subdued to the spirit' G21. The due discipline and direction of the B. is recognised repeatedly as a duty (e.g., H4³). (f) The use of the B. in worship falls under the 2nd Commandment, and is involved in all the rubrical directions as to kneeling (e.g., 'meekly kneeling upon your knees' H2⁹), standing, etc., for ministers and people to observe. The same principle is involved in the husband's promise to 'worship' his wife 'with (his) body.' (g) Christ's 'natural body' was unfeignedly real, for He 'abhorred not the Virgin's womb,' when He 'came to visit us in great humility' G1, but vouchsafed to 'take our nature ('our flesh' C26) upon him' C5, and 'was presented in the temple in substance of our flesh' C69. In this B. 'He was crucified, dead, and buried' K2⁸, and, when He 'rose again from the dead' K2⁴, He 'took again his B.' Art. 4, now become His 'glorious B.' O5, 'and the natural B. and Blood of our Saviour Christ are in Heaven, and not here; it being against the truth of Christ's natural B. to be at one time in more places than one' H6. (h) Metaphorically, the Ch. 'is his B.' T2⁴, His 'mystical B., which is the blessed company of all faithful people' H3⁴, C66, and is 'governed and sanctified' by the Spirit of God G28³, 'every member' of it (cp. K1⁷) having 'his vocation and ministry,' and all being bound to 'keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's B.' M2¹. (i) Sacramentally and spiritually 'the B. and Blood of Christ' ('the HC' N7, or 'the Sacrament of the B. and Blood' H1⁴, N9³, Art. 29, 'his most blessed' H2⁸, 'most precious B. and Blood' H3⁴) 'are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper' K5¹⁰ (cp. Arts. 28, 29); and profane receivers are 'guilty of the B. and Blood of Christ,' 'not considering the Lord's B.' H2¹. 'The Bread' (given to communicants with the words 'The B. of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee . . . ' H2⁹) is a partaking of the B. of Christ,' Art. 28 (cp. 1 Cor. 10 16).

1. PB Usage.

This breadth of PB usage may best be considered under two heads, (i) Body and Soul, (ii) The Body of Christ.

I. BODY AND SOUL.

It is one of the most familiar facts of which we are conscious that our nature is made up of two elements, body and soul.

2. Body and Soul Distinct.

We should probably find it difficult to set down, even in language which would satisfy ourselves, what precisely body is, and what soul, and how the one is related to the other. But no subtlety of reasoning will persuade plain people that these two words do not correspond to two distinct, though not independent, realities. We have seen that the frank recognition of the coexistence of the two is a characteristic feature of the PB (see § 1a), with its sacramental and ceremonial system.

Yet this seeming obvious fact of the real coexistence of soul and body is just what some of the leading men of science in the last cent. set themselves to deny and to disprove. It was thought to be within the power of Biology to prove that soul is but a name, and that the body is all; that love, joy, grief, anger, the sense of beauty, the enjoyment of sweet music, were but physical thrills in the grey pulp of the brain. If Huxley and Tyndall stopped short of the extreme of positiveness, their disciples had no such scruples, and could point to Haeckel as their leader. And, now that Haeckel's work is filtering down to the masses through 6d. editions, it is important to point out that the biologists of the 20th cent. have learned humility. Anyone of course may wantonly deny the distinct existence of the soul. But he will no longer easily find a biologist of repute who will assert that his science disproves the separate reality of the soul. Over and above the forces of physics and chemistry, there is in the human body a mysterious energy of life which at every point has to be allowed for. It cannot be weighed or measured, it refuses to submit itself to the laws which matter obeys. But it is there all the same (cp. Bergson, Creative Evolution, Eng. tr., 1911).

The soul is not of yesterday or to-day or to-morrow, but can range freely in memory over the years of the past, and indeed, through the memory of the race, stored in books and other monuments, can visit in thought many a bygone age. So in imagination it can project itself into the future, and picture not only all manner of scenes in which its own personal wishes or fears may be realised, but can call up visions of the social life and political conditions of the coming centuries. The soul is not of here or there, but can cross sea and land in an instant and bring together in one view England and Australia. The body is a thing of the one moment and the single place. It belongs to the now and the here, and must borrow its then and its there, its past and future, from its mysterious inhabitant, the soul.

But, though sober inquirers no longer offer to explain away the soul, they are able to show the amazingly close relations between soul and body; they can unfold to us the utter dependence, in our present state of being, of the spiritual upon the material. For good and for ill we have to live our soul-life in and through a frail, mortal, corruptible instrument of flesh. In a mistaken view of what is spiritual we may ignore the body. It will have its revenge. We sometimes usefully call the B. the servant of the soul. It is however a servant that cannot be dismissed. We all know what influence an old and trusted servant may have. We have seen instances where the master has not dared to interfere with the man, nor the mistress to withstand the wilfulness of the maid. When we indulge the body we are educating the servant into the position of the master. When we neglect the B. we are preparing for ourselves the day when the servant will not have strength or skill to execute the will of the master.

8. Their Interdependence.

He then lives most perfectly the life of the spirit who at every point takes due account of the B., who makes best provision for nourishing and training and disciplining the B., who abandons all pretence of dispensing with the services of the fleshly part and prudently adapts all his plans and arrangements to the natural limits of the B. (cp. § 10). Perhaps we have not yet outgrown the exaggerated stress on the independence of the soul of which Christian teachers have in the past been guilty. And it is something of a scandal that any Christian should regard his health and bodily development as a mere private matter, as if he might play tricks with health and feel no shame, or that at best he need only consider the care of the B. as called for in order to the support of a family and the maintenance of earning capacity. All the time we owe our whole selves to God. We are not of course responsible for what we cannot help. Our Bs. are in part inherited, and only in part made what they are by our voluntary action. But whatever be our bodily inheritance the same duty rests upon us all, that we should not only take care of it, but improve it to the utmost of our power.

4. Care of the Body.

This is a valuable element in the modern English absorption in out-of-door pursuits. In playing a game or practising some sport in the fresh air, a man is gaining the mastery over his body, he is getting it into good condition. And it may be noted by the way that in the process, though often unconsciously, he is acquiring all sorts of good qualities. Another side of this revived care of the body shows itself in our hospitals and medical schools. There we have the care of disease, the restoration of health, in view. But there, too, the sense of the importance of the body is the prime motive. (See further, UNCTION.)

There is, however, a growing tendency to regard the B. as an end in itself. It is a consequence of the attention paid to the care of the B. in health and disease that a grave danger exists to-day of the overvaluing of the B. The due corrective is supplied by the remembrance that "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man." The development of the B. of the Incarnate Son of God was part of a single process. At each stage of bodily growth He needed and He acquired a fresh endowment of holy wisdom, the art by which He could employ those growing powers so as to win Him favour with God and man. Here is the Christian's model, and the scientific investigation of the material means by which the soul unfolds its life in union with the B. not only makes more intelligible the process by which our Lord became obedient to law for man, but supplies a new justification for the ritual system of the PB.

5. The Body Overvalued.

Science can help us to realise the long process by which God prepared a B. for His child, man, and built up cell by cell within the bony casket of the skull that amazing instrument of thought and feeling which we call the brain.

6. Function of the Brain.

The part of it which is particularly concerned in consciousness is what is called the cortex, a layer of grey nerve-matter, varying from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch in thickness, which spreads over the surface of the brain, following the outline of its curves and furrows. While we as yet know comparatively little about it, we know enough to judge that it is built up of $1\frac{1}{2}$ million cells, that each of these nerve-cells is built up of several 100 or 1,000 million particles of nerve plasm, that each of these particles contains some 1,500 atoms, that each of these atoms contains from one to 32 thousand electrons, which fly about within the inconceivably tiny atom at a speed of from 10 to 90 thousand miles a second.

This brain, then, with its 600 million billion atoms in that thin covering of it, the cortex—what is its purpose? That we may learn to dig and polish diamonds, to manage the lightning, and ride upon the wind? Man is the erect animal. He holds up his head as the rightful lord of creation. But while he does no more than rule the creatures, he is not yet fully man. He has not become what he was made to be.

"O come let us worship and fall down, and kneel before the Lord our maker." That is the one all-inclusive call of the Bible and the PB. We come into the house of God, not to learn this duty (the learning is supposed to have been done beforehand), but to practise obedience to it. Never was this moulding of the soul into a habit of reverence more necessary than at the present day. But without some frame of devout habit, in private or in public, and best in both, the soul will never take that mould of reverence without which man is not fully man. How is this frame of habit to be formed? From Genesis we learn that God made man in His own image and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. From the science of yesterday we learn something of the nature and the laws of that instrument of rational life, the brain. It is by a sound instinct that, in the PB, B. and soul are so often closely coupled together: twelve or more instances may be noted. It is the central mystery of creation that "the reasonable soul and flesh is one man." And it is part of that mystery that, if the special organ of the soul, the brain, be deficient at birth or injured after birth, the soul-life is stunted, crippled, or extinguished. So much is generally known and remembered. But it is not so generally understood that a soul which has at its disposal an active and healthy brain will only enjoy those life-powers which it has developed by the proper use of the brain. So much can be learnt at once by a familiar illustration from common experience.

7. Birth and Growth of Reverence.

A concert hall is packed to hear the music of the great composers. Why do the listeners enjoy it? Because they have educated the brain by practice in listening to music. Who enjoy it most? Those who know the music best, and have studied it most closely; and those most of all who have by singing or playing the music made it part of themselves. Who enjoy it least? That minority of people who acknowledge themselves to be unmusical, but who come often or came just for once with friends, because it is the fashion to go to this particular series of concerts, or to profess an interest in classical music. Are these really unmusical? It may without rashness be said that with scarcely an exception they are not. But they have never by attention and practice cultivated the nerve cells of their brain to grasp and convey to the soul the magic and the mystery of music. Sound and noise they hear. But melody awakens no answering thrill, and the pulses beat no quicker in response to the most exquisite harmonies.

He then will never be fully capable of the supreme soul-reaction of religious reverence who does not from youth to age progressively develop his brain to respond to the supreme fact of the ever-present Being of God. Here is part of the scientific basis of the practice of prayer. Real prayer in any of its forms includes the opening of the delicate nervous fabric of the brain to impressions that link up the soul with God. New tracks of association between common duties and the unseen Helper are made, or old paths deepened, as we pray definitely for grace to carry us through our appointed tasks. New bridges of escape from dangerous places of emotional stress are built up out of those microscopic nerve-cells just spoken of, as we kneel before God and journey in anticipation past the quicksands and quagmires of temptation that may meet us in the near future. There is nothing secular or merely moral and prudential in these suggestions. We are but following out the clue which God's great Book of the World has put into our hands. The light by which we use it comes from the Word of God.

8. The Psychology of Prayer.

So the association of ourselves with one another in public worship, as members of one

9. Use of Public Worship.

Divine family and household, when it is rightly used, trains us, through the brain as the organ of the soul, to live in the world as not wholly of it, and to use the world as not abusing it. The externals of worship, appealing as they do to the bodily senses, may powerfully reinforce this effect of association. (See RITUAL, 2-5, and CEREMONIAL.) And though the dangers, never fully avoided, of formalism and hypocrisy have provoked reactions (see ASCETICISM, QUAKERS), the systematic enlistment of the B. as a direct instrument for the expression and development of religion in the soul has been an unvarying mark of Catholic Christianity (cp. § 1 f.).

Nothing need be added here on the moral discipline and direction of the B. to what will be found elsewhere. (See CHASTITY, DISCIPLINE, FLESH, TEMPERANCE.) So, too, the transformation of the corruptible B. is considered sufficiently under LIFE, DEATH, RESURRECTION.

II. THE BODY OF CHRIST.

This great religious term is used in three distinct senses, corresponding to the defining words—natural, mystical, sacramental. It will be proper, before considering the derived uses of the term—the B. of Christ—to say something about its primary sense. Four facts are here singled out for attention, and from the last an inference is drawn as to purpose. (For the PB usage see § 1 g.)

10. Christ's Natural B.

1. It is a fact, if we may trust the 1st and 3rd Gospels and the Creeds, that the natural B. of Christ, though through His birth from the Virgin Mary truly in the line of human descent, was yet in a unique sense a new creation, the result of a special Divine intervention, by which the phenomenon, not uncommon in lower forms of life, of parthenogenesis or birth from a single parent, was also employed by the Creator in order to bring about a new beginning for the human race. (See further, VIRGIN BIRTH.)

2. It is a fact that the natural B. of Christ was during His earthly life subject to the ordinary limitations under which our bodies lie. He lay an infant in His mother's arms, grew in stature, was hungry, thirsty, and weary, felt pain, and finally suffered the agony of a cruel death. His natural B. was no imaginary husk within which the Divine was concealed, no mere appearance of a body—put on to deceive the devil, or the hostile Jews—as the Docetists in their exaggerated reverence supposed.

3. It is a fact, if the whole NT and all the Creeds and Fathers may be trusted, that, after Christ had laid aside His natural B. in death, He rose again on the third day from the dead, and appeared to His disciples in a body which was like and yet unlike that which He had formerly indwelt, and which St. Paul in Philippians 3:21 calls "the B. of His glory" in contrast to "the B. of our humiliation." There is evidence, which has been generally accepted in the Ch. as sufficient, that this "first fruits from the dead," this "spiritual body," again to borrow St. Paul's words, was the body that died, but which had not merely been reanimated, but reconstructed and transformed to become the fit vehicle of the resurrection life. (See further, RESURRECTION.) But it is on the fact, and not on the manner, of our Lord's Resurrection that the Church's faith is built.

4. A fourth fact of observation may be added, that the natural B. of Christ was the visible instrument by which He brought Himself near to men, and entered into fellowship with those who would receive Him. The statement of purpose arises directly out of this fact, viz., that it was for this very end that the Son of God assumed a human body. He desired to bring Himself near to men, and to enter into fellowship with them. But how short was the time and how limited the area within which this purpose was realised through the instrumentality of His natural B.! For two or three years at most, within or just outside the little country of Palestine, those holy feet trod the earth, those kind hands brought healing and sight to sufferers, those tender lips spoke words of grace and truth, those pure eyes searched the souls of men. And then this instrument was at the Ascension finally withdrawn from immediate relationship to the world, if the unique appearance to St. Paul on the road to Damascus be excepted.

The explanation of this strange piece of providential ordering may be found in the simultaneous emergence of a second instrument of grace which could be termed the B. of Christ, the 11. Christ's Mystical B.

Ch., His MYSTICAL B. The Second Adam came to be the centre of a new humanity. That His purpose might be realised He must acquire an instrument by which He could bring Himself near to all men everywhere, and so enter into fellowship with those of every race and language and country under heaven, a fellowship to embrace succeeding generations to the end of time. For work of this universal scope, this eternal range, His natural B. was obviously unsuitable. But, on the other hand, it had been both indispensable and sufficient for the lesser task of enlisting a company of disciples and training its leaders, so that it might be the nucleus of His mystical B., the Ch. Twice over this phrase occurs in the PB, in the Coll. for All SS. and the Th. aft. HC, and the idea constantly recurs in the Cat. and elsewhere (cp. § 1A). Identity of use and purpose then at once gives a reason why the term "B. of Christ" should be applied as a designation to the Ch. For it is matter of history that Christ has been and is entirely dependent on His Ch. as the one instrument by which He can bring Himself near to men, and enter into fellowship with them. And from the fact of this use it is safe to infer the Divine purpose. When the conviction, at present but rarely grasped, has become generally realised, that to each of the baptised as a member of the

B. belongs his share of the privilege and responsibility of fulfilling the purpose of its Founder and Head, Ch. extension and world evangelisation will become manageable tasks.

We must now ask whether we may properly argue from the fact that the Ch. is called the B. of Christ to any sure conclusions as to the nature or constitution of the Church.

12. The Ch. as Christ's B.

Going back to the human B., we observe that it is a fitting image of the Ch., because it is an ordered whole, in which one member, the head, is supreme over the rest, while the members are so knit together that each has some function to perform or service to render which benefits the rest, while, if one member suffer, all suffer with it; and the whole expresses a characteristic form of life. On the other hand, in the B. it is only the parts least highly charged with life, the hair and the teeth, which can be severed from the body without crumbling into corruption.¹ But in the Ch. it is the members which have least of the characteristic life of the B. in them (the useless, the ignorant, the inconsistent), who are most likely to lose that life, if they are isolated from the B.; witness the practical paganism of many colonial districts where emigrants from so-called Christian lands have settled. And it is the members who have most of the true life of the B. in them (the earnest, the instructed, the whole-hearted), who can stand practically alone; witness our heroic pioneer missionaries labouring long years alone without visible fruit. The members of the Ch. are in fact separate selves, which, after once being nurtured by the Society to spiritual maturity, have a large measure of relative independence. But the main limbs and organs of the natural body cease to live, and go to corruption, if severed from the living whole of which they are to the last inseparable and dependent parts.

It follows from this that the B. has unity in space, marked out by a defined assemblage of interdependent parts, so closely knit together that no doubt can exist as to what B. any member is a part of. Of the Ch. as a society of selves, a B. of persons, no such locally organised unity can be asserted. And the modern RC. claim that the mystical B. of Christ shall have one world-wide centralised government is seen to be ill-based when inferred from the term, the B. of Christ.

Again, the more specialised organs of the B. are by their very structure limited to their peculiar function, and, if they cannot perform this function, no other member can replace them. If the sight goes, the finger tips may grow more sensitive, but that only means that they perform more perfectly their own function of feeling, not that they take on the office of seeing.² But in the Ch. there is no sharp line between those who hold special offices and the rest. It is true we are careful to preserve inviolate the threefold ministry, but we do not pretend that a clergyman and a layman are differently constituted beings, and when a bp. dies there is no lack of men adequately qualified to be consecrated without delay as his successor.

¹ How like these are to artificial products we see at once when we reflect on the success which attends the labours of the wig-maker and the mechanical dentist.

² The only biological parallels are among lower orders of life, as when a crab grows a new claw, or a snake a new skin.

Those then who base the distinction of orders in the ministry upon the general principle of Ch. authority, exercised with due regard to historic order and considered policy, are on firmer ground than those who rest these distinctions on a parallelism, which experience does not confirm, with such specialised organs of the B. as the eye and the ear. We have now seen how real is the analogy between the Christian Ch. and the human B., while we have also noted the need for caution in pressing the image beyond what is safe or fitting.

It remains to connect the two senses in which the B. of Christ may be spoken of, indicated by the words natural and mystical, with the third application of the same expression to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

13. The Sacramental B. of Christ.

Here in particular it is important to observe the rule of interpretation that, when a term is borrowed from another connection of thought for use in some fresh relation to persons or things, no inference must be drawn from any aspect of the term which has no clear and obvious parallel in the new connection. This is the rule we have been following already. The Ch. is Christ's B., yes, just in so far as the term B. can find a true and clear analogy in a society of persons like the Church.

So the Eucharistic bread, blessed and broken with due observance of the Lord's words and acts of institution, is said by St. Paul to be the communion or communication of the B. of Christ, who indeed Himself said as He brake the loaf, "This is my B." Once more we go back to the primary sense, the natural B. of Christ. It was, we saw, the visible instrument which He took in order to bring Himself near to men, and so to enter into fellowship with them. The consecrated bread is no ordered whole of members, no organism expressing a characteristic life, no assemblage of interdependent parts. But Christian faith has ever seen in it that supreme symbolic instrument, historically appointed, by which our glorified Lord still brings Himself near to men, and admits them to fellowship with Himself.

But there are two distinctions to be noted.

(1) In the Euch. Christ draws near only to His own. The wicked do not, cannot,

14. Two Distinctions. "discern the Lord's B." here.

(2) He makes the bread His B. sacramentally, but it is in separation from, though in association with, the wine which He at the same time makes His Blood. The B. of Christ in the Sacrament has not therefore so wide a range of association as the other two senses of it have. It is indeed the means by which, together with His Blood, He admits His members to fellowship with Him as their Risen and Glorified Head, but the present union and communion is at each Euch. rooted afresh in the historically accomplished but eternally valid sacrifice upon the Cross. That moment is re-enacted at each celebration of the HC, when His B., deserted by friends, gibbeted by foes, reduced in all appearance to utter helplessness to bless or heal, had actually achieved the crowning manifestation of Love Incarnate. So, in the Words of Administration, it is His B. "which was given," and His Blood "which was shed," which are the saving Gifts offered to those who worthily receive the Sacrament.

It is not the purpose of this art. to trace out the ramifications of theory developed by those who (whether Roman Catholics, Lutherans, or English Churchmen) have, in the interests of faith and 15. Conclusion. reverence, attempted to define more precisely the manner or degree of identification with the B. of Christ in heaven which it is lawful or necessary to claim for the sacramental elements. For, though the Ch. of Eng. has only rejected one of these theories (TRANSUBSTANTIATION), she has committed herself to none of them. But it is necessary to point out that she has decisively transcended the opposite view (held by some Zwinglians, but probably not by Zwingle), that the Lord's Supper is a mere contrivance of men, deriving all its efficacy from the faith they bring to it. Not only in Arts., Catechism, and Exhs., but in the words and ceremonies of the Order of HC, she has asserted plainly the objective reality of the Divine Gifts of the B. and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament.

The intimate connection between the three senses of the B. of Christ will now be clear. In His Natural B. our Lord became Incarnate, revealed the Father, lived the perfect life, and offered the all-prevailing Sacrifice. After manifesting that B. in its glorified state to chosen witnesses to whom He had in the state of humiliation brought Himself near in an intimate fellowship, He by the quickening Breath of the outpoured Spirit constituted the society of His disciples His Mystical B., through which He would henceforth bring Himself near to the generations and races of mankind and so enlarge the circle of His life-bringing fellowship. And, lest this Mystical B. should grow weak through the spending of its powers, or decay through the working of the seeds of corruption yet lodged in its members, He provided two safeguards. First, He guided the apostles and evangelists to furnish in the Gospel of His birth, life, death, and resurrection, a pure and lively image of His Person. Secondly, He established one sacrament of union in which He reveals the power of His Presence incorporating fresh members into His B., and another sacrament of communion in which the same power of His Presence is perpetually manifested afresh as He becomes known to them in the breaking of bread, and makes them partakers of His holiness.—K2^a, K2^b, Hd.

G. HARFORD.

BOOK-REST.—In some old churches a stone lectern still remains on the north chancel wall. But at least as early as the 13th cent. the same purpose was served by a cushion (sometimes one at each end) or small desk placed upon the Holy Table. The cushion, represented by mediæval artists as small and square, was of rich material, and still obtains in some churches. More generally, it has been superseded by the small desk.—R3.

S. REDMAN.

BOOKS, CARE OF.—From the early Christian centuries the Book of the Gospels was treated with extreme reverence. In

1. Service-Books. mediæval times Service-Books were comparatively few, the officiants being expected to know the greater part of the services by heart. But they were often beautiful, with clear pen-work and delicate brilliant illumination within, and with costly and jewelled covers. This old tradition survived the Reformation. In 1654 Evelyn was shown at York Minster the Bible and PB, "covered with crimson velvet and richly embossed with silvergilt," and preserved with jealous care in hope of brighter times.

The Service-Books should be the best the parish can afford, and they should be well cared for, as a sign of reverence for their sacred contents and use. If they are found to be dirty, torn, or neglected, an impression of slovenliness and irreverence is created, which it is not easy to shake off. It is difficult to believe that the minister will say the service with due reverence from a book which is evidently treated with indifference. Service-Books should be strongly, and, if possible, beautifully bound. Bindings should be protected by a cloth (as sometimes in mediæval times and even earlier) from hard oak or brass desks, which often injure them. They should be periodically rubbed with the preparation given below. Care should be taken that the strip of wood or brass, which supports the Lectern Bible, is wide enough to keep the book quite straight when closed. Books which have become dirty or torn should either be replaced by new ones, or else be sent to a competent bookbinder for restoration.

Bingham tells us that libraries were anciently attached to churches. Not a few post-Reformation

2. Other Books. Church Libraries still exist in England, e.g., Basingbourne, Bath Abbey, Cartmel, Bridgnorth St. Mary, Castleton, Grantham, etc., etc. There are also many single "chained" books, such as the Holy Bible, Homilies, Jewell's Apology, Erasmus' Paraphrases, etc. Some of these books are of considerable value from the book-collector's point of view, though for actual use they have, for the most part, been superseded by modern books or editions. They should, nevertheless, be carefully preserved as "a sacred trust . . . a portion of the national history." The foes of such books are damp, dirt, dust, heat especially gas fumes, vermin including that now rarus vermis the book-worm, overtight packing, fire and water, and thieves of various sorts. All leather bindings are liable to decay. There is no protection like constant careful use in a well-warmed and ventilated place. But all such books ought annually to be treated with a preservative such as this: paraffin wax (one part), castor oil (two parts), melted together. Work a little of this into a piece of flannel, and rub the books well with it, especially the back and joints. Then rub with the hand, and finally with a clean, soft cloth. A glass case is no protection against damp, but rather makes matters worse. Old bindings which need repair should be sent only to a binder well accustomed to such work.—R3. W. A. WICKHAM.

BOOKS, LITURGICAL.—I. PRE-REFORMATION SERVICE-BOOKS. When the Church services were celebrated in Latin, each parish church in England was required by authority to

1. Pre-Reformation Service-Books. be furnished with LB. for their due performance. The number of such books as specified by some authorities (viz., in 1287 and 1433) was as many as 11 or 12; but the number of separate volumes requisite could either be enlarged further, or else it could be reduced to seven or eight by the combination of one or two books into one volume, as we now have church services with lessons, and PBs with hymns.

Each incumbent usually found his own BREVIARY, but the parishioners were expected to provide: (a) An Antiphoner, a Collect-book (with capitula, or "little chapters"), also the Hymnary, Legenda, Ordinale (or PIE), and Psalter inclusive of the Venitane—for the Divine service of Evensong, Mattins and other HOURS said or sung in the choir. (b) For the service of the Mass, or sacrament of the altar, a Grail (Graduale), a MISSAL, and a TROPER. (c) For christening and occasional services, a MANUALE. (d) For processions in the church or churchyard, etc., a Processionale would be needful; but this was often considered as an integral part of the Manuale already mentioned, and authorities accordingly did not specify it by name.

The Breviary (as its name implies) and the Mass-book, or Missale plenarium, were themselves, from

2. Origin of the Breviary and Missal. about cents. 11-13 when they came into being, composite books, or combinations of what in earlier ages had been written in several distinct rolls or codices for the specific use of each person or ministrant taking his distinctive part in the common rites of the Church. Thus the singers had their music-book for Mass (the graduale) and the troper also; and in the same—or in a separate—volume they had their special antiphoner of words and music for their part at Evensong and other divine offices of the canonical hours. The subdeacon had his epistolare, and the deacon his gospel-book (evangelarium or textus evangelii), for reading the Epistle or the holy Gospel of the day, respectively. The readers at Mattins had in early times a variety of books, the bibliotheca (a marked Bible), the passionarius or passionale, and the legendarius (for lives and deaths of martyrs and confessors respectively), and the homiliarius and sermologus for portions of homilies and sermons selected for ecclesiastical lessons. These five were in due course combined into one book—the Legenda, which, although it was occasionally printed to meet the requirements of large churches and the more stately services in quires and places where they sang, was (along with the words and sometimes also the music of the antiphoner, together with contents of psalter, hymnal, and collect book, calendar, and the appropriate sections of the ordinale to serve as rubrics, and the pie) most frequently combined and rearranged in the breviary-noted (i.e., with music), or other great breviary-books, sometimes called "couchers" or "liggers," because they lay open like a "ledger" on the music desk or eagle for the rulers of the choir. The smaller Brevs. or portiforia (properly so-called, though this name was sometimes used indifferently for the more unwieldy volumes) naturally contained the same combination of the entire service of the Hours, because they were to serve as the "portos" (French portehors) which the priest or clerk could carry from place to place to fulfil his pensum in the daily duty of reciting the offices of the Church prescribed for the canonical hours.

Similarly, whereas for the altar service the priest in earlier cents. had been provided with a Sacramentary, containing the celebrant's prs. not only in the "Liturgy" or Euch. service, "but also such as the principal officiant would use at Bapt., Ordination, etc." (W. H. Frere, in Procter's Hist. of C. Prayer, p. 6, ed. 1901), with little or nothing in the shape of a rubric; afterwards, when the less dignified Low Mass had come in (as it had done about the 9th cent.), and the priest, with merely a clerk to "serve" and answer, became practically made responsible for the entire performance of the sacred rite and Euch. action, Missals were provided in which (along with the Ordinary, Prefaces and Canon, now furnished with rubrics from an ordinale or ordo and a modicum of music for Kyrie, Credo, Preface, Sanctus and Agnus) there were included not only the various Colls. ("secreta," orisons or "orations," and post-commons or post-communiones) which were already found in the old-fashioned Sacramentary, but also in full the words of the Antiphon ad introitum (INTROIT), Respons, GRAIL, ALLELUIA, VERSES, SEQUENCE, Offertorium, Communio, etc., from the music-books (graduale and troper), out of which the chief celebrant, when there were singers, had required to be furnished with the cues at most. The reading-books (epistolare, etc.) likewise supplied their contribution of prophetic Lections, Epistles and Gospels to the Missale plenarium; so that the Mass-book or Missal, as fully developed, contained all that the parish priest needed as he stood at the altar to say Mass (H. B. Swete, Services and Service-Books, Camb., 1896, p. 105).

II. POST - REFORMATION SERVICE - BOOKS.

When the service-book in English appeared, in 1549, it was commended (in its Preface) to the economical instinct of churchwardens and others in the following passage (which was in time discarded by revisers in 1662): "The Curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book" (of Common Prayer, etc.) "and the Bible: By the means whereof the people shall not be at so great charge for books, as in time past they have been." Nevertheless Psalters in English continued to be required. A more compendious Clerk's Book, for making responses, appeared in 1549. The Order of Matrimony was issued separately about 1550. The Litany and the Suffrages, in a separate form, as well as the old order of liturgical Epistles and Gospels in English in one volume, had preceded the PB of 1549. Besides the reprints in 1549 of Matthew's Bible by W. Hyll and T. Reynoldes in October, with its "table of Epistles and Gospels after Salisbury use," and by J. Daye and W. Seres, with Edmund Becke's notes, and an edition of Taverner's version in 5 vols. 12°, also printed by Daye & Seres, there was an edition of the Great Bible printed by E. Whitchurch, Dec. 29, 1549, which supplied the Pss. and Lessons then required; also a table to find Epistles and Gospels for the new Communion Book. The Forme and Manner of Making and Consecrating of Archbishoppes, Bishoppes, Priestes and Deacons, followed in March, 1549-50.

As, at a later date, Bp. Cosin and other divines felt the need of a fuller Pontifical, so Cranmer was conscious that an English Hymnal was still a desideratum. English prose in his day had reached a season of maturity not then so far attained by English prosody and psalmody. We may be thankful that hymnody was allowed to develop gradually, and that we are not by any Act of Uniformity bound to the use of translations, or other hymns or Pss. in metre, made to order 360 years ago.

K. Henry VIII and Cranmer tried their hands at religious verse, and the old king's groom of the robes, T. Sternhold, with his Psalms in metre found favour with Prince Edward; but neither of them lived to see Sternhold's work, as supplemented by J. Hopkins and others, brought out in the full collection of 1561, presented, as it was, to Q. Elizabeth, and bound up with PB, Bible, Homilies and "Godly Prayers" (Julian, Dict. Hymnol., 1892, pp. 859, 1539), and approved, for public as well as private use, by the Archbishops and the Bp. of London, censor and dean of the college of bishops of the southern province. In 1696, when taste had changed, "A New Version of the Psalms of David fitted to the Tunes used in the Church" by Nahum Tate, chaplain in ordinary, and Nic. Brady (poet laureate) was allowed by the King in council, and in 1698 the Bp. of London added his formal approval or licence, with an expression of good wishes. In 1703 a supplement was allowed by Order in Council; seven hymns (for Christmas, etc.) were added in 1782, and five more about 1808.

Dr. Julian, in tracing the rise and development of English Hymnody from the time of the Wesleys, shows that about 1829-40, among numerous private ventures, several hymnals appeared under some sort of episcopal recognition. In 1859 a trial copy of Hymns Ancient and Modern indicated the gathering force which a committee could apply to restore in some measure an element of divine service which authority had not been equal to supplying. The introduction first of metrical versions of the Pss. and subsequently of hymns in English has materially protracted the order of Mattins and Evensong and has modified also that of HC.

That the Anthem should follow the three Collects "in Quires and places where they sing" (Cathedrals, Collegiate Churches, and Royal Chapels) was directed by the rubric in 1662. Pepys heard one at Whitehall somewhat earlier (Aug. 12 and Oct. 7, 1660, and see Diary, Feb. 23-24, 1661), and such anthems had in fact been in use from Elizabethan times (Machyn's Diary, and Strype, s.a. 1560). No book of anthems for general use has been prescribed except what was included in J. Day (Q. Elizabeth's Printer's "Certain Notes in 5 Parts" (1560, Tallis), after the Injunctions of 1559 (No. 49; Gee and Hardy, p. 435) had permitted "an hymn or such like song . . . in the beginning or in the end of Common Prayers." For "An Anthem or prayer for the preservation of the Church, the Queen's Majesty, and the Realm, to be sung after evening prayer at all times" (1578), see Liturgical Services, Q. Eliz., Parker Soc., p. 560. Other collections of anthems ("full," "verse," etc.) have simply the authority of Dean and Chapter or some local Ordinary with "peculiar jurisdiction."

The 1st Book of Homilies was issued in July, 1547, and contained in thirty portions twelve sermons by Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, T. Becon, J. Harpsfield, R. Taverner, etc. The 2nd Tome is attributed mainly to Bp. Jewel and contains twenty-one homilies in forty-five portions. It was printed in 1562 and issued in 1563 (cp. 35th Art. of Religion).

Convenient books containing such parts or sections of the PB as the Litany, Confirmation and Catechism, Visitation and Communion of the Sick, Burial of Dead, etc., have been frequently printed, some of them with notes and instructions, but without special authority. An Altar Book (an edition in 1715) and a Book of the ministration of Holy Baptism with some other Occasional Offices of the Church according to the Use of the Church of England (e.g., 1836, SPCK.) have been issued and re-issued from time to time.

The Accession Service, 1576, etc.; Fifth of November (Powder Plot), 1606; K. Charles the Martyr, Jan. 30; and the Restoration of Church and King, May 29, for a long period printed annually by the King's printers, were at length appended to copies of the PB, along with the 39 Articles of Religion (1562, revised 1571, with Royal Declaration 1628).

Forms or Orders of Prayer for Days of general public Humiliation, Thanksgiving, etc., had been frequently issued in mediæval times by archbishops and bishops at the direction of Royal authority (cp. e.g., Grandisson Register, Exeter, ed. Hingeston-Randolph, 2 nrs, s.a. 1355). In later times such forms in English have been prepared by the archbishops and issued to the bishops by the Bp. of London, and to the parishes in accordance with an Order in Council. More than forty occasional forms, c. 1560-1601, have been described or reprinted by the Parker Society, Liturgical Services, Q. Elis., 1847, and Camb. Univ., 1876.

A service at the Healing or Touching for the King's Evil was printed in 1636, 1670, 1686, and occasionally bound up with the PB until 1719, as was a Form for the 2nd Sept., after the Fire of London, printed in 1681, revised in 1696, and used at St. Paul's until the STATE HOLY-DAYS were discontinued in 1859. Parsell's Latin PB (1706) also contained them, with the Latin form used at the opening of Convocation in 1700. A Form for Admitting Converts from the Church of Rome was drawn up by the Queen's command in 1714 and was revised in 1898 (Procter and Frere, p. 254). The Form of a Pr. to be used by all Preachers before their sermons (in bidding prayers), which had been added to the Injunctions of 1550 (Gee and Hardy, p. 440), is enjoined by the 55th canon of 1604, and various recensions of it are in occasional use. An academical service at Commemoration of Benefactors (with the Euch. service at a Funeral, 1549—omitted in 1552) was issued in the Latin PB of Q. Elizabeth in 1560, and is in use in certain colleges. Local Commemorations of Benefactors have been drawn up and used under the authority of the Ordinary in several cathedral churches.

It was proposed at the Restoration in 1660 to add to the order of Confirm. and the Ordination services, already existing in English and belonging to the Pontifical, some other forms of services reserved to the episcopal office, and in particular to provide an authorised order for the Consecration and Reconciliation of Churches and Churchyards. Bp. Cosin, to whom the task was committed, was prevented by age and infirmity from completing it in time. A later project, 1712 and 1714, was rendered abortive by the arbitrary silencing of Convocation. Accordingly each bishop (and notably J. Wordsworth of Sarum, 1885-1911) has continued to exercise his "liturgic right" to authorise the forms to be used in his diocese, as was done habitually by Anglican prelates in the 17th century. Dr. J. W. Legg has edited such forms of that period for HBS (vol. 41).—B2.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

BOWING.—From the very earliest times it has been the custom to bow at the name of Jesus, Phil. 2 10 being interpreted as directing this practice. Canon 18 of 1604 orders: "When in time of Divine Service the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present, as it hath been accustomed." The Convocation of 1661 revived this order. The custom which obtains in many churches of B. at the name of Jesus only in the Creeds is entirely without authority.

B. upon entering or leaving church is also a very ancient custom and is recommended in canon 7, passed by Convocation in 1640, as follows: "We heartily commend it to all good and well-affected people that they be ready to tender to the Lord their reverence and obeisance both at their coming in and going out of church, according to the most ancient custom of the primitive Church in the purest times."¹

B. towards the altar bef. and aft. receiving HC is a very common practice and one which seems to have been more or less continuous in the English Church from the Reformation to the present day. In the Officium Eucharisticum, written by E. Lake, chaplain to Lady Mary of York, afterwards Queen Mary, wife of William of Orange—a book of devotion dedicated to and used by Her Royal Highness, and bearing the Lambeth Imprimatur of June 13, 1677—the communicant is directed (p. 63) to "go up to the Altar and prostrate before it say"; and again, aft. Communion: "arising and making your reverence towards the Altar you depart with a glad heart and cheerful countenance." This book ran through 34 edns. and was in use as late as 1740 when the last edition was issued. In churches where the custom of B. towards the altar is practised, it should be noted that the reverence is paid not to the altar or to the cross upon it, but to Him who sanctifies the altar.

In many congregations it is customary to bow at other periods of the service, notably at the Gloria Patri, at the mention of the Holy Trinity, and when reference is made to our Lord's Incarnation. These are pious customs referred to in the 1st PB of Edward VI, and again in the canons of 1640, as practices which may be observed or not according to the inclination of the worshipper.²

¹ "Whereas the Church is the house of God, dedicated to His holy worship, and therefore ought to mind us both of the greatness and goodness of His divine majesty; certain it is that the acknowledgment thereof, not only inwardly in our hearts, but also outwardly with our bodies, must needs be pious in itself, profitable unto us, and edifying unto others. We therefore think it very meet and becomful, and heartily commend it to all good and well-affected people, members of this Church, that they be ready to tender unto the Lord the said acknowledgment, by doing reverence, both at their coming in and going out of the said churches, chancels or chapels, according to the most ancient custom of the primitive Church in the purest times, and of this Church also for many years of the reign of queen Elizabeth. The reviving therefore of this ancient and laudable custom we heartily commend to the serious consideration of all good people, not with any intention to exhibit any religious worship to the Communion Table, the east, or church, or anything therein contained in so doing, or to perform the said gesture in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, upon any opinion of a corporal presence of the body of Jesus Christ on the holy table, or in the mystical elements, but only for the advancement of God's majesty, and to give Him alone that honour and glory that is due unto Him, and no otherwise; and in the practice or omission of this rite we desire that the rule of charity prescribed by the apostle may be observed, which is that they which use this rite, despite not them who use it not; and that they who use it not, condemn not those that use it." (See further, CANONS.)

² [There is, however, no sanction for the usages noted in the last two paragraphs in any Anglican formulary now clearly authoritative.]

The practice of B. to the cross by the ministers and servers at the altar when passing and re-passing has no primitive sanction and is not warranted by custom. What is incorrectly known as "genuflexion"—the custom of dropping upon one knee—is absolutely without authority in the Church of England and without precedent in the ancient church.—R2.

J. O. COOP.

BOX FOR BREAD.—A B., usually of pewter or silver, for carrying the sacramental bread to the Church.—R3.

S. REDMAN.

BRAWLING.—The offence of creating a disturbance in a consecrated building or on consecrated ground was by ecclesiastical law punished by penance, pro salute animas, and this power was recognised by the Common Law.

In the case of B. by words, the courts christian were empowered by Stat. 5 and 6 Edw. VI, c. 4, to suspend a lay offender ab ingressu ecclesiae, and a cleric from eccles. functions. In the case of blows, the offender was excommunicate ipso facto, i.e., on the offence being proved in the eccles. courts. In 1860 this Act was repealed except as to persons in holy orders (see Girt v. Fillingham, Law Rep., 1901, P. 176, 183).

Interference with or disturbance of public worship in the churches and churchyards of the established church is still punishable by lay courts under Acts 1 Mar., St. 2, c. 3, 1 Eliz., c. 2, § 3, and the Toleration Act of 1688; but the general law on the point is now that of the Eccles. Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict., c. 82), which applies also to chapels of any religious denomination and to any burial ground. Any person (§ 2) guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour in any such place; or who shall "molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful means disquiet or misuse any preacher, etc., ministering or celebrating any sacrament or any divine service, rite, or office" is liable (on summary conviction before two justices) to fine not exceeding £5, or imprisonment not exceeding two months. Any constable or churchwarden may arrest an offender (§ 3).

A clerk in orders is subject to this Act, and after conviction may be dealt with under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892. An objection publicly made to the ordination of a deacon, unless it specifies an "impediment or notable crime" within the meaning of the ordination service, was held to be B. (Law Rep., 1905, 2 KB 249).—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

BREAD.—See ELEMENTS, UNLEAVENED BREAD, WAFER.

BREVIARY.—The book containing the Offices for the HOURS OF PRAYER. The title originally designated a volume giving the first words only of each Ps., Antiphon, etc., so as to indicate the order of the service. In early times, when the Hours were never recited except in choir, the matter composing the office was contained in several distinct volumes—the Psalter, Antiphonary, etc. But in the 13th cent. the custom of reciting the offices privately when absent from the monastery arose among the Mendicant Orders, and was adopted by the older religious orders and the secular clergy. Hence the necessity for one book containing the whole office, to which the name of B. was transferred. In England it was also called Portiforium or Portio. In course of time it became usual to divide the B. into two vols., for summer and winter, and eventually into four, one for each season. Originally each religious order and even each diocese had its own B., but the Roman B., as revised by Pius V in the 16th cent., is now used throughout practically the whole Roman Communion with three notable exceptions: (1) the Milan B., tracing back its origin to the time of St. Ambrose, and differing widely from the Roman office; (2) the Monastic B. put forth by St. Benedict, used by the Benedictines, Cistercians, etc., and possessing many marked peculiarities; and (3) the Dominican B., best described as the form of the Roman office used by Canons Regular in the time of St. Dominic.—db.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

BRIEFS.—See ALMS, § 1.

BURIAL.—A dead body is usually buried in the ground, but the law permits it to be disposed of in other ways, e.g., by burning, provided that no nuisance is thereby caused. Cremation, however, is now regulated by Act of Parliament.

If the body be buried, it is not legally necessary that it should be buried in any particular place or with any particular ceremony. Public B. grounds are universally provided; but B. in private ground is permissible, so long as the requirements of decency are observed.

A coffin is ordinarily used, but it is not essential: it is sufficient if the body be decently covered. Coffins are generally of wood, but they may be made of iron or other material; though the payment of special fees for interment may be thereby occasioned.

Every householder, in whose house a dead body lies, is responsible for its B., unless some other person will undertake the office. Husbands are bound to provide for the B. of their dead wives, parents for the B. of their dead children, and executors for the B. of their testators; want of sufficient means may, however, be a valid excuse.

If a dead body be cast up on the shore by tidal or navigable waters and remains unclaimed, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish within the bounds of which it is found must bury it in the churchyard at the expense of the county.

The guardians of a poor law union are bound to provide for the B. of poor persons dying in their institutions; and they may bury the body of any poor person which may be within their union.

Proper funeral expenses are payable out of the property of a deceased person in priority to any other charges.

It is an offence against ecclesiastical law to remove a dead body from consecrated ground, unless a FACULTY authorising the removal be obtained. It is also a criminal offence to disinter a dead body without lawful authority; and in the general case that authority can only be conferred by the licence of the Home Secretary. If however a Faculty be obtained for the purpose, a dead body may be removed from one consecrated place of burial to another without the licence of the Home Secretary.

Apart from the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, a minister of the Ch. of Eng. is not allowed to perform the B. Service according to the rites of the Ch. in any B. ground which is unconsecrated; and, conversely, any person who is buried in consecrated ground (other than a person excluded from the right

2. Law as to Service. of Christian B.) must have the B. Service of the Ch. of Eng. read over his body by a duly authorised minister of the Ch.

To those "that die unbaptised or excommunicate or have laid violent hands upon themselves," the right of Christian B. is denied; so that the B. Service may not be read over them. It is, however, to be noted that only those are regarded as unbaptised who have not received baptism according to the form of any Christian denomination. Now, under the Act, a minister of the Ch. of Eng. is not to be subject to any censure or penalty for performing the B. Service according to the rites of the Ch. in any unconsecrated B. ground, nor for using in consecrated ground at the request of the person in charge of the B. such a shortened form of the B. Service as is prescribed or approved by the Ordinary. In the case, however, of persons excluded from Christian B., a minister of the Ch. of Eng. is still not permitted to use the full form of B. Service: he may only use the shortened form as above.

Moreover, under the same Act, when a proper notice has been given by the person in charge of the B. to the incumbent or officiating minister, a person may be buried in consecrated ground either without the performance of any religious service or with the performance of such Christian or orderly religious service as the person in charge of the B. may think fit; Christian service including every religious service used by any denomination or person professing to be Christian. And the incumbent or officiating minister so notified shall not be liable to any censure or penalty for permitting any such B. to take place.

Brawling or indecent behaviour in any B. ground is an offence punishable on summary conviction. All B.'s must be duly registered.—oa.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

BURIAL SERVICE.—The Order for the Burial of the Dead, as it now stands in the PB, may be thus briefly analysed. (i)

1. Analysis of PB Office. Introd. (gen., though not necessarily, in ch.): (a) Three opening Sents.—(1) Antiphon, (2) Respond from Sar. Office of the Dead, (3) Revision of 1549 text; (b) Psalms 39 and 90, one or both, (inserted 1662—Psalmody had been expelled from the 1552 office¹); (c) Lesson (1 Cor. 15 20-38: part of which was the Ep. in the Sar. Daily Mass for the Dead).

(ii) Service proper—at the grave: (d) Opening anthem (peculiar, at funerals, to the English Ch.; from an antiphon sung at Compline during a part of Lent); (e) Committal (of the body only; of the soul also in 1549); (f) Second Anthem (same source as c, but quoted from the "Great Bible"); (g) Lesser Lit. and Lord's Pr.; (h) Prayer (altered in 1552 from two composed in 1549); (i) Coll. (from the Order for HC which followed the Burial Service in 1549); (h) "The Grace."

The prefatory rubrics indicate: (1) the classes of persons for whom this office may not be used, viz., those who (a) lacking baptism are not members of the Church, (b) have been excommunicated by a competent court and die unreconciled to the Ch., (c) are suicides, i.e., declared such by formal verdict of a coroner's inquest. In cases (b) and (c) the clergyman may not decide who is excommunicate, or (except for grave reasons) set aside the decision of a legally constituted jury. (2) The liberty (doubtless for sanitary reasons) of proceeding at once to the grave and there conducting the entire office.

The service itself is more one of comfort for the living than of commendation of the departed.

But, as the Occasional services of the PB are not (properly speaking) independent offices, but are all intended to be combined with HC, it is to this latter service that we look for specific commemoration of the departed (Ch. Militant Pr. and 1st Post-Com. Pr.). It is noteworthy that one of the three forms of Memorial Service used on the B. day of King Edward VII (1910) was a Funeral Euch. with proper Coll., Ep. and Gospel (all taken from the 1549 celebration. "when there is a B. of the dead"), i.e., our present "Coll." 1 Thess. 4 13-18, John 6 37-40. The omission of specific pr. for the departed in 1552 was no doubt due to the many superstitions and practical abuses with which it had become associated; and for a similar reason, in view of the mistaken popular belief in the "missarum sacrificia" (Art. 31) as propitiatory for the dead, the Funeral Euch. ceased to be definitely ordered. At the present day there is a deepening realisation of what is connoted by the Communion of Saints which finds fair reflection in the epitaph of Bp. Barrow (1677), written by himself: "The remains of Isaac, Bishop of St. Asaph, laid in the hand of God, in the hope of a joyful resurrection through the merits of Christ alone. O ye that pass by into the house of the Lord, the house of prayer, pray for your fellow-servant that he may find mercy in the day of the Lord." (See further DEAD, PRAYER FOR THE.)

As far back as the time of the Venerable Bede (HE 4 23) it was customary in England to ring a bell

2. The Passing Bell. when a death occurred, and the 67th canon of 1604 orders that, when any person "is passing out of this life, a bell shall be tolled, and the Minister shall not then slack to do his last duty. And after the party's death there shall be rung no more than one short peal, and one other before the B., and one other after the B."

The Pre-Reformation Services, compared with the present rite, are very full and rich.

(1) During the last moments of life Litanies and Pss. were recited, closing with a solemn and touching farewell in the Name of the Holy Trinity (Commendatio Animae in Articulo

¹ The words "shall be read" are by custom interpreted as not prohibiting singing where it is practicable.

Mortis). (2) After death the Commendatio Animas continued, consisting of P.'s (with appropriate Antiphons) and Colls. during which the body was prepared for interment. (3) The Officium pro Defunctis (Evensong, Mattins and Lauds). The Evensong was commonly known as the PLACEBO and the Mattins as the DIRIGE (from the first words of their respective Antiphons at the beginning of the offices). (4) The Requiem Mass (so called from the first word of the Introit Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis, see REQUIEM), followed by a Commendation, the body being censed and sprinkled with holy water. (5) The actual Service of B. (Inhumatio Defuncti), praying that the good God would vouchsafe the departed eternal rest, closed a series of offices remarkable for tender pathos and love toward the departed.

The 1549 Rites departed from the mediæval use in many respects, but had their own intrinsic characteristics. The Order of B. was much shorter and was practically a compilation from the preceding offices, consisting of: (1) A Procession from the church-stile to the ch. (or grave), the present three Sents. being said or sung. (2) The Burial Service proper: (a) Sents. "Man that is born," etc., and "In the midst," etc.; (b) Commendation of the departed soul, followed by a Pr. taken from the order of HERMANN of Cologne. (3) Office for the Dead: (a) Psalms 116, 139, 146; (b) Lesson, 1 Cor. 15 20-38; (c) Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., Versicles and Responses; (d) A long Pr. evidently culled from Sar. sources. (4) The Funeral Eucharist: (a) Introit, Ps. 42; (b) Collect, "O Merciful God" (as in PB, but slightly expanded at the end); (c) Epistle, 1 Thess. 4 13-18; (d) Gospel, John 6 37-40.

5. The Order in 1549.

In 1552 there came a radical change. Almost all words relating to the departed were deliberately expunged from the HC, 6. Changes in 1552.

and the B. Service was so revised as to exclude all pr. for the dead, e.g., the commendation of both soul and body became merely the committal of the body. Such a change can only be explained by the influence of Calvin's teaching. Men who denied or ignored the Intermediate State could not pray either for those who had attained to heaven, or for those beyond the efficacy of prayer. [There is however another explanation, adopted by Bp. Chavasse at the Liv. Dioc. Conf., in 1910, viz., that in 1552 the principle was deliberately adopted of not authorising in the PB, intended for public use, any doctrine or devotional practice involving doctrine which could not be proved from Scripture. The slight alteration in 1662 noted below may be taken as indicating that this view was adhered to in 1662. See further, HOPE, G.H.] But even in the Pr. "Almighty God with Whom do live," etc., there was an oblique petition for the departed in the words "that we, with *this our brother and all other*¹ departed . . . may have our perfect consummation and bliss both in body and soul."

¹ Italicised words omitted in 1662.

Pss. and Suffrages were cut out, and the earth was to be cast upon the body "by some standing by," and not by the priest as in 1549 (an old ceremony inherited in a simplified form from the Latin rite).

The American Office is practically the same as that of the present PB with the following variations.

7. The American Office.

(a) There are "selections" only from the 39th and 90th Pss. (i.e., they are not complete). They are specifically allowed to be sung, an alternative not given in our English PB. (b) In the rubric before the Lesson, American modernity prefers the word "first" to "former"; and after the Lesson comes a rubric "Here may be sung a Hymn or Anthem; and, at the discretion of the Minister, the Creed, and such fitting Prayers as are elsewhere supplied in this Book, may be added" (three additional Prs. are given at end of Office, one taken from the Scottish Communion Office). (c) The "Committal" is an expansion of the English form and is suitable for use at sea. (d) One or both of the concluding Prs. may be used. (e) The word "Minister" replaces "Priest" throughout the rubrics.

The Irish Office (1877) has the two following peculiarities.

8. The Irish Office.

(a) It has an enlarged prefatory rubric: "Here it is to be noted, that the Office ensuing is not to be used for any that die unbaptised, or excommunicate, or in whose case a verdict shall have been found of felo de se. But if any be brought for B. who have died unbaptised, being infants of tender age, the offspring of Christian parents, and not having been withheld from Bapt. by wilful fault or neglect, or being persons known or certified to the Minister to have been at the time of their death prepared for or desirous of Bapt., the Minister shall in such cases read one of the following Pss. and Lessons, or such portion of them as he shall see fit, and the four sentences at the grave, concluding with the Lord's Pr. and the Benediction at the close of the office." (b) It provides an alternative Lesson, viz. 1 Thess. 4 13-18.

For B. of the Dead at Sea, see SEA, FORMS OF PRAYER TO BE USED AT.—ob. H. E. SCOTT.

BURSE.—A square pocket or case, sometimes open on three sides, made of cardboard and covered with a rich material; introduced in the 14th cent. as a receptacle for the pall and corporas.—R3.

S. REDMAN.

CALENDAR.

- § 1. THE CHANGE OF STYLE.
- § 2. OLD STYLE PB TABLES.
- § 3. THE PASCHAL FULL MOON.
- § 4. THE GOLDEN NUMBER.
- § 5. GOLDEN NUMBERS IN OLD-STYLE CALENDAR — EMBOLISTIC MONTHS.
- § 6. DAY OF FULL MOON.
- § 7. THE SUNDAY LETTER (O.S.).
- § 8. CONSTRUCTION OF EASTER TABLES (O.S.).
- § 9. REFORMATION OF CALENDAR.
- § 10. CORRECTION OF SOLAR CYCLE.
- § 11. SECOND GENERAL TABLE IN PB.
- § 12. EASTER TABLES, 1500-1699.
- § 13. THIRD GENERAL TABLE IN PB.
- § 14. MODERN ROMAN SYSTEM. EPOCHS.
- § 15. MATHEMATICAL FORMULÆ.

Not only the ecclesiastical but also the civil affairs of life are regulated by the C. which is inserted in the PB with "Tables and rules for the moveable and immoveable Feasts, together with the days of Fasting and

1. The Change of Style. Abstinence throughout the whole year." This C. was inserted in accordance with the Statute 24, Geo. II, c. 23, 1751. By this statute it was directed that, the "Table to find Easter for ever," which had been printed in the PB since 1561, and also the column of the "Golden Numbers" which, with some changes, had been printed since 1552, both of which were in the PB of 1662 as established by 14 Car. II, c. 4, should henceforth be omitted and the New C. and tables should take their place.

The reason assigned was that in process of time the Old C. and tables had become "considerably erroneous," and in consequence the New C. and tables must be regarded not as superseding but as amending them.

It will be necessary therefore first to describe the structure of the Old Church C. as it is found in its most complete form in the Sealed

2. Old Style Books and in the MS. annexed to the Act of Uniformity of 1662. Most unfortunately, in this, as was the case in the earlier editions of the PB, various errors apparently due to carelessness are to be found, and also from that date down to the present time these tables have been printed in a more or less mutilated and changed condition.

The C. of 1662 consisted of nine columns of which the first four only need be given in this article. As specimens these four columns are given in the annexed table for the months of January and March. The fifth column gave the dates of festivals and Saints' days, and the remaining four columns gave the daily morning and evening first and second lessons.

January hath xxxi days.				March hath xxxi days.
The Moon hath xxx.				The Moon hath xxx.
1	A	Kalend		3	1	d	Kalend
2	b	4 No.		4	2	e	6 No.
10	3	c	3 No.	11	3	f	5 No.
19	4	d	Pr. No.	20	4	g	4 No.
28	5	e	Nonæ	29	5	A	3 No.
7	6	f	8 Id.	8	6	b	Pr. No.
16	7	g	7 Id.	17	7	c	Nonæ
25	8	A	6 Id.	26	8	d	8 Id.
3	9	b	5 Id.	12	9	e	7 Id.
11	10	c	4 Id.	20	10	f	6 Id.
19	11	d	3 Id.	28	11	g	5 Id.
27	12	e	Pr. Id.	5	12	A	4 Id.
5	13	f	Idus	13	13	b	3 Id.
13	14	g	19 Kl. Febr.	21	14	c	Pr. Id.
21	15	A	18 Kl.	29	15	d	Idus
29	16	b	17 Kl.	6	16	e	17 Kl. April
6	17	c	16 Kl.	14	17	f	16 Kl.
14	18	d	15 Kl.	22	18	g	15 Kl.
22	19	e	14 Kl.	30	19	A	14 Kl.
30	20	f	13 Kl.	7	20	b	13 Kl.
7	21	g	12 Kl.	15	21	c	12 Kl.
15	22	A	11 Kl.	23	22	d	11 Kl.
23	23	b	10 Kl.	31	23	e	10 Kl.
31	24	c	9 Kl.	8	24	f	9 Kl.
8	25	d	8 Kl.	16	25	g	8 Kl.
16	26	e	7 Kl.	24	26	A	7 Kl.
24	27	f	6 Kl.	31	27	b	6 Kl.
1	28	g	5 Kl.	7	28	c	5 Kl.
9	29	A	4 Kl.	15	29	d	4 Kl.
17	30	b	3 Kl.	23	30	e	3 Kl.
25	31	c	Frid. Kl.	31	31	f	Pr. Kl.

In the first column the "Golden Numbers" were placed. These numbers range from 1 to 19, referring to a cycle of 19 years in which time it was believed that the phases of the moon would recur to the same days in the C. This cycle was believed to have been discovered about B.C. 433 by Meton at Athens, and for this he received an Olympic Crown, and the cycle was inscribed in gold on the walls of the temple of Minerva. Meton may have learnt his astronomy in Egypt. In the 1662 C. the day opposite to which a number stands is the day on which a C. new moon falls in that particular year of the cycle.

In the column for January there are three dates on which the numbers are wrong: Jan. 1 should be 3; Jan. 3, 11; Jan. 30, 14. On May 1 also a should be 11, and, on July 26, 13 should be 14.

The second column contains the days of the month.

The third column contains letters by which the day of the week is indicated throughout the year.

The fourth column contains the Old Roman C., and this column is, without authority, always omitted from printed Prayer Books. By the revision of 1751 the only change that was made was that the Golden Numbers were transferred from the dates of the C. New Moons to the dates of the C. Full Moons, and were omitted altogether except from Mar. 21 to April 18 inclusive, because it is only these that are of use for finding the date of Easter on which the dates of all the moveable feasts, etc., depend, and because the Golden Numbers are now used for no other purpose. The third and fourth tables in the PB show how these feasts depend on Easter.

The Old Church C. was constructed on the hypothesis that there are exactly 365½ days in the year; this was assumed in the C. given to the Roman Empire by Julius Caesar in B.C. 46, which was drawn up under the supervision of the Egyptian astronomer Sosigenes. The length of the year was taken as 365 days, but every fourth year this was made 366 by reckoning Feb. 24, 6 Kl. Mart, twice, whence the name Bissextile. This is still the case in the C. of the Roman Church, and was the case in the C. of the English Church until the revision of 1662, when the extra day was made Feb. 29. At this one point then the English and Roman Calendars do not now agree, and confusion has occurred in consequence as to the correct date of the Feast of St. Matthias. (See FESTIVALS, § 29.)

Up to this point then the C., as the names given to the various months of the year testify, is that of Pagan, official Rome, and is based on the lengths of the year and the day only, whatever the earliest Roman systems may have been, since apparently originally the Kalends, Nones and Ides were intended to correspond to New Moon, 1st Quarter and Full Moon. On this C. depend the dates of the various Saints' days and Festivals and of Advent Sunday, which is always the nearest Sunday to Nov. 30, the feast of St. Andrew.

We next come to the part the moon plays in the construction of the C., because on to this solar Pagan C. was grafted a lunar

3. The Paschal Full Moon. one, which came to the Christian Church from an Eastern source on account of the connection of the Festival of Easter with the Jewish Passover as described in Exodus 12. The following passage from the letter sent (710) to Naitan, King of the Picts, as recorded in Bede's Ecclesiastical History 5 21, will explain how this came about:

"There are three rules in the Sacred Writings on account of which it is not lawful for any human authority to change the time of keeping Easter which has been prescribed to us; two whereof are divinely established in the law of Moses; the third is added in the Gospel by means of the passion and resurrection of our Lord. For the law enjoined that the Passover should be kept in the first month of the year and the third week of that month, that is, from the fifteenth day to the one and twentieth day. It is added by apostolical institution from the Gospel that we are to wait for the Lord's Day in that third week and to keep the beginning of the Paschal time on the same. This threefold rule whosoever shall rightly observe will never err in fixing the Paschal feast."

Now this first month is the Jewish first month, and is by intention that month of which the full moon came next after the vernal equinox. It is also related to the following statement in the C. tables of the 1662 PB:

"Note that the Supputation of the year of Our Lord in the Church of England beginneth the five and twentieth day of March."

For at the time of the Julian reform, B.C. 46, the vernal equinox fell about 3 C. days later than the time it fell at the date of the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325, i.e., roughly, March 25. In the Julian year the equinox receded in the C. about 1 day in 129 years. Julius Caesar assigned his New Year's Day to Jan. 1 because it was in B.C. 45 the first new moon after the Winter Solstice which he believed to be Dec. 25. This would bring the Spring Equinox to Mar. 25.

The Old C. was constructed on the hypothesis that in 19 years there are exactly 235 lunar months or lunations. Had this hypothesis been exactly true, then the whole cycle would have been completed in $4 \times 7 \times 19 = 532$ years, and after this period the years, days and phases of the moon, and therefore the dates of Easter, would have come round in exactly the same order. This cycle bears the name of Dionysius Exiguus, an abbot at Rome about 530, and therefore this is probably the date about which the Old C. took that complete form which it retained for over 1,000 years, although the gradually accumulating error was noted as early as 1223 by an unknown French writer. This C. put an end to the acute disputes about the date of Easter which had previously prevailed.

We will next see in what way the Golden Numbers were affixed to the Calendar.

Since A.D. 1 was the second year of the cycle, the Golden Number, or Prime, written in ancient Cs. in gold, is found by the following rule: "Add 1 to the date of the year. Divide by 19. The result gives the number of cycles of the moon that have elapsed since the Christian era. The remainder is the Golden Number, or, if there be no remainder, 19 is the Golden Number."

Dating January as the first month according to the Roman Official C., and reckoning by the old rule,

"In quo completur mensi lunatio detur," we shall be able by affixing the Golden Numbers throughout the year to find the date of Easter.

This was probably first done by Anatolius, a native of Alexandria and bishop of the Syrian Laodicea about 270, who first made use of the cycle of Meton for this purpose (see Eusebius, EH. vii. 3214-19). In the year 325 (the year of the Nicene Council) a new moon fell on Jan. 1. The Golden Number of 325 is 3, therefore we place a 3 against Jan. 1. Since a lunation is nearly $29\frac{1}{2}$ days, then counting from Jan. 1, we place a 3 opposite every 30th and 29th day alternately, and we thus reach Dec. 21, for $6 \times 30 + 6 \times 29 = 354$ days. There are $365 - 354 = 11$ days over. Hence the fourth year of the cycle has each of its months ending 11 days sooner, the first month ending on Jan. 19, the last on Dec. 9. We have now 22 days over. If we repeat this process for year 5 of the cycle we must have 33 days over. We therefore call this year a year of 13 months and call the extra month an embolistic month. Since the 19 years have 235 lunations, there must be in all $235 - 19 \times 12 = 235 - 228 = 7$ years with embolistic months. To make the cycle true to a day we must ignore the average value of the Bissextile day and reckon 6 of these embolistic years to contain 30 days and 1 to contain 29.

Different Cs. make a slight variation as to where these embolistic months should be inserted, but the rule was rigidly observed that the lunation in which the Paschal Moon fell must be kept as one of 29 days so as to ensure that that moon could not fall into a wrong nominal month, and the embolistic months were distributed amongst the 235 lunations at approximately even distances. In leap years the intercalated day caused a slight interference with the reckoning. Either three consecutive lunations actually contained 30 days each, or, what was undesirable, yet at times unavoidable, the March lunation had to include really 31 days.

For C. purposes the 14th day onward inclusive from each of these C. New Moons was reckoned as the full moon, although the actual full moon must fall on the 15th or even the 16th. This very ancient assumption is due to the fact that formerly "New Moon" meant first day of visibility, which is what modern astronomy would regard as the second or even third day of the moon's age.

6. Day of Full Moon.

If now the date of the Vernal Equinox be known, we can determine also the date of that Paschal full (14th day of the) moon which belongs to it. This is settled by fixing the date as Mar. 21. Leap year causes the date, even in the corrected C., to vibrate between Mar. 21 and 22. Nevertheless we ignore this and decide to always call the determining date of Mar. 21 the Vernal Equinox, and intend, as 24 Geo. II, c. 23, remarks, thereby to restore the C. to the condition it was in at the date of the Council of Nicaea.

By the third column in the C. which contains the letters we determine which dates in a given year are Sundays. Since $365 \div 7$ gives a remainder of 1, each ordinary year begins and ends with the same day of the week, the next year beginning with the next day. A.D. 1 began on Saturday and therefore ended on Saturday. A.D. 2 therefore began on a Sunday. Also every leap year the letter leaps, and $366 \div 7$ gives remainder 2.

7. The Sunday Letter (O.S.).

Hence a simple rule arises which can be expressed in various forms. One form is as follows. Add to the number of the year its fourth part, omitting fractions (i.e., the number of contained leap years), also the number 2; divide by 7, and take the remainder.

Then the following table will give the Sunday letter for an ordinary year, and the second letter (the one in use after the intercalated day) for a leap year. This or these letters will give the Sundays throughout the year.

6	5	4	3	2	1	0
F	G	A	B	C	D	E

The reason why, in this particular form, these letters are affixed to these special numbers is that, by adding 2, we are taking the year B.C. 2, which actually began on a Wednesday, as our starting-point. Now, remembering that B.C. 1 is reckoned to precede A.D. 1 immediately, and that there was no intervening year 0, it follows from the table that, for B.C. 2, 0 corresponds to E, and that the first Sunday was Jan. 5, which, since the year began on a Wednesday, was the fact.

These calculations are sufficient to give a complete determination of the date of Easter. The old definition of Easter was probably drawn up by Bishop Cosin, as it agrees very closely with that given by him in his Private Devotions published in 1627. In 1751 the language was slightly modernised, but the meaning was unchanged.

We must next see how to construct the "Table to finde Easter for A. Construction Ever," which of Easter was first printed in Queen Elizabeth's PB, and edition (the New C. of 1561), and continued through the successive revisions down to 1662. If we lower the Golden Numbers as found in the first column of the C. each 14 places inclusive, these numbers are now opposite the places of the Paschal 14th's, the Ecclesiastical Full Moons. This is shown in the annexed table. The second table "To Finde Easter for Ever" contains merely the results drawn from the first table arranged in more convenient form for reference.

xvi	March 21	c
v	" 22	d
—	" 23	e
xiii	" 24	f
ii	" 25	g
—	" 26	A
x	" 27	b
—	" 28	c
xviii	" 29	d
vii	" 30	e
—	" 31	f
xv	April 1	g
iv	" 2	A
—	" 3	b
xii	" 4	c
i	" 5	d
—	" 6	e
ix	" 7	f
—	" 8	g
xvii	" 9	A
vi	" 10	b
—	" 11	c
xiv	" 12	d
iii	" 13	e
—	" 14	f
xi	" 15	g
—	" 16	A
xix	" 17	b
viii	" 18	c
—	" 19	d
—	" 20	e
—	" 21	f
—	" 22	g
—	" 23	A
—	" 24	b
—	" 25	c

TO FINDE EASTER FOR EVER.

The Golden Number.		A	B	C	D	E	F	G
i	Apr. 9	10		11	12		6	7
ii	Mar. 26	27		28	29		30	31
iii	Apr. 16	17		18	19		20	21
iv	Apr. 9	3		4	5		6	7
v	Mar. 26	27		28	29		30	31
vi	Apr. 16	17		18	19		20	21
vii	Apr. 2	3		4	5		6	7
viii	Apr. 23	24		25	26		27	28
ix	Apr. 9	10		11	12		13	14
x	Apr. 2	3	Mar. 28	29	30		31	1
xi	Apr. 16	17		18	19		20	21
xii	Apr. 9	10		11	12		13	14
xiii	Mar. 26	27		28	29		30	31
xiv	Apr. 16	17		18	19		20	21
xv	Apr. 2	3		4	5		6	7
xvi	Mar. 26	27		28	29		30	31
xvii	Apr. 16	17		18	19		20	21
xviii	Apr. 2	3		4	5	Mar. 30	31	1
xix	Apr. 23	24		25	26		27	28

The second table in the Reformed tables given in our modern PB, and headed "Another Table to Find Easter, etc.," is constructed from the first table printed there in exactly the same way, and thus these two tables are strictly comparable.

We must now turn to the reform of the Old Church C. The accumulation of small errors seems to have been first noted by an unknown French writer, probably Vincentius of Beauvais, in 1223. In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII abolished the Old C. and referred to a work which should completely explain the New C., written by the Jesuit Clavius. This work, under the title of Romani Calendaris a Gregorio XIII Pontifice Maximo restituti explicatio, was published 1603. In England the Old Style continued. It was known that the new moon of the heavens fell five days inclusive before the new moon of the C., and it was customary to pass from the one to the other by words or phrases of five syllables such as those given in the Latin PB (1564) of Queen Elizabeth, Sanc-ti-fi-ca-tur or Sol-est-in-ca-lis. In the Prayer Books of 1596, 1604 and 1637, however, the Golden Numbers were actually shifted five places, but their connection with the method of finding Easter was thereby disturbed, and the arrangement of 1552 and 1561 was restored in 1662.

In 1750 Lord Macclesfield published a paper on the subject in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society, and this was obviously the basis of the Act of Parliament which reformed the C. of the English Church and nation the following year, some of his actual language recurring in it. The tables annexed to the Act were drawn up under the supervision of Bradley, the friend of Newton and Halley, Astronomer Royal at Greenwich, 1742-1762. In 1582 the C. was altered by means of a system of Epacts as set out in the Roman Breviary to which we shall return later on (see § 14), but these are made no use of in the English reform, which in its table adheres to the old conservative system of Golden Numbers. It is this English system which we shall follow in the explanation of the New Calendar.

The Old Calendar was based on two assumptions which were not true. Therefore two errors, operating in reverse directions but not compensating each other, accumulated. The year is not exactly $365\frac{1}{4}$ days but a little less. Nineteen Julian years are not exactly 235 lunar months but a little more.

10. Correction of Solar Cycle.

Considering the effect of the first error. The Vernal Equinox in 1582 fell on Mar. 11, ten days too early; in 1751 it fell on Mar. 10, eleven days too early. This was rectified by the violent step of destroying these nominal days. In the Roman C., Oct. 5, 1582, was called Oct. 15. In the English C., Sept. 3, 1752, was called Sept. 14.

Considering for the purposes of explanation the effect of this as relating to, say, 1600, which is the first date mentioned in the "General Tables" printed in our Prayer Books. We must note that it will immediately react on the Sunday letter, because the new Oct. 15 must have the same letter as the old Oct. 5. These letters recur in sevens, but $10 - 7 = 3$. Hence the Sunday letter must be shifted three places, and the rule already given for finding the Sunday letter in the Julian or Old C. must be amended for the Gregorian or New Style C. thus:

"For all years between A.D. 1500 and A.D. 1700 add to the number of the year its fourth part, also the number 2, divide by 7, take the remainder, which will give the Sunday letter according to the table."

Remainder ..	6	5	4	3	2	1	0
Old Style ..	F	G	A	B	C	D	E
New Style ..	B	C	D	E	F	G	A

For all years succeeding 1700 the rule is given in the PB as subsequently explained.

By this step the C. Vernal Equinox was violently brought back to Mar. 21, and steps were taken to prevent its receding therefrom in the future.

The rule was made, the C. year of $365\frac{1}{4}$ days being too long by about 3 days in 400 years, that 3 leap years should be counted as ordinary years in each period of 4 centuries. The years chosen were those centennial years in which, the two terminal cyphers being removed, the preceding figures should not be divisible by 4 without remainder.

Thus, A.D. 1600, 2000, 2400 would remain leap years, but 1700, 1800, 1900, 2100 would not be leap years. As this correction still leaves the year too long by about one day in each 3,600 years, it was proposed by Delambre at the time of the French Revolution that A.D. 3600, 7200, etc., should not be counted leap years. This reform, however, we leave to posterity. The French revolutionary C. was dropped. The effect of this proposal on the Sunday letter is shown in the first of the General Tables printed in the Prayer Book. It is quite easy to construct this table backwards, and by this means show how the difference of the Sunday letter in the Old and New Styles arose in the preceding table.

6	5	4	3	2	1	0
B	C	D	E	F	G	A
100	200	300 400	500	600	700 800	900
1000	1100 1200	1300	1400	1500 1600	1700	1800
1900 2000	2100	2200	2300 2400	etc.	—	—

We find by inspecting this table that the Old Style dominical letter system corresponds approximately with what would have been the New Style dominical letter system at the time of the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325.

What the table effects is this, that every time a centennial leap year becomes an ordinary year, which it does 3 times in 400 years, the total number which has to be divided by 7 to get that remainder which determines the Sunday letter is reduced by one, the omitted bissextile day.

We must now consider the second general table given in the PB. In this table the third column combines in a single correcting 11. 2nd General Table in PB. number the result of two corrections—a solar correction for the length of the year, and a lunar correction for the length of the lunation or lunar month. The solar correction is intended to keep the year in correspondence with the sun so that the Vernal equinox should coincide with Mar. 21, which the astronomers who amended the C. in 1582 considered to be the date on which it fell at the time of the Council of Nicaea. The Alexandrian astronomers, who were contemporary, thought it fell on Mar. 23. Modern astronomers have decided that it then fell on Mar. 20. In our own C., on account of the disturbing factor of leap year, it vibrates every four years between Mar. 21 and 22.

The solar correction throws forward the days of the new moons, and therefore of the full moons, and therefore of the Paschal full moon, that is, the places of the Golden Numbers in the C., three days every four centuries.

The lunar correction operates the reverse way. The cycle of 19 Julian years is inexact, it is too long by an amount taken as 8 days, in 2,500 years. Therefore we must set back the places of the Golden Numbers one day at the end of each 300 years seven times, then one day at the end of each 400 years, and then repeat the series. The following table will illustrate how this gives rise to the table in our PB.

	Solar Correction.	Lunar Correction.	Resultant Number.
1600			= 0
1700	+ I		= 1
1800	+ I	- I	= 1
1900	+ I		= 2
2000			= 2
2100	+ I	- I	= 2
2200	+ I		= 3
2300	+ I		= 4
2400		- I	= 3
2500	+ I		= 4
2600	+ I		= 5
2700	+ I	- I	= 5
2800			= 5
2900	+ I		= 6
3000	+ I	- I	= 6
Etc.

The table given in the PB is simply the first and fourth columns of this derived series. It is perfectly easy to construct this table backwards, and the result is interesting; it will be found below traced backwards to A.D. 1.

	Solar Correction.	Lunar Correction.	Resultant.	- 7.
0			= 0	- 7
100	+ I		= 1	- 6
200	+ I	- I	= 1	- 6
300	+ I		= 2	- 5
400			= 2	- 5
500	+ I	- I	= 2	- 5
600	+ I		= 3	- 4
700	+ I		= 4	- 3
800		- I	= 3	- 4
900	+ I		= 4	- 3
1000	+ I		= 5	- 2
1100	+ I	- I	= 5	- 2
1200			= 5	- 2
1300	+ I		= 6	- 1
1400	+ I	- I	= 6	- 1
1500	+ I		= 7	0
1600			= 7	0
1700	+ I		= 8	+ 1
1800	+ I	- I	= 8	+ 1

It must be noted that the gap between 1400 and 1800 is taken as the one-day period of 400 years following seven periods of 300 years. These two tables are really consecutive, the subtraction of 7 being merely a convenient way of starting with 0 for the date of the Gregorian revision.

New Style 1582-1600	Old Style
iii	xvi	21	c
—	—	22	d
xi	v	23	e
—	—	24	f
xix	xiii	25	g
viii	ii	26	A
—	x	27	b
xvi	—	28	c
v	xviii	29	d
—	vii	30	e
xiii	—	31	f

TABLE FOR DOMINICAL LETTER.

	New	Old
0	A	E
1	G	D
2	F	C
3	E	B
4	D	A
5	C	G
6	B	F

New Style 1582-1600	Old Style
ii	xv	Apr. 1	g
—	iv	2	A
x	—	3	b
—	xii	4	c
xviii	i	5	d
vii	—	6	e
—	ix	7	f
xv	—	8	g
iv	xvii	9	A
—	vi	10	b
xii	—	11	c
i	xiv	12	d
—	iii	13	e
ix	—	14	f
—	xi	15	g
xvii	—	16	A
vi	xix	17	b
xiv	viii	18	c
—	—	19	d
—	—	20	e
—	—	21	f
—	—	22	g
—	—	23	A
—	—	24	b
—	—	25	c

In this table the Paschal tables in accordance with the Old and New Styles are placed side by side. Neglecting April 17 and 18 for the present, we observe that in all other cases the Golden Number in the revised C. has been moved down seven places. This seven is made up as follows: five places are taken with the deliberate intent of bringing back the C. to stand as it stood at the date of the Council of Nicaea; one place deliberately thrusts forward the date of the Paschal moon so as to ensure that it should never precede the moon of the heavens and come into conflict with the Jewish Passover; one place is an actual astronomical mistake due to an error in the tables then in existence (1582).

The Golden Numbers move one place further down in 1700, another place further down in 1900, and again another place in 2200. Table III, the last general table in our PB from which the special tables are all derived, shows their complete movement in accordance with the correction figures in Table II. This table it will not be necessary to reprint; it will be however convenient to refer to it whilst its peculiar structure is described.

Table III gives the thirty different positions of the Golden Numbers in the Paschal lunation. But, as it is necessary to ensure that the C. Moon should fall within that real period, that particular lunation is taken as 29 days only.

The adjustment is made in the four lowest lines of the table which are given up to April 17 and 18. These dates have each one line and a half assigned to them, so that the 30 different positions of the Golden Numbers are distributed over 31 horizontal lines, although in each vertical column there are only 30 numbers, and these 30 numbers are distributed over 29 actual days.

We must next observe that as the table is set out each figure reappears in the next vertical column which represents the next year of the nineteen-year lunar cycle eleven places further up, recommencing at the bottom of the column, although two of those places in the case of April 17 or 18 will be assigned to one day. This is because the year which each column represents consists of $6 \times 30 + 6 \times 29 = 354$ days, eleven days short of a solar year (the intercalary, Feb. 29, being ignored in spite of its producing from time to time what could not be dispensed with, and what Delambre called a "monstrosity in astronomy," a lunation of 31 days), these eleven day remainders accumulating until it is possible to throw out a 30 for an embolistic month. In the Table this rejected 30 represents 29 days on account of the coalescence of three places on the two dates April 17 and 18, and by the rejection of this 30 the date of the Calendar Full Moon is retained within the limits of the Table, that is, within the limits of the Paschal lunation.

Similarly, if we take any horizontal line of figures across the table, each number is the preceding increased by 11, throwing out 30 whenever possible, and it is possible 6 times because there are 6 embolistic months of 30 days in a 19-year cycle. But in passing from year 19 back to year 1 of the next cycle the figure 11 in every case becomes 12, and this is because there is a missing day, the last embolistic month being not 30 but 29. The 19-year cycle of $365\frac{1}{4} \times 19$ days is equal to $(6 \times 30 + 6 \times 29) \times 19 + 6 \times 30 + 29$ days + 4 or 5 intercalary days on an average and within the limits of the corrections, because a 19-year cycle with 5 leap years has 6,940 days, and one with 4 leap years 6,939—an average of 6,939 $\frac{1}{2}$ days.

The final point to explain is why the half lines of April 17 and 18 are broken at such a point that the 19-year cycle becomes $11 + 8 = 19$. This is an arrangement to prevent Easter Day ever coming twice on the same day within the same period of 19 years, as this is inconsistent with the notion of a cycle. In the same cycle of 19 years the places of the last eight Golden Numbers precede the places of the first eight Golden Numbers each in order by one day; this is easily seen in the table. This break at this point or at any point between the 8th and 11th years will prevent two different Golden Numbers falling on the same day of the month. This division, however, of the 19-year cycle into $11 + 8$ is very ancient, Dionysius Exiguus (530) himself stating in his Epistola ad Bomifacium: "Decemnovennalis cyclos per ogdoadem et hendecadem in se revolvitur."

These considerations completely explain and account for the English arrangement of the C. It only relates to the finding of Easter, and the whole apparatus of Golden Numbers for finding all the New Moons, except the Paschal new and the full moon depending on it, was swept away in 1751. Careful and accurate astronomical and tidal tables based not on antiquity but on modern observation take their place in good modern almanacs.

It was proposed in the Recommendations of the Convocations of Canterbury and York contained in the Reports presented to the Queen in 1879 to sweep away the existing tables in the PB and to substitute others which can be seen in The Convocation Prayer-Book, published by John Murray, 1880. A certain amount of simplicity would be gained at the expense of much destruction of historical interest and completeness, and the change is not advisable. The proposed Tables do not extend beyond 1999.

We must now say a few words on the C. as it is found in the Roman Breviary. The apparatus of Golden Numbers was removed in 1582 and their place was taken by Epacts. The Epact is a number denoting the age of the moon on Jan. 1 in each year.

For ordinary years the Epact is found by adding 11 to the Epact of the preceding year except when passing from 19th back to 1st, when 12 must be added. Corrections to the Epact must also be made when in our General Table II the number in the third column changes. The Roman Brev. prints in the first column of its Calendar an Epact almanac—reckoning each month as nominally 30 days, and counting backwards from 1 to xxx or rather *.

In the hollow months, as they are called, two numbers, xxv and xxiv, are written on one date, the month is really 29 days, and the full and hollow months come alternately.

If we have an Epact Almanac and know the Epact of the year, to find the date of Easter when the Sunday letter is known is a mere matter of inspection. However, the English reform of 1751 was a conservative reform. We refused to adopt the Roman system of Epacts, although the definition of Epact is printed in English Prayer Books as early as 1578, and although both in the 1662 PB and in the 1751 Revised Tables the Epact for each year is given in the Table of Movable Feasts.

The theory of the structure of the C. and the method of determining the date of Easter thereby have been reduced to mathematical formulæ by Gauss (1777-1855), and Mathematical Formulæ by Delambre (1749-1822) at the time of the French Revolution. Professor De Morgan, who wrote valuable papers on the subject in the British Almanac for 1845, 1846 and 1850, contributed also a paper to Stephens' Commentary on the MS. Book of Common Prayer for Ireland, E.H.S., pub. 1849. See also The Theory and Use of the Church Calendar by Rev. Samuel Seabury, New York, Pott, Young & Co., 1872.

The rule given below was supplied by a New York correspondent to Nature, April 20, 1876, and was reprinted in Butcher's Ecclesiastical Calendar (published by Hodges, Foster & Figgis, Dublin, 1877), where, however, $o + 1$ should be $o + 2$, a troublesome misprint. No detailed proof was given.

TO FIND EASTER "FOR EVER" (IN GREGORIAN CALENDAR).

Divide	by	and call the Quotient	Remainder.
The Year of Our Lord	19	—	a
" " "	100	b	c
" b + 8	4	d	e
" b - f + 1	25	f	—
$19a + b - d - g + 15$	3	g	—
" c	30	—	h
" c	4	i	h
$32 + 2e + 2i - h - k$	7	—	l
$a + 11h + 22l$	451	m	—
$k + l - 7m + 114$	31	n	o

Then n = number of month of the year.

$o + 1$ = the day of the month on which Easter falls.

Thus, for year 1911, $a = 11$, $b = 19$, $c = 11$, $d = 4$, $e = 3$, $f = 1$, $g = 6$, $h = 23$, $i = 2$, $k = 3$, $l = 2$, $m = 0$, $n = 4$, $o = 15$.

$n = 4$. April } Correct Gregorian date.¹
 $o = 15$. $\therefore o + 1 = 16$ }
 —C5-7. FREDC. F. GRENTED.

CALVINIST.—The Calvinists accepted the opinions of John Calvin, the Genevan Reformer, on the doctrines of grace and the divine decrees concerning election and reprobation. Although divided into "supralapsarians," who held that God had foreordained the apostasy of Adam, and "sublapsarians," who taught that He had simply permitted it, they were united on what are known as the Five Points of Calvinism: (1) Predestination, including election to life eternal and reprobation to everlasting condemnation; (2) Particular Redemption of a certain ¹ In view of certain proposals for alteration of the C. now before the public, the following extracts from De Morgan's art. in the British Almanac for 1845 may be of interest.

"If the Parliament of this country were to fix Easter Sunday, which it could only do for the Protestant portion of the Empire (and perhaps not for that), the odds are that the confusion which would arise from the different sects keeping Easter at different times would counterbalance the advantage of the more simple reckoning" (p. 11).

"Every alteration of the C. is an additional trouble and risk of error in questions of history; the Gregorian reformation has done much in this way, another attempt would go near to render the chronology of the country in which it was made an unfathomable mystery" (p. 36).

chosen number by Christ's death; (3) Original sin; (4) Irresistible grace, or the effectual calling of the elect; (5) Final perseverance of the elect. Calvin's Institutes were published in 1536, and his book on Predestination in 1552, and his doctrinal views were soon adopted by the Reformed Churches. Practically all the Elizabethan churchmen, especially those who had been in exile on the Continent, held, if not always extreme, at least decided Calvinistic opinions. Calvin's Institutes became the recognised text-book at the universities, and Hooker complained that "men] are daily accused of heresy for holding that which the Fathers held, and that they never are clear, if they find not somewhat in Calvin to justify themselves."¹

Heylin says that "when Laud commenced his university career it was safer to have been looked upon as a heathen or publican than as an anti-Calvinist."² This statement is borne out by the fact that an attempt in 1595 by a Cambridge divine to deny the Calvinistic doctrines of election and assurance led to the compilation of the "Lambeth Articles," which received the approval of Abp. Whitgift and a number of bps. and clergy at Lambeth, and were so strongly Calvinistic that one of them baldly stated that "It is not placed within the will and power of every man to be saved." Although these Arts. never received any eccles. authority, Abp. Whitgift declared them to be "sound doctrine and uniformly professed in this Ch. of Eng. and agreeable to the Articles of Religion."³

Early in the next cent., however, the teaching of Arminius, a Dutch Reformed divine, led to the rise of a new school of theologians, who taught, in opposition to the Calvinists, universal redemption, that election to eternal life was dependent on foreseen persevering faith, and that those united to Christ by faith might finally fall away from grace and be lost.⁴ These Arminian views were at first strongly condemned in England, and James I sent representatives to the Synod of Dort in 1618, when the doctrines of the "Remonstrants" were condemned, and the Five Points of Calvinism explicitly reaffirmed.⁵ Meanwhile, a violent and abusive controversy was waged between the two parties in the pulpits, until arrested by a Royal Proclamation, and soon after chiefly from political motives the Arminians began to be patronised first by James I and then by Charles I. Owing to the policy and support of Abp. Laud, the Arminians became so powerful that a largely successful attempt was made, by associating all the Calvinistic clergy with the non-conforming Puritans, to drive the Calvinists from the Ch. by means of an intolerant system of suspensions, fines and imprisonments. Thus one of the charges made against Montague by the Parliament in 1626 was that he "had endeavoured to raise factions amongst the King's subjects by casting the odious and scandalous name of 'Puritan' upon those who conform to the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church."¹

At the Restoration the bitter controversy between Calvinists and Arminians had almost abated, and it was only renewed again for a short time by the Methodist revivalists in the next cent., when the adherents of Whitefield, who inclined to the views of the Calvinists, opposed Wesley and his followers who approximated to the teaching of the Arminians.—K1.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

CANDLES.—Constant Ch. tradition seems to have required that the altar Cs. must be of bees'-wax, though in the Ch. of Eng. there is probably no reason why some modification should not be used in poor Chs. and in Cs. not actually burnt upon the Holy Table, e.g., those upon the pillars supporting the altar-curtains or hanging in coronae from the roof. Unbleached wax was often used at burials and probably in Lent, but there seems to have been no strictness as to this, Cs. provided in wills for use at funerals being frequently left for subsequent use at the altar. Cs. used to be made of wax throughout² and should be so now, the wooden and metal "stocks" (or sham Cs.) being a 19th cent. innovation without authority and utterly unworthy of God's house. Altar Cs. are mere adjuncts to the LORD'S TABLE, and should not be too high at any time, and they may well be burnt quite low. Properly made Cs., thicker at the bottom than at the top, have a more graceful appearance than straight ones. The shields placed on some modern altar Cs. are out of place, and are a mistaken adaptation of the armorial shields formerly hung upon the Cs. used at the funerals of armigerous persons.—R3.

F. C. EELES.

CANDLEMAS.—See FESTIVAL, § 13.

CANDLESTICKS.—Though the ceremonial use of LIGHTS is early, their stationary use in C. especially on the altar is comparatively late, altar C. not being at all general till the 13th cent. and then only two. Concurrently with this lingered the older uses of holding a torch near the altar to supply the light which mediæval Canon Law required at Mass, or placing candles in a hanging receptacle. Lights in early times were suspended from, or set upon, the ciborium-canopy over the altar (see LORD'S TABLE), and, when all that remained of the ciborium was the pyx-canopy and the pillars round the altar, candles were often placed upon the latter or in the hands of figures of angels standing on the pillars, while standard C. frequently stood on the pavement in front. Rich candelabra hanging from the roof were used to contain additional candles in the later Middle Ages, though less frequently in England than in Scotland, whither they were introduced from the Netherlands. Fine brass chandeliers of a later date, generally 18th cent., are common in England, e.g., St. Helen's, Abingdon, 1710, and Chs. in and near Bristol. Among hanging candelabra we may reckon the rowels, or circular C. supporting numerous tapers, often hung before the rood in the later Middle Ages. The rood light, which was looked upon as very important, sometimes took the form of a lamp, sometimes of a candle fixed in the loft before the rood

¹ Preface, Ecd. Pol. 2 9, Pref. n. 2 (ed. Everyman's Libr.).

² Life of Laud, p. 52 (1668).

³ Whitgift's Works, 3 615.

⁴ Cp. Mosheim, Eccles. Hist., cent. 17, sect. 2, pt. 2, c. 3.

⁵ Cp. Judgment of the Synod of Dort in Hall's Harmony of the Protestant Confess. of Faith.

¹ Rushworth, Hist. Collections, vol. i, p. 211 (1721).

² Except sometimes a Paschal when of great size (in which case it seems to have been made upon a wooden core), and certain kinds of torches.

or hanging from the roof. Such lights as those in the rowel were in addition to this, and of the same decorative nature as the numerous candles or torches burnt in the rood-loft, upon prickets or in basins of latten or pewter. In mediæval England the lights in the rood-loft were very numerous, those at the altar comparatively few.

Mediæval altar C. were small and few; there were rarely more than two actually set on the altar, behind the table of which the reredos rose immediately with the east window just above it. Large or numerous C. would have obscured the reredos if placed before it, and would have been useless and ineffective if set on the top of it. The two altar C. of normal mediæval use survived the Reformation, and came down to the 19th cent. in most cathedral and collegiate Chs. and in some parish Chs. Under the influence of the Renaissance their size increased, though not their number. The increase in the number of altar C. on the Continent in recent times has been largely due to the spread from Rome of the papal seven (modified to six), which seem to have been originally processional torches placed on the altar in the papal chapel in late mediæval times. The introduction of altar tabernacles and of gradines and shelves, with the services of Benediction and Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, all assisted in the multiplying of altar C., and helped to produce C. with small branches to hold numerous tapers, a type common in modern France, and introduced into England, without authority or precedent, during the 19th cent. under the mistaken name of vesper-lights.

Two pairs of 13th cent. altar C., one 10½ in., the other 5½ in. high, remain at St. Thomas, Bristol; and a wonderfully rich 12th cent. candlestick from Gloucester is now in South Kensington Museum. Fine pairs of 17th and 18th cent. C. are not uncommon, and are often massive and beautiful, e.g., Rochester Cathedral, 1653; Norwich, 1665; Exeter, 1681; Durham, 1767; Trinity Coll., Cambridge, 1773. Among parish Chs. possessing old altar C. are: Hackness, Yorks., early 17th cent., enamelled; Halam, Notts., copper; Lutterworth, Leics.; Messing, Essex, wood gilt; Harthill, Yorks., 1675; St. Anne, Soho, London, given 1722. Swithland, Leics., and some others, have silver C. Southwell Cathedral has a pair of brass standard C., originally 4 ft. 6½ in. high, which formerly belonged to Newstead Priory.—R3. F. C. EELFS.

CANON, CANONRY.—In cathedral and collegiate churches the residentiary members of the chapter, other than the dean, whether "heretofore styled either prebendary, canon, canon residentiary or residentiary," are now (3-4 Vict., c. 113) called "Canons." There is no chapter in the dioceses of St. Albans, Liverpool, Newcastle, Southwell or Wakefield, although each bishop has now the right to appoint twenty-four honorary Canons. The Canons are maintained from the revenues of the Cathedral. Each of them is a corporation sole in respect of his prebend, beside being part of the corporation of the chapter.

On a vacancy in any see the Canons, in chapter with the dean, have the function of electing as bishop the person named in the letter missive enclosed in the royal congé d'élire. Two Canons, at least, should be present at every ordination (canon 31). The Canons are, with the dean, responsible for the fabric and services of the church (canons 24, 25, 43, 44), and are assisted in the choral part of the service by priest-vicars or vicars-choral, who at St. Paul's and Hereford and in cathedrals of the new foundation are called MINOR CANONS.

The Canons are appointed by the bishop of the diocese, save in a few cases, e.g., the Crown appoints to the three Crown canonries of St. Paul's, and the canonries annexed by law to certain Regius professorships. Other canonries are annexed by statute to the headships of Pembroke College, Oxford, and St. Catherine's College, Cambridge.

In CATHEDRALS of the Old Foundation there are a large number of non-residentiary Canons, who are collated to their (nominal) prebends by the bishop, and share with the residentiary Canons the right of electing the proctors of the chapter (see CONVOCATION). In each cathedral of the New Foundation the bishop has power to appoint twenty-four honorary Canons; but these have no vote for proctors, although they vote in elections of commissioners under the Pluralities Act Amendment Act, 1885, and of assessors under the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892.

In several dioceses canonries are annexed to arch-deaconries, carrying out one of the objects for which canonries were instituted, the formation of a council to help and advise the bishop.

By 36-7 Vict., c. 39, s. 3 (1873), the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may accept a plan for a new or revived canonry whose incumbent is charged with "any spiritual, ecclesiastical, eleemosynary, or educational duties for the benefit of the Church of England, and in connection with the diocese."

In the collegiate church of St. Michael, Coventry, which will, it is hoped, shortly assume the position of a cathedral church, the corporate body appointed in 1908 consists of the Bishop of Worcester (the diocesan) as dean, a subdean, the archdeacon of Coventry, nine clerical Canons and seven lay Canons. (Much learning on the subject of this article will be found in M. E. C. Walcott, Cathedrals, 1865, pp. 69 ff.)—A3.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CANON (IN MUSIC).—Among the various meanings attached to the word C. in matters ecclesiastical, its special musical

1. Definition. sense is apt to be forgotten. It is applied to a kind of composition framed so strictly according to rule (canon) as to justify the name; a strict C. consists of a composition for several voices or instruments in which one part repeats exactly that which another part has previously performed, the leading part then proceeding to something else. The number of vocal or instrumental parts employed is only limited by the skill of the composer. It is essential that the imitation of one part by another should be exact, whether the imitation be at the same or a different pitch.

To discuss the famous Masses and other things which were written "in C." by the great masters of the Polyphonic school of the 15th and

2. Brief Account.

16th cents. would occupy an undue amount of space, but the reader may be referred to the art. Canon in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians for further information. The older writers were fond of puzzling musicians by not indicating clearly at what point in the first performer's part the second was to join in, and writing over the C. some enigmatical inscription containing the indication of the manner of performance. Thus, the inscription, "Mercy and Truth have met together," indicated that the two voices were to begin at different ends of the C. and meet in the middle. (See also art. Inscriptions in Grove's Dict.) But these complicated feats of mere ingenuity obviously could not call into play the higher qualities of the composer, and many of the older Cs. were quite without artistic merit. Not until the C. was developed into the freer form of Fugue could the composer show his full individuality and taste, as this form allows episodes to be introduced, and in various ways sets the writer free from the strict laws of canonic writing. Very few Cs. have the beauty and suavity of the famous "Non nobis, Domine," ascribed to William Byrd, or, to come to later times, of those which appear, at every interval of the scale, in Bach's thirty variations for the harpsichord. In these latter, the parts in C. proceed above an independent bass part, and the same thing occurs in the C. which English Churchmen know best, the tune called Tallis's C. to "Glory to Thee, my God, this night." In this the tenor part copies exactly what the treble has sung four notes before, the other two parts being usually independent of the C. While Fugue is a development of C., allowing space for musical originality, all vocal rounds and catches are strictly canonical in structure, differentiated only by the character of their words, and both having as a general rule secular words. The round has often serious or sentimental words, and the catch is a distinctively English art-form in which, although the structure is strictly canonical, notes and rests are so arranged that, when the voices are singing together, the effect of the interchanging words or syllables gives a sense different from the plain meaning of the words as they would be written. Dr. Callcott's "How, Sophia" ("House a-fire") is a modern example of this form, but the older instances are by no means so harmless as this in their tendency.—92.

J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND.

CANON LAW.—The word Canon is used both of isolated provisions of Councils (generally confined to Ecumenical or General Councils), and also of that body of law which governs the Ch. It is used exclusively of eccles., as distinguished from civil or secular, laws. The raison d'être of CL. rests upon our Lord's commission to the Apostles (e.g., in Matt. 18:18) and consequently to their successors in the Ch. The view taken of that commission must affect the whole question of the authority of the CL. If it included a legislative and administrative function which should reside in the Ch. in all ages, then we have Scriptural authority for the existence of a body of eccles. regulations to guide the Christian in his life as a member of the Spiritual Community divinely instituted by Christ. The Eng. Ch. has consistently taken the view that our Lord founded a visible society on earth of which He himself is the head, and that he committed to that society legislative, administrative, and judicial functions (cp. Art. 20, and Exh.¹ in the Comm. Service, which well illustrates the continued belief on the part of the Reformers in the right of the Ch. to exercise discipline over the faithful). The Ch. founded by Christ is then a society having a regular constitution and government with visible rules and laws. Upon this belief rests the authority of the CL. which has been called the handmaid of theology, for, while the latter deals with the development of doctrine and the inner thought of the Ch., the former regulates the working of her constitution, the control of her officers, the administration of her Sacraments, and all that has to do with Christian practice. Launcelot, a canonist of the 16th cent., and author of Institutiones Juris

1. Nature of CL.

Canonici, describes its object as being to guide the faithful towards "eternal beatitude."

The relation of CL. to other branches of law is important.¹ It is defined by all authorities as "jus" rather than "lex," for it partakes rather of the fundamental principle of law than of a body of isolated legislative enactments, though these go to make up its composition. Gratian (Dist. 1, c. 2) distinguishes between the two words in this way, "jus nomen generale est, lex autem juris est species." From this we see that behind the former there is a notion of the sources from which all legislation proceeds. The correct name therefore for CL. is Jus Canonicum, i.e., a body or code of laws duly promulgated by the Ch. and deriving its authority not only from the fact of its enactment, but also because legislation, administration and the exercise of judicial functions are inherent elements in the nature of the Ch. as founded by Christ.

According to the principles of jurisprudence, law generally is divided into Divine (i.e., Fas) and human (i.e., Jus). The first is imposed directly by God, either because it is instilled by the promptings of Nature (cp. Justinian, Inst., Liber 1, Tit. 2, "Jus Naturale est quod natura omnia animalia docuit"), or by direct revelation (cp. Gratian, Decret. I, Dist. I, c. 1 and 2). The second is imposed indirectly by God and directly through the agency of man. Of these two divisions CL. falls under the second. It is human law because, although based upon the Divine, it is framed and applied by man, and is enforceable by sanctions. It is Jus as distinguished from Fas, it adds something to natural law, and in view of this it falls under the description of positive law. Just as the Jus Gentium (Justinian, Inst., Liber 1, Tit. 2) deals with man in relation to that part of law which is common to all people ("quod naturalis ratio inter omnes homines constituit"), and the Jus Civile considers him as a member of a particular organised human community, so the Jus Ecclesiasticum (or Canonicum) considers him as a member of the spiritual state, i.e., the Ch. Like the civil law in its sphere, it deals only with the external acts of the individual as they affect the community of Christian people.

The Jus Canonicum has much in common with the Jus Civile in regard to its division into public and private law, the first being that part which deals with the constitution of the Ch., and the second with the relation of that constitution to the individual member. It is otherwise divided into written and unwritten law, the former being composed of Holy Scripture, decrees, canons of councils and certain Dicta Patrum, etc., and the latter of traditions and customs which have received general acceptance. The third or subject division is into the Law of Persons (dealing with the hierarchy of Order and Jurisdiction), the Law of Things (dealing with the Order of Service, etc.), and the Law of Actions or Causes.

The sources may be divided into (1) legislative, (2) historical. (1) The legislative source of CL., i.e., the authority, by which it is promulgated, was anciently found in the whole body of the episcopate as successors of the apostles. To them belonged the initiative in

¹ Sir George Bowyer in his Readings at the Middle Temple classifies it under the heading of Universal Public Law.

3. Sources. making laws for the Ch. The legislative power of the general body of the clergy and the laity lay merely in assent to the rules imposed.

By a gradual process of centralisation the legislative power of the episcopate was vested in the Bp. of Rome as the chief and representative of the successors of the apostles, and special authority attached to his Decretals and Constitutions. But it has been held that this does not affect the claim of the CL. to acceptance. The position of the Pope as the fount of all legislation has grown from that merely of proctor of the collective episcopate to that represented by the ultramontane claims which amount to a denial of the legislative function undoubtedly conferred upon each bp. at his consecration. It is only when the bps. of the whole Ch. meet in a General or Ecumenical Council that their legislation is held to be binding upon all Christian people.

Each bp. is, according to CL., the fount of legislation for his own diocese, the rules passed by him being called "statutes" as opposed to "laws." The bps. assembled in a National or Provincial Council have legislative authority over the nation or province which they represent, but their power is regarded as limited by the rule that they can enact nothing which is contrary to the voice of the whole episcopate assembled in a General Council or to the law which has been accepted and acted upon by the whole Church.

(2) The historical sources of CL., as far as that part of it which is written is concerned, are to be found in Holy Scripture, in the rules laid down by the apostles for the guidance of the Chs. founded by them, the canons of certain councils which have been adopted as binding by the Ch., the decrees¹ of the Popes, and the writings of the Fathers. The source of the unwritten law is found in certain traditions and customs which have universally been received and incorporated into the law.

A custom may interpret a canon, or it may have the greater force of dispensing from obedience to it. In order for a

4. Dispensary Power of Custom. custom to have this effect it must— (1) be reasonable, i.e., not contrary to the general voice of the Ch., and tending towards holiness; (2) be received by the legislative authority having jurisdiction over that part of the Ch. in which it exists; and (3) have sufficient prescription (cp. Decretal. Gregor. IX, Lib. 11, Tit. 26, "De Praescriptionibus").

The development of the law can be divided into three periods: (1) the Jus Antiquum, comprising all the law before the compilation of the Corpus juris Canonici; (2) the Jus Novum, another name for the contents of the Corpus; (3) the Jus Novissimum, comprising all recent law and especially that promulgated at the Council of Trent.

¹ A Decree is a decision of a general character, a Decretal a decision given on a particular case submitted, a Rescript a written reply upon some special matter given at request.

1. During the earliest centuries very little attempt was made at codification of the traditions by which the several Chs. were governed. We may trace the collection of certain canons to such documents as the Ancient Ch. Orders, the Didascalia, the Canons of Hippolytus, the Apostolic Constitutions, and the Apostolic Canons; but only the last of these have ever been admitted into the CL. proper.

In the 5th cent. we get the first really complete set of canons known as the "Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Universalis," which was formally approved by the Council of Chalcedon in 451 A.D. It included the Apostolic Canons, the Canons of the Councils of Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Nice, Antioch, Laodicea, Gangra, and Constantinople. This collection, with the addition of letters of certain bps. which have received canonical recognition, still forms the code of the Eastern Ch. The first Western collection is that of Dionysius Exiguus, who combined the Greek collection with the decisions of the Roman Pontiffs of the 4th and 5th cents., and added the canons of certain African councils. Between the 6th and the 9th cent. in the West the codification was mainly confined to local Chs., notably the canons passed by the several Councils in Africa, Gaul and Spain.

Towards the end of the 9th cent. appeared the famous False Decretals. The volume, in

6. The False Decretals. addition to the former collection of Dionysius Exiguus and certain canons of Councils of the African and Gallican Chs. which have always been received as genuine, contained certain letters of the early Popes (notably Clement), which are now considered by all authorities to be spurious. The object of the forgery was undoubtedly to uphold the claim of the successor of St. Peter in the apostolic see to universal jurisdiction, which at the time of the publication was being first definitely put forward. What effect the publication of the False Decretals had upon the future development of CL. it is hard to determine. On the one hand, a wise rule, formulating previous custom and accepted everywhere, cannot be properly objected to on account of its papal origin. On the other hand, a decree imposed on the Ch. in virtue of an invalid conception of papal authority can hardly, on a sound view, carry much weight. There is no doubt, however, that at the time the forgeries were received without question, and that they were incorporated unhesitatingly in the later codes. Their authenticity was not seriously doubted until the 16th cent. Their influence in leading to a complete codification of the law is obvious. Between the 9th and the 12th cents. the name of Ivo of Chartres is conspicuous among canonists. The value of his work can hardly be over-estimated.

2. Jus Novum (the Corpus juris Canonici). The 12th cent. brings us to the first section of the Corpus, the Decretum of Gratian.

7. Gratian's Decretum. The other sections are known respectively as: the Decretals of Gregory IX, the Sext, the Clementines, the Extravagantes of John XXII, and the Extravagantes Communes.

Gratian was a Benedictine of Bologna; his work was published about the year 1151 A.D. under the name of Concordia Discordantium Canonum. It is by far the most masterly piece of codification attempted up to that time, and the excellence of its arrangement and its exhaustive character ensured for it a popularity in the schools of CL. which surpassed that of any other part of the CL. It is divided into three sections: (a) 101 distinctions on different subjects, and treating of law generally and eccles. offices; (b) 36 causes or cases proposed and their solution according to canons and decisions quoted; and (c) a separate treatise entitled De Consecratione, dealing with the consecration of churches and with the celebration of the Eucharist, Bapt., and the Sacraments generally. As its full name implies, the work is an attempt to harmonise the canons under certain headings. It is interspersed with Gratian's own opinions and it freely makes use of the False Decretals. It has never received official authorisation on the part of the Ch., but it has been incorporated into the Corpus juris Canonici, and so by custom has won acceptance and authority.

Gratian had set an example which was followed by many canonists, and from his time began the interpretation of and commentaries upon the canons which led in 1234 to the publication of the Decretals of Gregory IX.

The work was compiled by St. Raymond de Pennafort. It was a systematised edition of all the glosses upon the Decretum of Gratian, together with the Decretals of Gregory IX. It contained very little that was original and in no way superseded the Decretum. It is divided into five parts, and its contents are summarised by the line "judex, iudicium, clerus, connubia, crimen." Innocent IV supplemented the collection of Gregory IX by the addition of 45 canons. The Sext was published by Boniface VIII in 1298 A.D.; its full title is Liber Sextus Decretalium. The work is divided into five books. It also contains the canons of two Councils held at Lyons in 1245 and 1274 respectively. The Clementines (Corpus, pt. 4) were published by Clement V in 1314, and contain in five books his own constitutions and the canons of the Council held in 1313 A.D. at Vienne. The Extravagantes of John XXII, containing his decretals arranged under fourteen titles, and the Extravagantes Communes, a collection of the decrees of the Popes from Urban IV to Sixtus IV (1483), complete the Corpus juris Canonici. The word "Extravagantes" was originally applied to all the collections which followed and were thus outside the Decretum of Gratian, but it has by usage been confined to the two last named.

In this body of law the canonist finds the chief material for his study. It is to him what the Corpus juris Civilis is to the civil lawyer.

3. Jus Novissimum. This begins with the decrees of the Council of Trent, but may be considered to include the Institutiones juris Canonici, the work of Launcelot of Bologna in 1559 at the request of Paul IV. Among the most noteworthy works of the period is the Bullarium of Benedict XIV; and two attempts were made after the Council of Trent to add to the Corpus a Liber Septimus, but neither received official sanction.

Before passing to the third section of this art., which deals with the validity of the CL.

10. English CL.: Lyndwode. in England, it will be well to deal shortly with the provincial law, i.e., the special canons, whether diocesan, provincial, or national, which governed the Eng. Ch. in matters which fall within the sphere of "local law." The earliest traces of this law are to be found in the Anglo-Saxon Canons and the Penitentials of e.g., Theodore of Canterbury (whose canons we also have) and Egbert of York, etc., though these in no sense can be considered as having received legal authorisation. Before the 15th cent. we get no complete code of the local canons; but in 1420 was published the famous work of William Lyndwode, containing the Constitutions of the several abps., from Stephen Langton (1209 A.D.) to Chichele (1433 A.D.). In arrangement it is unsurpassed, and its excellence from a purely legal point of view is admitted on all hands. It was issued under the name of Provinciales seu Institutiones Angliæ. The work contains five books (cp. § 8), each divided into titles, which comprise the constitutions of the several abps., with a lengthy gloss added by Lyndwode himself. This gloss is by far the most valuable part of the work. It was at first received only in the province of Canterbury, but in 1462 A.D. was adopted as authoritative by the Convocation of York also.

With the Provinciales are usually bound up the Legatine Constitutions of Otho and Othobon under the editorship of John of Acton. They comprise the constitutions passed by the two National Councils held in the years 1236 A.D. and 1268 A.D., under the presidency respectively of the two papal legates. They were adopted by the whole English Ch., and with Lyndwode's work they form the main body of our provincial CL., amplified by such small manuals as that of John de Burgh entitled Pupilla Oculi (vide Maitland's Canon Law in the Ch. of Eng., 40), and by the later law of Convocation, though it is doubtful whether this last can technically be included in CL. proper.

The discussion of the question as to the exact amount of validity possessed in England by the

11. Validity in England of Roman CL. CL. in pre-Reformation times has given rise to much controversy. Authorities have ranged themselves into two schools, the first holding that only such part of the foreign CL. was binding in England as was accepted and acted upon here; and the second, whose chief exponent is the late Professor Maitland, holding that the Eng. Ch. was bound by the CL. of the West because of its promulgation by the highest legislative authority of the Ch., and that it was not dependent upon inception. The evidence on both sides must be carefully weighed.

The question is whether the Eng. Ch. before the Reformation considered herself to be bound by that part of the Corpus juris Canonici which had been duly promulgated, or whether she was governed, independently of the Catholic

Ch. of the West, by her own provincial law alone. We are not concerned, except in a secondary degree, with the amount of authority accorded to the CL. by Parliament or the civil courts. If this fact is kept well in mind, it will serve to guard against the misconception that the anti-clerical and anti-papal legislation of the 14th cent. (e.g., Statute of Provisors, 1357 A.D., and Statute of Præmunire, 1353 A.D., etc.) has anything to do with the matter under examination. It is an undoubted fact that certain parts of the CL. were not allowed to be enforced by the State. This is clearly shown by the attitude adopted towards the Ch. by the Conqueror and the struggle between Henry II and Becket, etc. In England, as in other countries, the State put limits to the right of the Ch. to enforce certain of her laws.

12. Arguments pro and con.

In favour of the first view, Sir Mathew Hale says: "All the strength that either the papal or imperial laws have obtained in this realm is only because they have been admitted either by consent of Parliament, and so are part of the statute law of the Realm, or else by immemorial usage . . . and therefore so far as they are received and allowed here so far they obtain and no further." See Cawdry's case (1591 A.D., 5 Co. Rep. 1); 25 Hen. VIII, c. 21, s. 15; Martin v. Mackonochie (2 L. R. Adm. and Eccl., p. 116), the remarks of the Dean of Arches being to the same effect; Rep. of Eccles. Courts Com., 1883, which states that the CL. of Rome, although always regarded as of great authority, was not held to be binding in the courts; and finally it is clear that the CL. as a body was not received and never has been received as part of the common law of England (see Halsbury, Laws of England 2 377-380). The evidence is mostly drawn from Post-Reformation sources, and is primarily concerned with the possibility of enforcing the law in the civil courts, and in that sphere it has usually been rejected, though in 1848, in Burder v. Mavor (6 N. & C. 1), a case of plurality was decided upon the authority of a canon of the fourth Lateran Council of 1215 A.D. [The usual explanation given by lawyers is that CL. has no authority unless there is concurrent evidence of unbroken usage.] The modification by the papal court of the English law in regard to the legitimization of bastards by subsequent marriage of the parents was rejected by the Lords in Parliament in the reign of Henry III, in the oft-quoted words "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari." Here again, however, the foreign CL. was rejected not by the Ch., but by the civil legislature.

13. For Invalidity.

We may sum up the evidence by saying that it has been held ever since the Reformation as a legal theory that no part of the foreign CL. was binding in England, except so much of it as was accepted and acted upon.

But, if we are to decide not what the civil authorities but what the canonists themselves held to bind the Eng. Ch., we must look into the works of Lyndwode and of John of Acton. There we shall find the theory of the Eng. Ch. as to the authority of the papal law. Professor Maitland (op. cit.) has come to the conclusion that there is no trace in the Provinciale of any suggestion that the Eng. Ch. was independent of the general law of the West. It seems most satisfactory to follow his opinion, based as it is upon internal evidence, for it is clear that, if the English canonists had considered the papal law to have no binding force in England, some trace of such a theory would be found in the glosses written by them upon the provincial law, but when they are examined the evidence all points to an opposite conclusion.

14. For Validity.

A few instances may be taken from Lyndwode, following Maitland's plan. (1) Neither the work of Lyndwode nor of John of Acton professed to be an exhaustive treatment of eccles. law. In both there are ever-recurring references to the papal law and to foreign authorities, such as Johannes Andreae, and, e.g., such an important subject as marriage is dealt with by Lyndwode in four collected texts, no reference being made to the general nature of the Sacrament and the law governing its administration, but as an introduction we find the words, "Of these matters Innocentius has treated and yet more fully Johannes Andreae." It is obvious from this that Lyndwode could not have been the only authority used by the eccles. courts of the period in deciding matrimonial causes. (2) Both authorities assign to the Pope supreme legislative power, limited only by the inability to enact anything contrary to the fundamental principles of the Ch., and neither of them has a single passage suggestive of the view that a decretal can be set aside; and Lyndwode (p. 297, gloss. ad. v. decretalibus) maintains that they have the same force as canons of Councils. Moreover, he holds the view that a general council cannot be called without the papal sanction, and that the Pope is above all councils. (3) In the glosses upon the archiepiscopal constitutions we find them often described as ultra vires, as being contrary to the common law of the Ch. expressed in some decretal. His attitude is summed up in the words, "Tollere vel alterare non episcopus nec aliquis Papa inferior" (cp. also p. 154, gloss. ad. v. adiciendo).

This evidence leads to the view that during the centuries before the Reformation the law administered by the Ch. courts and held to be binding by the canonists in England was that of the Western Ch., modified, in such matters as could legitimately be dealt with by "local law," by the provincial canons, and this view is confirmed by the care that was taken at the time of the Reformation to root out the study of CL. If that study had been confined to the English provincial law and those parts only of the foreign law that had been accepted, there would have been no danger in its continuance. (See further, CANONS, ORDER, and CCR, 1908; cp. E. G. Wood, The Regal Power of the Ch., etc.) —A4.

15. Conclusion.

R. S. EVES.

CANON OF THE LITURGY.—Throughout the Church both Eastern and Western the Liturgy, or Service of HC, has

1 The Ordinary and Canon of the Mass.

from the earliest times been considered as divided into two parts. In the East they were known as the Mass of the Catechumens, ending with the dismissals of the CATECHUMENS (see ANTE-COMMUNION) and others at a point after the Gospel; and the Mass of the Faithful, commencing after the dismissals with the Prayers of the Faithful, the KISS OF PEACE and the OFFERTORY. The ANAPHORA, or C. proper, began with the SURSUM CORDA leading up to the PREFACE and SANCTUS. We are not further concerned with Eastern Liturgies here. In the West the twofold division was into the Ordinary of the Mass, including everything up to the Sanctus; and the Canon of the Mass, beginning after the Sanctus with the Prayer of Consecration (which commenced with the words Te igitur), and including the rest of the service to its close. In early days there was some variation as to the exact point where the C. was considered both to begin and to end; but those variations need not be described here, as we have practically only to do with the MISSAL as it existed in England, say in the first half of the 16th cent., with which the Reformers were familiar, and with which they had to deal. And that Missal was the Sarum Missal, the Missale ad usum insignis et praeclarae ecclesiae Sarum. It is true that other dioceses and cathedrals had their own Uses (see USE), of which York and Hereford were the most conspicuous. Abp. Cranmer, in his Pref. Concerning the Service of the Church, mentions also the Uses of Bangor and Lincoln; and others might be named. But the most remarkable and by far the most widespread of the English Uses was that of Salisbury or Sarum.

It had gradually come to prevail throughout England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland, predominating especially in the southern parts of England.

It must be understood that the Sarum Missal, like the Missals of all other English Uses, is essentially the Roman Missal, with variations. Those variations are numerous and important in the variable portions of the service, but in the invariable or nearly invariable portions, that is to say, in the Ordinary and C. of the Mass, they are confined to the earlier and later parts of the service. The text of the essential and central part of the C. exhibits only slight verbal variations from the text of the Consecration Prayer or C. of the Roman Missal, which had remained practically unchanged for something like a thousand years.

We append the Sarum and Roman Ordinary and Canon of the Mass in Latin, and the first complete English Order of HC. in parallel columns, with the view of calling attention to the similarities and to the variations in the Sarum Order of the Mass from the Roman Missal, and still more from the Communion Service in the PB. Our comparison is with the 1st PB of Edward VI (1549). The Sarum rubrics, which are lengthy and diffuse, have been occasionally consolidated and abbreviated. They are taken from the edition of 1526.

2. Parallel Tables.

ORDINARIUM MISSAE (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
1. Ad missam dicendam, dum sacerdos induit se sacris vestibus, dicat Hymnum sequentem. Hymnus. Veni, Creator Spiritus, mentes tuorum visita, imple superna gratia quae tu creasti pectora, etc. V. Emitte Spiritum tuum et creabuntur. R. Et renovabis faciem terræ. 2. Oratio. Deus, cui omne cor patet, et omnis voluntas loquitur, et quem nullum latet secretum, purifica per infusionem Sancti Spiritus cogitationes cordis nostri ut te perfecte diligere et digne laudare mereamur. Per, etc. 3. Deinde sequatur Antiphona. Introibo ad altare Dei. Judica me, Deus, et discerne, etc. (Ps. 43 = 42 Vulg.) Totus Psalmus dicitur cum Gloria Patri.	1. (Different devotions are provided for the priest while vesting, consisting of a short prayer as each vestment is put on, and they are printed, not after the commencement of the Ordinary of the Mass, but at the beginning of the Missal.) 2. (Om.) 3. (As Sar., only said later at altar step.)	(The structure of the old Latin Liturgy was so altered in 1549, that a comparison between the old and the new forms of the Liturgy is difficult to present. The distinction between the Ordinary of the Mass and the Canon of the Mass was not formally retained, though it was virtually retained by the rubric at the close of the Service ordering the priest on Wednesdays and Fridays to say all things at the Altar until after the Offertory.) 1. (The ancient vestments were retained, but no devotions were supplied to be used while vesting.) 2. (This Coll., which in the Sar. Ordinary of the Mass occupies an earlier position among the preparatory prs., is said at the altar after the Introit.) 3. (Om. No private preparatory devotions are provided for the Celebrant and assistant ministers.)

ORDINARIUM MISSAE (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
Deinde dicitur Antiphona, Introibo ad altare Dei, ad Deum qui laetificat juventutem meam. 4. Kyrie eleyson, Christe eleyson, Kyrie eleyson. 5. Pater noster, etc. 6. Ave Maria, etc. 7. His finitis, et Officio Missae inchoato, cum post Officium Gloria Patri incipitur, accedat sacerdos cum suis ministris ad gradum altaris, et dicat ipse confessionem, diacono assistente a dextris et subdiacono a sinistris. Hoc modo incipiendo, Et ne nos inducas in tentationem. Sed libera nos a malo. 8. Confitemini Domino quoniam bonus : quoniam in saeculum misericordia ejus (Ps. 118 1=117 1 Vulg.). Confessio. 9. Confiteor Deo, beatæ Mariæ, omnibus sanctis, et vobis, quia peccavi nimis cogitatione, locutione, et opere : mea culpa : precor sanctam Mariam, omnes sanctos Dei et vos orare pro me. Ministri respondeant, 10. Misereatur vestri omnipotens Deus, et dimittat vobis omnia peccata vestra ; liberet vos ab omni malo ; conservet, et confirmet in bono ; et ad vitam perducat aeternam. Sacerdos, Amen. Et postea dicant, Confiteor. Quo dicto dicat sacerdos, Misereatur, ut supra. Deinde dicat sacerdos, 11. Absolutionem et remissionem omnium peccatorum vestrorum, spatium veræ penitentiae, et emendationem vitæ, gratiam et consolationem Sancti Spiritus, tribuat vobis omnipotens et misericors Dominus. Ministri respondeant, Amen. 12. Et sciendum est quod quicumque sacerdos officium exsequatur, semper episcopus si præsens fuerit ad gradum altaris dicat Confiteor, Misereatur, et Absolutionem. 13. Deinde dicat sacerdos Versum, V. Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini, R. Qui fecit coelum et terram. V. Sit nomen Domini benedictum, R. Ex hoc nunc et usque in saeculum. Oremus. 14. Deinde, finitis precibus, sacerdos deosculetur diaconum, et postea subdiaconum ita dicens ; Habete osculum pacis et dilectionis, ut apti sitis sacrosancto altari, ad perficiendum officia divina. 15. . . . deinde accedat sacerdos ad altare, et dicat in medio altaris, tacita voce, inclinatus corpore et junctis manibus, Oremus. Aufer a nobis, quæsumus, Domine, cunctas iniquitates nostras, ut ad sancta sanctorum puris mereamur mentibus introire. Per. 16. Tunc erigat se sacerdos et osculetur altare, et hoc in medio, et signet se in facie sua ita dicens, In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen.	4. (Om.) 5. (Om.) 6. (Om.) 7. (The Rom. rubrics provide for either High or Low Mass. The Sar. rubrics involve Celebrant, Deacon and Subdeacon, and throughout imply a High Mass.) 8. (Om.) 9. (As Sar., with verbal variations.) 10. (As Sar.) 11. (As Sar.) 12. (Om.) 13. (6 different V. and R. substituted.) 14. (Not in Roman. This kiss of peace in this position is peculiar, among Western Liturgies, to Sar.) 15. (As Sar.) 16. (Om.)	4. (Om.) 5. (Om. here, but said at the altar with 2.) 6. (Om.) 7. (Om.) 8. (Om.) 9. (Om.) 10. (Om.) 11. (Om.) 12. (Om.) 13. (Om.) 14. (Om.) 15. (Om.) 16. (Om.)

ORDINARIUM MISSAE (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
17. Deinde ponat diaconus thus in thuribulum, et dicat prius sacerdoti, Benedicite. Et sacerdos dicat, Dominus. Ab ipso benedicatur hoc incensum in cuius honore cremabitur. In nomine Patris, etc. 18. Officium. 19. (No explicit Rubric in Sar., but the ninefold Kyrie certainly came here as in Roman.) Quo facto sacerdos et sui ministri in sedibus paratis se recipiant et expectent usque ad Gloria in excelsis, quod incipiat semper in medio Altaris quandocunque dicitur. 20. Gloria in excelsis, etc. (with farses glorifying Mary). 21. Collects for the day. 22. Epistle. 23. Gradual. 24. Gospel. 25. Nicene Creed.¹ 26. Oremus (with no following prayer). 27. Offertory. 28. Postea sequatur Dominus vobiscum et Oremus. Deinde dicatur Offertorium. 29. Post Offertorium vero porrigat diaconus sacerdoti calicem cum patena et sacrificio, et osculetur manum ejus utraque vice. Ipse vero accipiens ab eo calicem diligenter ponat in loco suo debito super medium altaris, et inclinato parumper dext. calicem utraque manu, offerens sacrificium Domino, dicendo hanc Orationem. 30. Suscipe, sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem, quam ego indignus peccator offero in honore tuo, beatæ Mariæ et omnium sanctorum tuorum, pro peccatis et offensionibus meis: et pro salute vivorum et requie omnium fidelium defunctorum. 31. In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti acceptum sit omnipotenti Deo hoc sacrificium novum.	17. (As Sar., with verbal variations.) 18. Introitus. 19. Quo finito junctis manibus alternatim cum ministris (Celebrans) dicit: Kyrie eleison (ter), Christe eleison (ter), Kyrie eleison (ter). 20. (As Sar., without farses.) 21. (As Sar.) 22. (As Sar.) 23. (As Sar.) 24.¹ (As Sar.) 25. (As Sar.) 26. (As Sar.) 27. (As Sar.) 28. Postea dicit Oremus et Offertorium. 29. Quo dicto, si est Missa solemnis, Diaconus porrigit Celebranti patenam cum Hostia: si privata, Sacerdos ipse accipit patenam cum Hostia quam offerens dicit: 30. Suscipe, sancte Pater, omnipotens æterne Deus, hanc immaculatam Hostiam quam ego indignus famulus tuus offero tibi Deo meo vivo et vero, pro innumerabilibus peccatis et offensionibus et negligentis meis, et pro omnibus circumstantibus, sed et pro omnibus fidelibus christianis vivis atque defunctis; ut mihi et illis proficiat ad salutem in vitam æternam. 31. Deinde faciens crucem cum eadem patena, deponit Hostiam super corporale. Diaconus ministrat vinum, subdiaconus aquam in Calice; vel si privata est Missa, utrumque infundit Sacerdos, et aquam miscendam in Calice bene + dicit, dicens:	17. (No mention of incense.) 18. Introit. 19. Ninefold Kyrie eleison in English. 20. (As Sar., without farses.) 21. (As Sar., followed by a Coll. for the King.) 22. (As Sar.) 23. (Om.) 24. (As Sar.) 25. (As Sar.)¹ 26. (Om.) 27. (As Sar.) 28. Offertory Sentences. 29. (Presentation of elements with no expressed verbal formulæ.) Then shall the minister take so much Bread and Wine, as shall suffice for the persons appointed to receive the Holy Communion, laying the bread upon the corporas or else in the paten, or in some other comely thing prepared for that purpose: And putting the wine into the chalice, or else in some fair or convenient cup, prepared for that use (if the chalice will not serve), putting thereto a little pure and clean water: And setting both the bread and wine upon the Altar (there being no accompanying formulæ of devotion). 30. (Om.) 31. (Om.)

¹ There is no Rubric fixing the position of the Sermon (if any), but we know from other sources that it was preached at the Offertory after the Creed, and not after the Gospel as in the Roman. For the evidence see T. F. Simmons, Lay Folks' Mass Book, p. 317.

¹ The following Pr. is appointed to be said by the deacon before reading the Gospel. It is not in Sar.:

Munda cor meum ac labia mea, omnipotens Deus, qui labia Isaiae prophetae calculo mundasti ignito; ita me tua grata miseratione dignare mundare, ut sanctum evangelium tuum digne valeam nuntiare. Per.

The Sermon (if any) comes after the Gospel, and before the Creed.

¹ The Sermon is after the Nicene Creed, as in Sarum.

ORDINARIUM MISSAE (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
32. Dictaque oratione, reponat calicem et cooperiat eum corporalibus, ponatque panem super corporalia decenter ante calicem vinum et aquam continentem; et osculetur patenam et reponat eam a dextris sacrificii super Altare, sub corporalibus parum cooperiendo.	32. Deus, qui humanæ substantiæ dignitatem mirabiliter condidisti et mirabiliter reformasti; da nobis per hujus aquæ et vini mysterium ejus Divinitatis esse consortes, qui humanitatis nostræ fieri dignatus est particeps, Jesus Christus Filius tuus, Dominus noster. Qui tecum, etc.	32. (Om.)
	33. Postea accipit calicem et offert dicens: Offerimus tibi, Domine, calicem salutaris, tuam deprecantes clementiam; ut in conspectu divinæ Majestatis tuæ, pro nostra et totius mundi salute cum odore suavitatis ascendat. Amen.	33. (Om.)
34. (See below 46.)	34. Deinde facit signum Crucis cum Calice, et illum ponit super Corporale, et palla cooperit: tum junctis manibus super Altare, aliquantulum inclinatus dicit: In spiritu humilitatis et in animo contrito suscipiamur a te, Domine: et sic fiat sacrificium nostrum in conspectu tuo hodie, ut placeat tibi, Dominus Deus.	34. (Om.)
	35. Erectus expandit manus, easque in altum porrectas jungens, elevatis ad cælum oculis, et statim demissis, dicit: Veni, sanctificator omnipotens, æternæ Deus, benedicis oblata proseguendo et bene + dic hoc sacrificium tuo sancto nomini præparatum.	35. (Om.)
	36. Postea, si solemniter celebrat, benedicit incensum dicens: Per intercessionem beati Michaelis Archangeli stantis a dextris altaris incensi et omnium electorum suorum, incensum istud dignetur Dominus bene + dicere, et in odorem suavitatis accipere. Per.	36. (Om.)
	37. Et accepto thuribulo a Diacono, incensat oblata modo in Rubricis generalibus præscripto dicens: Incensum istud a te benedictum ascendat ad te, Domine, et descendat super nos misericordia tua.	37. (Om.)
38. Hoc peracto, accipiat thuribulum a diacono et thurificet sacrificium, videlicet ultra ter signum crucis faciens et in circuitu, et ex utraque parte calicis et sacrificii; deinde locum ter inter se et altare. Et dum thurificat dicat versum sequentem: Dirigatur, Domine, ad te oratio mea, sicut incensum in conspectu tuo.	38. Dirigatur, Domine, oratio mea sicut incensum in conspectu tuo: elevatio manuum mearum sacrificium vespertinum. Pone, Domine, custodiam ori meo, et ostium circumstantiæ labiis meis; ut non declinet	38. (Om.)

ORDINARIUM MISSÆ (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSÆ (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
	cor meum in verba malitiæ, ad excusandas excusationes in peccatis.
	39. Dum reddit thuribulum Diacono dicit :	39. (Om.)
	Accendat in nobis Dominus ignem sui amoris et flammam æternæ charitatis. Amen.
40. His itaque peractis, eat sacerdos ad dextrum cornu altaris, et abluat manus dicens,	40. Interim sacerdos lavat manus dicens,	40. (Om.)
	41. Lavabo inter innocentes . . . te Domine (Ps. 26 6-12).	41. (Om.)
	42. (Om.)	42. (Om.)
42. Munda me, Domine, ab omni inquinamento mentis et corporis; ut possim mundus implere opus sanctum Domini,	43. (Om.)	43. (Om.)
43. diacono interim ipsum altare in sinistro cornu thurificante, et reliquias more solito in circuitu.	44. (Om.)	44. (Om.)
44. Ablutis manibus sacerdos revertat se ad Altare ad divinum officium exsequendum, et diaconus et subdiaconus in gradibus suis ordinatè supradicto modo se teneant.
45. Deinde revertat se, et stans ante Altare, inclinatoque capite et corpore, junctis manibus dicat hanc Orationem,	45. Deinde aliquantulum inclinatus in medio Altaris, junctis manibus super eo, dicit :	45. (Om.)
46. In spiritu humilitatis et in animo contrito suscipiamur, Domine, a te : et sic fiat sacrificium nostrum in conspectu tuo, ut a te suscipiatur hodie, et placeat tibi, Domine Deus meus.	46. (See above 34.)	46, 47. (Om.)
47. (Om.)	47. Suscipe, sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem, quam tibi offerimus ob memoriam passionis, resurrectionis, et ascensionis Jesu Christi Domini nostri, et in honorem beatæ Mariæ semper Virginis et beati Joannis Baptistæ et sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et istorum, et omnium Sanctorum, ut illis proficiat ad honorem, nobis autem ad salutem; et illi pro nobis intercedere dignentur in cœlis, quorum memoriam agimus in terris. Per.
	48. Postea osculatur Altare, et versus ad populum extendens et jungens manus voce paululum elevata dicit :	48. (Om.)
48. Et origens se, deosculetur Altare a dextris sacrificii; et dans benedictionem ultra sacrificium, postea signat se dicens,	49. (Om.)	49. (Om.)
49. In nomine Patris, etc.	50. Orate, fratres, ut meum ac vestrum sacrificium acceptabile fiat apud Deum Patrem omnipotentem.	50. (Om.)
50. Deinde vertat se sacerdos ad populum, et tacita voce dicat,	51. Minister seu circumstantes respondent, alioquin ipsemet Sacerdos :	51. (Om.)
Orate, fratres et sorores, pro me ut meum pariterque vestrum acceptum sit Domino Deo nostro sacrificium.	52. Suscipiat Dominus sacrificium de manibus tuis (vel meis) ad laudem et gloriam nominis sui, ad utilitatem quoque nostram, totiusque Ecclesiæ suæ sanctæ.	52. (Om.)
51. Responsio clerici privatim,	Sacerdos submissa voce dicit, Amen.
52. Spiritus sancti gratia illuminet cor tuum et labia tua, et accipiat Dominus digne hoc sacrificium laudis de manibus tuis pro peccatis et offensionibus nostris.	53. Deinde, manibus extensis, absolute sine Oremus	53. (Om.)
53. Et reversus ad Altare sacerdos Secre- tas Orationes dicat juxta numerum et ordinem

ORDINARIUM MISSAE (SARUM).	ORDINARIUM MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
ante-dictarum ante Epistolam, ita incipiens, Oremus. Quibus finitis, dicat sacerdos aperta voce, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum, manibus non levatis donec dicitur, Sursum corda. Hic elevet sacerdos manus dicens, 54. V. Dominus vobiscum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo. V. Sursum corda. R. Habemus ad Dominum. V. Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro. R. Dignum et justum est. Vere dignum et justum est æquum et salutare nos tibi semper et ubique gratias agere, Domine sancte, Pater omnipotens, æterne Deus. Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Per quem majestatem tuam laudant angeli, adorant dominationes, tremunt potestates, cœli, colorumque virtutes ac beata seraphin socia exultatione concelebrant. Cum quibus et nostras voces ut admitti jubeas deprecamur, supplicii confessione dicentes, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabaoth; pleni sunt cœli et terra gloria tua. Osanna in excelsis: benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini; Osanna in excelsis. (With ten Proper Prefaces.) 55. Deinde confestim, manibus junctis, et elevatis oculis, incipiat. Te igitur, clementissime Pater, per Jesum Christum Filium tuum, Dominum nostrum, supplices rogamus corpore inclinatio donec dicat ac petimus, hic erigens se sacerdos osculetur Altare a dextris sacrificii dicens, uti accepta habeas et benedicas hic faciat sacerdos tres cruces super calicem et panem dicendo, haec do + na, haec mu + nera, haec sanc + ta sacrificia illibata, factis signaculis super calicem, elevet manus suas, ita dicens, Imprimis quæ tibi offerimus pro ecclesia tua sancta Catholica, quam pacificare, custodire, adunare, et regere digneris toto orbe terrarum, una cum famulo tuo Papa nostro N. et Antistite nostro N. id est, proprio episcopo tantum, et Rege nostro N. et dicuntur nominatim. Sequatur, et omnibus orthodoxis atque catholicæ et apostolicæ fidei cultoribus. Hic ora pro vivis. Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum N. et N.	subjungit Orationes Secretas. Quibus finitis, cum pervenerit ad conclusionem, clara voce dicit: Per omnia sæcula sæculorum. 54. Dominus vobiscum (etc., to end of Sanctus, as in Sar.) (With ten Proper Prefaces.) 55. (The Rom. and Sar. Canons from "Te igitur" to the close of Pater Noster are identical throughout so far as the liturgical text is concerned, with a few and unimportant verbal variations noted below; but there is considerable and important variation in the rubrics affecting the position of the celebrant, and the ritual. Some of these points are of much interest, but are not entered upon here.) Om. et Rege nostro N.	54. (To the end of the Sanctus as Sar., with the substitution of "Glory be to thee, O Lord, in the highest" for the and "Osanna in excelsis.") (With five Proper Prefaces.) 55. (The whole structure and wording of the Prayer of Consecration and its surroundings differ so widely from the Sar. and Rom. Canon Missae that we print them here in full. Except as regards the words of Institution and the Lord's Prayer, parallel comparison is impossible.) When the Clerks have done singing (the Sanctus) then shall the Priest or Deacon turn him to the people, and say, Let us pray for the whole state of Christ's church. Then the Priest, turning him to the Altar, shall say or sing, plainly and distinctly, this prayer following: Almighty and everliving God, which by thy holy apostle hast taught us to make prayers and supplications, and to give thanks for all men: We humbly beseech thee most mercifully to receive these our prayers, which we offer unto thy divine Majesty, beseeching thee to inspire continually the universal church with the spirit of truth, unity and concord: And grant that all they that do confess thy holy Name, may agree in the truth of thy holy Word, and live in unity and godly love. Specially we beseech thee to save and defend thy servant Edward our King, that under him we may be Godly and quietly governed. And grant

CANON MISSÆ (SARUM).	CANON MISSÆ (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
In qua oratione ordo debet attendi propter ordinem caritatis. Quinquies orat sacerdos; primo pro se ipso; secundo pro patre et matre, carnali videlicet et spirituali, et pro aliis parentibus; tertio pro amicis specialibus; parochianis et aliis; quarto pro omnibus adstantibus; quinto pro omni populo Christiano; et potest hic sacerdos omnes suos amicos Deo commendare. Consulo tamen, ut nullus ibidem nimis immoretur; tum propter cordis distractionem, tum propter immissiones quæ possunt fieri per angelos malos, tum propter alia pericula. et omnium circumstantium, quorum tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, pro quibus tibi offerimus, vel qui tibi offerunt hoc sacrificium laudis, pro se suisque omnibus, pro redemptione animarum suarum, pro spe salutis et incolumitatis suæ, tibi que reddunt vota sua aeterno Deo vivo et vero. Communicantes et memoriam venerantes, Imprimis gloriosæ semperque virginis inclinando parumper dicat Mariæ, genitricis Dei et Domini nostri Jesu Christi, sed et beatorum apostolorum ac martyrum tuorum Petri, Pauli, Andreæ, Jacobi, Johannis, Thomæ, Jacobi, Philippi, Bartholomæi, Matthæi, Simonis et Thadæi, Lini, Cleti, Clementis, Sixti, Cornelii, Cypriani, Laurentii, Chrysogoni, Johannis et Pauli, Cosmæ et Damiani, et omnium sanctorum tuorum, quorum meritis precibusque concedas, ut in omnibus protectionis tuæ muniamur auxilio. Pereundem Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen. Hic respiciat sacerdos hostiam cum magna veneratione dicens, Hanc igitur oblationem servitutis nostræ, sed et cunctæ familiæ tuæ, quaesumus, Domine, ut placatus accipias, diesque nostros in tua pace disponas, atque ab æterna damnatione nos eripi, et in electorum tuorum jubeas grege numerari. Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen.	Om. que. + et (et Pauli).	unto his whole Council, and to all that be put in authority under him, that they may truly and indifferently minister justice, to the punishment of wickedness and vice, and to the maintenance of God's true religion and virtue. Give grace (O heavenly Father) to all Bishops, Pastors, and Curates, that they may both by their life and doctrine set forth thy true and lively word, and rightly and duly administer thy holy Sacraments: and to all thy people give thy heavenly grace, that with meek heart and due reverence they may hear and receive thy holy Word, truly serving thee in holiness and righteousness all the days of their life. And we most humbly beseech thee of thy goodness (O Lord) to comfort and succour all them which in this transitory life be in trouble, sorrow, need, sickness or any other adversity. And especially we commend unto thy merciful goodness this congregation which is here assembled in thy name, to celebrate the commemoration of the most glorious death of thy Son: And here we do give unto thee most high praise and hearty thanks, for the wonderful grace and virtue, declared in all thy saints, from the beginning of the world: And chiefly in the glorious and most blessed virgin Mary, mother of thy Son Jesu Christ our Lord and God, and in the holy Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles and Martyrs, whose examples (O Lord) and steadfastness in thy faith, and keeping thy holy commandments, grant us to follow. We commend unto thy mercy (O Lord) all other thy servants, which are departed hence from us, with the sign of faith, and now do rest in the sleep of peace: Grant unto them, we beseech thee, thy mercy, and everlasting peace, and that, at the day of the general resurrection, we and all they which be of the mystical body of thy Son may altogether be set on his right hand, and hear that his most joyful voice: Come unto me, O ye that be blessed of my Father, and possess the kingdom which is prepared for you from the beginning of the world: grant this, O Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our only Mediator and Advocate.

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).	CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
Hic iterum respiciat hostiam dicens, Quam oblationem tu, Deus omnipotens, in omnibus, quaesumus Hic faciat tres cruces super utrumque, cum dicat, benedic + tam, ascrip + tam, ra + tam, rationabilem, acceptabilemque facere digneris, ut nobis Hic faciat crucem super panem, dicens, cor + pus Hic super calicem, et san + guis junctisque manibus dicat, fiat dilectissimi Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi. Hic erigat sacerdos manus et conjungat : et postea tergat digitos, et eleuet hostiam, dicens, Qui pridie quam pateretur accepit panem in sanctas ac venerabiles manus suas, et elevatis oculis in coelum Hic eleuet oculos suos. ad te Deum Patrem suum omnipotentem Hic inclinet se et postea eleuet paululum dicens, tibi gratias agens bene + dixit, fregit, Hic tangat hostiam dicens, deditque discipulis suis, dicens, Accipite et manducate ex hoc omnes. Hoc est enim corpus meum. Et debent ista verba proferri cum uno spiritu et sub una prolatione, nulla pausa- tione interposita. Post hæc verba inclinet se sacerdos ad hostiam, et postea eleuet eam supra frontem, ut possit a populo videri, et reverenter illam reponat ante calicem in modum crucis per eandem factæ : et tunc discooperiat calicem et teneat inter manus suas, non disjungendo pollicem ab indice nisi dum facit benedictiones tantum, ita dicens, Simili modo posteaquam coenatum est accipiens et hunc praeclarum calicem in sanctas ac venerabiles manus suas item tibi Hic inclinet se, dicens, gratias agens, bene + dixit, deditque discipulis suis, dicens, Accipite et bibite ex eo omnes. Hic eleuet sacerdos parumper calicem, ita dicens, Hic est enim calix sanguinis mei novi et aeterni testamenti, mysterium fidei, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum.	Om. omnipotens. Postquam.	O God, heavenly Father, which of thy tender mercy didst give thine only Son Jesu Christ, to suffer death upon the cross for our redemption, who made there (by his one oblation, once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world, and did institute, and in his holy Gospel command us to celebrate, a perpetual memory of that his precious death until his coming again : Hear us (O merciful Father) we beseech thee : and with thy holy Spirit and Word vouchsafe to bl + ess and sanc + tify these thy gifts, and creatures of bread and wine, that they may be unto us the body and blood of thy most dearly beloved Son Jesus Christ.¹ Who in the same night that he was betrayed, took bread, Here the Priest must take the bread into his hands, and when he had blessed, and given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples saying : Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you : do this in remembrance of me. Likewise after supper he took the cup, Here the Priest shall take the cup into his hands, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them, saying : Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the new Testament, which is shed for you and for many, for remission of sins : Do this as oft as you shall drink it, in remembrance of me. These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the Altar, without any elevation, or shewing the Sacrament to the people. Wherefore, O Lord and heavenly Father, according to the Institution of thy dearly beloved Son our Saviour Jesu Christ, we thy humble servants do celebrate, and make here before thy divine Majesty, with these thy holy gifts, the memorial which thy Son hath willed us to make : having in ¹ The insertion of the Epiclesis, or Invocation of the Holy Ghost upon the elements, is a remarkable feature. It has no counterpart in Sar. and Roman. It must have been borrowed from an Eastern source, where however its almost universal position is after, not before, the words of Institution. (See EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.)

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).	CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
Hic elevet calicem usque ad pectus vel ultra caput dicens, Haec quotiescunque feceritis, in mei memoriam facietis. Hic reponat calicem et fricat digitos suos ultra calicem propter micas, et cooperiat calicem. Deinde elevet brachia sua in modum crucis, junctis digitis usque ad haec verba de tuis donis ac datis. Unde et memores, Domine, nos tui servi sed et plebs tua sancta, ejusdem Christi Filii tui Domini Dei nostri tam beatæ passionis, necnon et ab inferis resurrectionis, sed et in cœlos gloriosæ ascensionis, offerimus praeclarae majestati tuæ de tuis donis ac datis Hic quinque cruces fiant: sed tres primæ cruces super Hostiam et calicem dicendo, hostiam pu + ram, hostiam sanc + tam, hostiam immacu + latam, Quarta super panem, dicendo, pa + nem sanctum vitae aeternae, Quinta super calicem, dicendo, et cali + cem salutis perpetuae. Supra quæ propitio ac sereno vultu respicere digneris, et accepta habere, sicut accepta habere dignatus es munera pueri tui justî Abel, et sacrificium patriarchae nostri Abraham, et quod tibi obtulit summus sacerdos tuus Melchisedech, sanctum sacrificium, immaculatam hostiam. Hic sacerdos, corpore inclinato et cancellatis manibus, dicat Supplices te rogamus usque ad hæc verba ex hac altaris participatione. Et tunc erigat se, deosculans Altare a dextris sacrificiis, et faciat signum crucis super hostiam et calicem et in facie sua, cum dicit omni benedictione coelesti. Supplices te rogamus, omnipotens Deus, jube hæc perferri per manus sancti angeli tui in sublime altare tuum in conspectu divinae majestatis tuae, ut quotquot Hic erigens se, osculetur Altare a dextris sacrificiis, dicens, ex hac Altaris participatione sacrosanctum Filii tui Hic faciat signum crucis super hostiam dicens, cor + pus et san + guinem sumpserimus, omni Hic signet se in facie dicens, bene + dictione coelesti et gratia repleamur. Per. Hic oret pro mortuis. Memento etiam, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum N. et N. qui nos praecesserunt cum signo fidei et dormiunt in somno pacis; ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii, lucis et pacis, ut indulgeas deprecamur. Per. Hic percutiat pectus suum semel, dicens, Nobis quoque peccatoribus famulis tuis de multitudine miserationum tuarum sperantibus partem aliquam et societatem donare digneris, cum tuis sanctis apostolis et martyribus, cum Johanne, Stephano, Matthia, Barnaba, Ignatio, Alexandro, Marcellino, Petro, Felicitate, Perpetua, Agatha, Lucia, Agnete, Cæcilia, Anastasia,	Servi tui. Om. Dei.	remembrance his blessed passion, mighty resurrection, and glorious ascension, rendering unto thee most hearty thanks, for the innumerable benefits procured unto us by the same, entirely desiring thy fatherly goodness, mercifully to accept this our Sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving: most humbly beseeching thee to grant, that by the merits and death of thy Son Jesus Christ and through faith in his blood, we and all thy whole church may obtain remission of our sins and all other benefits of his passion. And here we offer and present unto thee (O Lord) ourself, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable holy and lively sacrifice unto thee: humbly beseeching thee that whosoever shall be partakers of this holy Communion, may worthily receive the most precious body and blood of thy Son Jesus Christ, and be fulfilled with thy grace and heavenly benediction, and made one body with thy Son Jesus Christ, that he may dwell in them, and they in him. And although we be unworthy (through our manifold sins) to offer unto thee any Sacrifice, yet we beseech thee to accept this our bounden duty and service, and command these our prayers and supplications, by the ministry of thy holy Angels, to be brought up into thy holy Tabernacle, before the sight of thy divine Majesty; not weighing our merits, but pardoning our offences, through Christ our Lord; by whom, and with whom, in the unity of the Holy Ghost, all honour and glory be unto thee, O Father Almighty, world without end. Amen.

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).	CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
et cum omnibus sanctis tuis, intra quorum nos consortium, non aestimator meriti, sed veniae, quaesumus, largitor admitte. Per Christum Dominum nostrum. Non dicitur, Amen. Per quem hæc omnia, Domine, semper bona creas, Hic sacerdos ter signet calicem, dicens, sancti + ficas, vivi + ficas, bene + dicis, et praestas nobis. Hic sacerdos discooperiat calicem, et faciat signaculum crucis cum hostia quinques. Primo, ultra calicem ex utraque parte; secundo, calici æquale; tertio, infra calicem; quarto, sicut primo; quinto, ante calicem. Per ip + sum et cum ip + so et in ip + so est tibi Deo Patri omni + potenti in unitate Spiritus + Sancti omnis honor et gloria. Hic cooperiat sacerdos calicem, et teneat manus suas super Altare usque dum dicitur Pater Noster, etc., ita dicens, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen. Oremus. Præceptis salutaribus moniti, et divina institutione formati, audemus dicere: Hic accipiat diaconus patenam, eamque a dextris sacerdotis extenso brachio in altum usque ad Da propitiis pacem in diebus discooperiam teneat. Hic elevet sacerdos manus, dicens, Pater noster, qui es in coelis, sanctificetur nomen tuum. Adveniat regnum tuum. Fiat voluntas tua sicut in coelo et in terra. Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie; et dimitte nobis debita nostra sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris. Et ne nos inducas in tentationem. Chorus dicat, Sed libera nos a malo. Sacerdos privatim, Amen. Libera nos, quaesumus, Domine, ab omnibus malis, præteritis, præsentibus, et futuris; et intercedente beata et gloriosa semperque virgine Dei genetrice Maria et beatis apostolis tuis Petro et Paulo atque Andrea cum omnibus sanctis Hic committat diaconus patenam sacerdoti deosculans manum ejus; et sacerdos deosculetur patenam; postea ponat ad sinistrum oculum, deinde ad dextrum; postea faciat crucem cum patena ultra caput; et tunc reponat eam in locum suum, dicens, Da propitiis pacem in diebus nostris, ut ope misericordiae tuæ adjuti et a peccato simus semper liberi et ab omni perturbatione securi. Hic discooperiat calicem et sumat corpus cum inclinatione, transponens in concavitate calicis, retinendo inter pollices et indices; et frangat in tres partes: prima fractio dum dicitur, Per eundem Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum Filium tuum Secunda fractio. Qui tecum vivit et regnat in unitate Spiritus Sancti Deus	Om. cum. Om. que. For 1st et read cum. For cum read et.	Let us pray. As our Saviour Christ hath commanded and taught us, we are bold to say, Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy Name. Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation. The Answer. But deliver us from evil. Amen. 56. Then shall the Priest say, The peace of the Lord be alway with you. The Clerks. And with thy spirit. The Priest. Christ our paschal Lamb is offered up for us, once for all, when he bare our sins on his body upon the cross; for he is the very Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world: wherefore let us keep a joyful and holy feast with the Lord. Here¹ the Priest shall turn him toward those that come to the holy Communion and shall say, You that do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins to Almighty God, and be in love and charity with your neighbours, and intend to lead a new life, following the commandments of God, and walking from henceforth in his holy ways: ¹ The following lengthy preparation of the communicants has no counterpart in the Sar. or Roman rite.

CANON MISSÆ (SARUM).	CANON MISSÆ (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
Hic teneat duas fracturas in sinistra manu, et tertiam fracturam in dextera manu in summitate calicis, ita dicens aperta voce, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Chorus respondeat, Amen. 56. Hic faciat tres cruces infra calicem cum tertia parte hostiæ, dicens, Pax Domini + sit sem + per vo + biscum. Chorus respondeat, Et cum spiritu tuo. (From this point onward there is considerable variation between Sar. and Rom.) 57. Ad Agnus Dei dicendum, accedant diaconus et subdiaconus ad sacerdotem, uterque a dextris. diaconus propior, subdiaconus remotior, et dicant privatim, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi: miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi: miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi: dona nobis pacem. In missis pro defunctis dicitur hoc modo, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, dona eis requiem. Cum hac additione in tertia repetitione sempiternam. 58. Hic cruce signando deponat dictam tertiam partem hostiæ in sacramentum sanguinis, sic dicendo, Hæc sacrosancta commixtio corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi fiat mihi omnibusque summentibus salus mentis et corporis, et ad vitam æternam promerendam et capescendam præparatio salutaris. Per eundem Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen. 59. Antequam pax detur, dicat sacerdos, Domine, sancte Pater, omnipotens æterne Deus, da mihi hoc sacrosanctum corpus et sanguinem Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi ita digne sumere, ut merear per hoc remissionem omnium peccatorum meorum accipere et tuo Sancto Spiritu replei; et pacem tuam habere; quia tu es Deus solus et præter te non est alius, cujus regnum et imperium gloriosum sine fine permanet in sæcula sæculorum. Amen. Hic osculetur sacerdos corporalia in dextera parte et summitatem calicis et postea diaconum, dicens, Pax tibi et Ecclesiæ Dei. R. Et cum spiritu tuo. Diaconus a dextris sacerdotis ab eo pacem recipiat, et subdiacono porrigat. Deinde ad gradum chori ipse diaconus pacem portet	56. Cum ipsa particula signat ter super calicem dicens, Pax + Domini sit + semper vobis + cum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo. 57. Cooperit calicem, genuflectit, surgit, et inclinatus sacramento, junctis manibus et ter pectus percutiens, dicit, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, dona nobis pacem. In Missis pro defunctis non dicitur miserere nobis, sed ejus loco dona eis requiem, et in tertio additur sempiternam. 58. Particulam ipsam immittit in calicem dicens secunde: Hæc commixtio et consecratio Corporis et Sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi fiat accipientibus nobis in vitam æternam. Amen. 59. Deinde junctis manibus super Altare inclinatus dicit sequentes Orationes: Domine Jesu Christe, qui dixisti Apostolis tuis: Pacem relinquo vobis, pacem meam do vobis, ne respicias peccata mea, sed fidem Ecclesiæ tuæ; eamque secundum voluntatem tuam pacificare et coadunare digneris. Qui vivis et regnas Deus per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen. Si danda est pax, osculatur Altare et dans pacem dicit: Pax tecum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo. In Missis Defunctorum non datur pax, neque dicitur præcedens Oratio.	draw near, and take this holy Sacrament to your comfort, make your humble confession to Almighty God, and to his holy church here gathered together in his Name, meekly kneeling upon your knees. Then shall this general Confession be made in the name of all those that are minded to receive the holy Communion, either by one of them, or else by one of the ministers, or by the Priest himself, all kneeling humbly upon their knees. Almighty God, Father of our Lord Jesu Christ, maker of all things, judge of all men, we knowledge and bewail our manifold sins and wickedness, which we from time to time most grievously have committed by thought, word and deed, against thy divine Majesty, provoking most justly thy wrath and indignation against us: we do earnestly repent, and be heartily sorry for these our misdoings: the remembrance of them is grievous unto us, the burden of them is intolerable: have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us, most merciful Father, for thy Son our Lord Jesu Christ's sake, forgive us all that is past, and grant that we may ever hereafter serve and please thee in newness of life, to the honour and glory of thy Name: Through Jesu Christ our Lord. Then shall the Priest stand up, and turning himself to the people say thus, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who of his great mercy hath promised forgiveness of sins to all them, which with hearty repentance and true faith turn unto him; have mercy upon you, pardon and deliver you from all your sins, confirm and strengthen you in all goodness, and bring you to everlasting life: through Jesu Christ our Lord. Amen. Then shall the Priest also say, Hear what comfortable words our Saviour Christ saith to all that truly turn to him. Come unto me all that travail, and be heavy laden, and I shall refresh you. So God loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son to the end that all that believe in him, should not perish, but have life everlasting. Hear also what Saint Paul sayeth. This is a true saying, and

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).

rectoribus chori et ipsi pacem choro portant, uterque suae partis incipiens a majoribus. In festis vero et feriis quando chorus non regitur, pax a diacono choro apportatur per duos extremos de secunda forma: caetera sicut prius.

60. Post pacem datam dicat sacerdos orationes sequentes privatim antequam se communicet: tenendo hostiam duabus manibus.

Deus Pater, fons et origo totius bonitatis, qui ductus misericordia Unigenitum tuum pro nobis ad infima mundi descendere et carnem sumere voluisti, quam ego indignus in manibus meis teneo,

Hic inclinât se sacerdos ad hostiam, dicens,

Te adoro, te glorifico, te tota mentis ac cordis intentione laudo et precor; ut nos famulos tuos non deseras, sed peccata nostra dimittas, quatenus tibi soli vivo ac vero Deo, puro corde et casto corpore, servire valeamus. Per, etc.

Domine Jesu Christe, Fili Dei vivi, qui ex voluntate Patris, cooperante Spiritu Sancto, per mortem tuam mundum vivificasti; libera me, quæso, per hoc sacrosanctum corpus et hunc sanguinem tuum a cunctis iniquitatibus meis et ab universis malis; et fac me tuis semper obedire mandatis, et a te nunquam in perpetuum separari permittas, Salvator mundi, Qui cum Deo Patre et eodem Spiritu Sancto vivis et regnas Deus per omnia saecula sæculorum. Amen.

Corporis et sanguinis tui, Domine Jesu Christe, sacramentum quod licet indignus accipio, non sit mihi iudicio et condemnationi; sed tua prosit pietate corporis mei et animæ salutis. Amen.

Ad corpus dicat cum humilitatione antequam percipiat,

61. Ave in æternum, sanctissima caro Christi, mihi ante omnia et super omnia summa dulcedo. Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi sit mihi peccatori via et vita.

In no+mine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen.

Hic sumat corpus, cruce prius facta cum ipso corpore ante os. Deinde ad sanguinem cum magna devotione dicens, Ave in æternum, cœlestis potus, mihi ante omnia et super omnia summa dulcedo. Corpus et sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi prosint mihi peccatori ad remedium sempiternum in vitam æternam. Amen.

In no+mine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen.

62. Hic sumat sanguinem: quo sumpto, inclinât se sacerdos et dicat cum devotione orationem sequentem,

Gratias tibi ago, Domine, sancte Pater, omnipotens æterne Deus, qui me refecisti de sacratissimo corpore et sanguine Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi; et precor, ut hoc sacramentum salutis nostræ quod sumpsi indignus peccator non veniat mihi

CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).

60. Domine Jesu Christe, Fili Dei vivi, qui ex voluntate Patris, cooperante Spiritu Sancto, per mortem tuam mundum vivificasti; libera me per hoc sacrosanctum Corpus et Sanguinem tuum, ab omnibus iniquitatibus meis, et universis malis; et fac me tuis semper inhaerere mandatis et a te nunquam separari permittas. Qui cum eodem Deo Patre, etc.

Perceptio corporis tui, Domine Jesu Christe, quod ego indignus sumere præsumo, non mihi proveniat in iudicium et condemnationem: sed pro tua pietate prosit mihi ad tutamentum mentis et corporis, et ad medelam percipiendam. Qui vivis et regnas, etc.

Genuflectit, surgit, et dicit,
Panem cœlestem accipiam, et nomen Domini invocabo.

Deinde parum inclinatus, accipit ambas partes Hostiæ inter pollicem et indicem sinistræ manus et Palenam inter eundem indicem et medium, et dextera percutens pectus, elevata aliquantulum voce, dicit ter devote et humiliter:

61. Domine, non sum dignus ut intres sub tectum meum: sed tantum dic verbo et sanabitur anima mea.

Postea dextera se signans cum Hostia super palenam dicit:

Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam meam in vitam æternam. Amen.

Sumit reverenter ambas partes Hostiæ, jungit manus, et quiescit aliquantulum in meditatione sanctissimi Sacramenti.

62. Deinde discooperit Calicem, genuflectit, colligit fragmenta, si quæ sint, extergit Palenam super Calicem interrim dicens,

Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quæ retribuit mihi? Calicem salutaris accipiam, et nomen Domini worthy of all men to be received, that Jesus Christ came into this world to save sinners.

FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.

Hear also what Saint John sayeth.

If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father. Jesus Christ, the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins.

Then shall the Priest, turning him to God's board, kneel down, and say in the name of all them that shall receive the Communion, this prayer following,

We do not presume to come to this thy table (O merciful Lord), trusting in our own righteousness, but in thy manifold and great mercies: we be not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under thy table: but thou art the same Lord whose property is always to have mercy: grant us therefore (gracious Lord) so to eat the flesh of thy dear Son Jesus Christ, and to drink his blood in these holy Mysteries, that we may continually dwell in him, and he in us, that our sinful bodies may be made clean by his body, and our souls washed through his most precious blood. Amen.

61. Then shall the Priest first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and next deliver it to other Ministers, if any be there present (that they may be ready to help the chief Minister), and after to the people.

And when he delivereth the Sacrament of the body of Christ, he shall say to every one these words:

The body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life.

62. And the Minister delivering the Sacrament of the blood, and giving every one to drink once and no more, shall say,

The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ which was shed for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life.

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).	CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
ad iudicium, neque ad condemnationem pro meritis meis; sed ad profectum corporis mei et animæ salutem in vitam æternam. Amen.	invocabo. Laudans invocabo Dominum et ab inimicis meis salvus ero.	If there be a Deacon or other Priest, then shall he follow with the Chalice: and as the Priest ministereth the Sacrament of the body, so shall he (for more expedition) minister the Sacrament of the blood, in form before written.
63. Qua dicta, eat sacerdos ad dextrum cornu altaris cum calice inter manus digitis adhuc conjunctis sicut prius; et accedat subdiaconus, et effundat in calicem vinum et aquam: et resinceret sacerdos manus suas ne aliqua reliquæ corporis vel sanguinis remaneant in digitis vel in calice. Post primam abluionem dicitur hæc Oratio.	Accipit Calicem manu dextera, et eo se signans dicit, Sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam meam in vitam æternam. Amen. Sumit totum Sanguinem cum particula. Quo sumpto, si qui sunt communicandi, eos communicet antequam se purificet. Postea dicit,	57. In the Communion time the Clerks shall sing, ii. O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world: have mercy upon us. O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world: grant us thy peace. Beginning so soon as the Priest doth receive the holy Communion, and when the Communion is ended, then shall the Clerks sing the post-Communion.
64. Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, pura mente capiamus; et de munere temporali fiat nobis remedium sempiternum.	64. Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, pura mente capiamus; et de munere temporali fiat nobis remedium sempiternum.	67. Sentences of holy scripture, to be said or sung, every day one, after the Holy Communion, called the post-Communion. (Here follow 22 texts from the NT.)
65. Hic lavet digitos in concavitate calicis cum vino infuso a subdiacono: quo hausto, sequatur oratio. Hæc nos communio, Domine, purget a crimine, et cœlestis remedii faciat esse consortes. Post percæptionem abluionum ponat sacerdos calicem super patenam, ut si quid remaneat stillet. Et postea, inclinando se, dicat,	63. Interim porrigit Calicem ministro, qui infundit in eo parum vini, quo se purificat, deinde prosequitur. Corpus tuum, Domine, quod sumpsit, et sanguis quem potavi adhaereat visceribus meis: et præsta, ut in me non remaneat sceleurum macula, quem pura et sancta refecerunt sacramenta. Qui vivis, etc.	Then the Priest shall give thanks to God, in the name of all them that have communicated, turning him first to the people and saying, The Lord be with you. Ans. And with thy spirit. Priest. Let us pray. Almighty and everliving God, we most heartily thank thee, for that thou hast vouchsafed to feed us in these holy Mysteries, with the spiritual food of the most precious body and blood of thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, and hast assured us (duly receiving the same) of thy favour and goodness towards us, and that we be very members incorporate in thy mystical body, which is the blessed company of all faithful people, and heirs through hope of thy everlasting kingdom, by the merits of the most precious death and passion of thy dear Son. We therefore most humbly beseech thee, O heavenly Father, so to assist us with thy grace, that we may continue in that holy fellowship, and do all such good works, as thou hast prepared for us to walk in. Through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, world without end.
66. Adoremus crucis signaculum: per quod salutis sumpsimus sacramentum. Deinde lavet manus: diaconus interim corporalia complicit. Ablutis manibus, et redeunte sacerdote ad dextrum cornu altaris, diaconus calicem porrigat ori sacerdotis, si quid infusionis in eo remanserit resumendum. 67. Postea vero dicat cum suis ministris Communionem. Deinde facto signo crucis in facie, vertat se sacerdos ad populum, elevatisque aliquantulum brachiis, et junctis manibus, dicat, Dominus vobiscum. 68. Et iterum revertens se ad altare dicat, Oremus. Deinde dicat Postcommunionem iuxta numerum et ordinem antedictarum Orationum ante Epistolam. Finita ultima Postcommunionem factoque signo crucis in fronte, iterum vertat se sacerdos ad populum, et dicat, Dominus vobiscum. Deinde diaconus, Benedicamus Domino. Alio vero tempore dicitur Ite, missa est. Quotiescunque enim dicitur, Ite, missa est, semper dicitur ad populum convertendo: et cum dici debeat Benedicamus Domino (R. Deo gratias), vel Requiescant in pace, convertendo ad altare dicitur.	65. Abluit digitos, extergit, et sumit abluionem, extergit os, et calicem, quem operit, et plicato corporali collocat in altari, ut prius. 66. (Om.) 67. Deinde prosequitur Missam. 68. Dicto post ultimam Orationem, Dominus vobiscum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo, dicit pro Missa qualitate vel Ite, missa est, vel Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias. In Missis Defunctorum dicit: Requiescant in pace. R. Amen. 69. Dicto Ite missa est vel Benedicamus Domino, Sacerdos inclinatur ante medium altaris, et manibus junctis super illud, dicit:

CANON MISSAE (SARUM).	CANON MISSAE (ROMAN).	FIRST REFORMED PB OF 1549.
Placeat tibi Sancta Trinitas, obsequium servitutis meae, et præsta ut hoc sacrificium, quod oculis tuæ majestatis indignus obtuli, tibi sit acceptabile, mihi que et omnibus pro quibus illud obtuli, sit, te miserante, propitiabile. Qui vivis, etc.	Placeat tibi, sancta Trinitas, obsequium servitutis meae, et præsta ut sacrificium quod oculis tuæ majestatis indignus obtuli, tibi sit acceptabile, mihi que et omnibus pro quibus illud obtuli, sit, te miserante, propitiabile. Per, etc.
70. (om.)	70. Deinde osculatur altare, et elevatis oculis, extendens, elevans et jungens manus, caputque Cruci inclinans dicit Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus, et versus ad populum, semel tantum benedicens, diam in Missis solemnitibus, prosequitur, Pater et Filius + et Spiritus Sanctus. Amen.	70. Then the Priest, turning him to the people, shall let them depart with this blessing : The peace of God (which passeth all understanding) keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord. And the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be amongst you and remain with you alway. Then the people shall answer. Amen.
71. Qua finita, erigat se sacerdos, signans se in facie sua dicens, In nomine Patris, etc. Et sic inclinatione facta, eo ordine quo prius accesserunt ad altare in principio missae, sic induti cum ceroferario et ceteris ministris redeant. . . . Sacerdos vero in redeundo dicat Evangelium In principio, etc.	71. Deinde in cornu Evangelii, dicto Dominus vobiscum et Initium vel Sequentia sancti Evangelii, signans altare, vel librum et se, ut supra in Evangelio missae, legit Evangelium secundum Joannem, in principio, etc. (Joan. 1 1-14), vel aliud Evang. ut dictum est in Rubricis generalibus. Cum dicit Et verbum caro factum est, genuflectit. In fine, R. Deo gratias.	71. (Om.)
72. (A gratiarum actio for the priest, etc., is added, which it is unnecessary to print here.)	72. (A somewhat similar gratiarum actio is provided in the Rom.)	72. (Om.)

We are now in a position to compare the reformed with the unreformed C. of the Liturgy.

3. Comparison of the Rites.

Taking the seventy-two paragraphs into which the text of the Liturgy has been somewhat arbitrarily split up, we shall find that the following are entirely omitted, and therefore unrepresented in the PB, viz. : Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6-17, 23, 26, 30-53, 58-60, 63-66, 68, 69, 71, 72. The following are retained either in their entirety or, where leaden type is employed, with some variation of text or position : Nos. 2, 5, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 54, 55 (= Canon, with enormous dislocations and variations), 56, 57, 61, 62, 67, 70.

Among the more remarkable omissions the following may be mentioned. Whether in any case omission involves prohibition is a legal question upon which it is not our province to enter here. (a) All provision for the private devotions of the priest before and after service. It is difficult to suppose that all such devotions were forbidden ; they might be naturally omitted as not falling under the designation of " Common Prayers." (b) All elevation of the Sacrament is not only omitted, but expressly prohibited (see rubric after Words of Institution). (c) The number of crosses to be used or made in the course of the service is reduced from thirty-one (Rom.) or twenty-eight (Sar.) to two. (d) The Proper Prefaces are reduced in number from ten to five. This reduction, while it adds to the simplification of the service, is, from the point of view of liturgical enrichment, a distinct loss. (e) All directions for the use of Incense are omitted. (f) Also all directions for the use of the Lavabo.

Among the more notable new features in the PB of 1549 are : (a) The introduction of an Epiclesis, to which attention has been called in a foot-note. (b) The introduction of a new and lengthy, yet beautiful, form of preparation for Communicants, intervening between the Pater Noster at the end of the C. and the Communion of clergy and people. It extends from " You that do truly " to " his most precious blood. Amen."

There are a large number of minor alterations, variations, additions, and omissions, in the rubrics, ritual, and text of the component parts of the Liturgy, for which see COMMUNION (HOLY) and separate arts. on the various component parts.—Hb. F. E. WARREN.

CANONICAL BOOKS.—The Christian Ch. has a collection of sacred books which is called "the Bible." This collection has

1. Meaning. been gradually formed by the Ch. for the use of her members. A book is "canonical" when it has been "canonised," i.e., received into the "Canon," or official list of scriptures. Certain books, however, of the Bible are "apocryphal," or deuterocanonical, and are not to be regarded as on the same level as the canonical books. (See art. APOCRYPHA.)

The word Canon, from the Gk. κανών, meaning primarily "rod" or "measuring-line," acquired also the meanings "rule" and "catalogue." In the latter sense it was familiar to early Christianity from its use in the lists of state officials, festivals, etc., while, possibly, it gained also a further significance from the phrase "the Canon of the truth," as applied to the faith of the Ch. "Canonical," therefore, means accepted or recognised by the Ch., and in itself says nothing as to the authenticity or genuineness of the books in question. The terms truth, inspiration, and canonicity, require to be carefully distinguished.

The formation of the Biblical Canon was a gradual process. (a) The Jews seem to have been the first people to have had

2. Formation. authoritative scriptures. The grouping of the books of the OT into Law, Prophets, and Sacred Writings, is historical in as far as it shows the order of their official acceptance by the Jewish Ch. Ezra, on the return from exile, was probably responsible for the recognition of the Pentateuch; in our Lord's day we have references to the "Law and the Prophets"; while the Council of Jamnia, in A.D. 70, gave the Jewish Canon its final form, recognising our present books of the OT as books "which defile the hands," as being sacred, and excluding those writings which are only to be found in the LXX, or Canon of Alexandria, and are known to us as "the Apocrypha."

(b) Christianity adopted the Jewish Bible, taking her Canon from Alexandria rather than Palestine. To these scriptures she added by degrees books of a specifically Christian character. The Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the other writings of our NT, were gradually received, group by group, into the Canon. As with the Jewish Canon, controversy occurred with regard to certain books of the last group, but in course of time the Christian Canon was definitely, though never ecumenically, determined. Many motives would combine to induce the Ch. to come to some agreement as to her sacred books—the requirements of public reading and worship, the desire for universality as opposed to the esoteric faith of Gnosticism, the demand for apostolicity as against Montanism, and the necessity of having some final court of appeal in controversy. Canonical books were therefore not merely "books read in Church," but books which possessed ecclesiastical authority. The end of the 2nd cent. was a time of many doctrinal disputes, and it is then that we find traces of a fixed Canon of the NT. Thus, Irenæus quotes as authoritative most of our books of the NT, though he does not mention Hebrews. The Muratorian Fragment, a list of NT books made in Rome at this time, acknowledges the four Gospels, Acts, 13 Eps. of St. Paul, Rev., but omits Hebrews, 1 and 2 Peter, James, and one of the three epistles of St. John. But a definite settlement of the Canon did not come until the 4th and 5th cents., when our present Bible came to be gradually recognised as canonical. (Eusebius has three lists of books, i.e., those accepted by all, those disputed by some, and those rejected as spurious. Hebrews, James, 2 Peter, 2, 3 John, and Rev. were all still under discussion, though he himself is disposed to admit them to the Canon. In one place, HE. iii. 31, he rejects 2 Peter as spurious. Athanasius, Epiphanius, the 3rd Council of Carthage, Augustine, and Jerome, give lists of books which are identical with our NT.)

(c) The Reformation re-opened the question of canonicity by its insistence upon scriptural authority. Luther and Calvin, while criticising certain books of the Bible alike from the point of view of doctrine and edification, retained the whole Canon, with the Apocrypha, in their translations. The English reformers likewise made no change. On the other hand, the Council of Trent, by including the Apocrypha among the CB. of the OT, departed from the custom of the primitive Church.

Art. 6 discusses the question of the Canon of Scripture in view of "the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Salvation." It

3. Anglican Attitude. says: "In the name of Holy Scripture we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church." After giving "the names and numbers of the canonical books," it enumerates "the other books," i.e., the OT Apocrypha, and concludes with the words, "All the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them for canonical."

With regard to the liturgical practice of the Ch. we have directions in Pref.³ that "nothing is ordained to be read, but the very pure word of God, the holy scriptures, or that which is agreeable to the same," but the question of canonicity is not discussed, the Bible being regarded as the necessary companion to the PB ("the curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book and the Bible," ib. 1549). In conclusion, we may say that the Ch. of Eng. is faithful to primitive tradition in her treatment of the books of the Bible. She recognises that their claim to authority rests not upon the opinion of the individual, but upon their recognition by the corporate consciousness of the Ch. And upon any theory of inspiration we have to allow for this "selective genius" manifested by the Ch.

through the long ages of her history. (See arts. APOCRYPHA, BIBLE IN PB, SCRIPTURE.)

Bibliography.—Hastings' DB, art. Canon; do. (1909), arts. Canon of OT, Canon of NT; C. E. Gregory, Canon and Text of the NT, 1907; E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-nine Articles, 1896; B. J. Kidd, The Thirty-nine Articles, 1899.—B5.
E. F. MORISON.

CANONICAL HOURS.—See HOURS OF PRAYER.

CANONISATION.—See SAINT, § 2.

CANONS.—The present art. deals only with Post-Reformation Canons. For earlier eccles. legislation see CANON LAW.

With the abolition of papal jurisdiction, the ordinances of popes became inoperative in this country; and it was held by the courts, with growing firmness, that the resolutions of general councils were not binding save so far as Eng. councils had expressly assented to them. The result was that the legal force, and even the content, of the surviving canon law was entirely unascertained. A code of eccles. law, substantive and adjective, became an absolute necessity. As a temporary expedient, it was provided (25 Hen. VIII, c. 9, s. 7) that existing C., etc., "which be not contraryant nor repugnant to the lawes statutes and customes of this Realme, nor to the damage or hurte of the Kynges prerogatyve Royall," should continue to be used until a body of thirty-two commissioners should have produced a new code. It was further enacted, and is still the law, that no new C., etc., should be made or used without "the Kynges most Royal assent and lycence to make promulge and execute" them. The commissioners met and completed their work, but before it was ratified Henry died and the commission lapsed. Under Edward, Parliament authorised the commission to be reappointed; and again considerable progress was made, especially after the number of commissioners was reduced to eight, of whom Cranmer was most influential. They produced an ordered, coherent and intelligible body of eccles. law;¹ but the document was not ratified by Convocation, King, or Parliament. In 1571 it was printed² under the title, "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, ex autoritate primum Regis Henrici 8. inchoata: Deinde per Regem Edwardum 6. provecta, adauctaque in hunc modum, atque nunc ad pleniorum ipsarum reformationem in lucem dedita."³ But it did not receive any authorisation; and a partial and temporary expedient of the same year had no better success. This was A Book of certayne Canons, concernyng some parte of the discipline of the Church of England.¹ Though assented to by abps. and bps., it does not appear even to have been submitted to the lower house in either province.

Other "Articles" (Cardwell, Synodalia 1 132-163) were prepared by eccles. authority in 1575, 1585 and 1597, and the last-named received some sort of royal assent; but the Queen died without committing herself to any general scheme of eccles. law. It was reserved to Richard Bancroft to provide what had been attempted so often in the seventy years since the passing of the "Acte for the submission of the Clergie," and to produce the code which has bound the Ch. of Eng. from 1604 to the present day, with some slight alterations inserted in the last third of the 19th century.

The See of Canterbury being vacant, Bancroft, then Bp. of London, was appointed to preside in the Convocation of the southern province which met on March 20th, 1604. "In the eleventh session (says Collier, Hist. 2 687) he delivered to the prolocutor a book of canons, which passed both houses, and were afterwards ratified by the King's Letters Patent. These canons, being a hundred and forty-one, were collected out of the Articles, Injunctions and Synodical Acts passed and published in the reigns of King Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth." Although thus ratified, and ordered by the King to be observed throughout both provinces, the C. were not in fact submitted to the Convocation of York till March 5, 1606, when, with the King's assent, they were read and approved. No sooner were the C. ratified than a strong agitation arose against them, and a bill passed the Commons in the following session declaring that no C. or constitution eccles. made in the last ten years, or thereafter to be made, should be of force to impeach or hurt any person in his life, liberty, lands or goods, unless first confirmed by the legislature. And the principle that laymen are not bound by any resolutions of church councils unless so confirmed was then and has ever since been upheld by the courts as a fixed basis of judicial decision. But they are binding on the clergy in re ecclesiastica, and on such of the laity as have expressly or impliedly agreed to be bound by them (e.g., churchwardens in the duties of their office, lay rectors in questions of the repair of chancels, and other lay persons as regards offences in churches or churchyards).

Many canons are reiterations or declarations of ancient usages and laws of the Ch. which had previously been received as common law. Such rules obtain no additional force from being incorporated in Post-Reformation canons, and are binding only when proved to have been "received, observed and acted upon . . . from the earliest times of the Reformation, and . . . uniformly recognised and acted upon since the

¹ A statement of some of its outstanding merits will be found in M. Fuller, Throne of Canterbury (1891), pp. 249 ff.

² The preface states that parliamentary sanction would certainly have been given if Edward had survived a little longer.

³ Reprinted by E. Cardwell, Oxford, 1850.

¹ Latin text in Cardwell, Synodalia (1842) I 111-131: Latin and English ed., W. E. Collins (S.P.C.K., 1899).

Reformation" (Exeter, Bishop of, v. Marshall, 1868, L.R. 3 H.L. 53-54).

A certain parliamentary recognition may be claimed for such canons as are directly mentioned in the PB, which is a statutory document:

2. Attempts at Revision. canons 26, 27, 28, 109, in rubrics bef. HC; canon 30, in Bapt.¹ last rubric; canon 31, in Ord. Pref., and Ord.¹ last rubric; canon 68, in Bur. 1st rubric:

and for the acts, conducts and habits mentioned in canons 75 and 109, as incorporated by the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892.

In the year 1640 seventeen canons (printed in Cardwell, Synodalia 1 380-415) were passed by the Convocations and received the assent of Charles I; but they were not duly made during the sitting of Parliament; and never had any binding authority in the church courts.

Again, after the revival of Convocation in the 19th cent., a committee of the lower house of the Convocation of Canterbury was appointed in June, 1866, "to examine the Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, with a view to their amendment and adaptation to the present necessities of the Church." The reference was later enlarged to allow the production of "a body of new Canons suited to the present necessities of the Church," and a committee of the Convocation of York was associated in the work. A report (not distinguished by any great boldness of initiative) was presented in October, 1873. See Chron. Conv. Cant., 1874, 150-1, 440. The Report is appended to the volume, and was also published separately.

Editions of the CANONS OF 1604: Text only. Many contemporary edd. of the Constitutions and Canons in English will be found in the larger 4. Bibliography. libraries: they were frequently appended to folio prayer books. The Latin text was printed in 1604 by J. Norton (London 4°, BM. 5155. aa. 4). Both texts are in A. Sparrow, Collection of Articles (1675), and E. Cardwell, Synodalia (1842). A convenient modern edition, substituting the new C. of 1866 and 1888 for those superseded by them, and adding the new canon of 1892, is published by the S.P.C.K. Editions, annotated:—Davis, C.H., The English Church Canons of 1604, with Notes . . . showing the Modification of each Canon by subsequent Acts of Parliament, etc., 8°, London, 1869; Walcott, M.E.C., The Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical of the Church of England, referred to their original sources, etc., Oxford, 1874. Each of these answers the specific claim of its title, and both should be consulted by the student. The second has the great advantage of a good index. A copy of the C. of 1604 is always included in the large PBs to be found on the reading-desks of our churches.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

CANONS OF 1604. (For information as to the external history, and legal force of these canons, see CANONS and the books cited. In the present art., the words following the Roman numeral indicate the headings under which the various canons were grouped by their compilers. Very brief notes are added in certain cases, specially where the canon has been amended.)

The Constitutions and Canons of 1604 are divided into fourteen sections, varying much in importance. The first section and the last are the natural outcome of the political and eccles. situation and show least dependence on earlier enactments.¹ The anathemas of the former are aimed at the Puritans and other sectaries who would disintegrate the Church, those of the latter at Erastians and politicians who would degrade her to entire subordination to the State. The other sections are mainly gathered from existing formularies. As a help to understand the temper in which this compilation was made, and the intention of those who enacted and ratified it, canons 1, 2 and 139 are set out practically at length.

I. Of the Church of England. 1. *The King's supremacy over the Ch. of E. in causes Eccles., to be maintained.*² As our duty to the

1. The Royal Supremacy. King's most Excellent Majesty requireth, we first decree and ordain, that the Abp. of Canterbury (from time to time), all Bps. of this Province, all Deans, Archdeacons, Parsons, Vicars, and all other Eccles. persons, shall faithfully keep and observe and . . . cause to be observed and kept of others, all and singular Laws and Statutes, made for restoring to the Crown of this Kingdom, the ancient jurisdiction over the state Eccles., and abolishing of all foreign power repugnant to the same. Furthermore, all Eccles. persons, having cure of souls, and all other Preachers . . . shall . . . declare, four times every year (at the least) in their Sermons . . . That all usurped and foreign power (forasmuch as the same hath no establishment nor ground by the Law of God) is for most just causes taken away and abolished: and that therefore no manner of obedience, or subjection within his Majesty's Realms and Dominions, is due unto any such foreign power: but that the King's power within his Realms of England, Scotland and Ireland, and all other his Dominions and Countries, is the highest power under God, to whom all men, as well inhabitants, as born within the same, do by God's Laws owe most loyalty and obedience, afore and above all other Powers and Potentates in earth.

2. Impugners of the King's supremacy censured. (As a specimen of the general formula³ of this section of the canons 2-12, this canon is printed in full.) Whosoever shall hereafter affirm that the King's Majesty hath not the same authority in causes Eccles. that the godly Kings had amongst the Jews, and Christian Emperors of the Primitive Ch., or impeach any part of his Regal supremacy in the said causes restored to the Crown, and by the Laws of this Realm therein established: let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored but only by the Abp. after his repentance and public revocation of those his wicked errors.

3. The Ch. of Eng. a true and Apostolical Ch.—

4. Impugners of the public worship of God established in the Ch. of Eng., censured.—

2. The Church of England. 5. Impugners of the Arts. of Religion established in the Ch. of Eng., censured.—

6. Impugners of the Rites and Ceremonies established in the Ch. of Eng., censured.—7. Impugners of the government of the Ch. of Eng. by Abps., Bps., etc., censured (see EPISCOPACY).—8. Impugners of the form of consecrating and ordering Abps., Bps., etc.

1 Canon 1 alone reproduces the language of the Injunctions of 1547 and 1559.

2 These and the following titles and extracts are taken with spelling modernised, from a copy (4° Rawl. 236) of the "Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical . . . Imprinted At London by Robert Barker, Printer to the Kings most Excellent Maestie, Anno 1604," in the Bodleian Library.

3 This form is that usually adopted by Church Councils; e.g., those of Trent: "Si quis dixerit hominem suls operibus . . . posse justificari coram Deo: anathema sit."

in the Ch. of Eng., censured (see ORDINAL).—9. Authors of Schism in the Ch. of Eng., censured.—10. Maintainers of Schismatics in the Ch. of Eng., censured.—11. Maintainers of Conventicles, censured.—12. Maintainers of Constitutions made in Conventicles, censured.

II. Of Divine Service, and Administration of the Sacraments. 13. Due celebration of Sundays and Holy-days.—14. The prescript form of Divine Service to be used on Sundays and Holy-days.—15. The Litany to be read on Weds. and Fridays.—16. Colleges to use the prescript form of DS.—17. Students in Colleges to wear Surplices, in time of DS.—18. A reverence and attention to be used within the Church in time of DS.

... All manner of persons . . . shall reverently kneel upon their knees when the general Confession, Litany, and other prayers are read; and shall stand up at the saying of the Belief . . . and likewise when in time of DS. the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present . . . (see POSTRION, BOWING).

19. Loiterers not to be suffered near the Ch. in time of DS. 20. Bread and Wine to be provided against every Communion.—21. The Comm. to be thrice a year received.—22. Warning to be given beforehand for the Comm.—23. Students in Colleges to receive the Comm. four times a year.—24. Copes to be worn in Cath. Churches by those that administer the Comm.

... The principal Minister using a decent Cope, and being assisted with the Gospeller and Epistler agreeably, according to the Advertisements published Anno 7 Elizabethæ.

25. Surplices and Hoods to be worn in Cath. Churches, when there is no Comm.—26. Notorious offenders not to be admitted to the Comm.—27. Schismatics not to be admitted to the Comm.

No Minister . . . shall wittingly administer (the Comm.) . . . to any that refuse to be present at public Prayers . . . nor to any that are common and notorious depravers of the Book of Common Prayer . . . or to any that have spoken against and depraved his Majesty's sovereign authority in causes Eccles. . . . Provided that every Minister so repelling any (as is specified . . . in this or in the next Precedent Constitution) shall, upon complaint, or being required by the Ordinary, signify the cause thereof unto him, and therein obey his Order and direction.

28. Strangers not to be admitted to the Comm.

29. Fathers not to be Godfathers in Bapt., and children not Communicants.—30. The lawful use of the Cross in Baptism explained. This, the only canon specifically referred to in the PB (Bapt. last Rubric), is a long and argumentative reply to those by whom, in spite of "his Majesty's most princely care and pains taken in the Conference at Hampton Court . . . the use of it (the cross) in Baptism is so greatly stuck at and impugned." After reasons for the retention of the sign, it is pointed out that: (a) the sign of the Cross in Baptism is no part of the substance of that Sacr.; (b) the infant baptised is, by virtue of Baptism, before it be signed with the sign of the Cross, received into the Congregation of Christ's flock; (c) the use of the sign being thus a thing indifferent, the true use of it should reverently be retained as prescribed by a lawful magistrate.

¹ In 1865 the Conv. of Cant. made and published a new canon, making it possible for fathers to be godfathers; but the canon did not receive the royal assent.

III. Ministers, their Ordination, function and charge. 31. Four solemn times appointed for the making of Ministers (see EMBER

6. Of DAYS).—32. None to be made Deacon and Minister, both in one day.—33. The Titles of such as are to be made Ministers. ("No person shall be admitted into Sacred Orders except he . . . exhibit . . . a Presentation"—or give other evidence that he is in a position to "attend the cure of souls," or is a Fellow of a College, etc.).—34. The quality of such as are to be made Min. This provides that a deacon must be 23 and a priest 24 years complete; and as to his faith and moral conduct being duly evidenced.—35. The examination of such as are to be made Min.

36. Subscription required of such as are to be made Min. No person is to be received into the Ministry or instituted or collated without a licence from the abp. or bp. of the diocese, nor without subscribing a declaration. The declaration provided in 1604 expressly required the declarant "willingly and ex animo" to subscribe three articles setting forth: (a) the royal supremacy; (b) that the PB and Ordinal contain nothing contrary to the word of God and that the declarant will use it; (c) that the declarant holds the 39 Arts. "to be agreeable to the word of God."

In 1865, by canon duly made and published by both Convocations, and ratified by Royal Letters Patent, a new declaration was substituted in these terms: "I, A.B., do solemnly make the following declaration:—I assent to the 39 Arts. of Religion, and to the Book of Common Prayer, and of Ordering of Bps., Priests, and Deacons; I believe the doctrine of the United Ch. of Eng. and Ireland, as therein set forth, to be agreeable to the Word of God; and in Public Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments I will use the form in the said Book prescribed and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority."

37. *Subscription before the Diocesan.*¹ None licensed as aforesaid may execute any eccles. function in a diocese to which he removes without making the same declaration in the presence of the bishop.

38. Revellers after Subscription, censured. If any Min., after he hath "once subscribed to the said three articles," shall omit to use the form of Pr., or any of the Orders or Ceremonies prescribed in the Communion Book, let him be suspended; and if after a month he do not reform and submit himself, let him be excommunicated: and then if he shall not submit himself within the space of another month, let him be deposed from the ministry.

39. Cautions for institution of Ministers into Benefices. (Production of Letters of Orders, etc.).—40. An oath against Simony at institution into Benefices. By a fourth new canon of 1865, a declaration in the following terms is substituted for the oath:

"I, A.B., solemnly declare that I have not made by myself, or by any other person on my behalf, any payment, contract, or promise of any kind whatsoever, which to the best of my knowledge or belief is simoniacal, touching or concerning the obtaining the preferment of . . . ; nor will I at any time hereafter perform or satisfy, in whole or in part, any such kind of payment, contract, or promise made by any other without my knowledge or consent."

¹ By canons also made in 1865, the terms of canon 37 were altered to correspond with the alteration of canon 30, and the words "made and subscribed the declaration aforesaid" were substituted for the words in quotation marks in canon 38.

41. Licences for plurality of Benefices limited, and Residence enjoyed.—42. Residence of Deans in their Churches.—43. Deans and Prebendaries to Preach during their Residence.—44. Prebendaries to be resident upon their Benefices.

45. Beneficed preachers being resident upon their livings to preach every Sunday.—46. Beneficed men not preachers to procure monthly Sermons.—47. Absence of Beneficed men to be supplied by Curates that are allowed Preachers.—48. None to be Curates but allowed by the Bp.—49. Ministers not allowed Preachers, may not expound.—50. Strangers not admitted to Preach without showing their Licence.—51. Strangers not admitted to preach in Cath. Churches without sufficient authority.—52. The names of strange Preachers to be noted in a Book.—53. No public opposition between Preachers.—54. The Licences of Preachers refusing conformity, to be void.—55. The form of a prayer to be used by Preachers before their Sermons. (See art. BIDDING PRAYER.)

56. Preachers and Lecturers to read divine Service and administer the Sacraments twice a year at the least.

57. The Sacraments not to be refused at the hands of unpreaching Ministers.

58. Ministers reading Divine Service, and administering the Sacraments, to wear Surplices, and Graduates therewith Hoods.—59. Min. to Catechise every Sunday.—60. Confirmation to be performed once in three years.—61. Min. to prepare children for Confirmation.—62. Min. not to Marry any persons without Banns or Licence. This canon provided that "No Minister . . . join any . . . in Marriage at any unseasonable times, but only between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon . . . and likewise in time of Divine Service." By a canon duly made and ratified in 1887 (cp. 49-50 Vict., c. 14) these hours were extended to 3 p.m., and it was declared unnecessary for the celebration to take place in time of divine service.

63. Min. of exempt Churches not to Marry without Banns or Licence.—64. Min. solemnly to bid Holy-days.

Every Parson . . . shall . . . declare to the people every Sunday at the time appointed in the Communion Book, whether there be any Holy-days or Fasting days the week following.

65. Min. solemnly to denounce Recusants and Excommunicates.

. . . Every six months ensuing, as well in the Parish Church, as in the Cathedral . . . openly in time of Divine Service upon some Sunday.

66. Min. to confer with Recusants.—67. Min. to visit the sick.

And when any is passing out of this life, a Bell shall be tolled.

68. Min. not to refuse to christen or bury.—69. Min. not to defer Christening, if the child be in danger.—70. Min. to keep a Register of Christenings, Weddings, and Burials.

71. Min. not to Preach or administer the Communion in private houses.—72. Min. not to appoint public or private Fasts, or Prophecies, or to exorcize, but by authority.—73.

18. Sunday Rules for Ministers and Schoolmasters. Min. not to hold private Conventicles.—74. Decency in apparel enjoined to Min.

A prescript form of decent and comely apparel, to have them (the prelaty and clergy of the Churches) known to the people, and thereby to receive the honour and estimation due to the special Messengers and Ministers of Almighty God. (Of some historical and antiquarian interest, now binding only in the spirit.)

75. Sober conversation required in Min. See art. CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 2 n.—76. Min.

at no time to forsake their calling. " . . . upon pain of excommunication." But now see Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870, 33-4 Vict., c. 91, and art. ORDERS (HOLY).

IV. Schoolmasters.¹ 77. None to teach School without Licence.—78. Curates desirous to teach, to be licensed before others.—79. The duty of Schoolmasters.

V. Things Appertaining to Churches. 80. The great Bible and Book of Common Prayer to be had in every Ch.

11. Of Churches and their Officers. Provided by the churchwardens at the charge of the parish.

81. A font of Stone for Baptism in every Ch.—82. A decent Communion table in every Ch.—83. A pulpit to be provided in every Ch.—84. A Chest for Alms in every Ch.—85. Churches to be kept in sufficient reparations.

A duty of the churchwardens, who shall also take care "that the Churchyards bewell and sufficiently repaired, fenced, etc.; but especially they shall see that in every meeting of the Congregation, peace be well kept, and that all persons Excommunicated, and so denounced, be kept out of the Church."

86. Churches to be surveyed, and the decays certified to the high Commissioners (see art. REPAIRS).—87. A Terrier of Glebe lands, and other Possessions belonging to Churches.

To be taken by the view of honest men in every parish, by the appointment of the Bp., whereof the Minister to be one, and (it shall) be laid up in the Bp.'s Registry. }

88. Churches not to be profaned.

No . . . profane usage, to be kept in the Church, Chapel, or Churchyard, neither the Bells to be rung superstitiously . . . nor . . . without good cause to be allowed by the Minister.

VI. Churchwardens or Questmen, and Sidemen, or Assistants. 89. The choice of Churchwardens and their account.—90. The choice of Sidemen and their joint office with Churchwardens.

VII. Parish Clerks. 91. Parish Clerks to be chosen by the Minister.

VIII. Eccles. Courts belonging to the Archbishop's Jurisdiction.—92. None to be Cited into divers Courts for probate of the same Will (abrogated 20-1 Vict., c. 77: see WILL).—93. The Rate of Bona notabilia liable to the Prerogative Court (abrogated, as above).—94. None to be Cited into the Arches or Audience but dwellers within the Archbishop's Diocese or Peculiars.—95. The restraint of double Quarrels.—96. Inhibitions not to be granted without the subscription of an Advocate.—97. Inhibitions not to be granted until the Appeal be exhibited to the Judge.—98. Inhibitions not to be granted to factious Appellants, unless they first subscribe.

99. None to marry within the degrees prohibited.—100. None to marry under 21 years, without their Parents' consent.—101. By whom

12. Of Marriage and Divorce. Licences to marry without Banns shall be granted, and to what sort of persons.—

102. Security to be taken at the granting of such Licences, and under what conditions.

By a new canon of 1888 (see note on canon 62) it was provided that the licences should contain the condition that the marriage be celebrated between 8 a.m. and 3 p.m.

103. Oaths to be taken for the Conditions.—104. An

1 " In the last few years a course of legislation has been inaugurated, and in many respects completed, by the Public Schools Act, the Endowed Schools Acts, and the Elementary Education Act, which leaves remaining very little of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over schools."—Phillimore, Eccles. Law (1895) 1625.

No. of Canon	Royal Injns. of 1536	Royal Injns. of 1538	Bonner's Injns. of 1542	Other parallels under Henry VIII	Royal Injns. of 1547	Royal Arts. of 1549	Other parallels under Edw. VI	Parallels under Mary	Royal Injns. of 1559	Advertisements of 1566	Canons of 1571	Canons of 1585	Whitgift's Stat. of 1587	Whitgift's Arts. of 1591	Bancroft's Orders of 1595	Canons of 1597	Other parallels under Eliz.	NOTES AND REFERENCES.
4	36	38	42	H8	47	49	E6	M	59	66	71	85	87	91	95	97	El. 73	4 1559 Form of Sub.; 1573 * Proclamation in Cardwell DA 1 283 (cp. 240, 263); 13 Eliz. c. 12 s. 2; 1591 arts.; 1592 arts. proposed by Whitgift to imprisoned Puritans, Strype Whitgift 285.
5																	76	5 1571 Canons 1 3; 6 2; 13 Eliz. c. 12; 1576 Vis. art. 21; 1604 new declaration bef. 39 Arts.
6														91				6 1571 Canons, 6 2; 1591 arts.
7														91				7 1591 arts; 1592 arts (as under Canon 4); cp. Strype Whitgift 1 387, 2 135.
8																		8 8 Eliz. c. 1; 1571 Canons 6 2.
9														91			63	9 Art. 34; 1591 arts.; 1592 Letter . 10 No direct precedent, but see Strype Ann. iii. 3 291; cp. Councils: Antioch (341) 2, 5, Chalcedon 18, Gangra (340) 5, 6.
11														91				11 1591 arts.
12																	92	12 1592 arts.
13					47				59									13 1547 R. Injn. 24; 1559 R. Injn. 20.
14																	73	14 1573 Proclamation in Cardwell DA 1 383; 1576 Vis. art. 1.
15					47	49		59										15 1547 R. Injn. 23 (end); 1549 (Royal) art. 7; 1559 R. Injn. 48+.
16																	67	16 1567 Parker's Vis. arts. for Cath. and Coll. churches 3.
18						49		56	59									17 new. 1551 Hooper's Injn. 15
19																		18 1549 (Royal) art., 4; 1559 R. Injn. 38 (order in church) cp. Hooper, 1551, arts. 15, 52 (Bowling at the Name, cp. 1556 Pates' Injn. 5).
21											71							19 1571 Canons 5 (not verbatim).
23																	76	20 new.
24										66								21 1576 Vis. art. 5 2.
25										66		71						22 new.
26			42							66								23 1566 Advt. 10 +.
27										66								24 1566 Advt. 11 +.
28									59	66								25 1566 Advt. 12 +; 1571 Canon 2 4 (alt.).
29										66								26 1542 Bonner's Injn. 9; 1547 R. Injn. 25; 1559 R. Injn. 21.
33												85				97	75	27 1566 Advt. 15 (part).
34										66	71	85				95	97	28 1559 R. Injn. 33 (substance).
35												85						29 1566 Advt. 16, 17 (substance).
36				37			51	58	59	66							67	30 new.
40					47				59									31 new: cp. Bacon Considerations touching the Pacification of the Ch. (1603).
																		32 new.
																		33 1575 arts. 6; 1583 arts. 7 +; 1585 Canons 1; 1597 Canons 1.
																		34 Lyndwode Prov. 1 5, 6, 9; 1566 Advt. 22 (one clause); 13 Eliz. c. 12; 1571 Canons 1 6 (letters dimissory, knowledge of Latin, and testimonials required); 1575 arts. 1 (age to be 23 or 24, Arts. to be subscribed, confession of faith in Latin); 1583 arts. 8 (substance); 1580 Canons 1; 1593 orders 1; 1595 Bp. of London's orders 2 (Wilkins' Conc. 4 348); 1597 Canons 1; 1601 Abp. of Cant.'s Letters (Wilkins' Conc. 4 366).
																		35 1585 Canons 1; 1593 orders 1597 Canons 1; Bacon Considerations .
																		36 1583 arts. 6. Cp. Usher Reconstruction (1910) for text of a series of forms of the following dates, 1537 (?), 1551 (2, cp. Strype Crammer 2 902), under Philip and Mary, 1559 (4, cp. a Strype Ann. 1 i 255 (inaccurate), b. Cardwell DA 1 240 ff., 263 ff.), 1566 (annexed to Advts., cp. Cardwell DA 1 330 f.), 1567, 1571, 1375 (3), 1575-6, 1579., 1583 (Whitgift's Three Arts. in Cardwell DA 1 468).
																		37-39 new.
																		40 1547 R. Injn. 31; 1559 R. Injn. 26 +.

No. of Canon	Royal Injns. of 1536	Royal Injns. of 1538	Bonner's Injns. of 1542	Other parallels under Henry VIII	Royal Injns. of 1547	Royal Arts. of 1549	Other parallels under Edw. VI	Parallels under Mary	Royal Injns. of 1559	Advertisements of 1566	Canons of 1571	Canons of 1585	Whitgift's Stat. of 1587	Whitgift's Arts. of 1591	Bancroft's Orders of 1595	Canons of 1597	Other parallels under Eliz.	NOTES AND REFERENCES.
41	36	38	42	H8 38	47	49	E6	M	59	66	71	85	87	91	95	97	El. 88	41 1536 R. Injn. 6; 1538 Lee's Injn. 13, Shaxton's Injn. 1; 1542 Bonner's Injn. 4; 1571 Canons 8; 1585 Canons 5; 1588 orders (Cardwell DA 2 16); 1597 Canons 2.
42									59		71						88	42 1559 R. Injn. 1; 1571 Canons 2 5 (substance); 1588.
43																	76	43 1576 Vis. arts. 4.
44																	76	44 1576 arts. 5.
45		38	42		47				59								86	45 1538 R. Injn. 6; 1542 Bonner 18; 1547 R. Injn. 2; 1559 R. Injn. 3; 1586 Orders 6.
46										66							75	46 1566 Advts. 7; 1575 arts. 10; 1586 orders 7 (alt).
47																97	01	47 1597 Canons 4 (altered).
48											71							48 1571 Canons 5 9; 1601 Commissioners' orders 5 (Wilkins' Conc. 4 363).
49										66	71							49 1566 Advts. 9 (part verbatim); 1571 Canons 6 1.
50		38			47				59									50 1538 R. Injn. 9; 1547 R. Injn. 10; 1559 R. Injn. 8.
51			42								71							51 1542 Bonner's Injn. 8, 19; 1571 Canons 2 6 (substance).
52											71							52 1571 Canons 5 10 (substance).
55									59									53-4 new.
56																	79	55 1559 R. Injn. (end), ct. 1547 R. Injn. end.
57						49												56 1579 Letter of Privy Council to Abp. of Cant. (Wilkins' Conc. 4 292); cp. Hist. MSS. Com. Hatfield House 7 452.
59			42			49		59									75	57 1549 arts. 13. 58 new.
62																		59 1537 Lee's Injn. 10; 1542 Bonner's Injn. 11; 1559 arts. 8; 1559 R. Injn. 44 (verbatim +); 1575 arts. 10; 1586 orders 4 (sense).
64																	97	60-1 new.
65																	93	62 1593 orders 2; 1597 canons 5.
67																	97	63 new.
70		38			47				59									64 1559 R. Injn. (end +).
73																		65 1597 Canons 8. 68 new.
74			42	37					59	66	71							67 1566 Advts. 19 (substance).
75	36		42	38	47				59									68-69 new.
77								57	59		71							70 1538 R. Injn. 12; 1547 R. Injn. 13, 30 (?); 1559 R. Injn. 10 +.
79			42	38	47				59		71							71-72 new.
80	36	38	42	37	47				59		71							73 1560 Parker's Vis arts. 15 (cp. and ct. 1559 R. arts. 51); 1573 Proclamation.
81																		74 1537 Lee's Injn. 13; Bonner's Injn. 12; 1559 R. Injn. 30 (supplying preface of Canon); 1566 Advts. 29-36 (supplying most of the substance); 1571 Canons 6 3; 1583 arts. 4.
82																		75 1536 R. Injn. 8; 1538 Voysey's Injn. 13; 1542 Bonner's Injn. 15; 1547 R. Injn. 8; 1559 R. Injn. 7 (verbatim +).
83																		76 new.
																		77 1557 Pole's arts. 41; 1559 R. Injn. 40 (nearly verb.); 1571 Canons 9 1 +.
																		78 new.
																		79 1538 Shaxton's arts. 10; 1542 Bonner's arts. 7; 1547 R. Injn. 34; 1559 R. Injn. 3 9; 1571 Canons 9 2 +.
																		80 1536 R. Injn. 7; 1538 R. Injn. 2, 3; 1547 R. Injn. 7; 1559 R. Injn. 6; 1571 Canons 5 3 (verb.); cp. 1537.
																		Latimer's arts. and 1542 Bonner's Injn. 3 (requiring Bps. Book) also cp. 1571 Canons 1 8, 2 1.
																		81 1561 Order 5 (cp. 1561 Resol. 5 in Frere VA I 3 60); 1563 Parker's arts. 5; 1566 Advts. 16; 1571 Canons 5 3.
																		82 1550 Ridley's arts. 5; 1551 Hooper's arts. 43; 1559 R. Injn. (end); 1565 Benthams Injn 1; 1566 Advts. 13, 14; cp. also for tables of X Comts., 1560 R. Order 3.
																		83 1547 R. Injn. 28; 1550 Ridley's arts. 60; 1559 R. Injn. 24 (alt.); 1560 Parker's arts. 2; etc.

																		NOTES AND REFERENCES.
No. of Canon	Royal Injns. of 1536	Royal Injns. of 1538	Bonner's Injns. of 1542	Other parallels under Henry VIII	Royal Injns. of 1547	Royal Arts. of 1549	Other parallels under Edw. VI	Parallels under Mary	Royal Injns. of 1559	Advertisements of 1566	Canons of 1571	Canons of 1585	Whitgift's Stat. of 1587	Whitgift's Arts. of 1591	Bancroft's Orders of 1595	Canons of 1597	Other parallels under Eliz.
84	36		42	H8	47	49	E6	M	59	66	71	85	87	91	95	97	El.	84 1547 R. Injn. 29; 1559 R. Injn. 25, &c.
85											71							85 1571 Canons 5 2 (substance).
87											71							86 new.
88											71							87 1571 Canons 10 3.
89					47		51	54			71							88 1571 Canons 5 7.
																		89 1554 Bonner's arts. 63, cp. 1547 R. Injn. 13 and 1551 Hooper's arts. 18; 1556 Brooks' Injn. 27-34; 1571 Canons 5 1; &c.
90					47				59		71						61	90 1547 R. Injn. 24; 1559 R. Injn. 46+; 1561 R. Procl. (cp. reits. under 89); 1571 Canons 5 2, 8.
91							48	54									61	91 1548 R. Injn. for Doncaster 5; 1551 Hooper's arts. 22; 1554 Bonner's arts. 97; 1571 Grindal's arts. 39; and Injn. 46; 1561 Parkhurst's Interrog. 47-49; 1574 Cooper's arts. 6.
92																		92 1571 Canons 4.
93				34							71							93 cp. Lyndw. de Test.; 25 H. VIII c. 5.
94													87					94 1587 Whitgift's Statutes for the Eccles. Courts 1 1
95												85					83	95 1583 arts. 9; 1585 Canons 1 5, cp. Lyndw. 3 6.
96													87					96 1587 Whitgift's Stat. 1 3.
97													87					97 ib. 1 3.
99																		98 new.
100			42	37						66	71						63	99 1562 Parker's Table; 1566 Advt. 28; 1571 Canon 10 5, 6.
101			42														97	100 1537 R. Lee's arts. 9; 1542 Bonner's Injn. 5; 1593 orders 3; 1597 Canons 5 3.
102												85					oi	101 1542 Bonner's Injn. 6; 1601 Com. orders 6; Canon 6 2 above.
105																	97	102 1585 arts. 3; 1597 Canons 5.
106																		103-104 new.
107													87				97	105 1597 Canons 6+.
108																	97	106 1587 Whitgift's Stat. 5 2.
110	38			47				59									97	107 1597 Canons 6.
																		108 1597 Canons 6. 109 new.
																		110 1538 R. Injn. 11; 1547 R. Injn. 12; 1559 R. Injn. 9+.
																		111 Enforcement of Canon 18.
																		112 new.
114																	95	113 new.
																		114 1595 Bancroft's Orders 12 (Wilkins' 4 348).
116																	95	115 new.
																	oi	116 1598 Bancroft's Orders 5; 1601 Whitgift's Letter about Courts (Wilkins' Conc. 4 366).
117																	oi	117 1601 Whitgift's letter to Bps. (Wilkins' Conc. 4 363); 1601 Commissioners' Orders 4.
																	oi	118-120 new.
121																		121 1601 Com. Orders 3; 1601 Whitgift's Letter about Courts 3.
122																	oi	122 1603 agreed at Hampton Court Conf.
123																		123 1595 Bancroft's Orders 8
124																	95	124 ib. 8.
																	95	125-127 new.
128																		128 ib. 7 (part).
129													87					129 1587 Whitgift's Stat. 4 1.
130													87					130 ib 4 2.
																		131-132 new.
133													87					133 ib 4 7.
134													87				95	134 1573 Parker's Statutes for the Court of Arches 1 5, 2 4; 1587 Whitgift's Stat. 2, 4 6; 1598 Bancroft's Orders 6.
																		135 new.
136																	93	136 1593 Orders 7.
																		137 new.
138																	95	138 1595 Bancroft's Orders 17, 18; 1601 Whitgift's Letter about Courts 5.
																		139-141 new.
	3	5	12	7	14	4	5	5	25	14	24	6	8	8	8	11

CANTICLE.—The word C. is derived from canticulum, but it is generally used as the equivalent of canticum (= ᾠδή).

1. Name. used in the Vulg. of Eph. 5 19 (cp. Col. 3 16), "canticis spiritualibus." It is defined by Jerome, Augustine, Basil and Chrysostom as that which is sung unaccompanied, in contrast with the psalm which is sung to an instrumental accompaniment; but Augustine himself acknowledges the inadequacy of the definition. Liturgically, the word is confined to sacred songs or prs., other than Pss., taken from the Bible, and used in the daily offices; this restricted use will be observed in the present article.

It is probable that passages from the OT, other than Pss., were used liturgically by the Jews before the Christian era. Our Lord's language about "living water" (John

2. Historical Uss. 7 38) seems to allude to the daily use of Isaiah 12 (which afterwards became one of the chief Cs. of the Ch.) during the feast of Tabernacles. There is a similar possible allusion in Rev. 15 3, where the redeemed, standing on the sea of glass, "sing the song of Moses the servant of God"; for Exodus 15, the song of the redeemed Israel on the shores the Red Sea, became the first C. on the Ch.'s list, the second (Deut. 32) being of undoubted Jewish use as a Sabbath hymn. And Philo's references to Jewish hymnody (esp. De Vit. Cont., § 10, "ἀρχαίων τινα" ὅμιλον "τῶν πάλαι ποιητῶν") would cover such a use, which would readily account for its adoption by Christianity.

The chief Cs. of the Ch., used in both East and West, were the two songs of Moses (Ex. 15 and Deut. 32), that of Hannah (1 Sam. 2), the prs. of Habakkuk (c. 3), Isaiah (c. 12), Jonah (c. 2), and the Three Children (Dan. 3 LXX), the song of the Three Children (Dan. 3 LXX); and from the NT the Magnificat and Benedictus; to these were usually added the dirge of Hezekiah (Isaiah 38), the song of Zion (Isaiah 26), and the Nunc Dimittis. These, with two additions, form the collection added to the Pss. in Cod. A (5th cent.). Verecundus (6th cent.) refers to a similar collection used in Africa, remarking that its contents were not everywhere the same, and adds that it was ascribed to Ezra, who added it to the book of the Psalms.

The Roman Ch. confines itself (apart from the NT) to seven OT. Cs., one being used each day of the week at LAUDS. This arrangement seems to be an innovation, for the Eastern Church (as Nicetas witnesses, de Psalm. bono, c. 3), the Ambrosian use, and the Churches of Gaul and Ireland (Bangor Antiphonary) employed two or three Cs. at each service. Under the influence of this custom, the Eastern Church admitted a larger number of OT passages to its collection. In the same way St. Benedict, keeping to the Roman practice for Lauds, ordered three Cs., chosen by the abbot from the prophets, to be sung at the third NOCTURN on Sundays, which led to the formation at an early date of a list of thirty-six OT passages. The Mozarabic liturgy, which employed six Cs. for the night offices, was even richer, a list of eighty-four passages (including five from the NT), which were used at different seasons, having been compiled from different MSS.

The name C. occurs in the PB (apart from its use in the Calendar to describe the Song of Solomon) once only, being correctly applied to the BENEDICTE. It would be applicable also to the MAGNIFICAT and NUNC DIMITTIS, which are, however, described by their proper names, and to the BENEDICTUS.

2. PB Use. which is loosely termed a hymn, a title correctly applied to the TE DEUM. The VENITE, Jubilate, Cantate and Deus misereatur are rightly described as Psalms.

(Cabrol, DAC, art. Cantiques; Bäumler, Geschichte des Breviers; DCA, art. Canticle.)—D2.

M. LINTON SMITH.

CANTOR.—A technical name for those chosen to chant the Verses in responsories, antiphons, graduals, proses, and litanies.—Q1.

JAMES BADEN POWELL.

CAP.—Canons 18 and 74 of 1604, whilst directing that "no man shall cover his head in the church or chapel in the time of Divine Service, except he have some infirmity, in which case let him wear a night-cap or coif (pileolo aut rica)," require as part of the outdoor habit of the clergy the wearing of "square caps" (pileis quadratis). The square C. referred to in canon 74 has undergone several modifications and developments in regard to shape; from the comely form depicted in the portraits of Bp. Fox and Abp. Cranmer (National Gallery), it was during the 17th cent. developed into the shape shown in Vandyke's portrait of Abp. Laud and in the portraits of the Caroline divines with which we are familiar. In this form the square C. was of limp unstiffened material, and it was adorned with a tuft placed on the centre of the top of the C. This Caroline shape finally became the well-known college-cap or "mortar-board" of the present day, composed of a soft skull C., fixed to a stiffened square from which depends a tassel. This present form dates from about the middle of the 18th cent., though the tuft had not then given way to the tassel. The square C. appears to have been evolved by slow degrees from the hood, which for centuries had been worn upon the head and shoulders. There is no authority whatever for discarding the English square C., as the outdoor headgear of the clergy and others, in favour of any foreign variety, such as the modern Italian biretta. (See BIRETTA, also Robinson, The Pileus Quadratus, St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. Trans. 51 ff.)—R3.

V. STALEY.

CARNIVAL.—See LENT, § 3.

CAROL.—As a substantive, the word is used of any joyful song, especially of those intended to be sung at Christmas or Easter.

1. The Name. tide. As a verb, it is used in a less special sense, of joyful and often spontaneous singing, without special reference to religious festivals. The derivation seems rather uncertain; it is difficult to trace it back further than the old French form carole. An ultimate derivation from the Greek chorus has been suggested (see the New Eng. Dict., s.v.). Until the end of the 15th cent. the idea of a ring-dance with or without vocal accompaniment was usually conveyed by the word, which seems to have acquired its special signification about 1500 or earlier, as the Privy Purse Expenses of Elizabeth of York (1502) contain an entry "for setting of a carrolle upon Christmas Day," and Wynkyn de Worde used Christmas Carolles as the title of a book in 1521. (It is worth while mentioning that the thirteen "English Carols of the Fifteenth Century," edited by the present writer in 1891, though they are really Cs., are not so called in the MS. roll from which they were taken.) In ordinary usage the name C. describes the popular hymns in celebration of the Nativity, the primary intention of which was certainly extra-ecclesiastical.

The music of the Church up to the time of the Reformation was almost entirely without marked rhythm of any kind, and the element of rhythm was confined to dances or to secular songs of very primitive construction. The single exception to the rule was the C., which combined a very distinct musical rhythm with words of a more or less definitely religious character. The rhythmic song in honour of Christmas goes back very much further than the name C. as a special term for it. The famous Prose de l'Âne which was sung at Beauvais and Sens as early as the 12th cent. (see Noël in Grove's Dict.) was connected, not with the Nativity, but with the Flight into Egypt, and was sung on the Festival of the Circumcision. A C. said to exist in a MS. of the 13th cent. is given by Joshua Sylvester in his Garland of Christmas Carols, 1861, but no clue is given to its identification further than the statement that the MS. is on a leaf in the middle of one of the MSS. in the British Museum! Of the 15th cent. Cs. already referred to, nine out of thirteen are in honour of the Blessed Virgin and in celebration of Christmas, one is in honour of St. Stephen, one in honour of St. John the Evangelist, one in celebration of the victory of Agincourt, while one, "Abyde, I hope it be the best," points a perfectly general moral. The proportion of these numbers is some slight indication of the great preponderance of Christmas Cs. over other kinds, and the French word Noël, or our own Nowell, would seem to be a more appropriate name for the whole class of compositions than the word C. which had another significance in earlier times, as has been already pointed out. The Noël was early turned into an elaborate art-form, and was employed with great skill by such men as Nanini and Marenzio in Italy, Sweelinck in the Netherlands, and our own William Byrd and Martin Peerson (whose "Upon my lap my Sovereign sits" is one of the most lovely Christmas motets in existence). But the C., strictly speaking, is far more simple and "popular" in style than most of these motets which have Noël for a refrain. The German C. In dulci jubilo, with its alternate lines of Latin and German, is a typical specimen and one of the finest. The date of the Oxford "Boar's Head C."—Caput apri deifero—is quite uncertain, but we know that it was first printed by Wynkyn de Worde in his collection of Christmas Carolles, 1521.

2. History of the Carol.

At some time between 1546 and 1552 a volume of seven Cs. was printed by Richard Kele, and in 1661 appeared New Carols for the Merry Time of Christmas. One of our most representative Cs., "God rest you merrie gentlemen," appears not to have been printed until it came out in Hone's Political Christmas Carol, about 1820. In 1822 the same writer published, in Ancient Mysteries Described, a list of 89 Cs. In the same year came out Davies Gilbert's Some Ancient Christmas Carols, and in 1833 William Sandys published an important collection of Christmas Carols, Ancient and Modern. The Rev. T. Helmore's Carols for Christmastide appeared in 1853.

Since that time many collections have been issued, as well as a crowd of newly-composed Cs., the best of which sometimes approach within measurable distance of the Cs. of the past. The necessary simplicity of the best examples of the older Cs. has attracted those composers whose technical skill is not on a level with their anxiety to obtain a popular success, and the average modern C. has few points in which it surpasses the average "ballad" of the present day. It is significant that hardly one of these modern Cs., although every Christmas season sees them turned out in great numbers, has obtained lasting or general popularity.¹—G2.

4. Modern Carols.

J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND.

CARPET.—From very early times it has been customary for the Holy Table to stand always covered with a decent C., in addition to the "fair linen cloth" spread on it for the celebration of HC. According to St. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. 50 3) this C. was sometimes of silk ornamented with gold, and a purple one at Apamea in Syria is mentioned in a letter addressed to a Council of Constantinople in 536. In one of the earliest pictures of a Holy Table now existing (a 7th cent. mosaic in the ch. of S. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna) it is entirely covered with a cloth having a symbol or design worked in front, which cannot therefore be merely the "fair linen cloth." The custom of having this C. is still the rule in both East and West, there being, we believe, no authority for the bare altars sometimes seen in Western churches. In the mediæval Eng. Ch. such Cs. were always used (except when the altars were stripped for the Good Friday services), as may be seen from MS. representations of them (e.g., the two reproduced on p. 113 of Some Principles and Services of the English PB, edited by Dr. Wickham Legg). No change was made in this respect at the Reformation (except that the stripping of the altars was discontinued), and canon 82 of 1604 orders the use of "a carpet of silk or other decent stuff." The object intended is clearly reverence for the Holy Table, and the innovation of leaving it bare, introduced into this country in recent years, disregards this, as well as the custom of the Ch. Catholic and the express orders of the Ch. of England. In the illustration mentioned above, the sides, as well as the front, of the altars are covered (so also in the mosaic at Ravenna), and this is plainly the meaning of the canon. When the covering of the front is separate from that of the sides it is commonly called a Frontal, and the narrow detached strip at the top is the Frontlet. (See DCA, art. Altar-Cloths.)—R3.

¹ Besides the Cs. mentioned above, the following may be considered as thoroughly representative of the best kind of C. in existence: "The First Nowell," "Good King Wenceslaus," "The Seven Joys of Mary" (these three are easy Cs.); "In dulci jubilo" (arranged by R. L. de Pearall), and Sweelinck's "Hodie Christus natus est" (these two are suitable for more elaborately trained choirs; both are provided with English words).

J. W. TYRER.

CARPETING.—C was introduced into Europe from the East, where it is used rather for sitting than for walking upon, hence the pile surface of the Turkish, Persian and Indian varieties. These are, however, much more durable than the European kinds, although the latter were invented especially for foot-wear. The best of all C. for wear, next to the Eastern, is the Axminster, made on the same principle as the Turkish, and cheaper (chenille for weft, the projecting threads forming the pile). A still cheaper substitute for C. is felt or matting. C. may be laid in the SACRARIUM; a strip should be placed in front of the rails for the use of communicants, two mats where the assistants kneel in the Sacrarium, and a long strip on the altar-step where the celebrant stands. Wherever, or for whatever purpose, C. is employed, two things should be borne in mind: (a) it should be chosen carefully and under good advice, so that its colouring may be in harmony with the surroundings (tiles, walls, furniture, curtains, etc.); (b) although it may to a certain extent neutralise the chilliness of stone or tiles, it always has the effect of deadening the sound of the voice of him who stands on it, as curtains lessen the resonance of a building. For this reason C. should not be laid in the pulpit, nor before the lectern.—R4.

G. VALE OWEN.

CASSOCK.—The ordinary under-robe worn by the Clergy, and generally used as an outdoor dress by the Clergy of the Church of England until the beginning of the 19th century. It is a long robe reaching to the ankle, with an upright collar, and in this country is usually made of black cloth. The English form of C. is double-breasted without buttons save at the shoulder, and is kept in position by a band, leathern-belt, or girdle. In the Church of Rome the colour of the C. varies according to the dignity of the wearer, and in the Church of England the bishops occasionally wear Cs. of purple. As an outdoor dress it generally fell into disuse in the 19th cent., although it still survives in the "bishop's apron," really a short C., and the present clerical coat is merely a C. with the skirts shortened. The 74th canon of 1604 required that the benefited clergy should not go out in public "in their doublet and hose without coats or Cassocks."

The C. is in no sense a purely Romish garb. Indeed the Roman clergy in this country are forbidden by English law to wear the C. in the street; this not from any antipathy to the C. but to prevent them from being mistaken for the clergy of the Church of England.

The use of the C. is not confined to the clergy, but is permitted by custom to choristers, ministers at the altar, and others.—R3.

J. O. COOP.

☞ CASUIST.—See DISCRETE AND LEARNED MINISTER.

CASUISTRY.—C. may be defined as the systematic and methodical application of general ethical principles to particular cases of conduct.

Hence it is in itself an entirely neutral term, inviting neither blame nor commendation. The deserts of any given system must be determined according to the truth or falsity of the principles on which it rests, and the trustworthiness or disingenuousness of the method of their application.

The dangerous corruptions to which C. is liable may be illustrated from the rebukes administered by our Lord to the Scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 23 23). These blind guides exhibited an anxious scrupulosity about trifles, combined with a dull insensibility to the true spirit of the law which they professed to teach (Mark 7 8-13). The Christian Church from the first repudiated the accumulated mass of burdensome tradition. But that the fault lay not with C. in itself but with its perversion and abuse is evident. Of all the Apostles St. Paul was the most vehement opponent of the old system. Yet it is he who in his answers to the questions of the Church at Corinth gives the clearest biblical example of a true C. purified and ennobled by the spirit of the new faith (1 Cor. chap. 7 ff.). To the case of marriage under certain circumstances and to the case of participation in meats offered to idols he applies the general principles of loyalty to Christ and of obedience to the law of charity. In the writings of the Christian Fathers appear many similar attempts to discover the right line of Christian conduct in special cases. But though treatises were written with reference to specific Christian obligations and the proper method of their observance in detail, as, e.g., by Tertullian, Cyprian and Ambrose, yet many centuries passed before anything like a system of Christian C. came into existence. The impulse towards the formation of a methodical arrangement of rules of Christian behaviour was given by the gradual development of the penitential discipline of the Church. In order that a certain degree of regularity might be secured in the imposition of penances, the decrees of synods and ecclesiastical authorities on these matters began to be collected and codified. Of this process the result is seen in such a work as the Penitential bearing the name of Archbishop Theodore, which fixes the length and severity of the penances suitable for various classes of sins (cp. Haddan & Stubbs, Councils and Eccles. Documents, vol. 3). The effort after exact arrangement by which scholastic philosophy set such store contributed during the Middle Ages to the development of C., and a further stage of the process was reached when definite collections of cases of conscience began to be compiled. About the year 1235 Raymund of Pennaforte produced a book, Summa de Paenitentia et Matrimonio, intended to assist the priest in the Confessional. The example thus set was widely followed. Works of a similar character or commentaries on the same became common, and continued to be issued up to the time of the Reformation.

That great upheaval affected the development of C. both within and without the Roman Communion. The Jesuits, in their task of inspiring and directing the movement of the Counter-Reformation, adopted as one of their most effective instruments the exercise of influence through the confessional. A sinister result ensued. In too many cases the Jesuit, thinking to make things easy for the penitent, admitted into his practice as confessor a lamentable laxity. C. became in part degraded into the art of juggling with the moral sense and of providing by means of convenient excuses a licence for self-indulgence and a way of escape from the reproaches of conscience. Thus the very foundations of morality were undermined. No wonder that the whole system became the object of the righteous indignation of the moralist and the butt of the satirist. Often as the theme has been handled, it has never been treated with greater warmth of indignant contempt or with more caustic wit than by Pascal in the Provincial Letters. That work is the classical exposure of the dishonesty and hypocrisy of spurious Casuistry.

In the countries which adopted the Reformation eager partisans were influenced by a violent reaction against C. as a whole (cp. Calvin's Institutes 4 10). The Church of England however, in this matter as in others, seems to have desired to pursue a middle course. It is clearly in accordance with her mind, as expressed in the language of the PB, that her members, if they find themselves perplexed in conscience, may appeal to their parish priest for expert advice. When giving warning for the Celebration of HC the minister is required to invite anyone who cannot quiet his own conscience to come to him "or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution together with ghostly counsel and advice." With the invitation to Conf. we are not here concerned; but we may be sure that the man who thus in virtue of his office proffers advice is under the strictest obligation to fit himself for the difficult task of giving it. That the duty was recognised at any rate in some quarters there is evidence to show. One of the earliest writers on C. after the breach with Rome was the Cambridge Professor, William Perkins (1558-1602), a Puritan divine, who in Fuller's words "first humbled the towering speculations of philosophers into practice and morality." George Herbert declares a knowledge of C. to be one of the necessary accomplishments of his Country Parson: "He greatly esteems also of cases of conscience wherein he is much versed" (Priest to the Temple 5). Spiritual counsel is of little use unless it can be shown to be deduced from the first principles of the Christian life, and be accurately and closely adapted to the circumstances of the consultant. In order that it may be so the adviser must be equipped not only with adequate knowledge but also with the skill to use it. Tact, sympathy and spirituality of mind count for far more than mere acquaintance with theory and precedent.

The Church of England indicates the nature of the help to be given by insisting that it shall be counsel and advice rather than absolute direction. This point is of great importance. It is not the function of the minister, however proficient in C., to relieve the man with an unquiet conscience from the necessity of himself coming to a decision. To weaken the sense of individual responsibility in any way would be to hinder rather than to promote the spiritual development of the consultant. C., as it is sanctioned by the Church of England, is not the art of providing a ready-made answer to any difficulty of conscience, but the acquired skill to remove obscurities and perplexities and thus to set the moral issue in its naked clearness before a mind hitherto confused and distressed.

It is questionable whether books of C. can afford the conscience much help in the delicate task of discriminating between right and wrong. Hesitation as to the practical value of the discussion on paper of more or less imaginary cases will account for the scanty production of books of this kind by members of the Church of England. Among the works specifically devoted to the consideration of cases of conscience the following deserve mention: William Perkins, Whole Treatise of the Cases of Conscience, 1606; William Ames, De Conscientia, ejus Jure et Casibus, 1632; Bp. Hall, Resolutions and Decisions of Diverse Practical Cases of Conscience, 1649; Bp. Jeremy Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, 1660; R. Baxter, A Christian Directory or a Sum of Practical Theology and Cases of Conscience, 1675. Of these books the most influential has probably been that of Bp. Jeremy Taylor. His preface contains certain observations which serve admirably to illustrate the peculiar character of Anglican C., in particular its reluctance to cite mere external authority such as decisions of doctors or even decrees of councils and synods, its endeavour to find Biblical ground for its conclusions, and its confident appeal to right reason. Literature of this kind has, however, fallen out of fashion. The practical bearing of the Christian religion upon conduct is now considered in treatises on Christian Ethics in general rather than illustrated by means of investigation into particular cases. The new method has advantages over the old. For in Ethics principles can be more thoroughly handled and their mutual connections more systematically set forth. Nevertheless, since principles apart from their application remain

2. Degradation of Casuistry

5. The Church of England View of Casuistry.

4. History of Casuistry in the Church of England.

6. Works on Casuistry and Modern Ideas.

barren and unfruitful, there is truth in the assertion that "C. is the goal of Ethics."—pe.
G. C. JOYCE.

CATECHISING.—Catechising is instruction by means of question and answer; and is usually confined to such instruction in the principles of the Christian religion.

1. History of Catechising. Among the Jews it was regularly practised, and is enjoined by such passages as Deut. 6 7. A person was appointed for this purpose in every town, and at the age of thirteen children were brought to the Temple and publicly examined. It may have been with the intention of fulfilling this custom that our Lord presented himself to the doctors in the Temple, as narrated by St. Luke (Luke 2 46). It was only natural that C. should pass from the Jewish into the Christian Church. We find the word κατηχησις used several times in the NT (Luke 1 4, Rom. 2 18, Gal. 6 6, etc.). In the Primitive Church an officer was appointed in each place to instruct the Catechumens. (See CATECHUMEN and CATECHIST.)

Though C. was enjoined in mediæval times, e.g., in the Sarum Manual: "Si infans sit, compatribus et commatribus injungatur ut doceant infantem Pater Noster et Ave Maria et Credo in Deum, vel doceri faciant"; yet this injunction seems to have been widely neglected, and great ignorance of even the simplest truths of the Christian religion was widely prevalent. The Injunctions of 1536 and 1538 enjoined upon the clergy to see that the young of their parishes were taught to say the Credo, the Pater Noster and the Ten Commandments in English, and in their sermons they were to recite the same little by little till the whole was learned.

In the PB of 1549 the CATECHISM was inserted, and the following rubric marks a decided advance in the duty of C.: "The curate of every parish once in six weeks at the least, upon warning by him given, shall upon some Sunday or holy day, half an hour before Evensong, openly in the church instruct and examine so many children of his parish sent unto him as the time will serve, and as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism. And all fathers, mothers, masters and dames, shall cause their children, servants and prentices (which are not yet confirmed) to come to the church at the day appointed, and obediently hear and be ordered by the curate, until such time as they have learned all that is here appointed for them to learn." This rubric, with some verbal alterations, still remains in our present PB, except that the C. is now ordered to take place after the second Lesson at EP every Sunday and holy-day. Canon 59 is to the same effect.

In the latter part of the 17th cent. the Bps. made great efforts to revive the practice of C., which during the troublous times of the Civil War had fallen into disuse. Burnet, Tenison, Ken, Beveridge and Patrick, among others, insisted upon this duty. But there was great difficulty in carrying it out, partly on account of the popular taste of many for sermons rather than for C., and partly on account of the lukewarmness of parents who would not trouble to send their children. "As to Catechising," writes Bishop Stillingfleet, "it would be very well to have a warm injunction about it: but what if people will not send their children?" But, as we get further from the date of the Restoration, a distinct improvement is manifest. In 1704 Bp. Beveridge, writing to the clergy of St. Asaph to urge C., adds, "Not as if I thought this duty had been neglected among you: for I have heard to my great comfort that it is generally practised throughout the diocese every Lord's Day." Samuel Wesley required his curate to catechise every Sunday as a matter of course, and C. in Lent became a common custom (see Abbey and Overton, Life in the English Church, 1660-1704). In the 18th cent. the practice fell into general disuse, notwithstanding the efforts of individuals here and there to preserve it. The plurality of livings which had now become common was a fruitful cause of this neglect. Mention, however, should be made of the work of Bishop Wilson, who succeeded in making C. a recognised practice in the Isle of Man, and himself compiled the Manx Catechism. The spread of Sunday Schools also tended to discourage C., as it was felt that the children received religious instruction through their means. In the latter half of the 19th cent. there was a distinct revival of C., though many clergy prefer a children's service with short address. (For the introduction of what is known as the method of St. Sulpice, see CATECHISM, THE SYSTEM.)

Though the altered circumstances of our day make it difficult, if not impossible, to carry out the rubric and canon literally, yet

3. Catechising a Duty. there surely should be a loyal endeavour to comply with their spirit and see that the children of the Church are duly instructed in the truths of our holy religion. Some points may be briefly noted. (i) The instruction should be catechetical. A sermon or address has its value, but it is not such a valuable mode of instruction as Catechising. There can be no true teaching without co-operation between teacher and scholar. (ii) The catechist should, preferably, be one of the parish clergy. The value of personal contact can hardly be exaggerated. (iii) There is no place so good as the church. The atmosphere helps to raise the C. to a high level.

To put the questions in the Church Cat. and to hear the answers correctly given does not satisfy the idea of Catechising. The

4. Method of Catechising. Catechist should take a small part of the Cat. and put searching questions upon it from different points of view, till he is satisfied that the children have thoroughly grasped its meaning. A few hints upon these questions may not be out of place. (i) The question should be perfectly clear. There should be no doubt as to its meaning. (ii) It should be terse and not accompanied by unnecessary additions (e.g., "Can anyone tell me?"). (iii) It should not merely demand the answer yes or no, as children can generally deduce from the tone of the questioner's voice which of these he requires. (iv) Questions should follow each other in logical sequence, each answer suggesting naturally the next question (e.g., the questions on the Sacraments in the Church Cat.).

¹ Hastings Rashdall, Theory of Good and Evil 2 418.

Only a certain number of children—and they of about the same age—should be catechised each Sunday. It is impossible to deal effectively with too large a number. The children should not be allowed to answer all together but individually.

Lastly, a hope may be expressed that the clergy themselves should obtain some instruction in the art of questioning and class management, without which they can hardly hope to carry on this important work efficiently.—K6.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

CATECHISM, REVISION OF THE.—Though not expressly named in the Royal Letters of Business, the Catechism cannot be left out in a comprehensive treatment of PB Revision. In the art.

1. The Catechism.

CATECHISM (THE CHURCH) its doctrinal and ethical value is sufficiently indicated. It is not, therefore, for correction of erroneous doctrine or faulty morals that revision is here recommended, but in the interests of its practical use. At present, partly from inherent defects, and partly from the altered usage of language since it was made, the Catechism is found in practice to be seriously inadequate for modern needs. It is not satisfactory either as an educational instrument, or as a means of spiritual enlightenment and training. It is neither as clear, as simple, or as edifying, as it ought to be. While the Ch. had her children under her exclusive charge, and competitive schools and subjects had not to be considered, the need for revision might be put on one side. But every year an improved educational method is transforming more and more completely all branches of instruction, and the teaching of distinctive religious formularies is being increasingly left to lay and clerical workers, untrained in the art of teaching. At this juncture, therefore, it is urgently necessary that Ch. pastors and teachers shall no longer be hindered, in communicating to the young a knowledge of the "things which a Christian should know and believe to his soul's health," by any unnecessary defectiveness of form in the authorised summary of fundamentals. As it is, the Ch. Catechism is blocked in use with what to children and uneducated persons, are grave grammatical obscurities; several portions of it are long aggregates of slenderly connected clauses which overtax both intelligence and memory; and the phrasing is often too technical to be edifying.

The difficulties in the way of religious thought and practice are so inevitably serious, that it is most important to make the mere mental part of the study of religion as little of a barrier as possible, so that all the powers of the soul may be free to grapple with the real issues. Other pieces of Tudor prose could be readily found, on which the sharper children might practise their wits. A Catechism to be learnt by every child should contain no single obscurity or ambiguity due to the forms of expression. It must in no part be merely childish, for it is to be the enduring foundation of the whole life and character. But its wording should be so simple and clear that none of it should be mere words to any average thoughtful child. All of it should already help the child, and so lodge in his mind as true and good, that he may, as he grows, fit into this mould all after-discoveries of truth and goodness.

The clergy do not find it easy to be fair judges in this matter. Their own educational advantages, their special theological training, their long familiarity with the wording, and their deep love of the truths and principles so admirably set forth in the Ch. Catechism, all conspire to blind them to the oftentimes faulty structure and phrasing which hinder it from helping others. Let them, however, take the opinion of their Sunday School teachers, or recall the feeling of almost despair that must sometimes have beset them on fathoming the ignorance and misunderstanding of the duller candidates for Confirmation, let them try to estimate what proportion of the time, spent by themselves or skilled teachers over the Catechism-lessons in the Day School or elsewhere, was really occupied with religion, and how much with English vocabulary and grammar, explaining obscure connections, supplying gaps, and analysing paragraphs—and they will perhaps extend a measure of indulgence to an attempt which is likely to seem sacrilegious to some and Quixotic to others.¹

The arrangement here printed is put forward purely as a crystallisation of the suggestions and criticisms of many, and as illustrating the kind of changes that need making, and the ways in which the alterations may be effected. A few refs. are added to the PB sources from which some of the new words are derived, but the alterations will for the most part explain themselves. The text has been printed in full, so that the amount and effect of changes suggested may be clearly perceived, but, in order not to over-encumber it, refs. have not been added to the voluminous literature out of which the various alterations have been consciously or unconsciously drawn. Even if revision be delayed, the form given below may be found suggestive for unofficial use. The bulk of the formulary is slightly increased, but it is believed that the breaking up of the longer answers, the omission of certain clauses, and the fuller linking of question and answer will more than make up to learners for the added length. Much care has been taken in regard to the general teaching in Part I (which should be the foundation of the whole), to bring out the intimate and vital connection of it all with the learners' baptism as an epoch-marking religious event, and to bring home the real religious meaning and value in the present of the Sacrament of regeneration. It is inevitable that some of the alterations must at first seem to be wanton changes of sense or wording, and some to be destructive of the rhythm. But no change has been made without long consideration, and the reasons will on second thought perhaps gather weight, while the effect upon the rhythm may be usefully tested by taking the judgment of someone unfamiliar with the Ch. Catechism. It should, moreover, be recollected that the imaginary jury, by reference to whose verdict a Cat. must be tested, is not the small minority of highly educated people who love the form they know, and even enjoy the intellectual exercise of explaining it.

¹ The writer is encouraged by remembering the kindly approval which Bp. Stubbs of Oxford expressed of an earlier attempt of his to make the Catechism more simple and edifying.

but the coming generation of children whose secular curriculum is making heavier demands on time each year, and the untrained average parents and teachers who want something which, instead of needing continuous skilled explanation, shall explain itself, and which, instead of being badly and reluctantly learnt by rote, shall be well and easily recited because its meaning and value are clear.

A Catechism, that is to say, An instruction in the principal things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health,¹ to be learned by every person before he be brought to the Bp. to be confirmed by him.

Part I.—THE GENERAL TEACHING: Our Christian Calling.

Q. 1. What is your Christian Name?—A. (Each should give his full Christian Name.)

Q. 2. Who gave you this Name?—A. My Godparents named me at my Baptism.

Q. 3. What did God call you in your Baptism to be?—A. In my Baptism I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and a partaker of the Kingdom of heaven.

Q. 4. What did your Godparents do for you at your Baptism?—A. They promised three things in my name.

Q. 5. What was the first thing you promised by them?—A. They promised, first, that I should renounce the devil, with all hatred, pride, and deceit; the vainglory and greed of the godless world; and all the sinful desires of the flesh.

Q. 6. What does this promise of renunciation (or renouncing) mean?—A. It means that I must refuse to follow or be led by the devil, the world, and the flesh,² and must fight manfully against³ all that is evil.

Q. 7. What was the second thing you promised by your Godparents?—A. They promised, secondly, that I should believe all the Articles of the Christian Faith.

Q. 8. What does this promise of Faith mean?—A. It means that I should believe in the great and good God as my Father, my Saviour, and my Guide.⁴

Q. 9. What was the third thing you promised by your Godparents?—A. They promised, thirdly, that I should obey God's holy commandments, and walk in his ways every day of my life.

Q. 10. What does this promise of Obedience mean?

¹ Cp. Exh.⁴ in Bapt.¹

² The inclusive term avoids the awkwardness in the PB text as said either by a boy or girl.

³ Cp. "Name this child" in Bapt.¹

⁴ Cp. A. 13 below.

⁵ Cp. last Pr. in Bapt.¹

⁶ Cp. A. 35 below.

⁷ Two pitfalls are avoided by adopting the very words of the first question to Sponsors: (1) the fallacy that "renounce" means to "give up," whereas innocent children from good homes cannot without unreality or over-subtlety profess to "give up" evil that they have never made their own; (2) the ambiguity arising from the alternative meanings, good or bad, of "world" and "flesh." The Christian does not without qualification "fight against" world or flesh, and he cannot strictly "give up" either. He must live in the world, and his spirit must act through the flesh all his life. But he must not let either world or flesh dictate to spirit or usurp God's throne. He must refuse to be led by the world, but he must seek to leaven and convert it. He must control the flesh as an indispensable servant, not erect it into a bad master.

⁸ Cp. words of Reception in Bapt.¹

⁹ Cp. v. 12 of Veni Creator in Ord.³, and for 'great and good God' cp. Bp. Ken's Exposition.

—A. It means that I must always do what is right in the sight of God.¹⁰

Q. 11. Do you not think that you ought to believe and do as you promised by your Godparents?—A. Yes, verily.

Q. 12. Are you ready so to do?—A. By God's help I will believe and do, as they have promised for me.

Q. 13. What is the state of God's faithful and obedient children?—A. They are safe under his care and guidance, and I heartily thank our heavenly Father that he hath called me to this state of salvation through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Q. 14. How do you hope to continue in this state?—A. I pray unto God to give me his grace, that I may continue in the same safe and happy state unto my life's end.

Part II.—THE CREED: Our Belief.

Q. 15. Can you repeat the Articles of your Belief?—A.

I BELIEVE in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth: 1

AND in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, 2
Who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, Born of the Virgin Mary, 3
Suffered under Pontius Pilate, Was crucified, dead, and buried, 4
He went down¹¹ into the world below; The third day he rose again from the dead, 5
He ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; 6
From thence he shall come, to judge the living and the dead. 7

I BELIEVE in the Holy Ghost; 8
The holy Catholick Church; The Communion of Saints; 9
The Forgiveness of sins; 10
The Resurrection of the Body; 11
And the Life everlasting. Amen. 12

Q. 16. Can you tell me shortly what you mean when you say this Creed?—A. I mean that I believe in One God,¹³ the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in whose Name I was baptised.¹⁴

Q. 17. Can you now tell me more fully what you learn in these Articles of your Belief?—A. First, I learn to believe in the Almighty and Merciful Father, who has made me and all the world; Secondly, in the Everlasting Son of the Father,¹⁵

¹⁰ Cp. 3rd Coll. at MP.

¹¹ The text is oddly inconsistent, fluctuating between "you" and "thou." It would appear desirable to keep the more familiar and intelligible "you" throughout.

¹² Cp. Creed in Bapt.¹

¹³ A term which is uncoloured by narrowing or incongruous associations, and which at the same time sufficiently explains itself. It is adopted in the RV of the Ath. Cr.

¹⁴ "At" is the clearest word, and so should be substituted for "on" in MP. In any case both forms should agree.

¹⁵ Cp. Nicene Creed. The risk of tritheistic error is not slight, with the present text.

¹⁶ Cp. A. 3. It seems very needful that the relation of the Creed and the promise of Faith to the Baptismal formula should be explicitly taught at this point.

¹⁷ Cp. Gen. Conf. and many other prs. It seems desirable to substitute for terms, which, without Trinitarian definitions unsuitable at this stage, are apt to leave in the mind an indelible impression of tritheism, other terms, richer and more helpful in suggestion, and associating the Cat. with the devotional atmosphere of worship.

¹⁸ Cp. Te Deum.

who has redeemed me and all mankind; Thirdly, in the ¹⁹Holy Ghost the Comforter, ¹⁹who sanctifies me, and ¹⁹all God's faithful people. ¹⁹

Part III.—THE TEN COMMANDMENTS: Our Duty.

Q. 18. You said that your Godparents promised for you, that you should obey God's commandments. How many are they?—A. Ten.

Q. 19. What do you chiefly learn from the first our commandments?—A. I learn my duty towards God.

Q. 20. Can you repeat them in order, with the points of duty which they teach?—A.

I. Thou shalt have none other gods but me.

My first duty is to believe in God, to fear him, and to love him, with all my heart, with all my mind, with all my soul, and with all my strength.

II. Thou shalt not make to thyself any image or outward form, to worship or to trust in it.²⁰

My second duty is to worship God with body and soul, to give him thanks and praise, to put my whole trust in him, and to call upon him in prayer.

III. Thou shalt not take the Name of God in vain.²⁰

My third duty is to honour God's holy Name and his Word, and to order myself reverently in his House.

IV. Remember that thou keep holy the Lord's Day. Six days shalt thou labour and do all that thou hast to do.²⁰

My fourth duty is to serve God truly all the days of my life.

Q. 21. What dost thou chiefly learn from the other six Commandments?—A. I learn that my duty towards my neighbour is to love him as myself, and to do to all men as I would they should do unto me.

Q. 22. Can you repeat the last six Commandments in order, with the duties which they teach, beginning with the fifth?—A.

V. Honour thy father and thy mother.

My fifth duty is to love, honour, and help my father and mother, as long as they live; To honour and obey the King, and his laws and officers; To submit myself to my pastors and teachers, and all who are set in authority over me; And to order myself modestly and respectfully to all my elders and betters.

VI. Thou shalt do no murder.

My sixth duty is to hurt nobody by word or deed, and to bear no malice or hatred in my heart.

VII. Thou shalt not commit adultery.

My seventh duty is to control the desires of the body, to guard against immodest behaviour, and to live a pure and temperate life.

VIII. Thou shalt not steal.

My eighth duty is to be true and just in all my dealings, and to keep my hands from picking and stealing.

IX. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

My ninth duty is to tell the truth at all times, and to keep my tongue from evil speaking, lying, and slandering.

X. Thou shalt not covet.²⁰

My tenth duty is, not to covet other men's goods, but to learn and labour truly to get my own living, and to do my duty in that state of life, unto which it shall please God to call me.

Q. 23. Can you tell me your whole duty in a single word?—A. My whole duty is love, for, if I really love God and my neighbour, I shall keep all the commandments.

Part IV.—THE LORD'S PRAYER: Our Prayer.

Q. 24. My good child, know this, that you are not able to do these things of yourself, nor to walk in the Commandments of God, and to serve him, without his special grace within you; which you must learn at all times to call for by diligent prayer. Will you, therefore, let me hear if you can say the Lord's Prayer?—A.

Our Father, which art in heaven,

Hallowed be thy Name,

Thy Kingdom come,

Thy will be done,

In earth ²¹even as²¹ in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our trespasses,

As we forgive them that trespass against us;

And lead us not into temptation;

But deliver us from evil. Amen.

Q. 25. To whom are you speaking in this Prayer?—A. I am speaking to my Lord God our heavenly Father, who is the giver of all that is good.

Q. 26. What do you ask in the first three petitions?—A. I ask God to send his grace unto me, and to all people, that we may worship him, serve him, and obey him, as we ought to do.

Q. 27. What do you ask in the last part of the Lord's Prayer?—A. I ask God to send us all things needful for our souls and bodies; to be merciful unto us, and forgive us our sins; to save us in all dangers to soul or body; and to keep us from all sin and wickedness.²²

Q. 28. Why do you say, Amen, at the end of the Prayer?—A. I say, Amen, So be it, because I trust God will do what I ask, of his mercy and goodness, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Part V.—THE TWO SACRAMENTS OF THE GOSPEL: Our Helps.

God." But, if it be thought undesirable so to vary the wording of the commandment, the 4th duty might include "to honour the Lord's Day." It is worth considering whether to the 7th Commandment there might not be added from the 10th, and in harmony with Matt. 5, "neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour's wife." For the shortening of the tenth, see Rom. 13 9.

²¹ Cp. Revision of PB.

²² The two clauses of the text omitted here make the explanation of the last petition out of proportion with the rest, and overweight the whole A.

¹⁹ Cp. Post-Com.³ in HC.

²⁰ The modifications of form suggested in the text of the Dialogue for recitation simply apply the methods of selection and alternations rendering so largely utilised throughout the PB, and the clauses omitted are just those which are already passed over in the explanations of Duty. It is not generally known that the Cat. in the First PB of 1549 contained the X Coms. in an abridged form (see RITUAL, § 42, ¶3). The substitution of "Lord's Day" for "Sabbath" is purely selective, and involves no change: "the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy

Q. 29. How many Sacraments hath Christ appointed in his Church?—A. Two only, as ²³needed by all for their souls' health,²³ that is to say, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion.

Q. 30. What do you ²⁴find in each of these Sacraments?—A. I ²⁴find an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace, appointed by Christ himself, as a ²⁵pledge to assure us of the gift of that grace, and a means by which we receive it.

Q. 31. How many parts are there in a Sacrament?—A. Two; the outward visible sign, and the inward spiritual grace.

Q. 32. What is the outward visible sign, or form, in Baptism?—A. Baptising in Water In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Q. 33. What is the inward and spiritual grace?—A. A death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness: for being by nature born in sin, we are, in our Baptism, made by grace the children of God.²⁶

Q. 34. What is required from those who are to be baptised?—A. Repentance, whereby they forsake sin; and Faith, whereby they stedfastly believe in the love of God, declared by his Son Jesus Christ.

Q. 35. Why then are Infants baptised, when by reason of their tender age they cannot repent and believe?—A. Because by their Godparents they promise both to ²⁷renounce sin, and to believe in God and serve him²⁷; and this promise they ought to perform when they come to a proper age.

Q. 36. Why was the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper appointed?—A. For the continual remembrance of Christ's sacrifice upon the cross, and of the good which we receive by our union with him.²⁸

Q. 37. What is the outward part or sign of the Lord's Supper?—A. The receiving of Bread and Wine, as the Lord hath commanded.

Q. 38. What is the inward part, or thing signified?—A. The Body and Blood of Christ, which are verily taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper.

Q. 39. What good do we receive by this Sacrament?—A. The strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of Christ, as our bodies are strengthened and refreshed by the Bread and Wine.

Q. 40. What is required from those who come to the Lord's Supper?—A. To examine themselves, whether they (1) truly repent of their former sins,

²³ Unequivocal words, adapted from the sentence in Exh.⁴ of Bapt.¹ which defines the duty of Sponsors as being "chiefly (that they) shall provide that (the child) may learn (a) the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and (b) all other things" (interpreted in the Catechism as at least prominently including knowledge about the Sacraments) "which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health."

²⁴ This alteration makes the A. slightly more concrete in form, and also removes the ambiguity from the use of Sacrament in this A. for the sign as distinct from the grace, and in the next for the whole ordinance (see SACRAMENT, § 7). The rest of the A. is simply rearranged so as more effectively to bring out the meaning, which is further safeguarded by the next Q. and A.

²⁵ Note that the order, "sign—pledge—means," is needed to bring out the progress, from thought (aroused by the sign), through faith (quickened or produced by the pledge), to sacramental reception (made possible by the means).

²⁶ The difficult Hebraisms "children of wrath" and "children of grace" are replaced by a form of wording which (a) brings out better the contrast between nature and grace, and (b) is more easily related to A. 3 above.

²⁷ Cp. Exh.⁴ in Bapt.¹

²⁸ The A. is slightly modified in order to remove the awkwardness of the thrice repeated "of" in the first clause, and to make the whole clearer and more edifying. The wording of the PB rather suggests gains from a transaction than the joy and strength derived from that personal fellowship, which is of the very essence of the Sacrament (see LORD'S SUPPER, § 2).

(2) have a living faith in God's mercy through Christ, with a thankful remembrance of his death; and (3) stedfastly purpose to lead a new life in charity with all men.²⁹—B1, K. G. HARFORD.

CATECHISM, THE CHURCH.—No form of Cat. had been in use in the English Ch. before the

1. Preamble. Reformation, but several expositions of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments had been put forth (Maskell's Mon. Rit., vol. 2, p. xlv ff.). "Hath not the commandments of Almighty God, the articles of the Christian Faith and the Lorde's Prayer been ever necessarily, since Christe's tyme, requyred of all both yonge and olde that professed Christe's name, yea though they were not learned to read" (Cranmer's Catechism, Ep. to the Kyng). Hence it is that we have still remaining in MS. so many short expositions in English of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, of which one of the most famous was written by Thoresby, Abp. of York, about 1370. Abp. T. Peckham, in his Constitutions at Lambeth, orders every parish Priest in his province to expound once every year to the people in the vulgar tongue the fourteen Arts. of the faith, the Ten Commandments, the two precepts of the Gospel, etc.

A Synodal statute of the diocese of Norwich, A.D. 1257, enjoins "all rectors and parish priests to teach the children of their people the Lord's Prayer and the Creed." The same is commanded to be taught by all parish priests to the laity in the last canon in the Synod of Exeter, 1257.

Marshall's Prymer, of which the earliest extant edition is 1534, though probably it was written before that date, contains a treatise, together with hymns, prayers, etc., and a dialogue wherein the child, asked certain questions, answereth to the same, beginning thus:—The Question—Speak, my dear child, what art thou? The Ans.—As concerning my first birth I am a creature of God, indued with wit and reason, the son of Adam; and as touching my new and second birth I knowledge myself to be a Christian.

The questions then deal with Baptism, the Creed and the Commandments.

The Institution of a Christian Man, drawn up in 1537 by a Committee of Bps., etc., appointed by the King, but not published by royal authority, is generally known as the Bishops' Book. It contained, among other things, expositions of the Creed, Commandments and Lord's Prayer, incorporating them from Marshall's Prymer. Notes and corrections to this, made between King Henry and Cranmer, led in 1543 to A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, called the King's Book. This was deliberated on in Convocation and assented to and approved by Parliament. The King's Preface ordered its use, and it was never repealed.

²⁹ The numbering and rearranging of the clauses is to relate this answer to the "three things" promised at Baptism (Q 4—Q. 10), and, in a slighter degree, to the short Exh., "ye that do truly." "Repent" is properly substituted here for "renounce," since it is the need for repenting of actual past sins that is to be urged, not the renunciation of possible future sins, which is sufficiently included in the positive closing resolve (3).

These three books, Marshall's Prymer and the Bishop's and King's Books, provided matter for the Ch. Cat.; and the Cat. in the 2. History.

First PB of Edward VI presented in a succinct form the truths contained in these expositions (see further, DOCTRINE); it formed part of the Confirmation Service, and went no further than the explanation of the Lord's Prayer. There are a few verbal differences between this Cat. and that in our present PB: but in the main they are the same (see RITUAL, Synopsis of PBs, § 42).

In 1604, the latter part dealing with the Sacraments was added. In 1662, two passages were altered as follows:—

(1604) "Water: wherein the person baptised is dipped or sprinkled with it. In the Name," etc. (1662) "Water: wherein the person is baptised in the Name," etc. (1604) "Yes: they do perform them by their Sureties who promise and vow them both in their names: which, when they come to age, themselves are bound to perform." (1662) "Because they promise them both by their sureties: which promise when they come to age, themselves are bound to perform."

In the proposed but abortive revision of 1689 it was suggested that the following questions and answers should be inserted after the Creed:

Q. What do you learn further in this Creed?
A. I learn that Christ hath had, still hath, and ever will have a Church somewhere on earth.

Q. What are you there taught concerning this Church?
A. I am taught that it is Catholic and universal, as it receives into it all nations upon the profession of the Christian faith in Baptism.

Q. What privileges belong to Christians by their being received into this Catholic Church?
A. First, the communion of saints, or fellowship of all true Christians in faith, hope and charity: Secondly, the forgiveness of sins, obtained by the sacrifice of Christ's death, and given to us upon faith in him and repentance from dead works: Thirdly, the rising again of our bodies at the last day to a state of glory: Fourthly, everlasting life with our Saviour in the Kingdom of heaven."

Some changes were also proposed in the arrangement of the Cat., and to the explanation of the 4th Commandment was to be added, "especially on Lord's Days."

In 1887 the following additions were approved by the Lower House of Convocation.

Q. What meanest thou by the Church?
A. I mean the Body of which Jesus Christ is the Head and of which I was made a member in my Baptism.

Q. How is the Church described in the Creeds?
A. It is described as One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic.

Q. What meanest thou by each of these words?
A. I mean that the Church is One, as being one Body under the One Head: Holy, because the Holy Spirit dwells in it and sanctifies its members: Catholic, because it is for all nations and all times: Apostolic, because it continues steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship.

Q. We learn from Holy Scripture that in the Church the evil are mingled with the good: Will it always be so? A. No: when our Lord comes again, He will cast the evil out of His Kingdom: will make his faithful servants perfect both in body and soul: and will present his whole Church to Himself without spot and blameless.

Q. What is the office and work of the Church on earth?
A. The office and work of the Church on earth is to maintain and teach everywhere the true Faith of Christ, and to be his instrument for conveying grace to men, by the power of the Holy Ghost.

Q. How did our Lord provide for the government and continuance of the Church?
A. He gave authority to his Apostles to rule the Church: to minister his Word and Sacraments: and to ordain faithful men for the continuance of this Ministry until his coming again.

Q. What orders of Ministers have there been in the Church from the Apostles' time?
A. Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.

Q. What is the office of a Bishop?
A. The office of a Bishop is to be a chief Pastor and Ruler of the Church: to confer Holy Orders: to administer Confirmation: and to take the chief part in the ministry of the Word and Sacraments.

Q. What is the office of a Priest?
A. The office of a Priest is to preach the word of God: to baptise: to celebrate the Holy Communion: to pronounce Absolution and Blessing in God's Name: and to feed the flock committed by the Bishop to his charge.

Q. What is the office of a Deacon?
A. The office of a Deacon is to assist the Priest in Divine Service, and specially at the Holy Communion: to baptise infants in the absence of the Priest: to catechize: to preach, if authorised by the Bishop: and to search for the sick and the poor.

Q. What is required of members of the Church?
A. To endeavour by God's help to fulfil their baptismal vows: to make full use of the means of Grace: to remain steadfast in the communion of the Church: and to forward the work of the Church at home and abroad.

Q. Why is it our duty to belong to the Church of England?
A. Because the Church of England has inherited and retains the Doctrine and Ministry of the One Catholic and Apostolic Church, and is that part of the Church which has been settled from early times in our country.

These additions, however, though approved by the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury, were never authorised.

The authorship of the Cat. is wrapped in obscurity. The first part has been attributed to Dean Nowell, and the second, that dealing with the Sacraments, to Bp. Overall: but this cannot be received without qualification. Nowell published three Catechisms, the Larger, Middle, and Little; the two former in 1563.

The Little Catechism is very rare. There is a Latin version in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin; and of the English original, a fragment in the Bodleian Library; and a copy, minus leaves at the beginning and end, at Trinity College, Dublin. It has been inferred, with a high degree of probability, that it existed in 1559, and is the Cat. referred to in the Interpretations of 1560-1, but it can hardly be placed as early as 1549, for at that date Nowell was a Master at Westminster and was not made Dean till 1560.

Again, his monument in Old St. Paul's, while it mentions that he wrote three Cats., makes no reference to his having written the Cat. in the PB. On the other hand, it must be confessed that the Ch. Cat. is almost identical with Nowell's Little Cat., except that Nowell has some additional questions and answers after the "Duty to my neighbour." Isaac Walton speaks of Nowell as "the good old man" "who made that good, plain, unperplexed Cat., printed in our good, old service-book." Some have ascribed the authorship to Poyntet, Bp. of Rochester, who wrote a Cat. in 1553. It has also been suggested that the "duties" were composed by Goodrich, Bp. of Ely, as two tables were set up in his palace at Ely on which the "duties" were inscribed.

With regard to the part on the Sacraments, it must be regarded as the work of Nowell, edited and slightly altered by Bishop Overall; Nowell being indebted for this part of his Cat. to Calvin's Genevan Cat. of 1541.

The following quotation from Nowell's Little Catechism will show the truth of this:

Q. "Quot in Ecclesia sua Sacramenta instituit Dominus? A. Duo. Baptismum et Coenam Domini.
Q. Quid est Sacramentum? A. Est externum et aspectabile signum, internam arcanamque spirituale gratiam representans, etc.

Q. Sacramentum quot partibus constat? A. Duabus: signo externo atque spectabili: et interna, invisibilique Gratia.

Q. Quod est in Baptismo signum externum? A. Aqua, in quam baptizatus intingitur, vel ea aspergitur, in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti."

The Cat. falls readily and naturally into five divisions. The first four questions and answers constitute the 1st div.; the other 4 expand more fully the truths contained in the first. The reference to the duty of the Belief in Q. 4 is followed by the Creed, showing what we should believe: Obedience is explained by the Duty towards God and the Duty towards our neighbour: the need of prayer is met by the Lord's Prayer with its explanation: the reference to grace is expanded into instruction on the Sacraments as means of Grace.

Thus we get these five parts: (1) the Privileges and Profession of a Christian, (2) the Creed, (3) the Commandments, (4) the Lord's Prayer, (5) the Sacraments.

Unlike many other Catechisms, the Ch. Cat. begins by telling the child what God has done for him, and goes on to teach him what he should do for God. It leads from Privilege to Responsibility.

It would be a mistake to regard the Cat. as intended only for children. The principles which it teaches are principles for life. A foundation is laid by it in childhood, upon which the religion of manhood may be securely built. There is a depth of meaning in its teaching, which is only fully apprehended in later life. Whether we regard the sober, weighty statement of doctrine, or the high standard of ethical teaching, it would be hard to find any similar short compendium to surpass it. The fact that it has stood the test of more than three centuries, without any wish on the part of the Church to make any substantial change in it, is sufficient proof of this. As Abp. Benson said: "I believe that there never has been in the hands of any Ch. any manual representing the doctrines, the true spirit of the Bible, to compare with the Cat. of the Ch. of England."

It might be urged that a document drawn up so long ago would be out of touch with the thought and circumstances of the present day. But the fact that the Cat. deals with principles of truth and righteousness, which stand good just as much now as they did in former days, safeguards it from this danger. The importance of the individual, the life of principle, the necessity of faith, the idea of duty, are, and must always remain, factors in the lives of Christian people. The objections which are sometimes raised to certain phrases are due to a misconception of their meaning. Such a phrase as, "To order myself lowly and reverently to all my betters," is sometimes quoted as if it inculcated servility, whereas it only enjoins that respect which is due from every person to those in authority over him. The more the Cat. is studied, the more its clear teaching and high standard of practical morality will become evident.

Great stress is laid by many teachers upon the importance of the Cat. being committed to memory accurately. In a document in which every word has been carefully weighed, and in which an apparently slight alteration may make a radical change in the meaning, accuracy is most needful; but it is well to put in a caution against learning the Cat. by heart before it has been carefully explained and thoroughly understood.

6. Methods of Teaching.

The principal objections to the Cat. have been raised by those who, for want of careful teaching, have read their own interpretation into it, and then found fault with the Cat. as thus interpreted.

It should also be borne in mind that a document of this character is not likely to be interesting to a child apart from the living voice and personal influence of the teacher; and interest is much increased if it is taught in connection with the Bible, each point in the Cat. being illustrated by a story from Holy Scripture. The teacher should thoroughly explain the exact meaning of certain terms and phrases, e.g., "renounce," "grace," "state of salvation." Let him also remember that, though primarily intended for children, it is capable of yielding fresh truths and new beauty to the student of any age. [See CATECHISM, REVISION OF, for a draft in which certain additions and changes of form are suggested in the interests of clearness and edification.]

(See Churton's Life of Nowell; A. W. Robinson, The Church Catechism Explained;

5. Doctrinal and Ethical Standard.

Reynolds, Handbook to the PB; Bp. Knox, Pastors and Teachers; Newbolt, The Church Catechism.)—K. MORLEY STEVENSON.

CATECHISM, THE SYSTEM.—The C. is a term applied to a special method of Catechetical Instruction instituted by M. Olier, curé of St. Sulpice in Paris, in the 17th cent., and further developed by Bishop Dupanloup in a course of lectures delivered to his clergy in the diocese of Orleans in 1869 and published under the title of The Ministry of Catechising. The method is frequently called The Method of St. Sulpice.

About twenty years ago it was introduced into this country, and has established itself in a certain (though not a large) number of parishes. The system, as adopted in England, is a modification of the original system, which is too intricate and one may add too lengthy to be of practical use for English children. It is of this modified system that I now proceed to give an outline.

In the first place there is a good deal of system and method in the arrangement of the children.

They are marched from school to church. Each child has his appointed place and knows it. Each pew has a child at its head, who acts as a monitor or monitress for that seat. Over the whole section of boys and of girls is an officer, called an Intendant. Above the Intendant is the Assistant Catechist or Catechists, and, over the whole, the Catechist himself. It is hardly necessary to point out how these various officers help in the maintenance of order.

In the C. there are three Principal Exercises and three Secondary Exercises.

The Principal Exercises are:

1. The Questioning; (2) The Instruction; (3) The Reading of the Gospel and Homily.

The Secondary Exercises are: (4) The Admonitions; (5) The Hymns; (6) The Prayers.

(1) For the Questioning, the Catechist should have a plan before him showing the position and name of every child. He should address a child by name, and the child should rise in his place and answer. This plan is a great aid to attention, as every child feels that he may be called upon at any moment. The questions should first be directed to discover if the children have understood and remembered the lesson of the previous Sunday, and should then go on to the Church Cat. with its explanation, or to some lesson which has previously been prepared in the Sunday School.¹

(2) The second Principal Exercise is the Instruction. This is a short piece of definite teaching upon some Christian fact, doctrine or practice. The children take notes. The Catechist is careful to see that the title and heads of the instruction are noted down. The heads should be short, simple and clear, e.g.: "The Forgiveness of Sin: (1) What is sin? (2) What is forgiveness? (3) How is forgiveness found?" Some Catechists put the heads upon a blackboard.

¹ Objections arise from the vacant places of absent children and from the difficulty of keeping up the interest when the children questioned answer slowly or not at all.

Of this instruction the children write brief analyses during the week. These are revised by the Catechist and commented upon at the next Catechism. It is found that children take a proper pride in hearing their analyses commended. The gain from the point of view of the teacher is great, as the children are helped to clearness of thought and to strengthening of memory.

(3) The third and last of the Principal Exercises is the Gospel and Homily. The children stand while the Catechist reads the Gospel for the day. They then sit, and the Catechist gives a very brief address on some part of the Gospel. This address, as distinguished from the Instruction, should be hortatory and practical. It should aim at going right home to the hearts of the children. Let it be bright and interesting, but let it avoid the modern, unworthy custom of introducing anything that amuses and provokes laughter. Though the Method of St. Sulpice prescribes that the Gospel should always be read, the writer can see no reason why other suitable portions of Scripture should not be substituted by the Catechist.

(4) Turning to the Secondary Exercises we will speak first of the Admonitions. These really mean little more than short pieces of instruction and advice which may be given forth at the will of the Catechist, as opportunity offers. The Prayers may be sometimes prefaced by a word or two on Prayer or on Reverence. Something in the report of the analyses may suggest a useful remark. A notice of a Church Season or Holy-day may lead to a simple explanation of what is commemorated. Let it not be thought that these are unimportant trifles. The apparently chance remark sometimes produces great effect. But the Catechist should not trust to such remarks suggesting themselves on the spur of the moment, but should think them out beforehand.

(5) There is no necessity to dwell upon the Exercise of Hymns. They naturally form a part of a children's service. The hymn should be given out distinctly and begun at once, after one chord on the organ. No time should be allowed for looking about.

(6) The Exercise of Prayers again needs but a word. Every effort should be made by suitable admonitions to inculcate reverence. A prayer at the beginning and one or two concluding prayers, with the Lord's Prayer, will be sufficient for the Catechism.

Such in brief outline is the system of the Catechism. Those who have tried it and thrown themselves heartily into the system are usually strong in its praise. It has transformed the Children's Service from a too often ill-disciplined, inattentive gathering, into an orderly, reverent and well-instructed congregation. It has done more for the lasting spiritual welfare of parishes than any other method of parochial work. If only the clergy could be induced to take it up, we should see, by the grace of God, a wonderful revival in the Christian life of our people.

(Literature: Dupanloup, The Ministry of Catechising; Spencer Jones, The Clergy and the Catechism; R. E. Johnston, Method of St. Sulpice for use in Sunday Schools.)—K. MORLEY STEVENSON.

CATECHIST.—The early Church required instruction as a condition of Bapt., but had no definite order of teachers. During the actual preparation for, and during the week after, its administration the Bp. usually gave a series of catechetical addresses to the accepted candidates, or competentes; but this duty was often delegated to others. The Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem were delivered in part while he was a deacon, and partly (as were those of Chrysostom at Antioch) when a priest. Augustine wrote his De Catechizandis Rudibus for Deogratias, a deacon. Optatus was commissioned by Cyprian to teach while a reader, and Origen was a young layman when he began to lecture in the Catechetical School of Alexandria. Thus, for the most part, the teaching of the Ch. arose from practical needs and was oral or catechetical. It dealt with OT History, Christian duties and doctrine, and the Sacraments. As a system of teaching it was inadequate, except at Alexandria, where it developed into an independent school of Christian Philosophy as part of a thorough system of education (cp. Westcott, Religious Thought in the West, p. 214 ff.). Its chief value lay in the fact that it developed the Christian Creeds and systematised the theology of the Ch., laying the foundation on which Augustine's City of God, Aquinas' Summa, and all our modern works of Systematic Theology could be built.

1. Origin and History.

[Lay Cs. were not allowed to instruct their CATECHUMENS publicly in the ch., but in buildings appointed for that purpose, though often attached to the church. Such were the famous schools at Alexandria where Origen and others taught.]

After the 5th cent. the system of the Catechumenate declined, and with it disappeared the office of the Catechist. Throughout the Middle Ages many manuals were in use among the parish clergy, but it was the revival of learning and the increased interest in education and theology that made the drawing up of Catechisms such a marked feature of the German Reformation. The PB Catechism was written as a basis of instruction for English children before Confirmation, and the clergy were ordered to catechise those sent to them every Sunday after the second lesson at EP. The Roman Church followed with the Catechism of the Council of Trent, intended for the clergy, on which the smaller diocesan catechisms in use at the present day are based.

The order of Cs. has been revived, or rather recreated, in the mission field, partly as an outcome of the needs of the Ch.

2. Revival.

working in heathen lands under conditions similar to those of the first three centuries, and partly because much of the work has to be done by members of native races, which are not yet able to supply many men for the priesthood.

At home, the work of Sunday Schools (so often valuable for the personal influence of voluntary teachers), of Children's Services which familiarise the children with the forms of worship that they learn about in the day school, of Confirmation Classes which aim at testing what has already been learned and at giving it a more spiritual and personal application, and of Bible Classes or Lectures for men and women, give scope for much teaching work, both clerical and lay.

Much attention is being given to the improvement of such work and to the training of teachers by the application of methods worked out by experienced professional authorities. [Useful instruction is given in the Theological Colleges, and gatherings of clergy under the guidance of educational experts, to study teaching in various forms, have been held with good success.] The Society of the CATECHISM advocates a system based on that of St. Sulpice, on which the French Ch. has had to rely owing to the exclusion of all religious teaching from the public schools. It has been criticised as adhering to methods discredited by modern educational science (learning of set answers by heart, reliance on marks and prizes, etc.), and as ignoring the experience and work of English day schools that are dealing with the same problems and the same children, but it has undoubtedly proved a great advance on the methods of the ordinary undisciplined Sunday School or Children's Service.

For with the general progress of education the inadequacy of such methods becomes apparent. Christian teaching cannot be separated from Christian education, and the modern counterpart of the C. is the teacher in a Christian school, whether at home or in the mission field, or the special teacher who gives lessons in religion as part of the curriculum, while that of the Catechism is the carefully thought out and graded syllabus of religious instruction.

[Although the formal office does not now exist, yet the importance of being a good C. is as great as ever. The qualifications are:—(1) a thorough (not superficial) knowledge of the subject matter, (2) some mastery of the art of questioning, (3) sympathy with the child and a knowledge of the working of the child's mind. No doubt, it is an art to catechise well—partly a gift—but anyone who will take pains may do it in a degree, and constant practice will increase his dexterity (see CATECHISING).]

3. Qualifications.

["He will aim above all things at making the children take an interest in the business themselves, and unite them, as far as possible, in a partnership in the investigation of the subject before them. Thus he will put to them what the lawyers call leading questions upon it—questions which partly suggest their own answers—and cheat them, as it were, into a persuasion that the εὐρηκα was in fact their own. He will make much of any word of truth or sagacity in the answer returned to him. He will lead them by the hand through a string of hints and queries, to narrow the ground still more and more, till he has eventually so hemmed the result in that it cannot escape them" (Blunt's Duties of the Parish Priest, p. 186).]

(a) For ancient Cs. see:—Bingham, Antiquities iii. 10; DCA, art. Catechumens (II). (b) For German

Cats. see:—New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia, art. Catechism. (c) For Cs. in Mission dioceses, see Literature given under MINOR ORDERS, esp. Convocation Report on Readers. (d) General Works:—World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 3, Christian Education; Hetty Lee, New Methods in the Junior Sunday School, and other publications of the National Society, including The Year-Book of the Society of the Catechism; J. Adams (Presbyterian), Primer on Teaching, T. & T.

Clark. In addition, general works on education and teaching should be studied and their principles applied to religious instruction.—A3, K6.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.
[MORLEY STEVENSON.]

CATECHUMEN.—A person undergoing instruction and discipline preparatory to Bapt. (from κατηχέω, to sound down or towards; hence κατηχούμενος). In the Acts converts are baptised immediately upon profession of faith in Christ. But Lk. 14, Acts 18:25, Rom. 6:17, Gal. 6:6, already imply some pre-baptismal teaching, and our Synoptic Gospels are thought by some to embody crystallised catechetical instruction.

Didache 7, and Justin, I Apol. 61, refer briefly to preparatory repentance and pr., with fasting. Tertullian uses catechumenus technically, and reproves heretics for neglecting their instruction (De Praescr. Haeret. 41). The frequent allusions now met with (Canones Hippolyti, Acta Perpetuae, Clem. Alex., etc.) show that the catechumenate was generally established. Alexandria boasted of the most famous "catechetical school" in the 3rd cent. (Eusebius, HE v. 10:1, vi. 3:3). The fully developed system belongs to the 4th and 5th cents. Preparation was extended from forty days or three months to two or three years, usually terminating on Easter Even or at Pentecost. The C. started by becoming an audiens, and was instructed in the elements of faith and morality by a CATECHIST appointed by the bishop. (The classical historical example is Augustine's De Catech. Rud.) He then, usually at the beginning of the Lenten Fast, applied to the Church for Bapt., and was styled a competens. Several Scrutinies and Exorcisms had now to be undergone, and fuller instruction was given (see esp. Cyril Jer.'s Catech. Lectures). Cs. attended the earlier portion of the Christian services, but were dismissed after the sermon, bef. the Euch. proper began. Initiation was performed by the bishop, and included our Bapt., Confirmation and Communion. But Cs. who died as martyrs bef. Bapt. were always reckoned among the saints. (See art. Catechumens in DCA.)

With the extinction of heathenism in the 6th and following cents. the catechumenate fell into decay. Gradually, its rites were compressed into a mere introduction to the Baptism of Infants, and Confirmation and Communion were separated from it.

In the PB Service for Adult Bapt. (added in 1662; for reasons see Pref.) the 1st rubric enjoins examination of Cs. in the

2. In Modern Times. principles of the Christian religion, and preparation with prs. and fasting. And, in some parts of the modern mission field, a revival of the Catechumenate in some shape or other has been found necessary. For further information with regard to the Modern Catechumenate, see Official Report of the Missionary Conference of the Anglican Communion, 1894, pp. 139-154.—J1.

H. MARRIOTT.

CATHEDRAL.—In the PB the word C. is correctly used as an adjective—"in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches." Καθέδρα = a professor's chair or pulpit, and is now applied to the church in which the Bp. of the diocese places his seat or chair whence he addresses the clergy subject to him. St. Augustine (Comm. on Ps. 126) explains the word in reference to the chair of greater dignity occupied by the bishop, i.e., that in the middle of the apse behind the chief altar of the church—"sedes honestior et augustior episcoporum in ecclesia" (cp. also Ep. 203). In the Notit. Ep. Afric. in Victor Vitensis, De Persec. Vandal., Bk. 4, the word cathedra is used as equivalent to episcopatus or diocese. Gregory of Tours uses it as a term for the capital city of a kingdom (HF. 2:38, "Chlodovechus . . . egressus autem a Turonis Parisios venit ibique cathedram regni constituit"). At the Council of Aachen in 789, cap. 40, the word is used for a C. church—"ut non liceat episcopo principalem cathedram suae parochiae negligere et aliquam ecclesiam in sua diocesi magis frequentare." "Cathedram sacerdotalem regere" = to act as bishop, and Jerome, Ep. 14, to Damasus, writes, "ego nullum primum nisi Christum sequens beatitudini tuae, id est, Cathedra Petri communione consocior."

The ecclesiastical use of the word may have arisen from Jewish sources, because the bishops, like Moses and the Rabbis, authoritatively announce to us the Catholic doctrine of the Church, or it may arise from the habit of the bishop sitting in the midst of his diocesan clergy, but on a superior chair and raised above them (see THRONE, BISHOP'S). Four kinds of churches are referred to in the PB. We have C. and Collegiate Churches as distinct from Parochial Churches, and the latter are in their turn distinguished from Annexed Chapels.

The C. church, as being the church of the bishop, is normally the original church of the diocese, and in such we find a type of architecture earlier than that generally in vogue in the Middle Ages. Growing out of the Basilica-type of church (i.e., a long oblong building divided usually into three by two rows of columns necessary for the support of the roof, and ending eastwards with one or perhaps three apses), we arrive at the cruciform Basilica, a Romanesque building with transepts north and south so as to produce the sign of the cross, and at times a narthex or columnaded annex to the West. Such churches are to be found in the Rhine Provinces of Germany, e.g., Speyer, Worms, Mainz and the older churches at Köln. The apsidal chapels at Lincoln known as St. Hugh's and the chapel in the north transept at Norwich are survivals of this earlier type. As the church of greater dignity, the C. church is usually the largest in the diocese, the result of the effort of many generations of the faithful; but of course neither size nor shape is essential to it. The C. church is the church which holds the seat of the bishop. It is a collegiate church as distinct from a parish church, though the parochial character which originally clung to it often exists in the survival of some arrangement by which the duties of the parish priest are performed by others than the Canons. The Church of St. Gregory in the crypt of St. Paul's is an instance of this, and the existence in some C. churches of the office of the Vicar of the C., as at Rouen and other churches in France and England, indicates the recognition of the claims of those who live in the precincts of the church to the spiritual privileges enjoyed by the parishioners of an ordinary parish.

2. The Cathedral Church.

As a church specially assigned for the bishop and his chapter, there are two essential features of a C. church. There is a chapter house or council chamber attached to it, and there are stalls or seats for the Bishop and the Canons of the church. There are usually aisles or passages for processions on the great festivals of the year. The great Gothic C. churches in France and England which rose during the 13th and 14th cents. with their many chapels, choirs, sanctuaries, aisles and transepts, their mighty naves and their beautiful cloisters, are evidence of the devotion and architectural ambition of their age rather than of the necessary details of the bishop's church.

The clergy of the bishop's church before the 8th cent. came to be known as Canons, because of the rule of life which they observed as members of the bishop's household.

4. Canons versus Monks.

About 760 Chrodegang, Bishop of Metz, drew up a series of rules which the clergy of his church were compelled to observe, and in consequence these clergy came to be known as the Canons of St. Chrodegang. They lived a semi-monastic life, having their meals in common and all sleeping in one dormitory. This rule was introduced into England by Leofric, Bishop of Crediton and Exeter, and Gisa, Bishop of Wells. In early English times the C. churches were served by Canons, but it is not known for certain the exact rule which these Canons were wont to observe. Bishops Dunstan and Oswald of Worcester and York, with Archbishop Odo of Canterbury, about 970, were anxious to make these rules stricter, and would have preferred to turn out the Canons and introduce monks for the service of the C. churches. At the time of the Norman Conquest then, the bishops' churches were served either by monks as at Canterbury, Winchester, Durham and perhaps Worcester; or by Canons of the order of St. Chrodegang, as at Wells and Exeter; or by secular Canons, as at York, London, Hereford, Selsey, Rochester, Lichfield, Ramsbury, Dorchester and Thetford. At the Council of Carthage in 534, it was enacted that no bishop was to place his cathedra or seat in the church of a monastery, i.e., to make a church of monks a C. church, and this rule prevailed generally in Western Europe. The exception to it in England is only apparent. Monks were introduced to serve the C. churches which had been served by Canons. Monasteries were not invaded, but monks whose discipline was stricter were invited to take the place of men whose rule was somewhat indefinite. When Lanfranc became Abp. of Canterbury in 1070, there was not only a considerable rearrangement of the C. churches, but the line also of demarcation between monks and secular Canons became more definite, seeing he did all he could to impose upon the English monks the rule of St. Benedict. So we find in 1072 the church in Crediton yielded to the church in Exeter, as already Selsey had given way in 1070 to Chichester; in 1078 Ramsbury gave way to Sarum, and in 1094 Dorchester gave way to Lincoln. All these churches were served by secular Canons, the only change being the removal of the bishop's seat from the one place to the other. At the end of the cent. however, a new see was created at Ely, where in 1092 Hervé was consecrated Bp., and the monastery of Ely became at once the seat of a Bp. and definitely Benedictine; while in 1095 Bishop Losinga transferred his seat from Thetford to Norwich, and practically founded there a Benedictine monastery with the monks as members of his chapter. One more diocese was created in the following cent., and after that the English Church continued without any reorganisation until the time of Henry VIII. The county of Cumberland had become in the 12th cent. a recognised portion of the English kingdom, and in 1133 Adelulf was consecrated Bp. of Carlisle, and the Austin Canons who served the church thus became in like manner the members of his chapter.

Before we refer to the changes produced by the Reformation in the 16th cent., it will be best to describe the character of the chapters which served the C. churches and administered their revenues.

5. Medieval Cathedral Chapters.

As the diocese became better organised and parish churches were increased in number, the administration and service of the C. church became impossible for the bishop himself to accomplish, and he was obliged to assign it to his chapter. Before the end of the 11th cent. we find that the secular Canons, such as those at Exeter, Wells and Salisbury, were organised under a provost or dean, and the services of the church and the estates of the church were definitely handed over to this body of responsible Canons. In the four C. churches served by monks, Canterbury, Winchester, Worcester and Durham, the bishop had become the titular abbot of the monastery, while the real head was the prior. Lanfranc introduced into English monasteries the system of Obedientiaris, monkish officers detailed for special duties in reference to the monastery and its church and also stewards of such moneys as should be assigned to these duties. As the endowments of the C. churches grew, this system was adopted for the secular chapters, and the Canons had assigned to them definite portions of estates or benefices for their personal maintenance. This system of division began in the 11th cent. and grew with the wealth of the Church. But the increase in the number of Canons demanded an organisation such as prevailed in Benedictine monasteries. Canons were appointed over certain branches of the work of the church, and, as such, were of superior dignity to those who had no special duties. The movement which created dignitaries of the C. church, as distinct from dignitaries of the Church generally, began probably in York about 1090 under the guidance of Archbishop Thomas, who himself had been treasurer at Rouen. We find under him a dean, precentor, chancellor and treasurer, designated as the Quatuor Personæ. At Lincoln, too, a simultaneous movement took place in the same year under Remigius, who created the posts of dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, seven archdeacons and a subdean. And immediately afterwards the same system was adopted at Salisbury by St. Osmund, who created a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, four archdeacons, subdean and succentor. Other churches, such as Lichfield and Wells in 1136 and Moray in 1214, followed this example, and bef. the end of the 12th cent. this plan became normal for all the C. churches of secular Canons. The appointment to all these posts, as to that of a simple Canon, lay with the bishop of the diocese, but the dean as the perpetual chairman of the chapter, the primus inter pares of the Canons, was chosen by the Canons from among their own body.

In two cases in England the Bp. became possessed of two C. churches. In 1088 John de Villula purchased the city of Bath from William II and transferred his throne from Wells to Bath. But, as Wells in the next cent. regained its rights, the Bp. found himself head of the monkish chapter at Bath and the secular chapter at Wells, both churches being of C. rank. In the great Mercian diocese of Lichfield much the same change occurred. Bp. Peter of Lichfield (1072-1085) obtained permission to forsake Lichfield and establish his C. church in Chester, and his successor, Robert de Lymsey (1086-1117), obtained a grant of the abbey of Coventry, and withdrew from Chester to Coventry. Soon after Lichfield regained its former position, and the Bp., as in Somerset, found himself with two chapters, those of the secular Canons of Lichfield and the Benedictine monks of Coventry.

8. Bishops with Two Cathedrales.

The monastic chapters were governed by the rules of their order, i.e., the rule of St. Benedict, the actual head of the monastery being the prior, elected as their head by the monks with the sanction and approval of the Bp. The secular chapters were presided over by the Dean, the chief of the Canons of the church. The order of precedence of the other dignitaries varied somewhat. The second in dignity was always the precentor, who had imposed upon him the observance of the Consuetudinary and Ordinale of the Church. Every matter concerning the choir and its services was his special care. At York, Lincoln and Salisbury the chancellor took the next place, and he was followed by the treasurer, the archdeacons and the two minor dignitaries of subdean and succentor. At Wells the Archdeacon of Wells followed the precentor, and the chancellor and others were immediately after the archdeacon. In addition to these officers whose residence was more or less perpetual, other of the Canons from time to time, because they were summoned or because they desired it and obtained a house to live in, were in residence and took part in the services of the C. church. They were bound not only by the link of mutual intercession, but also in many cases, as at London, Lincoln, Salisbury and Wells, by the bond of united praise, the Bp. and all the Canons having assigned to them certain Pss. or portions of Pss., which they were to say daily wherever they might be, so that the whole Psalter might be said by their fraternity of praise. The numerous chapels and chantries which during the 13th and 14th cents. were added to the C. churches demanded a large staff of additional priests. The absent Canon had his vicar, and these vicars were organised into a body attached to the C. church with their separate endowments and their distinct rights. In processions therefore, the order of precedence would be the Bp., the Dean, the dignitaries as arranged by the Consuetudinary of the church, the simple Canons, the vicars, the chantry priests, and the boys of the choir.¹

7. Government and Precedence.

¹ In 1800 an Act was passed (4 & 5 V., c. 39) which created a body of Honorary Canons for the C. churches of the New (i.e., Henry VIII's) Foundation and for any subsequent Foundations. These dignitaries are not in the same position as

In each diocese the Bp. was the Ordinary, and to him was attached the responsibility for the services in the parochial and C. churches of his diocese. All additions to the Euch. Office and all enrichment of the daily Brev. Offices were regulated by his decision.

8. Power of the Bishop in Cathedrales.

In certain features therefore the Euch. Office would in mediæval times be found to differ as a visitor went from diocese to diocese. This diversity is referred to in the Pref. of the PB, entitled Concerning the Service of the Church—"And whereas heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in Churches within this Realm; some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, and some the Use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln; now from henceforth all the whole Realm shall have but one Use." This reference does not include all the Diocesan Uses formerly in England, but it represents the confusion which certainly prevailed in the 14th cent. Before the end of the 15th cent. however, the Use of Salisbury had become generally the Use over the whole of the South of England, but the Use of Hereford and the Use of York were retained up to the appearance of the first PB of Edward VI. The differences were not indeed important, and the tendency to assimilate had long been at work, but the advantage of one PB for the whole Realm was at once recognised.

The great changes of the 16th cent., known as the Reformation, began with the Submission of the Clergy in 1531, after Convocation had been convicted under the PRÆMUNIRE Act because of its recognition of Cardinal Wolsey as Papal Legate. During the years 1536-9 the monasteries were dissolved or surrendered, and the abolition of the monasteries not only destroyed the C. chapters, but also affected the C. churches, of Bath, Canterbury, Coventry, Winchester, Rochester, Worcester, Durham, Ely, Norwich and Carlisle. Not only the endowments but the very buildings themselves were surrendered to the Crown. It was necessary therefore that some re-endowment should be made, if these C. churches were to continue. An Act was therefore passed in 1539 (31 H. VIII, cap. 9) entitled "An Act for the King to make Bishoppes," and under it Canterbury, Winchester, Rochester, Worcester, Ely, Norwich, Durham and Carlisle were re-created as C. churches, the former monastic church becoming now only a C. church, and the government of the church being assigned to a body of four to six Canons with a Dean appointed by letters patent to rule over the church. In addition to these re-creations, five new additional sees were formed with the monastic churches of Bristol, Gloucester, Oxford, Chester and Peterborough as the new C. churches, and in the following year the former abbey church of Westminster became the C. church for the new diocese of West Middlesex. There were two other dioceses affected by the dissolution of the monasteries; Lichfield had lost Coventry, and Wells had lost Bath; and in the prebendaries or Canons of the Old Foundation, since they have no freehold in the Church, nor have they any voice in the election of the bishop. In the diocese of Truro, however (50 V., st. 2, cap. 12), a General Chapter has been created which includes the Honorary Canons.

9. Reformation Changes—Cathedrales of the New Foundation.

1541-2 an Act (33 H. VIII, cap. 30) was passed which confirmed to the secular chapter at Lichfield all the rights which formerly it had shared with Coventry, and in 1542-3 a similar Act (34-5 H. VIII, cap. 15) confirmed to the chapter at Wells those rights in which formerly the monks of Bath had shared. By the Act of 1539 the constitution of these new chapters was practically identical. Both the Bp. and the Dean were now of the patronage of the Crown. The Constitution was defined by Letters Patent (cp. 35 Eliz., cap. 3, which confirms them).

There remained the old chapters with their former constitutions untouched because they had been chapters of secular Canons:

10. Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. London, Chichester, Salisbury, Wells, Exeter, Hereford, Lincoln, Lichfield and York, and the process by which they were brought into subjection to the Crown steadily went on. At Wells as early as 1537 (cp. Wells Chapter MSS., D., f. 22), in the election by the Canons of Thomas Cromwell as their Dean, the influence of the Crown had begun. One by one these chapters were induced to accept nominees of the Crown, and these formally surrendered their office to the King, and as at Wells in 1547 (W.C. MSS., E., fol. 18) the deanship was re-created as a royal creation, the dean to be henceforth appointed by letters patent. This process naturally rendered doubtful the legal position of the corporate body which now came to be called the dean and chapter. Was the old chapter and the new dean the same corporate body as before? In Wells this question was answered in the affirmative by the Charter of Queen Elizabeth of 1592 (cp. ut supra Act of Eliz.), and during that reign the issue of charters to other cathedral chapters made the procedure of the chapter strictly legal.

In the 17th cent. all C. chapters were abolished by the Act of 1649 (Ordinance of 30 April, 1649).

11. Changes since the Reformation. the estates of the C. churches were confiscated and the clergy dispersed. And so it continued until by the Act of 1660 (12 Car. II, c. 11, s. 48) they were re-created, and the endowments as far as possible restored to them. From that date little was done concerning the C. churches of England until the year 1836 (6 and 7 W. IV, c. 77), when an Act was passed which gave power to the Privy Council to reorganise the boundaries of a diocese by an Order, and which authorised the union of the dioceses of Bristol and Gloucester, St. Asaph and Bangor, Carlisle and the Isle of Man, and the creation of the two new sees of Ripon and Manchester, the two collegiate churches of Manchester and Ripon to be raised to the rank of C. churches. The diocese of Ripon was at once created, and a bishop consecrated for it that year, and the two dioceses of Gloucester and Bristol were united. The other sections of the Act remained in abeyance; and in 1838 (3 & 4 V., c. 30) the proposal to unite Carlisle and the Isle of Man was revoked, and the similar clause concerning Bangor and St. Asaph in 1847 (10 & 11 V., c. 108); and in 1848 (10 & 11 Vict., c. 108) the diocese of Manchester was formed out of the diocese of Chester. In 1884 (47 & 48 V., cap. 66) Gloucester and Bristol were again divided, a bishop being appointed to Bristol and the bp. of the united see retiring to Gloucester.

The four Welsh C. chapters form a group by themselves. They were never organised under monastic systems other than Celtic, and, since the Welsh Church became an integral part of the English Church, the Welsh chapters have always been chapters of secular Canons. We know little of their earlier constitutions. The bishop was always the head of the chapter, and the office of dean is to this day in the patronage of the bishop. The right of the bishop in this respect was established by Llewelyn Ap Madre, Bishop of St. Asaph in 1357. At St. David's the dean is not instituted, the bishop holding in addition to his throne the stall the dean would usually hold, and not all the Canons here had endowments. These unendowed Canons, which are known as curial, include the King of England among their number as an ex-officio prebendary. The constitution of the chapters is similar to those of secular Canons in England, and the chief officers or obedientiaries or dignitaries of the church are the dean, archdeacons, treasurer, chancellor and precentor. The method of endowment of the dignitaries at Llandaff differed somewhat from that at St. David's, St. Asaph and Bangor. We know very little about the deans, since they were subordinate in chapter to the bishop; and during mediæval times Essic in 1120 is the only dean we know of at Llandaff. The link between the C. church and other churches in the diocese was strong, and members of the chapter received their endowments from the churches where they served. So at Bangor in addition to the dignitaries there are two prebendaries and two curial Canons; at St. Asaph six prebendaries and seven curial Canons; at St. David's six prebendaries and six curial Canons; and at Llandaff five prebendaries only.

12. The Welsh Cathedral Chapters.

In the first PB of Edward VI we find a rubric that "in all cathedral churches, the archdeacons, deans and prebendaries, being graduates, may use in the choir besides their surplices such hood as pertaineth to their several degrees which they have taken in any University within this realm." According to the Rubric before the Communion Office of 1549, in all churches, whether C. or parochial, the priest when he celebrated the HC was "to put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white Albe plain with a Vestment or Cope." This was repealed in the PB of 1552, which ruled that the minister was to wear neither alb, vestment nor cope. This again was modified by the Advertisements of 1566, which enjoined that in the ministration of the HC in C. and collegiate churches the principal minister shall use a cope with gospeller and epistoler agreeably; and at all other times no copes to be used but surplices.

In 1604 the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury (can. 24) ordained that in all C. and collegiate churches the HC shall be ministered on principal feast days sometimes by the Bp., if he be present, and sometimes by the Dean, and sometimes by a Canon or Prebendary; the principal minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the gospeller and epistoler agreeably.

It is clear that it was the intention of Queen Elizabeth and her adviser, Archbishop Parker, that the ceremonial of the Service for the HC in a C. should be of a more dignified character than that observed in a parish church, and the possession by some C. churches of copes which have been long in use there preserves this tradition. The custom has however fallen into desuetude, and there are few C. churches where to-day the cope is to be seen as the vestment for the minister at the time of the HC.

The relation of the Bp. of the diocese to his C. church and chapter varies considerably in the churches of the old secular Foundation. In mediæval times the frequent absences of the Bp. compelled him to make his Dean and Canons almost autonomous. In churches of the creation of Henry VIII the Bp. is the visitor, and he has power to inquire into the administration of his C. church.¹ In the old Foundations the old rights of independence in reference to the management of estates and the organisation of the church, with certain exceptions which vary in almost every church of the old Foundation, still exist. The right, however, which is inalienable from the office of the Bp. has never lapsed and has in many such churches, as at Lincoln, been again revived. The question of authority is complicated by the position of the Dean as holding an office under the Crown, a position which clearly limits the coercive power of the Bp., but it is certain that the ius episcopale is still valid over all the C. churches of England and only waits a favourable opportunity for its general assertion.—A2, A7, R6.

14. The Bishop and his Cathedral.

T. SCOTT HOLMES.

CATHOLIC.—See CHURCH, § 6.

CAUTION is ordered to be "put in" (Solemn. Matrim., R. bef. Q.) by any man alleging an impediment to a marriage "to the full value of such charges as the persons to be married do thereby sustain," unless he "will be bound and sufficient sureties with him." "Caution" probably meant here and in canon 107 "realis cautio"; as when a man engageth goods, or mortgageth lands for the performance" (Gibson, 1063); but such security is now obsolete.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CEMETERY.—This title (κοιμητήριον, place of slumber) was originally applied to the catacombs of Rome, which the early Christians used for the burial of their dead. In its broadest significance it now denotes any place set apart for the burial of the dead, but it is generally used in a more special sense to denote a burial ground other than a churchyard.

Cs. in the special sense may be classified as (1) private, (2) public. (1) In general a private C. may be provided by anyone; and particular religious communities other than the Ch. of Eng. not infrequently provide private Cs. for their own use without obtaining any statutory authority. It is not, however, practicable to have a private C. consecrated in whole or in part, unless it be established under a private Act of Parliament. Cs. established under such special Acts closely correspond with public Cs. in their main features. (2) Public Cs. are established under the Burial Acts and other general Acts of Parliament, and are vested in and subject to the control of burial authorities constituted in a variety of ways. The burial authority may be, for instance:—(a) an elective burial board; (b) a parish council or parish meeting; (c) an urban or rural local authority; and the C. may be maintained for the benefit of a parish as such, but not necessarily. Part of a C. may be reserved for the exclusive use of a particular denomination and, if so, a chapel may be built in that part at the expense of the denomination.

¹ Cp. Visitation of Cathedral Church of Bristol by the Lord Bishop of Bristol, 1905.

A C. may be consecrated in whole or in part: it is not necessary that the consecrated part should be actually fenced off from the unconsecrated, but sufficient boundary marks must be provided. In the consecrated ground the Ch. of Eng. has a special jurisdiction, e.g., as regards inscriptions.—oa.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

CEMETERY CHAPEL.—There is no necessary reason why C. chapels should be the cold and formal places that they almost invariably are at present. Probably the most beautiful C. chapel that exists is that designed by the late G. F. Watts at Compton in Surrey, where the panels set forth in soft colours the imagery of the Unseen World and the emblems of Redemption. Of course ordinary chapels could not emulate the artistic wealth which is so remarkable at Compton, but pictures after great artists representing, for example, our Lord's entombment and Resurrection could be procured at no great cost. It is a common thing now for all who can afford the additional expense to arrange for the first part of the Office for the Burial of the Dead to be said in the parish church; then the funeral cortège proceeds to the C. for the interment, thus avoiding the use of the C. chapel. But in the majority of cases this is not possible. The mourners have to endure the chill of the chapel which has been designed on the lines of a board room or a police court. A funeral is an occasion when associations are peculiarly strong and tender, and those who can do so are glad to have the associations of their parish church. But for those who find this not possible, it would be a matter for thankfulness, not easy to express, to have the hallowed feelings awakened by sacred art.—R6.

H. GIBSON SMITH.

CENSER (or THURIBLE).—The vessel used for burning INCENSE.

CENSURES, ECCLESIASTICAL.—A general term for sentences of varying severity, grouped in App. A5.

CENTURY.—At the end of the 17th, 18th, and 19th cents. controversy arose as to whether the C. begins with the year ending 00 or with the year ending 01. In the year 1900 the Astronomer Royal wrote from Greenwich Observatory, Jan. 1, 1900:

"The twentieth century begins on January 1, 1901. It has been generally agreed to call the first day of the Christian era A.D. 1, not A.D. 0, and consequently the second century begins with A.D. 101, a hundred years after the beginning of the first year, and so on for succeeding centuries. . . ."—c6.

FREDC. F. GRENTED.

CEREMONIAL.—A prescribed or customary order of ceremonies. (See CEREMONY.)

CEREMONY.—This term, though used also loosely and in cognate or extended senses, properly denotes any action, posture, movement, gesture, or outward usage, which accompanies the utterance of the words of a rite or form of service, or qualifies the rendering of it. That this is the sense in Pref.³, "Of Ceremonies" (see RITUAL, § 19), is confirmed by the contemporary documents printed under RITUAL LAW, § 6 (Art. 2 and Injn. 2). See further, CHRISTIAN RELIGION, § 15, and, more fully, RITUAL VI (CEREMONIAL).—B3. G. HARFORD.

CERTIFICATE (a) Of death.—At any funeral a C. of death obtained from the registrar of births and deaths must be delivered to the person who performs the funeral service or has charge of the burial, as the case may be, under a penalty of 40s. If the C. be not delivered, the person who ought to have received it must give notice of the burial in writing to the registrar within seven days under a penalty of £10. (b) Of burial.—Every burial must be registered in a book provided by the owner of the burial ground, and a certified copy of the entry may be obtained by anyone on payment of 2s. 7d. (See also DILAPIDATIONS).—Oa. HUGH R. P. GAMON.

CHAIR.—(1) Among the furniture every vestry ought to possess should be two or three suitable chairs. (2) Modern churches are not uninfrequently provided with chairs for the seating of the congregation. Though these are neither so ecclesiastical or so convenient as pews or benches, yet they have the advantage of costing much less. When they are adopted, thin strips of wood ought to be nailed on the floor behind each row of Cs. and the Cs. fastened together to prevent confusion, noise and danger. Further, the successive rows ought not to be placed so near together as to render kneeling difficult or impossible. (3) For Bishop's C., see THRONE.—R5. J. W. TYLER.

CHALICE (Latin calix).—The cup in which the wine is consecrated in the HC, and from which the priest and people com-

1. Definition. communicate. By a figure of speech C. is often used as synonymous with "the Communion of the Blood of Christ," e.g.:

"And oh, what transport of delight
From Thy pure Chalice floweth."

The word C. is used once in the present PB; in the last rubric in the Pr. of Consecration. Elsewhere, the word "cup" is used as its synonym. In the First PB "Chalice" occurs three times, in the Second PB not at all.

In the early Church Cs. of glass were often used, and less frequently Cs. of ivory, horn, wood and base metals. But a restriction to the

2. Material. precious metals was soon enforced by custom. St. Augustine and St. Chrysostom speak of Cs. of gold and silver. This custom became law, possibly at the Council of Rheims in 847. Cs. of the early Middle Ages, as those preserved at Nancy (10th cent.) and at Rheims (12th cent.), were set with many precious stones. In England the Council of Celchyth (787) forbade the use of horn Cs.: the canons of St. Dunstan prescribed metal. Finally, a decree included in the Corpus juris ordered that if not of gold the C. must be of silver, or of pewter in cases of extreme poverty, and all other materials were prohibited. In the English Ch. aft. the Reformation pewter Cs. were frequently used in poor parishes.

Many of the early Cs. were two-handled cups. From the 11th cent. onward they were usually made with a wide, shallow bowl, a short stem
3. Shape. broader than the bowl to ensure stability. In the 13th cent. the stem tended to be made longer, the bowl deeper and more conical, and in the 14th cent. the stem and knop were given an angular section, and the foot became hexagonal. In examples of the end of the 15th cent. little ornaments were added to the angles of the hexagonal foot. The Tudor type (1510-1536) had a less conical bowl, and a six-lobed foot.

From the Carolingian period onward the people were often communicated from the C.

4. Use in the Communion of the People. by a silver pipe or reed (cp. Imitation of Christ 44). After the 12th cent. COMMUNION IN ONE KIND gradually became the rule for the laity, and was finally authorised by the Council of Constance (1414-1418). When at the Reformation the C. was restored to the laity the old Cs. were found inconveniently small. Between 1560 and 1570, probably by direction of Abp. Parker, a "decent Communion cuppe" was substituted for the C. "heretofore used at Masse." The Elizabethan type has a deep, straight-sided bowl, a thick stem with a small knop, and a small domical foot. The 17th cent. Cs. have usually a baluster stem, and a deep bowl, conical or straight-sided.

The Rubric of the PB directs the minister to "deliver" the cup to the communicant, and canon 21 of 1604 employs the same word. The C. should therefore be given into the hands of the communicant. (See also PLATE.)—R3.

E. HERMITAGE DAY.

CHALICE, MIXED.—See MIXED CHALICE.

CHANCEL.—That part of the church which contains the Holy Table. The name (from can-celli = screenwork) is due to the

1. The Place. fact that this part was, from the very earliest times, divided from the rest of the church by some kind of screen or barrier, the form and height of which have varied greatly at various periods and in different countries. In England any part of a church screened off and containing an altar was called a C., but the word generally designated that containing the principal, or high, altar. From the circumstance that in England the C. besides containing the altar also accommodated the persons who sang the Divine service, the word Choir or QUIRE was frequently used as a synonym for C., as in the rubrics of the first PB of Edw. VI. The C. is in most churches a distinct portion of the structure, of different width and height from the body of the church, and opening into it by an arch. The Cs. of English parish chs. in the Norman and Early English periods of architecture were, with some notable exceptions, of small size, intended only to contain the altar and accommodate the clerk or the few chanters who assisted the priest in singing the service. But, during the two centuries that preceded the Reformation beginning from the reign of Edward III, many hundreds of Cs. in all parts of England were built or rebuilt on a larger plan, and fitted with choir-stalls for the accommodation of singers.

The ORNAMENTS RUBRIC directs that "the Morning and Evening Pr. shall be used in the accustomed place of the Church, Chapel, or C." This direction assumed its present form in 1559. In Edw. VI's First PB (1549) it was enjoined that these Offices were to be said by "the Priest, being in the Quire" (i.e., the C.); but in place of this we find in the 2nd PB (1552)—"in such place of the Church, Chapel, or C. . . as the people may best hear." And it is here that we first find the clause that "the chancels shall remain, as they have done in time past," which was retained in 1559, and has continued down to the present time. The direction in 1559 seems intended to cover a certain latitude of practice as to the place where the Offices were to be said. During the reign of Elizabeth it became more and more usual to conduct the service from a reading-pew outside the C.—a practice which was in fact enjoined by some of the bishops. And, as the singers were by this time beginning to be very generally transferred to a West gallery, the chancels stood empty, or were utilised for the seats of the more influential parishioners.

2. Chancellor in PB.

The obligation of repairing the C. rests with the owner of the great tithes of the benefice.

3. Repair of Chancel.

Originally this would in every case be the priest of the parish, known as the RECTOR. But in course of time the great tithes in many parishes became appropriated to some religious house, and the priest, known as the VICAR, received only the small tithes. At the Reformation the tithes held by religious houses were transferred either to colleges at the Universities or to private individuals, but the obligation of keeping the C. in repair still rests, as it has always done, with the owners of the great tithes, whoever they may be.—R6.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

CHANCELLOR OF A CATHEDRAL.—In a CATHEDRAL ch. of the Old FOUNDATION, the C. (sometimes specifically styled "of the church," or "of the choir") is the seal-keeper, and is writer and custodian of letters from and to the chapter. In many dioceses he is entrusted with a general superintendence of education, and specially of theological study.¹ The office must not be confounded with that of C. of a diocese.—A3.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CHANCELLOR OF A DIOCESE.—In every English diocese the bishop has, virtute officii, a CONSISTORY COURT. In this court the Chancellor of the Diocese sits as judge, authorised by a commission or patent under the seal of the bishop, whereby the latter usually commits all jurisdiction to him, whether voluntary or contentious, under two separate offices, those of VICAR GENERAL and OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL.

¹ See Walcott, Cathedrales 34 (1865).

Copies of the commissions in Eng. dioceses are printed in Rep. Eccl. Courts Comm., 1881 (1883), ii, 659-698. Various forms of words practically reserving to the bp. the right to sit in the court to hear certain cases (see R. v. Tristram, L.R., 1902, 2 K.B. 816) appear in sixteen of these.¹ A bp. may be compelled to appoint a chancellor, and the metropolitan should appoint in case of his failure (Godolphin 81).

In the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 12, "chancellor" is defined as "the judge of the Consistory Court, by whatever name known." Though nominated by the bp., the C. is, in the trial of cases under that Act, a king's judge, sitting in one of the king's courts. He must preside in the Consistory Court, and he alone is to determine any question of law; but he is not able to depose from holy orders, this being reserved to the bp., who must also pronounce sentences of deprivation and declarations of incapacity to hold preferment. By canon 127, a C. must be at least 26 years old, "learned in the civil and eccles. laws, and at the least a Master of Arts, or Bachelor of Law"; he must be "reasonably well practised in the course thereof, as likewise well affected and zealously bent to religion, touching whose life and manners no evil example is had"; he must take the Oath of allegiance and assent to the Arts. of Religion.

A bp. may (Cl. Disc. Act, 1892, § 10) appoint as deputy chancellor a barrister of not less than seven years' standing.

The number of persons qualified as above for the functions of C. is not large, and Whitaker's Almanack, 1910, shows that one person is C. of five dioceses, a second of four, and so in smaller numbers. The bp. of Southwark does not appear to have appointed a chancellor.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CHANCERY COURT OF YORK.—The provincial court of the northern Abp. is called the Chancery Court, and its judge is called the official principal or auditor. Under 37 and 38 Vict., c. 85, the judge of the Court of Arches is now also judge of the CC. of York.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CHANT, ANGLICAN.—This article will deal with the origin of the AC.,² and with its earlier history, which is still somewhat obscured. The evidence is the written record, which the destruction of books has left imperfect, interpreted by knowledge of conditions, and supplemented by probable inference. Whatever is here written applies only to the chanting of the Psalms and Canticles.

When Ed. VI's First PB ordered the Psalms to be sung in English,³ there was only one way in which that could be done, namely, to sing them, as the Latin Psalms had been sung, in unison to ¹ In all cases not de facto excepted he has ordinary jurisdiction, jure proprio et non per deputacionem.

² PLAINSONG is treated separately. For terminology of C. form see that art. and CHANTING.

³ It must not be overlooked that the realisation of Cranmer's design of putting the new wine into the old bottles was impeded not only by religious prejudice against Latin use, but also by the very condition of the Latin music, which was itself in a state of change and confusion.

the Gregorian tones. The incompatibility¹ between the new words and the old music was probably unsuspected; and with such tones as had but one note in mediation, and two in cadence, it was easy to make formal adaptation, but with longer chants nothing could be done without notation. It cannot be guessed what experiments were actually tried, but Merbecke's book, which came out in the following year, though entirely unisonal, did not help in this as much as was perhaps expected of it: for (as if to show how little difficulty there was) he sets Venite to the 8th tone with short 1st ending, and then orders the same C. for both morning and evening Pss. and in three other places. In all his nine fully noted Canticles he uses but seven Cs., and wastes many pages in noting every verse of Benedicite, although the identical refrain covers all the musical movement, so that one verse would have sufficed. And, since there is neither record nor vestige of any book that pointed the Eng. Pss. to the Tones, it must be concluded that only the very simplest of the chant-tones can ever have been commonly used in the reformed service. Moreover, the notings of the Eng. Canticles that have survived show no sign of any progress towards a solution of the difficulties, such as must have come of continuous experience.

1. The Conditions in 1560.

Quite distinct from this old unisonal fast chanting, there was another practice, that of singing the Tones in vocal harmony; and this had become variously elaborated, and may be divided into two kinds, according as (a) the C. form overruled the music, or (b) the music obliterated the C. and became more like a note-under-note motett than a C. The following setting of Tone VIII by Josquin Després² (died 1521) will illustrate the former kind (a):

Ex. 1.

Now this C. differs from the old tradition by being in four voice-parts on a harmonic system that fixes and enforces accents and time-values. The chanting is wholly altered in character, being slow and sustained; and, since the Recitation moved no faster than the rest of the C., it is somewhat stiff and tedious. When such settings were used for special Pss. or Cants., it became a custom that the Cantors should sing the alternate verses in unison, while the choir responded in their slower harmony, which could only justify itself by elaboration. These Modulations, as they were called, quickly came to take liberties with the Canto fermo, and in Italy soon dispensed with it altogether, as in this later ex., by G. M. Nanino (d. 1603). It has no CF. and the Cantor takes up his tone on C \sharp after the chord of A maj.

¹ This incompatibility is explained in art. CHANTING, § 1.

² Ex. 1, reference lost. Ex. 2, from Bordes, with his barring: Anthol. des Maîtres Rel.: Motets, 69, where it is in notes of half value one tone lower. Ex. 3 is from Capes, Select. from Palestrina, p. 169.

Ex. 2.

The following is a Miserere by Palestrina, without CF.:

Ex. 3.

As for the other manner (b) in which the chant-form came to be obscured and ultimately lost in the elaboration of the setting, Day's book, Certain Notes, etc., which was published in 1560, and intended to supply part-music for more accomplished choirs, shows that this style of writing was much practised in England. It is the origin of our "Services," and has strictly no relation with the AC., nor would it be mentioned here but for the fact that the settings which Barnard has preserved of Pss. by Tallis and Byrd happen to be in a midway condition between (a) and (b), and are of importance because they not only show a tendency to fall into what ultimately came to be the AC. rhythm but even contain such Cs. The following exs. are taken from Bishop's scoring of Barnard, with the transcriber's barring:

Ex. 4.

live and keep thy word.

The above is from Tallis's 2nd Psalm; the whole is regular throughout, and his first Ps. is the same C. (Tone 1) differently harmonised, and these are indistinguishable from class (a). The ex. following is from Byrd's setting of Ps. 114. It has no CF. The extract given is used as a double C. at Wells Cathedral to this Psalm.

Ex. 5.

The sea saw that and fled; Jor-dan was dri - ven back. The moun-tains skipp-ed like rams, and the lit-tle hills.... like young sheep.

These compositions, though they seem pointing the way to our modern C., had probably no direct influence on its evolution, except in so far as that Ex. 4 may have produced Ex. 6. They are new experiments in setting Eng. Pss. The only AC. known to have been written at this date is Tallis's very beautiful Quicunque, which is in a different form, having two notes in mediation and one in cadence. Ex. 6 has been ascribed to Tallis, but is probably by Adrian Batten, more than fifty years later. Ang. single Cs. ascribed to composers of the Reformation period have no known authority, and may be assumed to be compilations of the last century.

To pass to the time of the Restoration: at this date we find the tradition of Church music so lost that knowledge of it was confined to a few persons, who, for the instruction of the re-established choirs, published books so elementary as to prove that the practice of chanting was virtually extinct. The first of these by Lowe, in 1661, has two unisonal Cs. for the Venite, viz., the Ch. Ch. tune (Ex. 6), and the 8th Tone: then these again with Tallis's Quicunque, all in four parts, for the Te D. or Benedictus, with a direction that these last "may serve for the Psalms on Festival days, when the Quiremen are well skill'd in song." From the prominence of the "Ch. Ch. tune" in records of this date we may conclude that it had seen active service. The most probable tradition ascribes it to Batten, so that it may now have been some forty-five years old; and it has thus some title to the fatherhood of all AC., being a setting of the 1st Tone (like Ex. 4) in the Ang. form. It is misprinted in Lowe; the following is from a MS. by Dr. Aldrich:

Ex. 6.

Lowe brought out a 2nd ed. of his book in 1664, and in the same year a 2nd ed. of Clifford's anthem-book was published. In both of these there are eleven Latin tones set without harmony to the first v. of the Venite, also one for Ps. 136, which is thus noted by Clifford—the Ps. is probably chosen because the refrain allowed the noting of one v. (bad or good) to serve for all.

O give thanks un-to the Lord, for he is gra - ci - ous and his mer-cy en - dur - eth for ev - er.

This specimen goes far to prove that there was no tradition from Merbecke. In the Venite he treats the words "our salvation" as five syllables, which was archaic. All is very clumsy. The harmonised Cs. in both books are Tallis's Quicunque (which is now called "Canterbury"), the "Ch. Ch.," and "the Imperial tune," which last is a setting of the 8th tone by Dr. Child, as follows:

Ex. 7.

From these two examples (6 and 7) it would seem as if the AC. form were already arrived at. This was not the case. Both these Cs., which should be compared with Ex. 1, must still have preserved the fiction of their original penultimate accent, though the harmony had destroyed it: and the common practice of setting out the C. to the first verse of Venite, which happens to have a penultimate accent on the word "salvation," was probably the unsuspected cause which prevented the acceptance of the final accent: and yet that word was apparently sung with almost any pronunciation except the spoken one, so that there was a fiction in the words as well as a fiction in the music. It was so confused a misunderstanding that it defies analysis. If only the second v. had come first it seems that the long-anticipated solution must have been earlier arrived at.

When the musicians returned from their string-concerts to the re-established choirs, their activity showed itself mainly in the composition of Anthems and Services, and the metrical Pss. soon began to divert attention from the beautiful prose Pss. But even where the Pss. were not chanted, the lack of Cs. for the Canticles made a pressing demand; and at least fifty or sixty original Cs. were quickly contributed. As these were afterwards all reduced to the subsequently prevailing form, it cannot be guessed, without more investigation of the old books, exactly through what stages the experiments passed. We must be content to show that there was not yet any agreement about the rhythm of the C., though we may suppose that our Exs. 6 and 7 were not without influence, and would have been accepted as models, if they had satisfied in practice. The following exs., copied from contemporary books, will illustrate the actual conditions.

2. Period of Experiment (to 1770).

New Chants. The Cs. were still sometimes written without any bar except between the divisions, thus (Ch. Ch., Oxford):

or the Recit. notes were separated off thus (Brit. Mus.):

The second of the crotchets in the first Recit. was sometimes a moving note with moving bass; in such cases it became a part of the mediation, and, unless it made a triplet, drew the first crotchet also with it, when the C. took this form, the second Recit. renouncing its crotchets:

or, where the mediation was short, the divisions were made to correspond thus (Ch. Ch.):

or the alla breve time was thus shown (Ch. Ch.):

or the penultimate accent was asserted in alla breve bars (Chichester):

In 1678 Playford prints Turner's chants thus:

O come, let us sing un-to the Lord, Let us heartily re-joice in the strength of our sal - va - ti - on.

making the two divisions to correspond by taking two minims from the first recitation, and giving a choice between triple time and penultimate accent by writing two minims in each division as crotchets, the whole C. being thus:

and so little did the common time accent please, that after Boyce in 1760 had so printed the Cs. in his Cathedral Music, i.e., with two minims to the bar, his continuator, Arnold, twenty years later repudiated it, and set out his Cs. thus:

The only assertion that can safely be made is that it was out of the above experiments that our present chant-form arose, and that, when the beautiful minor C. attributed to Thos. Purcell had been set out as here shown, nothing more was done:

Ex. 9.

Now if this chant be compared with our Ex. 7 it will be found to have exactly the same relation towards it, as Ex. 2 has to Ex. 1. It is a free original composition in the style of the time and based on the older form. Only the style in favour in 1680 was not counterpoint but harmonised melody, and the poorest attempts in the current fashion were preferred to the best of the old. On the other hand, it is plain that the common-time barring (which was probably adopted for its assistance in dividing the words) and the rigid form are a confession of failure. It is evident that the experiments died out before they had attained their aim of finding an elastic form: they survived awhile in the "chanting tunes" set out for the Canticles in metrical Ps. books: and from them we may conclude that the chanting, so far as notation of words to music is concerned, was always very bad. Here is a specimen from a Bodleian MS. The whole of Venite is pointed in this style:

O come, let us sing un-to the Lord, Let us heart-i - ly re-joice in the strength of our sal - va - ti - on.

The problem still remains to be solved, and there is now plenty of experience.

The double C. is merely two single chant-forms so composed that there is an antiphonal musical relation between them.

4. The Double Chant. The effect of varying the antiphonal response, which is a natural and beautiful evolution, was old, and fully heard in "Modulations," as in Exs. 2 and 5, and in many antiphonal settings of the Cants., whether Modulations or Faux Bourdons; and the choral antiphony was semper et ubique between the verses, not the halves of the verses. But our double C. arose, no doubt, under the influence of two overpowering modern motives; first, when the C. had become a harmonised melody, its ten notes were a forbidding limitation; secondly, the metrical Psalter in CM. verse suggested the double form, and those who composed for the prose version eagerly appropriated what they could of the musical form which rendered the shabby doggerel popular. There are two curious illustrations of the connection between the CM. Ps. tune and the double C.; the first is that in a book of metrical psalmody dating 1547 a double C. is actually contrived out of the 7th tone to serve as a common tune for all the metrical psalms. (It may be seen in Grove's Dict. under Psalter.) The second illustration is that Flintoft's double C. in G minor (about 1720) is an adaptation from a metrical Ps. tune. The earliest double C. found is that recorded in a counter-tenor choir-book at Oxford, most probably before 1700; it is thus:

Ex. 10.
1st Verse.

2nd Verse.

Good double Cs. were written at all periods; but too many have taken them in hand, and the books swarm with compositions ridiculous for lack of taste, of musical skill and of religious feeling. Even musicians like Attwood and Battishill, who both wrote worthy Cs. in the style of their time, would sometimes excel in rollicking to meet the popular taste. What we now deem vulgar had an actual charm. Beckwith of Norwich, who, in 1808, published a book with C. to the first verse of every Ps., thus sets the 136th:

Ex. 11.
Sh - on king of the Amorites: For - an - dur - eth

Ora. CHOR.

for ev er: And Og the king of Haan:

Ora.

For - en - du - reth for ev - er.

CHOR.

The sympathetic performance of this by the Eton boys was only a few years ago discontinued; but, though the more rollicking Cs. have disappeared, what may be called "rowdy" Cs. are favourites in our parish churches. The following by Woodward of Dublin, 1770, is a good example:

Ex. 12.

It is noisy and commonplace and distorts the words without compensation. Some of the florid chants are beautiful, the following setting (by Geo. Elvey?) of a C. by Robert Cooke (d. 1814) is such a one:

Ex. 13.

This C. is docked of a good many crotchets, which is an advantage on all grounds; but the singers for whom the florid chants of that period were composed plainly commanded more vocal execution than those for whom the corresponding books are now compiled. The numerous cheap Psalters supply a fuller history of the development of the double C. than could be attempted here. A double C. is adapted to those verses which do not agree in pairs with the music by treating one half of it freely as a single Chant. A triple C. is justified by some psalms, e.g., 136. A quadruple C. (and some have been composed) seems a useless excrescence. There is now a sufficient body of dignified and almost romantic music to make the chanting of the Pss., especially as rendered in our cathedrals, one of the most stable charms of our national service.—Q2.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

CHANTING.—This article deals with the theory and practice of singing the Pss. to Anglican Chants (for the use of Gregorian Chants see PLAINSONG).

1. English Accentuation.

Some preliminary remarks on the ultimate accent are necessary. The Ang. Chant has a strong accent on its final note. The Latin Chant had a penultimate accent, due to the Latin speech-accent, with which the chant had grown up. English differs from Latin. In Latin no polysyllable is accented on the last, and the monosyllables are few, and rarely end a sentence. In English the accented finals are frequent (they are predominant in the Psalms¹), for the stressed monosyllables are common (nouns, verbs, and adjectives), and many polysyllables are accented on the last. Again, the Latin vowels are few and sonorous. In English the numerous vowels are some of them obscure, and when unaccented unable to sustain any significant note. All this created an incompatibility between the old music and the new words. The old penultimate accent was traditional and cannot but have had ample trial: no attempt at conciliation has ever succeeded, and as the result of practice the Anglican chant settled down to a final accent. Since this article is practical, and accepts actual conditions, there would be no need to explain further, if there were not recurrent attempts to reintroduce the Latin penultimate accent into our English C., the main argument in favour of it being the objection felt to breaking up the accented final of the music into crotchets distributed over a polysyllable, etc. In face of this it is expedient to show that the penultimate accent is no solution, and that the distribution of syllables over the final is correct.

If the penultimate accent of the chant were of any service, it should suit verses which end with a disyllable that has its first

2. Penultimate Accent in English.

Now had harmony never been introduced, the Latin chant might possibly have been adaptable to such words; but the penultimate accent in music now implies harmonic movement, and the English words in question will not suffer anything so strong. E.g., Ps. 68 has many penultimate accents in the finals of the verses, and it is commonly set to Tone 8, 2nd ending, which exactly suits escape death in v. 20. But experiment will show how other endings suffer. Of course all the monosyllables are tortured, but even the heavy paroxytones, e.g., joyful, habitation, scarceness, weary, preachers, which the ending should suit, are also distorted. Henry Purcell, who had a genius for the expression of vocal units in music, and lacked no imaginative resource, and was almost lawless in his liberty, expresses such words in his verse-anthems either by repetition of the accented note, or by movement of a third on a fixed bass. The rule is that the harmonic bass does not move. His anthems are full of examples, and Handel's "Comfort ye" shows the practice perfectly. The speech accent of such words is distorted by having its vocal significance expressed by a dominant-tonic progression; and any harmonic movement of sufficient strength to make a close is too much for them. A "suspension" suits them; it is commonly sung in Handel's recitatives, which all follow Purcell's rule. The repetition then of the accented note is correct and good practice, and even Merbecke himself used it in his first experiments. Therefore the only objection is the musical objection that a full close should not have its final dissipated in small notes; and that is true;¹ but it is an objection not fully applicable to chant music, and untenable by those whose professed aim is to obtain the best speech expression. Its unpleasant effect in our C. is due to the chant being sung like a hymn-tune, which disregards everything but itself; and accordingly as that practice is given up (as I am about to urge) the objection must disappear; and indeed this treatment of the final should aid in obtaining the true C. effect.

¹ Of the 2,508 verse-endings some 1,260 are accented finals, and some 280 accented short penultimates, which must be treated as finals. This makes some 1,540 against 960 non-finals.

The Ang. single chant is a one-line hymn-rhythm (see below), and the double chant has close affinity with the metrical psalm-tune (see CHANT). Besides this it is also the fact that the chant is commonly sung as a hymn-tune with licence to crowd or extend refractory syllables. It will be convenient to divide our description of the practice artificially under two heads, according as the chant is treated as a hymn-tune or as a chant.

If the chant be sung as a hymn-tune, the bar-accent and time of the music will be strictly observed, and will override the speech-accent where they do not coincide and cannot be easily accommodated. Also the words that fall to the melody will be more important than those on the recitation-notes, for these will tend to be hurried or delayed in order to wrest the recitation note into time. If on the other hand the chant be sung as a chant, then the recitation will be as important as the melody, strict time-values will disappear, and interpretation of the melody will be guided by the words. In either case the aim is to bring the accents of words and music into correspondence, and where the words happen to fall into the hymn-tune rhythm there is practically no difference between the systems. To sing an Ang. chant as a hymn-tune is very easy, and as the practice of C. the Psalms was extended to unskilled choirs, this method naturally prevailed, and was degraded so as to make it still easier. On the other hand, to subordinate the strong melody to the irregular rhythms of the prose Psalms is extremely difficult, and few choirs are skilled enough to attain much proficiency. What is now esteemed the best C. is a modification of the hymn-tune method; and though it will appear that the freest C. may be attained by the use of time-fictions on that basis; yet for the sake of exposition it is best to keep to this artificial distinction. The chant will be considered as single, a double chant being only the same rhythm repeated.

¹ This was Lucas Pearsall's objection, and those who share it may study his treatise in the Sammelbände der internationalen Musikgesellschaft, Jan., 1907. His system is adapted from Latin practice, and based on a theory that the Recitation should be recited and the Meditation and Cadence sung. The last syllable of each division goes to its last note, and the next accented syllable before it begins Meditation or Cadence. Thus a verse ending with two might have four notes on ev, while verses like my Ex. 3b would not be dissimilar from my settings. Such opposite effects and inconsistencies are very apparent. The distinction too between reciting and singing twice in each verse is untenable, and the result, though generally sonorous, is a perpetual distortion of speech-rhythm. The Free-rhythm Psalter, which gives a penultimate accent to all chants, challenges notice by its title, but deserves no further criticism than that the title is a misnomer.

This being the scheme of ten notes, with their received group-names, the first question is how they should be barred. As a matter of fact the chant is usually barred in common-time, with equal alternate accents, thus:

Ex. 2.

Praise him sun and moon; Praise him all ye stars and light.

This is the worst way because it introduces the greatest possible number of primary musical accents. It is plainly only suitable where, as in the verse chosen, the words happen to be weighty syllables with corresponding alternate accents. In such a case it is right and identical with free C.; but the cases are few. The Pss. were versified in order to obtain such lines of regular length with regular accents corresponding with the accents of common tunes. The prose version has not got them; and the more fixed accents a chant has, the less adaptable is it to the text.

A better way then will be to reduce its accents by barring it in alla breve time, with four notes instead of two in the bar; which gives the following rhythm:

12—(2422)

Ex. 3.

(a) [the] Lord is my strength And . . defence of his a-nointed. 28 9

(b) Lord keep the city; The . . wak-eth but in vain. 127 2

This is the old favourite sapphic rhythm of Nocte surgentes, Herzliebster Jesu, Monk's Abide with me, etc. Though I believe that musicians are now generally agreed that this alla breve barring is the better account of the rhythm,¹ it seems a matter of taste, and the preference unhesitatingly given to it depends on its æsthetic superiority, and on the convenience of having half of the fixed accents reduced to a secondary and shifting condition. They can be used or not as required. And the advantage is in practice very convincing. None the less it is true that most of our chants were deliberately composed in alternate accent, and some of them are by their nature intractable; but they will generally yield, and are often surprisingly improved by being forced out of their obstinate intentions.

The words in recitation should be sung at the same pace as the words in melody; the melody should have a slight tendency to be the quicker, as if the sense had escaped from bonds into freedom rather than the reverse; and this hastening is most necessary in the 2nd Div. (see Ex. 1) in the four-note bar, where it assists the primary accent to override the forceful intrusion of the dominant preparing the close when that occurs inopportunately on the 8th note of the chant. In C. in alla breve time, if the accent on note 1 is required to assert itself against the secondary accent on note 2 (as in Ex. 3a), then it is necessary to have some syllable of the first Recitation marked in the word-books as the commencement of that bar, as is now the common plan: but observe that the second recitation note is not in this condition, and that in the second division of the chant, if the accent on note 6 is to have its full value, then the only syllable that needs a mark is the one chosen to commence the bar on that note. The whole of the 2nd Recitation is imagined as an extension of the 2nd bar, and to force a word into time-accent within it contradicts the rhythm and produces a strong accent on the 8th note.

A choir that has only got so far as this may chant the Pss. with good effect. They have choice of two rhythms, and, as either division can be in either rhythm, there are four variations, and with a hybrid 2nd division (made by commencing Div. 2 like Div. 1 in Ex. 3), there are six. But in proportion as excellence is attained there will be dissatisfaction with the verses that do not fit into the system. Whatever devices are sought to get rid of the false accents and the crowding and extension of syllables, which are constantly injuring the sense in any form of duple rhythm, these will all fall under the next head, i.e., the practice of treating the chant as a chant.

¹ My old friend, Sir John Stainer, accepted it without qualification, although it is his books that have done perhaps most to establish the common-time practice. And he admitted to me that the system which he had adopted for the convenience of those who used his books was open to the reproach with which I charged it; and he approved of my contentions.

The logical need is for devices which will make the chant-rhythm give way to the words without destroying the rhythmical unity or the harmonic structure. 7. Chant treated as a Chant. It must be clearly perceived that what we are now engaged in is to adapt the values and accents of the musical notes to the fixed predetermined values and accents of the words; so that the words will determine the note-values and accents, not vice versa. The difficulty is to exhibit the speech-rhythm to the eye intelligibly in common terms of musical notation: the musical notation can only give the corresponding types of musical rhythm, the free interpretation of which will allow the syllables of the prose to keep their true natural speech-rhythm, with observation of accent and quantity.

I will take these devices in order of simplicity, as a preceptor might teach them; and will first treat of the first division 8. First Division. (see Ex. 1) which is comparatively easy.

The first thing to do is to shorten the recitation note when required, as:

Ex. 4. 1

(a)

(b)

When such a shortened recitation-note is unaccented and followed by an accent, the Mediation falls into the rhythm of Ex. 2. But when it is accented it will cause a triplet, thus:

Ex. 5.

(a) and the full recitation note may be thus concluded:

(b)

The use of this triplet should not supersede the prevalent duple-time use of two crotchets (for two syllables) on the 2nd note, where this latter form gives the more correct rhythm.

It will be convenient for exhibition of the pointing to bar the chant in all our examples in the form of ¹ The following examples will be written on this reduced stave of three lines, and transposed. The lowest line is Do, the top line Sol.

Ex. 2, that is, with two minims or a triplet in each bar; so that the first note of this triplet will be

9. Lesser Minims. taken over from the Recitation across the bar into the Mediation, as shown in the last Ex. But observe that the use of the triplet has introduced a lesser value of the minim; and this lesser minim, or large crotchet, once introduced, will come in naturally of itself whenever required to lighten the rhythm of all grouped notes, and even the regular bars of two notes, which then become parts of a larger group, though it may not be always necessary to indicate the full group-structure in the notation. In the case of the simple barred triplet there is no occasion to distinguish this lesser minim, because there is no other interpretation of the barred triplet possible, and no one can misread it; but in all other cases it will be written for distinction as a small minim; and it must be remembered that this small minim is practically a crotchet; and that small minims and minims in triplet are to be read as crotchets.

Now, in such a simple chant as we have chosen, this first step is easy and perfectly convincing; and if we examine what we have done, it is merely this: we have

10. Groups of Notes. thrown back the accent off the second note of the chant into the recitation (just as it is thrown back in alla breve barring, see Ex. 3), and we have reduced notes 2 and 3 to unaccented crotchets; and we have done this because the accents of the words were not "alternate," but separated by two syllables; and as this condition gave us the triplet, so a further separation of the speech-accents by 3, 4 or 5 short syllables (or their equivalents) will give us larger groups, and force the accent further back into the Recitation; and these larger groups will (with or without the aid of syncopation) fall into recognised musical forms almost as easy as the triplet. And just as the triplet shortened the minim-unit, so all the larger groups will have their units shortened, and will therefore be written as small minims, and read as crotchets. The fiction of the common-time barring is preserved as the easiest way of identifying the notes of the chant.

Groups of four are merely a hastening on light syllables of the¹ usual alla breve rhythm of Ex. 3, familiar in the practice of all choirs who use that barring, e.g.:

Ex. 6.

A group of five is quite natural and easy:

Ex. 7.

¹ This does not of course forbid or exclude the full alla breve type of four larger minims, where that is called for by weighty syllables as "Lord, keep the" in Ex. 3 b.

² In singing mine will come out longer than in by mutual accommodation.

and sixes are Turner's rhythm

(see CHANT, Ex. 8), that is, a large triplet of three full minim values, e.g.:

Ex. 8.

see-eth that I be a - venged. 18 43 bear of me they shall o - bey me. 18 45 e - ne-mies and o - ver - take them. 18 37 which are the simple speech-rhythms, expressed here in crotchets and easily read from a typical notation.

But the commonest type of all the larger groups kills the accent on note 2 of the chant by syncopation of the reciting note on some unaccented syllable which allows of extension, and this may be expressed thus¹:

11. Syncopated Recitation Note.

Ex. 9.

(a) Thy téstimo - nies..... are..... won - der - ful 119 129 which may for the sake of explanation be thus shown in crotchets:

(b)

Thy tes - ti - mo - nies are won - der - ful.

And thus would be read under this type such verses as these (I show the lesser triplet minims as crotchets):

(c)

6 flat - ter him with their mouth. 78 36

(d)

6 Con - si - der my com - plaint. 142 7

Though rarely if ever necessary in this first division, it may here be observed that notes 1, 2 and 3 of the chant can be sung without any accent at all (see Exs. 22, 23).

The above devices might be taught to a choir in two or three rehearsals. We will now proceed to the more difficult second division. It is here set out in common-time as in Ex. 2:

12. Second Division.

¹ This simple invention of Dr. Allen's is of the greatest value and with his syncopation of the cadence (see below) conquers the chant accent.

Ex. 10.

Ending.

5 6 7 8 9 10

As all the devices for the first division may be used to commence the second, these will carry us down to note 8 of the chant; and, since in our chosen chant the second division repeats the first one note lower, all our examples for the first division can be read as for the second division by taking them one note lower: we have therefore to consider only how to deal with the last three notes, 8, 9 and 10. (Triplets will of course be read as before as lesser minims or crotchets.)

Calling these three notes the "ending," and taking the notes 5, 6 and 7 in the common time of Ex. 2 for our basis, then our 13. The Endings. first ending is the common-time ending as there shown.

The second ending is made by borrowing a note by syncopation from note 7—as we have previously borrowed from the recitation (Ex. 9)—to make a triplet, thus:

Ex. 11.

This essential and simple device,¹ invented by Dr. Allen, finally and completely masters the most intractable part of the Anglican chant. Its use will be fully illustrated below.

The third ending is to make a triplet of 8, 9, by repeating 8. This is only a slight modification of the double crotchet and minim in common use, and a nearer representation of the best way of singing them, thus:

Ex. 12.

The fourth ending is to shorten notes 8 and 9 to lesser values, that is, to two crotchets, which is Turner's ending, and with Ex. 8 in the first division gives his whole chant. This ending is very useful:

Ex. 13.

In this large triplet (involving two bars) the two crotchets are written as lesser minims for the convenience of preserving the bar-fiction to the eye.

The combinations of the above simple elements, too numerous to be tabulated here, will express almost any speech-rhythm, and may be sufficiently understood from the following illustrations, and from the subsequent remarks on the restrictions which they impose on the chant-structure. These examples will show the whole of the second division in its more irregular forms.

14. Illustrations.

¹ Byrd's syncopation, shown in Ex. 5 in the art. CHANT (ANGELICAN), may be compared. Pearsall devised a syncopation in this very place, but only by holding a syllable over the bar to cover notes 7 and 8.

Turner's ending:

Ex. 11.

Turner's ending with triplet:

Ex. 15.

Turner's large triplet taken (as in Div. 1) from the recitation note:

Ex. 16.

Alla breve barring commencing (as in Div. 1) in the recitation, in short values:

Ex. 17.

Double triplet:

Ex. 18.

Double triplet with Allen's syncopation:

Ex. 19.

Allen's syncopation without triplet:

Ex. 20.

The type etc., which was explained under the first division may here be shown in the second:

Ex. 21.

With the lesser minims written as crotchets, and recitation also noted, this would read thus:

The following examples will show how in short verses the first three notes can be sung without any accent. The indication in the notation which we have used would be thus—for such rhythms as these:

Ex. 22.

Ex. 23.

This last syncopation becomes as familiar as the common-time accent, just as in some popular waltzes, and would be heard as:

The elasticity is so great that the main question is how far it is practical to push it.

If the proper speech-accent be known to the singers, then very simple indications would suffice in the word books; and the Pss. thus pointed could be sung to any simple chant. All "passing notes" must of course be excised, and musicians will know what progressions are forbidding; but there is a very simple test, for any chant will fulfil the required conditions if it can be taken not only in common time but also in the following rhythm, to exhibit which I will note Mornington's well-known chant in Eb. The original is somewhat offensively maudlin, but it will be seen that without its passing notes and with its varied rhythms it is beautiful. The common-time form of course remains the constant basis:

Ex. 24.

Any chant that can be taken in the above rhythm will submit to all the various treatments which Dr. Allen's system imposes; to modern ears the triplet may be trusted even to override the common suspended 4th on the eighth note. Florid chants will not generally yield to speech-rhythms; most of them would have to be renounced; or if they are kept they must have their particular Pss. specially noted for them; and it is not too much to ask that a peculiar chant should have a special setting. Some peculiarities of course give peculiar opportunities, but C. that does not regard speech accent will never stand in competition against a system which observes it, when once its rich and incomparable beauty has been revealed.

After the bad practice which has so long obtained, and is inculcated in all the Church

Psalters, attention must be called to the importance of observing the actual relative duration or "quantities" of the syllables. Righteousness and enemies, for example, are not equivalent because they are both accented on the first syllable; nor are weary and heavy alike because written with the same vowels. Our pedantic and wrong spelling is a real obstacle: a Psalter printed in phonetics would automatically cure our C. of its worst faults. Accented syllables, whether long or short, should always have their natural speech-quantities respected, but the SHORT ARE MUCH MORE SENSITIVE THAN THE LONG. Consider and battle are not English words, and no one would sing their accented syllables long unless he were taught to do so. On the other hand, short unaccented syllables will often fill long unaccented places without distortion, and their extension is of great use, because it is a ready means of weakening an impending accent by syncopation. In any group of notes, even in the common-time bars, the notes should be mutually accommodating in their relative length values to suit the words that they carry. Nothing is worse in C. than strict time.

We have considered only how our English Pss. can be best chanted to our national music, and no precentor who has ever instructed a choir in good C. would suppose it possible for a congregation to join in such singing. But the nearer the C. can be brought to reproduce the speech-rhythm, the easier is it for a congregation to follow; indeed absolutely good C. would carry all the hearers with it, so they would almost think that they were themselves singing. No one can sing the Pss. who does not know them by heart; all he can be expected to do is to follow; and the better the singing the nearer he will attend. Congregational singing of the Canticles is possible, and should be assured before the Pss. are attempted. But if it is desired that everyone should sing the Pss., then nicety must be relinquished, and all the musician can do is to play loudly on the organ. The old plainsong chants are more suitable than Ang. chants for congregational singing, but they are not generally popular nor likely to become so. Every musician would encourage congregational singing of hymns, but even that is rare; and practice shows that it is only well-known tunes that are heartily sung. That is why the Metrical Psalter superseded C.; and it is singing the chant as a hymn-tune that has won it its present popularity. Where congregational singing is the self-indulgence of a minority it should not be encouraged in the Pss., for their extreme beauty and profound devotional effect are thus wantonly sacrificed. It may be supposed that the present use, distressing as it is to those who consider either music or devotion, has been arrived at through some kind of popular evolution. Where it satisfies, it will probably continue; where it does not, the instructions in this article may help to amend it.—92.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

CHANTRY.—A C. is an endowment for the maintenance of a priest to say Mass at a specified altar on behalf of the departed relatives of the founder. We begin to hear of these foundations in the middle of the 13th cent. In 1256 Wm. de Kenny, Bp. of Ely, bequeathed 200 marks for the endowment of two chaplains to celebrate for his soul. The Mortmain Act, 1278, made it necessary to obtain the licence of the Crown for these foundations; and in 1281 we find such a licence granted for the foundation of a C. in the ch. of Caistor in Ormesby (C.P.R., p. 423, Jan. 18). These foundations increased enormously during the 14th and 15th cents., and the Calendars of Patent Rolls are full of records of licences for them. The earliest reference in literature is probably that of Chaucer, Prolog. 509 (A.D. 1386), "and ran to Londone unto Seynte Paules, To seeken him a chaunterie for souls." There were nearly one hundred such foundations at St. Paul's, and at the dissolution there were thirty-five remaining, and fifty-four priests celebrating daily. By the Act of 1529 spiritual persons were forbidden to take any particular stipend or salary to sing for any soul. The Act of 1545 declared that there had been a covert surrender of these endowments to the representatives of the founders, and, in order to reduce them legally, these were henceforth to be vested in the Crown. Some of the Cs. had been scheduled in the Survey of 1535 and appear in the Valor Ecclesiasticus. The Act of 1545 ordered a systematic Survey and report, but the death of Henry VIII brought the work of the Commissioners to an end. By the Act of 1547 all Cs. and Colleges of Priests endowed for this purpose were given to the Crown, and the Royal Commission for the Survey and the Dissolution was appointed Feb. 13, 1548. Henry VIII had already suppressed 2,374 Cs., and of course all Cs. founded in monastic churches were swept away between 1536 and 1539. Yet during the reign of Q. Mary Cs. were founded, as at Wookey in 1553, and by Sir John Byron of Clayton Hall in 1558, and the inquests concerning the disappearance of these endowments were still being held during the first ten years of the reign of Q. Elizabeth. C. priests had no cure of souls and were not as a rule licensed to hear Confessions. But in the 15th cent. we find that a good many of them were engaged in educational work, the forerunners of the headmasters of many of our old grammar schools.—A6.

T. SCOTT HOLMES.

CHAPEL.—The word C. is from Lat. Capella, which is usually derived from Capa, a cloak or ecclesiastical robe. The Capella S.

1. Name. Martini was the receptacle or chamber in which the relics of S. Martin were kept by the Frankish kings (cp. Mon. Sangall. 1 4, de vita Car. Mag.). The Gemma Animæ (c. 128) gives the derivation of capellani as "a capa S. Martini appellati." Capella was at first the receptacle (capsella) in which the relics were kept, and then came to mean the chamber or building in which these were preserved. Constantine the Great (Eusebius, Vit. Const. 4 17) was the first emperor to erect a C. or aedes sacra in his palaces, and the 6th Council of Paris in 615 describes the sacella Regis as Capella Palatina. Ordericus Vitalis in his 12th bk. says of the King that "sanctas sibi de capella sua reliquias deferri praecepit."

In the English Ch. there are several kinds of Cs. officially recognised, and it will be necessary to deal with these separately.

2. Kinds of Chapel. These are private chapels or oratories, free chapels, chapels of ease, parochial chapels, chapels attached to educational foundations, and, since the 16th cent., chapels attached to proprietary cemeteries, and proprietary chapels as distinct from private consecrated chapels.

The name C. however is given also to a portion of a larger parish church: and, though this title has perhaps little legal authority, it was and is for all that very real. It was a common feature of a mediæval English ch. to possess such attached

3. Chapels as Portions of Churches. Cs. These were anterior to the foundation of chantries, though they were generally used as CHANTRY Cs., and of course on some occasions they were built as part of the plan of the chantry foundation. It is probable that they arose out of a desire to maintain an early condition of things, and to retain the patronage of saints in whose honour at some former period distinct buildings had been erected, when chs. were small clusters of Cs. under separate dedications for the use of monastic communities. This was certainly the case at Iona, Clonmacnois and Glastonbury. As the desire for larger chs. grew and the old gave way to the new, these small Cs. were collected under the same roof, and the dedications were preserved in the additional altars erected in them. Cs. therefore in parish chs. were a necessary adjunct of the cultus of the saints, and it was a later usage to endow priests to say mortuary masses at the altars of these saints. Among these dedications the oldest in England is that in honour of the Virgin Mary. It is through a Lady C., as the C. came to be called, that we have one link between the English and the British Chs. The little wattle ecclesiola dedicated to the Virgin which, at Glastonbury, survived the Saxon Conquest was of such antiquity that legend had already clung round it even in the 10th cent. In the Life of S. Dunstan (Auctore B., Rolls Series, p. 7) we are told that this C. and another dedicated to St. Peter had not been constructed by the art of man, but that it was the heavenly Architect Himself Who "hanc sibi sanctæ genetrici suæ Mariæ consecratam fore demonstravit." The earliest Lady C. is probably that of Sancta Maria in Trastevere, which according to the Liber Pontificalis was erected by Pope Callistus I (217-222), though Martinelli declares that St. Peter himself erected a ch. in honour of the Virgin in the Via Latina. The Bollandists assert that St. Augustine erected a C. in honour of the Virgin on a spot known as Cratundene in the Isle of Ely; and St. Mary's Church in Canterbury is assigned to the foundation of King Aethelwald (cp. Waterton, Piedas Mariana, p. 66, 1879). There was a C. of the Virgin Mary in the cloister of the cathedral ch. of Wells which was endowed by Bishop Gisa, 1061-1088, and undoubtedly this is one of the most ancient dedications of a C. in the Eng. Ch. With the dissolution of the Chantries (1547-8) these Cs. fell into desuetude, the screens which had divided them from the parish church were destroyed, and the area thus increased was filled perhaps with some municipal or faculty pew, or left for the tombs of wealthy parishioners. Within the last quarter of a cent. however the desire to use these Cs. has been revived. The chancel of the parish ch. has been regarded as needlessly large for frequent celebrations at which there are only a few communicants, and a second altar has been erected in some aisle or transept where services can be celebrated at other times than those when the whole parish assembles in the body of the ch. The earliest instance of the revival of a second altar as sanctioned by Ch. authority is that in Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green; and the law concerning the erection of a second altar is given in the case of the Vicar of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, v. the Parishioners of St. Peter, which was argued in the London Consistory Court, Aug. 8th, 1894. Such altars are clearly not intended for the cultus of a saint, but rather for the convenience and religious needs of Ch. folk of to-day.

We must now consider the case of a C. as a separate building, distinct from the parish ch. In England Private Chapels existed in the 8th cent., and the Constitutions of Abp. Egbert of York in 750 decreed that parish chs. were not to be injured by the rich of the parish diverting their tithes and offerings from them in order that they might maintain a priest for their C. of ease. In the Domesday Survey, 1084, among the possessions of the Abbey of Croyland was "ligneam capellam sanctæ Mariæ per Spaldelyng quæ Anglice Stokkym appellata." Private Cs. or oratories always created difficulties between their owners and the parish priests, or those eccles. corporations which held the advowson of the parish ch., and the possession of a portable altar and a papal licence enabled many an owner to evade his eccles. dues. Abp. Stratford endeavoured to regulate them by forbidding priests to say Mass in unconsecrated oratories or Cs. (Lyndwode, 3 23). The inconvenience of them in a definite scheme of diocesan organisation was early felt in the Gallican Ch., and the Second Council of Orleans (533, can. 15) decreed that those who possessed a private oratory were on the great yearly festivals of the Ch. to attend Mass and receive their communion in their parish chs. An early instance of dispute with regard to a C. is shown in the trial between the prior of Bruton and William le Oiseleur living in the hamlet of Christon, in the parish of Banwell. The ch. of Banwell had been given in the 12th cent. to the Canons of Bruton, and the tenant-in-chief at Christon desired that his private C. should be free for his use. A final concord was arrived at in 1204, in which the tenant William le Oiseleur agreed to pay yearly, through the priest he maintained at Christon, 8s. to the prior of Bruton as rector of Banwell.

Free Chapels were those in the possession of the Crown or of those who had received them by way of grant from the Crown. They often went with the estate or manor where they were situated. They were places exempt from the ordinary jurisdiction of the eccles. authorities, the priests who were maintained by the holders of the manor or from ancient royal endowment being merely instituted by the Bp. of the diocese. Such Cs. existed at the Conquest, and are to be met with in the Domesday Survey. In the foundation charter of St. Martin's Monastery at Hastings William the Conqueror granted that the ch. and monastery were to be free from the jurisdiction of the Bp.—i.e., of Chichester—"sicut mea dominica capella libera sit ab omni ejus exactione." The two most notable free Cs. of to-day are those of Westminster and Windsor, and in the Charter of Confirmation granted by Edward I to Westminster it is described as "quæ omnium capellarum nostrarum est domina et magistra." In the Valor Ecclesiasticus, 1535, and in the Chantry Survey, 1547, we meet with Cs. described as libera of which it is difficult, if not impossible, to trace the history. The Cs. attached to the Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, and the Cs. of our large public schools such as Eton, Winchester and Harrow, are libera rather by custom than by any specific charter from the Crown. Some of them, however, are not consecrated, and are of the nature of proprietary Cs.; they could be turned to other uses.

Chapels of Ease and Parochial Chapels are allied to each other in that a C. of ease very often grew into a parochial C. Their relation to the parish and the parish ch. only varied in the degree of independence which they enjoyed. In regard to a parish, a C. of ease is described by J. de Janua as "parva ecclesia quæ nec habet baptismum nec coemiterium." Another definition is that it has not its own priest. These Cs. had no parochial rights. They were for pr., instruction and the Holy Euch., but offerings made in them belonged to the parish ch. The parish priest or his vicar served them for the spiritual welfare of his parishioners, and not because he was bound to do so by Canon Law. If the parishioners in the distant hamlet needed his ministrations, they must arrange with him to help them in their C. We find however that Cs. of ease in process of time frequently grew into parochial Cs., as indeed we may say that the private C. or oratory of the lord of the manor often grew into a C. of ease for the parishioners. The tenants were so accustomed to worship in it that the C. became a public C., i.e., a C. of ease to the parish ch. In the 14th and 15th cents. we have many instances where the C. of ease had its own warden, but this warden had to bring his account along with the wardens of the parish ch. to the yearly parish vestry. As the hamlet increased in size and in importance, the rivalry between the C. of ease and the parish ch. increased. The parishioners of the hamlet were prepared to maintain their own priest; they demanded, and at last obtained, a cemetery for their C. and the right to have their children baptised in the building where they worshipped, and so the C. of ease grew into a parochial C.; and in the 16th cent. the hamlet with its parochial C. became a new parish, and its priest took the title, not of rector or vicar, terms which belonged only to the priests of the mother ch., but of perpetual curate. We find mention of parochial Cs. in 1491 (Act 6-7 Henry VII, c. 2), when it is stated that marriages may be solemnised in them. Later legislation has given to perpetual curates under certain conditions the title of vicar.

In the Act of 2 & 3 Edw. VI chs. are divided into two classes—common chs. and private Cs. or oratoria. With the greater freedom

7. Proprietary Chapels. and laxer discipline of the 18th cent. another class of C. arose. We find it as early as 1735, and it was described as a Proprietary Chapel. Of course this differed very little from a private C. or oratory. The owner maintained the officiating minister, and these Cs. were open for pr. and public preaching. They were open for all, because of the regulations of the Conventicles Act which regulated the number of people who could gather together in private. They were not necessarily consecrated, and so could be bought and sold, pulled down, or used for secular purposes. Many of these however have been since their erection recognised by the eccles. authority and consecrated and have become the parochial Cs. of new eccles. districts; and those which still remain the property of their owners are rapidly disappearing before the better organisation of the Church.—A7.

T. SCOTT HOLMES.

CHAPLAIN.—(Lat. capellanus, from capella). The derivation from capella is certain: we may further probably derive

1. Origin and History. capella, which was the tent or canopy erected over an altar containing the relics carried with the army of the King of France in war-time, from the principal relic, the capa of St. Martin. This relic was naturally so used, being a military cloak. Later any priestly guardian of relics in the palace was named capellanus, as we should say "Court chaplain," and any sanctuary, capella. These Cs., whose number increased, officiated in the Royal chapel, and acted as confessors to the household, under an arch-chaplain, often a bp. or abbot, who was grand almoner to the King. Other kings, princes, nobles and bps. also appointed Cs. We even find a capellanus curatus, i.e., a rector of a parish, with a sub-capellanus under him.

Cs. were attached to the Pope's (Sistine) Chapel in the Vatican. These are now distinguished as private, honorary, common, or supernumerary Cs., having various ceremonial duties.

Cs. were paid by canons of cathedrals to perform the duties of their offices, an abuse checked by the Council of Trent.

Cs. were appointed in cathedrals or other churches, under pious foundations, to "sing for souls" departed.

Cs. were licensed by bps. for convents of female religious. These must be secular priests, unless there be a lack of qualified clergy. RC. Cs. in the British army and navy are under the jurisdiction of the Abp. of Westminster.

In England there are 36 Cs. in ordinary to the King, who officiate in rotation at the Chapel

Royal of St. James', besides honorary Cs. to the King, and Cs. of the household. There is also a clerk of the closet, and a sub-dean of the Chapels

Royal and sub-almoner to the King, who is a deputy of the Bishop of London. Cs. to embassies and legations abroad, since the chapels are deemed to be on British soil, as extensions of the Foreign Office which is in London, are licensed by the Bishop of London.

In the House of Lords, one of the bps. officiates as C.—In the House of Commons, prayers are said by the C. to the Speaker.—Cs. "to the forces" in the army hold commissions, ranking as colonels, lieut.-colonels, majors, and captains. They report to the chaplain-general, by whom they are nominated. He ranks as major-general. They are appointed not to regiments or bodies of soldiers, but to stations, where they remain, though regiments are moved. Special Cs. for a certain district may be appointed by the Secretary of State for War.—Cs. in India rank as "civil servants," appointed by the Secretary for India.—In the navy, Cs. have no official rank, and hold a special licence from the Abp. of Canterbury. The C. of Greenwich Hospital is "chaplain of the fleet."—The C. to the high sheriff preaches the assize sermon before judges on circuit.

Bps. appoint examining Cs. to test the fitness of candidates for holy orders. A bp. has also a domestic C., who resides at the palace, assisting the bp. in his correspondence.—While the fellows of the colleges at Oxford and Cambridge were in holy orders, one of them, usually holding the office of dean, was responsible for services in chapel. Recently, the fellows elect a C., possibly a member of another college.—In public schools, the C. may be a master, frequently he is not. At Eton there are two, named "conducts."—Cs. to religious communities are licensed by the Bp. of the diocese.

Workhouse Cs. are appointed by the overseers and guardians of the poor, as directed by the Local Government Board. Often they are parochial clergy. Sometimes an anti-clerical board refuses to appoint a C., and arranges a rota of dissenting ministers.—Prison Cs. are appointed by the Home Secretary.—Cs. to asylums are appointed by the asylums' board or managing committee.—Cs. are appointed to larger hospitals by the board of governors, to local hospitals (infectious or other) by the local authority.—At cemeteries, fixed Cs. are rare. Often the neighbouring clergy are in turn responsible for funerals; or the mourners are at liberty to bring any priest or minister to say the service.

All Cs. hold the bp.'s licence.—A3.

J. E. SWALLOW.

CHAPTER.—See CATHEDRAL.

CHARGE.—See VISITATION.

CHASTITY.—C. is coupled with TEMPERANCE and SOBERNESS in the Church Cat. to describe the positive duties involved by the negation of the 7th Commandment. The NT word rendered "chaste," ἀγνός, means consecrated or holy, but, like the English "chaste," it has the limited significance of bodily purity. Almost from Apostolic days mischievous teaching arose, suggesting varying degrees of C., and attaching superior merit to celibacy. This teaching was based on such passages of Scripture as Matt. 19 12, 22 30, 1 Cor. 7 7 ff., etc. Our Lord's answer to the Sadducees expressly referred only to the future life, and said nothing of the marriage vow. St. Paul writes exceedingly cautiously, and the most that can be made of his teaching is that for particular work and under particular conditions celibacy may be preferable for some. But the fact that some of the Apostles were married, that possibly St. Paul himself was a widower (if he were a member of the Sanhedrin, he must have been married), and St. Paul's own teaching in the Pastoral Epistles, which represents marriage as the proper condition of the clergy, all tend seriously to militate against the teaching of some in the early Church on the subject, teaching which in its turn was seriously exaggerated in the mediæval Church.

1. Teaching of Scripture.

Judaism honoured family life: heathenism, owing to the degradation of womanhood and the all too common practices of loathsome immorality, looked upon celibacy as an ideal. Extreme asceticism, therefore, seems to have entered the early Church either from the Essenes or from the heathen. Tatian and others tried to fasten the yoke of celibacy upon the Church, but Clement of Alexandria and Cyprian urged wiser counsels. The extreme practices gave birth to disgraceful scandals, and not least that of "mulieres subintroductæ," i.e., sisters (1 Cor. 9 5) who lived in the closest relationship with clergy and male ascetics, with the assumption that their C. was retained. (See art. MARRIAGE.)

The 7th Commandment demands that Christians, whether married or unmarried, shall live pure lives, pure in word and thought and deed. The command implies the possibility, and the "sowing of wild oats" is a figment of the devil, if it is taught as a necessity. Perhaps the best definition of the word and its use is that of Jeremy Taylor: "C. is abstinence or continence; abstinence is that of virgins or widows; continence of married persons; chaste marriages are honourable and pleasing to God."—K3'.

F. S. GUY WARMAN.

CHASUBLE.—An oval-shaped garment with out sleeves and containing an aperture at the centre to admit the head, worn

1. Origin. over the alb by the priest at the celebration of HC. The C. may be of linen or of rich silk, and is generally, though not necessarily, embroidered at the back and in front with a Y-shaped cross. Originally, it was used as an outdoor garment both by clergy and laity, and is probably identical with the paenula, the circular robe which superseded the Roman toga. This robe was made so full that when the head was passed through the aperture it completely enveloped the wearer, and the name casula—diminutive of casa, a cottage—which it subsequently received, denotes that "like a little hut it covers the entire person" (Isidore of Seville, c. 600, De Eccles. Off. 19 21). Aft. its outdoor use was discarded, the casula, in modified form, was retained by the clergy for use in the services of the Church, and is now worn by the celebrant in the service of HC only.

The C. is generally identified with the vestment prescribed in the First PB of Ed. VI to be worn by the priest or bishop celebrating

2. Legality. the HC, and those who at the present time wear it in the Church of England base their authority upon the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC. They declare that the canons of 1604, which prescribe the use of the cope in cathedrals and the surplice in parish churches, were prior to the final revision of the PB in 1662; and that at that revision, having before them all precedent legislation regarding the vestures of the clergy, the revisers deliberately retained the Ornaments Rubric in the PB [though with certain alterations]. The Puritans had strongly objected to its retention at the Savoy Conference in 1661 on the ground that: "this rubric seemeth to bring back the cope, alb, and other vestments forbidden by the common PB, v and vi, Edward VI," i.e., the Second PB. This objection the bishops ignored, stating: "We think it fit that the rubric continue as it is" (Cardwell's Conf., pp. 314, 351). It is argued, therefore, that the deliberate insertion of the Ornaments Rubric in its present form in spite of the Puritan interpretation and protest indicates the intention of the revisers that the use of the cope, alb, etc., should be permitted. The Privy Council has twice decided otherwise,¹ but its judgments have been ignored by many, and the C. is at the present time considerably in use in the Church of England.

The shape of the C. has undergone very considerable modification, and the form in use at the present time in the Roman Church bears

3. Shape. little or no resemblance to the graceful robe familiar to us on the tombs and old brasses of our churches. The oval Gothic shape generally used in the English Church at the present day, which reaches almost to the wrists and is usually some 48 inches long, has both dignity and antiquity in its favour.—R3. J. O. Cooper.

CHILDERMAS.—See FESTIVAL, § 11.

CHILDREN, TRAINING OF.—"And that this child may be virtuously brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life; remembering always that Baptism doth represent unto us our profession," etc. With these words the Church dismisses the newly-made Christian and his or her sponsors. But, of course, the Exhortation ought to be ringing in the ears of the father and mother. And how sad it is that so few read the Bapt. service; how different would be the conception of the life of a Christian were this often done.

The training of children; how can this best be carried on?

¹ [See further, ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.]

To us, the children of the Church, it should ever be connected with and start from the child's Bapt. He is a young tree planted in the garden of the Lord; he is a soldier of Christ; he is in a state of salvation, that is, of health and safety. And therefore the earliest religious teaching should be connected in the child's mind with the sense of love, joy, protection, an unseen Friend Who cares for the child. So, of course, it ought to be from his mother that he learns the pleasure and joy of all that these words mean.

If, as a child often will, he objects to say his prayers (which ought to be very, very simple),

2. The Earliest Training. it is a pity to scold him, only he might be told that the Friend of Friends is disappointed, that it is so kind of that Friend to listen, and so on, at some other time of the day, not when he is tired and sleepy.

Then life ought to be happy for the child, and by degrees let treats, new toys, be connected with God Who has given him such kind friends. It is a great thing gradually to lead the child to think of God as connected with all the pleasures of life. So many people take this view of religion and impress it on the children: "If Thou should'st call me to resign what most I prize," etc.; and there grows up a feeling that God is only connected with the sad things of life.

Then in these early days the sense of brotherhood with his fellow-Christians can be implanted. All the little acts of unselfishness, consideration for servants and younger children, can be gradually taught as matters of course to Christ's children. Nothing should be more carefully guarded against than self-conscious piety. Certain things must grow to be matters of course to Christian children.

But what of direct religious teaching? First of all, we should teach children that our holy religion, which makes us so happy, is devotion to a Living Master. The first beginnings of Christian teaching should be talks about

3. Direct Religious Teaching. our Lord, the little ones' Elder Brother. And then we can speak of the Father and of the Holy Spirit, and quite simply begin, "God the Father made me, God the Son bought me, God the Holy Spirit makes me good." Let us begin by showing the child a picture of our Lord blessing little children, or of Him as the Good Shepherd, and little by little show how God, Who loves us now, sent Jesus to teach us what God is. Little by little everything else will fall into its place. Only, begin from the known. The child knows what love is; he will love to hear there is someone who loves him and his mother too; then, little by little, will come the story of the life, and—then the death. Why did Jesus die? Then we shall, if we are wise, not talk about God, Jesus' Father, being angry, but we shall say that our Lord gave up His whole life to do God's will that we might learn to do so also, and that His goodness made men hate him and kill Him, and that God raised Him up, and that God joins us to Jesus and forgives us because we belong to Jesus. Very slowly, bit by bit, come the stories of our Lord's life, then the story of His death, and His rising, and now we can turn to the OT. For where was our Lord born, and what was His mother? He was a Jew. Who were the Jews? Well, all this book, the OT, is about our Lord's own people, and the stories they told about their history. Then we can begin, if we like, with the stories of Abraham and Joseph, David and Daniel, and teach the child as he grows how God chooses nations to do special work, just as He chooses individuals. If he has begun Greek and Roman history, he will understand how the Greeks and Romans had their work, and he will see what is meant by the Jews being chosen by God to prepare for Christ. Of course all this will be filled in later. Then we can talk about sin, and say how mysterious it is, and how the Jews explained the entrance of sin.

And then the ethical training. We must connect the Creed we teach our children with the daily life. And so by degrees the idea of sin must come into our teaching. As the child passes into the boy or girl, it is not well to dwell on the emotional side of religion, but rather to kindle in the youthful mind the sense of hero-worship for Christ and the joy of bearing, of endurance. Then by degrees we ought to teach the sacredness of our bodies, again with reference to Bapt., and by degrees the meaning of the Fellowship into which Bapt. brought the boy and girl. Then we can show them in our religious lessons what sin really means; it is not only a matter of hurting ourselves and displeasing God, but also it hurts the whole Body of Christians. A schoolboy or girl grasps that idea from the analogy of school life. A boy's chivalry can be awakened early on behalf of women and girls.

4. Ethical Training.

Again, the idea of service should be little by little brought before children. From the first there should be awakened the feeling of being wanted by God. Then as the child grows up there will be recognition of the claim of God. The child should learn from his early days that it is the work of the Church to make people good, and he in his turn must do his share, in prayers, in alms, but above all in real service.

Finally, all the young life should lead up to Confirmation and First Communion. As children grow older, their prayers should grow also. Parents should see that the prayers they pray should be adapted to the growing intelligence, and should be a preparation for the great gifts awaiting them. The children should learn from their parents what a wonderful Gift God gives them through the laying-on of hands; they should feel that what was done in the Middle Ages, when boys were made knights, is a type or picture of the young soldier receiving the fullness of Gifts. And of the Eucharist we may just say they should regard it, not as some privilege of advanced Christian Life, but as the Bread of Life to sustain them in the wilderness of this world.

5. Confirmation and First Communion.

Clearness of teaching on these points does prepare for facing modern difficulties. As children grow up they find that they are not committed to any particular theory of inspiration, of the Bible, or the Mosaic Cosmogony, but that they are committed to devotion to a Living Lord Whose ethical standard is of the loftiest, and Who supplies them with strength to meet their need.

6. Final Thoughts.

The important thing in all training is not to teach a child to solve problems, but to make him realise that he has to do with a loving Saviour Who leads him to know God through the Holy Spirit; and it is life, the joyous, unspotted life of a Christian child, and a Christian boy or girl, which really best trains for the battle of belief and the struggle with the world, the flesh and the devil.—K3⁵.

E. ROMANES.

CHIMERE.—The sleeveless robe, usually of black but occasionally of scarlet, worn by a bishop over the ROCHET. The origin of the C. as a portion of ecclesiastical dress is veiled in obscurity, but it is probable that it is derived from the DALMATIC or TUNICLE formerly worn by bishops. It resembles closely a garment worn by bps. in the Middle Ages called a mantelletum, which was similar to a COPE, but with openings at the sides for the arms to pass through. It also bears resemblance to the scarlet dress worn by doctors at the universities. Formerly a portion of outdoor dress, its original use no longer survives. The fashion of sewing lawn sleeves on the C., which obtained during the last cent., and which was quite incorrect, is now disappearing; the sleeves form part of the ROCHET.—K3⁵.

J. O. COOP.

CHOIR.—Though, etymologically, the word χορός signifies a dance in its primary meaning, it has always meant also a body or band of persons, and that (as in the Greek plays) with a musical reference; a convenient word, therefore, for ecclesiastical use in denoting a body of singers principally, though it can properly include all persons engaged in C. ministries. In this article "C." is intended to refer to the musical portion of that ministry.

1. A Ministry of Song.

The existence of an ordered band of singers, "the sons of Kohath," a Levitical clan, in connection with the worship of Israel is in the OT traced back to the earliest times. The dignified development of the older Tabernacle services in the worship of the Temple, and the position held by the Temple C., need no comment. This development alone would have been sufficient guide to the Christian Church; but, through St. John's Apocalypse, it had its own vision of the heavenly pattern, after the perpetual worship—there in Heaven—of the "Lamb as it had been slain" had begun. It was natural therefore, as soon as the days of persecution were over, and its position became more settled, that the Church should develop its worship according to that pattern, and the elders round the throne above should have their counterpart in the C. round the Holy Table below. As an Order in the Church, the "Singers" date from the early part of the 4th cent., and are mentioned as an existing body in the Council of Laodicea,¹ c. 361. Their primary duty seems to have been to regulate and encourage the chanting of the Psalmody of the Church; a term which would include all Canticles and other portions of divine service which could be musically rendered. From this beginning, the "C." of the Christian Church has sprung and continued, as a Ministry responsible for the Choral portion of the worship. Its function as a Ministry is evidenced by the old form of admission, "Take heed that thou believe in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and that thou show forth in thy doings what thou believest in thy heart," a form dating from the Fourth Council of Carthage, A.D. 399. Thus, the name "singer," like the more modern "chorister," became a technical name for a distinct ministry, not merely meaning one who could sing. The existence of a C. is assumed in many places in the PB, and its members are sometimes (Matrim., Burial, Commun.) called clerks. (See CLERK.)

The efficiency of a choral body is provided for, at least in the cathedrals and collegiate churches of England, by a "foundation," which has continued in most cases practically the same since its institution, so that the choral services of those churches have never ceased to be more or less efficiently rendered. In many, great improvements have taken place in the last sixty years, and the choral worship, at one time only including the daily offices, is now extended to the HC.

Parochial Cs., restored or established so generally in the same period of time, stand on a different footing, as there is no "foundation" to ensure their efficiency and continuity, and in many cases they are voluntary. But this does not interfere with the fact that when once a man or boy has offered himself to the C. for God's service, and been admitted to it, he becomes part of a distinct ministry, and the regulations of that ministry are binding upon his honour. Rules for such Cs. should be simple; they must vary according to circumstances, but should be looked upon as requiring strict correspondence, because of the solemn duty involved. There is no doubt that all the adult members of a C. should be bond fide communicant members of the Church, and the realisation of their position, both men and boys, as a ministry and not as merely singers, is of great importance with regard to the efforts taken by those in authority to insure the true religious character and devotion of the Choir.

There is no doubt, whether from Jewish or early Christian precedent, that a C. should be composed of men and boys, and that its proper place is in the chancel. A female element in an eccles. body of singers has only come into existence with the degenerate days of West-end gallery singers. But a supplement of female voices to the C. proper is a useful addition, and quite allowable, in places where boy trebles are a difficulty: they should be seated in the front seats of the nave, or in a chancel aisle behind the Choir.

There is no reason against a C. being paid for their work, where it can be done. In the case of the boys it ensures a very useful form of control for those who rule over C. matters; in the case of lay clerks it seems practically better to arrange the payment as a fixed quarterly stipend, by agreement, rather than by a computation of so many services attended; each lay clerk providing a deputy (approved by the authorities) in the case of necessary absence.

In all cases of payment in a parochial C., its members come under the primary control of the incumbent and churchwardens, as the official administrators of the church funds. But they remain, just as much as the voluntary C., in the control of the choir-master in all musical duties, and of the incumbent—quâ incumbent—or of the precentor appointed by him (see PRECENTOR) in all matters pertaining to conduct and religious discipline. The C. habit has always been, from the earliest, a white linen garment. The Council of Narbonne, A.D. 589, speaks of the "white garment of linen, common to all the clergy," and still earlier is it referred to by St. Jerome (346-420 A.D.). It may have been at first identical with the "Albe," which, with a difference of sleeve, has more lately been called a surplice (superpellicium) or "overslape," being, as its name indicates, necessarily worn over the "pellicia," "pelisse," or cassock, the ordinary clerical gown; but the "white garment" has continued throughout, as the sacred habit of the Choir. [For Architectural Choir, see QUIRE.]—Q1.

JAMES BADEN POWELL.

CHRISM.—(Gr. μύρον, Lat. chrisma.) Two materials have been employed in the Christian Ch. for performing the rite of UNCTION: (1) olive oil; (2) olive oil mixed with balsam, spices, or some other fragrant substance (see Ex. 30 23-25). The latter is commonly called C. Its use for Unction at Confirm. is as old as the 4th cent. (Apost. Constit. 7 22), and may be still older. This Unction is of very early date (1st half of 2nd cent.—see Tertullian, Adv. Marcion 1 14). But the terms in which Tertullian (ib., and De Bapt. 7) and Cyprian (Ep. 70 2) speak of it render it uncertain whether the material used were C. or simple oil. By the 6th cent. the C. was solemnly consecrated by the Bp. on Maundy Th., so as to be ready for the Easter Bapts. And the consecration of the C. still takes place on that day during the Euch. service in both East and West. In Pre-Reformation England, C. was used on several other occasions besides Confirm., the principal being Post-Baptismal Unction, Consecr. of Bishops, Ordination of Priests, CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES, and CORONATION of Kings (the kings of England and France enjoying the special privilege of being anointed with C., and not, as other kings, with oil only). Of these Unctions only two survived the Reformation. (1) Post-Baptismal Unction was retained in the First PB of 1549 (see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 23), but was omitted in 1552. (2) The English Sovereign continues to be anointed at his Coronation. Since the Reformation simple oil has been generally used for this purpose. But in at least one instance (that of Charles I) it was C. (see Coronation of King Charles I, HBS, pp. 3, 4). For further information, see DCA, art. Chrism.—R2.

J. W. TYRER.

¹ This Council forbids all others to sing in church, beside the Canonical singers (Bingham, Antiq. viii, 5 4).

CHRISOM.—The custom of clothing the newly-baptised in a white garment is as old as the 4th cent. (Eusebius, Vit. Const. 4 62; Ambrose, De Myst. 7), and signified the whiteness and purity which were henceforth to characterise their actions. It was continued through the Middle Ages, and appears under the name of C. in the First PB of 1549 (see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 23), but was omitted in 1552.—R2.

J. W. TYRER.

CHRIST.—(See first, art. JESUS.) "Christ," "The Christ," "Messiah," "Anointed," is originally the official title of our Lord, as "Jesus" is His proper name. But name and title soon became so conjoined in the common designation "Jesus Christ" as practically to lose their separate force. "Christ" is mostly used as a title in the Gospels, frequently so in the Acts, seldom in the Epistles, and never in the PB. This process might seem to indicate in the consciousness of Christianity the gradual and finally complete blending of the human and the divine in Jesus Christ into a single and homogeneous conception. But in fact there is no warrant that—at least in the mind of organised Christianity—"Jesus" ever denoted only the human, or "Christ" only the divine, in the person of our Lord. "Jesus" does designate the historic man, but in the very proper name itself—irrespective of any title attached—Christianity, which simply accepts its Scriptures, reads "God our Saviour," "Our salvation, because our righteousness and our Life." The Jesus of the Church and the PB is not only in office and function but in Himself divine.

Again, "Christ," however it must express a divine office and function, by no means necessarily expresses a celestial or divine Person. It expressed no such pre-Christian idea. "The Anointed" expresses a human not a divine subject: it is Humanity not God that is anointed. Our NT Christology as much transcends as it fulfils any anticipation of it in the Messiahship of the OT. Jesus was Christ in His own transcendent sense of Anointer as well as Anointed. In Him we are anointed with nothing less than God Himself: our Chrism or Baptism is with no impersonal spirit or life of God, but with God Himself, our Spirit and our Life. In the light then of the collective truth of the NT and of the Catholic mind of the Church, as reflected in the PB, what fullness of meaning and reality do we read in the name "Jesus Christ"? There are two parts in it, but the division is not into a human and historic Jesus and a celestial or divine Christ. In the first place, without question and without qualification, we see God in Him—God in Him as Jesus as well as God in Him as Christ, in His person as well as in His work. In the second place, we see in Him not only God in us, but equally ourselves in God—not only Deity as self-realised and self-expressed in humanity, but equally humanity as realising and expressing deity in itself. In Jesus as the personal presence and action of God in humanity, we acknowledge the inherent divinity of the eternal Son and Word. In Jesus as humanity indwelt by God and self-fulfilled in God, the Deity we recognise is the communicated and imparted divinity of the Holy Ghost. It is in the second of these aspects that our Lord is more properly the Christ: Humanity baptised, anointed with Deity, Man made one with and partaker of God. Jesus Christ is our Prophet, Priest, and King—as revelation to us, fulfilment for us, enactment in us, of God our Righteousness, our Holiness, our Life. The Church does not know or worship God in the abstract or in the void. Neither does it know or worship Him only as He is immanent and personally unknowable in nature and in humanity. It truly knows and fully worships Him where alone He makes Himself personally knowable and known—objectively in the Incarnation of His Son, and subjectively in the Fellowship of His Spirit. (See further, art. on INCARNATION.)—K2¹.

W. P. DU BOSE.

CHRISTIAN NAME.—See NAME, CHRISTIAN.

CHRISTIAN RELIGION, THE.—In the PB a particular conception of the CR. is embodied. It is proposed in this art. to supply what can be little more than a brief annotated list of twenty salient features, presenting a bird's-eye view of what will in the main be found elsewhere more fully treated.¹

The title of the PB gives a starting-point. As framed in 1549 and restored in 1662 (RITUAL,

1. An ancient National Ch. § 15), it recognises Common Prayer, Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies, as belonging to the general heritage of "the Ch.", the specific form and contents of the book reflecting "the use of the Ch. of Eng." The CR. is a matter of social concern. It is bound up with the life of the community. It has its roots in the past. The particular local Ch. is but the national representative of a universal society, qualified and destined to occupy all lands, and reaching back through the centuries to the Ch. of Pentecost and the Apostolic age. Taking occasion by an unfortunate and temporary Royal emergency (the divorce suit of Henry VIII), the Realm and Ch. of Eng. in 1533-4 threw off, not communion with the Western Ch., but the usurped Papal jurisdiction, long asserted and commonly allowed under certain protests in England. The ease with which inter-communion was restored under Mary, and the delay of the Popes under Eliz. in declaring a state of schism, establish the real continuity of that ancient society, whose liberty was safeguarded in the first art. of the Great Charter (Libera sit ecclesia Anglicana), with the Ch. of Eng. whose worship is expressed in the PB.²—A1.

¹ The ref. letters at the end of the paragraphs direct to the Appendix, where kindred arts. and relevant literature are referred to.

² Note also that the diocesan, provincial, and national areas were maintained as the units of Church life, in opposition to the Congregational principle of the Separatists.

Almost concurrently with this resumption of the inherent right of local autonomy another change of a different kind was made.

2. The Open Bible.

In the R. Injns. of 1538 (cp. the Proclamation of 1541) the embargo on Eng. versions of Scripture was removed and it was ordered that a large Bible be placed in every ch. Henceforth, Englishmen who could read their mother tongue had at hand that written Word of God which up to mediæval times had been universally regarded as the supreme rule of faith and practice. By this standard he was now able to judge the current teachings and usages of the Eng. Ch. Here, too, was unsealed, for direct application by all, the pure fountain of the water of life.¹ For "what piety [can be attained] without truth? What truth, what saving truth, without the word of God? What word of God whereof we may be sure, without the Scripture?" So also its sober narratives made the CR. real and actual, by revealing it in its setting of history, pattern lives and solemn warnings, illustrating the precepts and promises on which piety was based.—B2, B5.

When a new reign began in 1547, it was natural that an attempt should be made to carry out the project already cherished of providing forms of worship in the mother tongue.

3. An English PR.

After the English Bible had been, for ten years, open before the eyes of the people, and read in their ears, it was possible and desirable to introduce an English PB.² A main object avowed in the reconstruction of the services was that the Bible, and more of it, and in a better order, might be read in Eng. The ideal set up was that of a single book, in place of many volumes. In 1662 this ideal was more nearly realised than before, both Psalter and Ordinal being formally incorporated. Moreover, there was to be but one book for the whole Ch., as a bond of unity between all the dioceses, in place of various uses. The end was reached by judicious selection and compression, with expansion at successive revisions in order to enrichment. Our one book, which has kept its identity through its successive revisions, in its various forms now binds the whole Anglican Communion in a unity the reality and strength of which was illustrated vividly by the Pan-Anglican Congress in 1908.³—B1.

Just as, instead of abolishing liturgical forms, the PB compilers adapted them so as to carry out their original intention and true idea, so, in regard to the Sacraments, the same course was pursued. Two, out of the seven which had come

4. A Sacramental System.

¹ The translators in 1611 wrote that it is "translation . . . that removeth the cover of the well, that we may come by the water." (The quotation that follows above is also theirs.)

² The sober good sense of the leaders of the Eng. Ch. is shown by the absence of any serious proposal at any time to abandon the liturgical method in the supposed interests of freedom.

³ At this the project of the PB Dictionary was first outlined, and welcomed especially by those from far away.

to be called par excellence Sacraments, in the shape which they finally assumed had lost all title to the name. Unction of the sick, on special request of the sufferer, and with pr. for recovery, replaced Extreme Unction, and then disappeared altogether. Penance was represented by forms of public Confession and Absolution without appointed sign, and by optional private Conf., no form of Absol. being any longer provided after 1552. Orders, Matrimony, and Confirmation took rank as Apostolic, but still came into a lower category than the two "Sacraments of the Gospel"; and they all lost some of their appointed ceremonies. But, in spite of the abuses which had gathered round the Mass, and the risk of superstition in regard to Bapt., the sacramental principle was deliberately retained at the heart of the PB system.¹ And with it was secured the whole larger principle of the restrained, but serious, use of externals in religion not ceremonies of various kinds only (see § 15 below), but ornaments, and stately and beautiful fabrics and fittings for worship.—K5.

With the sacramental system also was secured a safeguard against Manichean disparagement of the body.

The first Sacrament to be provided with a vernacular form was the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion, as it was now styled.

5. A Scriptural Eucharist.

Without waiting for an Eng. PB, an Order was provided for an Eng. Communion in both kinds to follow the Latin Mass (1548). A complete reconstruction followed in the First PB of 1549, considerable changes in 1552 bringing the service practically to its present form. If the graver alterations are considered, it will be found that most of them had the aim of emphasising the fundamental Biblical idea of fellowship, or of weeding out any features which did not express some idea or motif for which unmistakable Scriptural warrant could be found. Some of these features, such as the Invocation and the solemn Commemoration, which were dropped in 1552, have been reintroduced in the American and Scottish offices. But, while the service as it stands contains every element which is required by NT parallels, it can be sympathetically used by those who approve as not only innocent, but as harmonious enrichments, certain supplementary developments, particularly those expressive of the Real Presence and the Eucharistic Sacrifice.²—H.

The doctrine of Bapt., though possessing difficulties of its own, did not demand reconsideration in the same way. And all that was needed was to state it in a form which robbed it of any appearance of attributing magical efficacy to the Sacrament, and to express it in an Order which would emphasise the moral and spiritual aspects of the ordinance. Ceremonies were cut down, and exhortations were multiplied. But the two important points, the expression of the necessary and gracious Divine activity, and the welcoming of infants to the Sacrament, were made quite clear. It is the fault of parents who belong to the Eng. Ch. if their children reach the age of full human consciousness without the seal of their adoption into the family of the Heavenly Father, and the mark of their dependence on His redeeming love. The Order may be called Apostolic, both because it follows the lead of St. Paul when he pronounced the children of even one Christian parent to be "holy," and because its Scriptural phraseology and care for edification bear out apostolic allusions and examples.—1.

6. An Apostolic Order of Baptism.

¹ Protests of Anabaptists and Quakers against formalism and on behalf of an unorganised reliance upon the Spirit never did more than attract individuals from the Ch. The sacramental principle has never been seriously in question within the Ch.

² Bp. Gore, The Body of Christ (2), p. vii: "The Ang. Ch. . . . admits a great deal which it does not, in its present formularies, explicitly teach."

How far the PB is from a superstitious view of the effects of Bapt. is shown by its insistence on the need for Christian education, and its provision for the instruction and training of the baptised. In cases where Infant Bapt. has been omitted, the office for Adult Bapt. (1662) makes two requirements: (a) that the candidates be shown to be "sufficiently instructed in the principles of the CR.," and (b) that the responsibility be laid upon them "to prepare themselves with prayers and fasting for the receiving of this holy Sacrament" (RITUAL, § 41, 11¹). After Bapt. has been administered to an infant, the Exh. to Godparents requires them to see (a) that the child be "taught . . . all . . . things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health"; and (b) that "this child be virtuously brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life." In each case the two elements are brought out, (a) the instruction of the mind, and (b) the discipline of the heart and will, by self-preparation in the case of adults, and by the training of their elders in the case of children. A Catechism was included from the first in the PB, and provision was made for regular catechising of young people by the curate. This provision was made more stringent in 1662 (cp. RITUAL, § 42, K6¹).—K.

7. Provision for Education.

Christened, taught, and trained, the boy (or girl) who has to face the world of life is offered in Confirmation a threefold gift.

2. A Priestly Laity. (1) He receives through the Laying on of Hands his ordination to the priesthood of the laity (cp. PRIESTHOOD).¹ (2) In the sign, symbolic of Divine commission, and accompanied by pr., he receives the seal of the Indwelling Spirit, not now first imparted, but pledged and given now in fuller measure for the fulfilment of the layman's share in the work of ministry. (3) By the whole rite he wins admission into the circle of duly-qualified communicants, and is invited to share in the Eucharistic Feast, and to offer with his brethren the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. The parallel with the services for Ordination of the sacred ministers and for Coronation of the King is close, the same three factors being prominent in each: (1) the sign of Imposition of Hands (or Unction), (2) pr. for the Holy Ghost with special reference to the particular vocation in view, and (3) the invitation to draw near to the Lord's table in the character newly imparted, and win strength for service. When this part of the PB conception of the CR. is universally recognised, the life and work of the Ch. will be transformed.—L.

But the rank and file need leaders, and God Himself must have His ambassadors. So in the Eng. Ch. the continuance of the sacred ministry has been an obvious necessity. (1) They who have cure of souls are still priests, but in a representative capacity as the appointed mouthpieces and agents of the priestly laity. Accordingly, in the Ordinals of 1550 and later, very great stress is laid upon the personal character and training of the candidates and the pastoral functions of the office, because the priest can only accomplish his ministry by bringing his people into a real fellowship of worship and service. (2) Christian ministers share also in the prophetic office of their Master, for it is made clear that the effective administration of the Sacraments requires that a faithful dispensing of the Word of God shall precede it. Authority to preach is, indeed, given in place of authority to offer the sacrifice of the Mass for the quick and the dead. (3) Even the Kingly office of Christ is reflected in the higher Orders of ministry, in the ordering of matters within their jurisdiction by bps. and priests, and by their administration of discipline.—T.

9. A Pastoral Ministry.

The essentially practical genius of Englishmen is also shown in the simplicity and yet sufficiency of the religious demands made upon the laity. The baptised child is to be trustful, obedient, thankful, prayerful.¹ The Object of his trust is defined in the shortest and plainest of the Creeds, and he is asked to profess no more at Confirm., and in preparation for death. The matter of his obedience is set out in the plain and outspoken words of the Decalogue, and in the summaries of Christian Duty which apply them. Abundant material for Thanksgiving and Prayer is provided (1) in the Common Prayer with its full cycle of Scripture lessons, which he is required to attend "upon every Sunday, and other days ordained and used to be kept as Holy-days," and invited to profit by on other days, and (2) in the Holy Communion, which he is required to receive "three times in the year, of which Easter to be one," and "to the often receiving of" which he is to be diligently exhorted. In particular, he must know how to use the Lord's Pr. as a compendium and model of prayer. When he marries, he takes the vow in ch., seeks there God's blessing, and, then or after, claims at the Lord's Table the spiritual food which shall strengthen him in the new state of life. When a child is born, he is to be christened without delay, three Communicants being associated as Sponsors with his natural guardians, and the mother has to make her thanksgiving with the accustomed offering at the ch. on resuming the ordinary activities of life. When any one is sick, notice is to be given to the minister of the parish, that he may assist in turning the enforced leisure and natural anxiety to spiritual use. Before he dies, he is not only to make his calling and election sure by self-examination, repentance, and faith, but he is to arrange his affairs, and make his will.—R.

10. A Practical Rule of Life.

¹ In the 4th A., which sums up the "general teaching" of the Cat., Part I, all these are implied. "By God's help I will (believe and do . . .), and I heartily thank . . . and I pray unto God. . . ."

¹ No other Ch. gives to the laity so large a place in its worship.

To provide for breaches of the Rule of Life, some system of discipline is needed, and in the 11. A Sound Ideal of Discipline.

PB it is clearly indicated that self-discipline should be the normal method. Candidates for Bapt. or Confirm., and communicants drawing near to the Lord's Table, are warned that repentance and faith are the standing conditions for the reception of grace. The nature of repentance is clearly set forth, and is shown to demand reconciliation and restitution where others are involved. After 1552 even Common Pr. is fenced about with a full penitential introduction, and a similar section has always formed part of the Communion Service, in which the recitation of the Decalogue, with the refrain of prayer for forgiveness and amendment, further contributes to the same end. If self-discipline, aided by these public reminders and opportunities, fails, the duty is recognised of seeking in private "the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice" from the curate or "some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word." Similar aid is to be furnished to the sick, if they need and desire it. Fridays and other fasting days help to set a seal of discipline upon the life. Ash Wed. and the whole season of Lent systematically provide for an annual course of self-discipline before Easter. And in case of notorious sin, scandalising the congregation, the right of repelling the offender is reserved.—P.

Self-discipline is universally necessary, because the full benefits of the CR. can only be enjoyed, and its duties performed, by conscious and prepared individuals. But those full benefits can also only be imparted to individuals as members of the Christian Society. No pains can therefore be too great to secure that complete confidence shall prevail as to the validity and regularity of the commission by right of which the ministers of the Ch. dispense the means of grace. Agreement on this head is also a condition of effective unity. The Ch. of Eng., without categorically asserting the invalidity of the ministry in non-episcopal societies, has with scrupulous care continued the three Orders, and allows no one to minister in her churches who has not been episcopally ordained. Moreover the Historic Episcopate has been deliberately affirmed by more than one Lambeth Conference as one of the four fundamental conditions of reunion.¹ The adjective has been interpreted as connoting a view of the Episcopate which, without including any dogmatic and exclusive statement of the Divine right of bps., accepts the Order as an institution that has in the course of history acquired de facto the right to be regarded as the channel of lawful authority, and an indispensable element in a normal Ch. organisation.—T3.

12. The Historic Episcopate.

Thus modestly, and without exaggerated boastings or anathemas, the Ch. of Eng. has safeguarded the "lawful authority" under which her ministers act.

13. A Reasonable Authority.

A similar moderation is shown in other matters where authority may be in question. Her Arts. were intended peacefully to comprehend all Christians not too gravely divergent in doctrine or practice to live and worship together. She bows to the authority of Scripture, where clearly expressed; but refuses to be bound by isolated texts, or doubtful passages. Some things she commands, some she only commends. She claims no infallibility, but asserts the right to bear authoritative witness in controversies of faith. In matters of policy, rites and ceremonies, times and seasons, she claims a larger liberty, but exercises it with jealous regard to the authority of the past. But she speaks sternly to those who set aside her "common order and discipline" (RITUAL, § 19, B3^a, and § 6).—U.

That which had come to be known as the Catholic Faith was the necessary expansion of the Threefold Name, into which Christians were baptised, needed in order to justify and protect that thoughtful trust in God as Creator, 14. The Catholic Faith.

Redeemer, and Sanctifier, which is the main-spring of the CR. Of this Catholic Faith the Eng. Ch., as we have seen, regards the Apostles' Creed as the sufficient elementary expression. By enshrining the fuller Creed of the Councils in the Order for the Communion, a more developed statement has been provided for the use of instructed communicants. And by the occasional recitation of the Quicumque Vult, the clear-cut phrases of that valuable exposition have been made accessible to any who might need something more elaborate. At the same time in Art. 8 it is made clear that the Creeds are only endorsed on the ground that (and—presumably—so far as) "they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture."—K2.

One of the proper consequences of accepting a sacramental system was, we have seen, the honouring of the body and the full utilising of the externals of worship. One of the abuses of the mediæval Ch. had been its wanton multiplication of ceremonies. Many of these were abolished in 1549 and in 1552. But the use of ceremonies was not allowed to drop because of the abuse of them. The sign of the cross was made more expressive at Bapt. by dispensing with it elsewhere. Bowing was restricted by custom to the mention of the name of Jesus in the Creed, or in the Gospel also, till canon 18 attempted to extend it. Standing and kneeling were, as of old, prescribed for the people as the attitudes of praise or profession of faith and confession or supplication, sitting being customary for attention to God's Word read and preached. And in the rubrics the attempt was made to supply directions for the ministers to use such ceremonies as would conduce to the seemly and reverent rendering of the service, without distracting the attention of the worshippers or ministers. These directions carry with them others by implication and analogy. Under ceremonial is naturally included the use of special articles, surplice, chalice, pulpit, and so forth, called "Ornaments" in the technical language of the Ch. law. What the ornaments or ceremonies should be may be matter of dispute. But it cannot be disputed that the PB conception of the CR. frankly makes room for both.—κ.

15. Sufficient Ceremonial.

¹ Passed first in 1888, they were reaffirmed or assumed in 1897 and 1908.

Ceremonial is concerned with the visible expression of the CR. in space. Its relation to time is no less important. So the 16. The Christian Year.

PB, while free from any Judaic Sabbatarianism, makes the Lord's Day the key to its system for the hallowing of time. The full round of services (MP., Lit., HC, EP) is ordered for every Sunday. But these weekly festivals are strung, like pearls on a string, in significant groups, according to the gradually developed practice of the Ch. in earlier cents. From Advent to Trinity Sunday the entire historical and doctrinal wealth of the Christian Gospel is displayed in orderly sequence, focussed round the greater festivals. The other half of the year allows of the exhibition, in less formal arrangement, of the connected treasures of grace and truth in their more detailed application to life and conduct. The grace of the Son, the love of the Father, and the fellowship of the Spirit are first brought out in their distinction and in their unity. Then man's answering faith and hope and love are variously illustrated. As it were twined round the greater string, there goes a second circle of the retained holy-days, one or more names of saints coming up month by month for commemoration and humble imitation.—c.

The CR. is only perfected in heaven. But it is really begun on earth, and is meant to make earth an ante-chapel to the temple above. It has to do with persons, and with all persons. And in the missionary stage it may be propagated on more than one plan. But, as soon as the pastoral stage has been reached, and there are bodies of believers scattered over a country, and much more when all the population or most of it is nominally Christian, some system must be taken as the basis of work. The Eng. Ch. has definitely retained the parochial, as distinct from the congregational, system. Not the persons who happen to attend a particular ch., but those who live within a certain area, have the right to a seat in their parish ch. and a share in the ministrations of the resident minister. In this way the natural bond of neighbourhood is taken up into the CR., and becomes the mutual obligation of parishioners to support the work and worship of their ch., and to help to make and keep each other Christian. Many difficult points of policy may arise about the appointment and tenure of the incumbent, the size of parishes, the modified congregationalism that has grown up in towns, the degree of episcopal control, and so forth. But any Ch. which has the slightest claim to be called national must start from some such territorial unit as the parish.—A7.

The PB began as a ritual directory for two provinces. It has become, in its various forms, 18. A World-wide Communion.

and in many languages, the PB of a world-wide Communion. Of this process of expansion the adoption of the PB in Ireland (not, alas! soon enough translated into Irish) in 1551, and the ill-fated Laudian experiment of 1637 in Scotland, were early examples. The 1662 service for Adult Bapt. was partly introduced for use in the "Plantations" (cp. RITUAL, § 17, B 14). Later developments need not be recounted. It has been proved that, with the administrative modifications and additions sanctioned by actual revision, as in America, Ireland, and Japan, or by local customary licence, as in most colonial and missionary dioceses, the PB embodies a permanently satisfying conception of the CR. Till it had undergone this trial, the PB might have been disparaged as an insular product. Having been successfully transplanted into so many different countries and conditions, it has been shown able to nourish a world-wide Communion.—A7.

The PBs. of the Irish and American Churches illustrate one more feature of the conception of the CR. which we are studying.

19. An Inherent Freedom of Polity.

We started (§ 1) with an ancient national Ch. as the primary factor in the historical situation. That Ch. has been legally for long cents. in close union with the State, so that the phrase "the order of this Ch. of Eng." (RITUAL, § 52, 72) can be replaced (§ 53, 73^a) by "the order of this Realm." But all the references to the Realm as a concurrent party even in the external government of the Ch. have dropped out of the Irish and American PBs. The reason is that the peculiar relation with the State which is inaccurately called "Establishment" (as if all permitted religious societies were not "established by the State") is only an accident of the Church's position, a happy accident—we may be inclined to say—but not an essential condition of its being, or even of its well-being. Each 17. The Parochial System.

Ch. in the Ang. Communion, that is to say, is essentially free to govern itself within the general laws of the country. But the Ch. of Eng., with some misgivings, exercises its freedom by maintaining, for the benefit of the State and Nation, the historical relation of co-ordination which at present exists. But should the tie at any time be severed, the result would only illustrate the claim here made to an inherent freedom of polity.—A1.

The last point to be noticed about the conception of the CR. found in the PB is that it is a uniting conception. If, that is, a similar list were made up of characteristic points, on the one hand of the Roman or Greek Ch., and on the other of the Presbyterian or Congregationalist denominations, hardly one of the Anglican points could be picked out that was not included on one side or the other. But no other Ch. in Christendom could be found which would have so much in common with what we may call the Catholic and the Protestant worlds. The Eng. Ch. has in common with the Catholics all that large part of her system which she has retained from ancient order and practice, whereas she, like the Protestant communities, has laid aside much which Rome and the East have as yet shown no signs of parting with. She is therefore in a position to hold out a hand as mediator on both sides—when the time comes. And it is obviously important not rashly to sacrifice for the sake of either what may eventually be of value in winning over the other.

Looking back upon the twenty points selected for review, we observe that they illustrate a quality to which the 1662 revisers "21. A Via Media," of the PB expressly lay claim as characteristic of the Eng. Ch. and as reflected in the PB, that of Christian Moderation (see RITUAL, § 17, B1¹). As our review has been designedly positive in character, it may be worth while to supplement it by a few illustrations of the PB conception of the CR. considered as a Via Media, not in the unworthy sense of a safe and easy path (escaping difficulties indeed, but by sacrifice of principles), but as the carefully surveyed central road, avoiding the dangerous detours of superstition on the one hand, and the seductive short cuts of fanaticism on the other.

1. The mediæval Ch. had an over-elaborate series of Latin service books. The Nonconformists rejected all liturgical forms. Our Reformers constructed the single Book of Common Pr. in English.

2. The adherents of the Papacy would have kept all Christendom under the centralised yoke of the Roman Curia. The Independents assigned fulness of authority to every petty congregation of Christians. In the PB was asserted the real and reasonable, though guarded, authority of National Churches.

3. The Council of Trent confirmed the aggregation of seven sacraments in an incongruous group. George Fox and the Quakers rejected all specific sacraments. The Eng. Ch. retained in undisputed supremacy the two Sacraments of the Gospel.

13—(2423)

4. Rome allowed tradition and papal authority to override Holy Scripture. Many Protestant theologians retorted by idolising the letter of the Bible. The Anabaptists superseded the NT by the inner light. Our Ch. avoids defining inspiration, tries all truth by Scripture, and demands both piety and learning for its interpretation.

5. The Roman Ch. pronounces our ministers to be but laymen, and our sacraments to be invalid. The non-episcopal churches make light of the irregularity of their self-constituted ministries. The Ch. of Eng. adheres to the Historic Episcopate and the three Orders, but makes no untenable claims on their behalf.

6. At Rome, salvation turned too much on outward performances and the official act of the priest; at Wittenberg, too much on an inward persuasion of the individual; at Geneva, too much on a mysterious Divine decree. In the PB, the saving will of the Divine Father, Redeemer and Sanctifier, the ministerial explanation and announcement of the promise and the conditions of Absolution, the ratifying sacramental seals of Bapt. and the Lord's Supper, and the personal requirement of penitent faith, are balanced in due proportions as factors in the saving process.

A study of the Gospels would furnish much evidence that this balanced inclusion of essentials is a true reflection of the attitude of our Lord Himself towards the religious movements and authorities of His time. And not a few biographies of English Churchmen show that those who walk in this wisely-ordered middle way of our Ch. realise, in so doing, the even poise of spirit, the quiet force of character, the secret spring of influence, which belong as of right to those who in any worthy measure imitate the resolute moderation of their suffering Lord.

It remains only to say something about a kindred characteristic of the CR. as expressed in the PB. It is comprehensive.

22. The CR. Substantial and not perfect agreement in belief and practice is required from worshippers. On certain fundamental points, such as the Incarnation of our Lord, the Work of the Holy Spirit, the forgiveness of penitent believers, the reality of sacramental grace, the supremacy and value of Scripture, the Divine commission of her ministry, the Eng. Ch. has spoken clearly. But outside this central zone the Ang. formularies are noticeably guarded and restrained in expression, and seem drawn so as to include as many as possible. Moreover, a large liberty of interpretation of the formularies has been customarily taken both by the clergy and the laity in regard alike to points of belief and practice, and has on several occasions been allowed by Courts. In this wide inclusiveness lies part of the strength of the Church.

On the other hand, her comprehensiveness is also a cause of weakness to the Ch. The unreconciled divergences are by many felt so acutely that they cannot act, and can scarcely worship, together. And it is important to realise that, while it is better to include the historic differences represented by the titles, High, Low, and Broad, than to suffer disruption.

or provoke wholesale secession, there is no strength or virtue in mere divergence. The inclusion of the differences can only be justified by the belief that they are not final, or that, at least, they can be reduced to differences of emphasis and expression. Further, a resolute search requires to be carried on, by qualified men within each typical group, for the uniting principle or policy which will reconcile conflicting views or practices without undue sacrifices. The impression is growing that this search has made considerable progress recently, and that parties and individuals are nearer to one another than they were a generation ago.

The men of real learning are certainly drawing together, and are carrying with them a large body of the clergy, especially those in middle life. But in each wing there is an "Old Guard," made up of men who extend the assurance drawn from a lifetime of Christian experience to cover all the traditional tenets of their party, and a "Young Guard," including all the younger men who have absorbed without criticism the clear-cut but one-sided statements of the party to which they belong. It is doubtful whether the extremists are as numerous as they are vocal. But they do splendid work. And the hopes of closer internal unity depend very considerably upon the degree in which the moderate men and the students can overcome their indecision, their love of quiet, their sense of isolation, and their aloofness from practical affairs, so as to influence adequately their day and generation.—K1.

G. HARFORD.

CHRISTMAS.—See FESTIVAL, § 4. 5, 6, 7; CHRISTMAS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).

CHRISTMAS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).—The subject on C. Day is of course the Incarnation. The morning Lessons

1. Christmas Day. are the well-known 9th Chapter of Isaiah and the story of the Nativity in St. Luke; while the evening Lessons are Is. 7 10-16 (the sign given to Ahaz), and Titus 3 4-8, which tells of the benefits to us of the Incarnation. This latter thought is continued in the Collect and expressed in "regeneration" and "renewal." The Epistle (Heb. 1 1) returns to the thought of Christ as the only begotten Son, and shows his superiority over the angels. This leads up to the great prologue of St. John used as the Gospel for the day (John 1 1), in which the eternal nature of the Word, His essential oneness with God, and His entrance into humanity are set forth. There is a special Preface in the HC Service, and special Pss. for the Day; and the Athanasian Cr. is appointed to be said.

The Collect for the Sunday following is the same as that for C. Day. The Epistle (Gal. 4 1) shows that Christ's Sonship implies our sonship by virtue of His Incarnation; we are no longer servants but sons, and, if sons, then heirs of God through Christ. The Gospel (Matt. 1 18) emphasises the leading thought in the Coll. by giving us St. Matthew's account of the Nativity. The proper Preface for C. is still used at HC.

The festival of the Circumcision naturally falls on the octave of C. In the Collect the circumcision of the flesh is spiritualised into that of the spirit, and both lead on to the great lesson of obedience. The Epistle

2. The Circumcision. (Rom. 4 8) presents St. Paul's arguments against the necessity of carnal circumcision for admission into the number of the true children of Abraham; while the Gospel (Luke 2 15) shows how Christ, though greater than Abraham, became obedient to the outer rite that he might fulfil the law. The two sides of the same question are here represented in Epistle and Gospel.—G5.

F. L. H. MILLARD.

CHRYSOSTOM (ST., PRAYER OF).—St. Chrysostom, one of the greatest Fathers of the Eastern Ch., was born c. 347, became presbyter at Antioch 386, Archbishop of Constantinople 398, and died 407. He is credited (rightly or wrongly) with the composition of the normal Liturgy of the Greek Ch., from the present text of which this Pr. (being the Pr. of the Third Antiphon) is taken. In the earliest MS. (Barberini), however, it is found not in the Liturgy of Chrysostom, but in that of Basil.¹ The translation is by Cranmer, and first appeared in the Lit of 1544. In 1662 it was placed also at the end of MEP.—D3.

J. W. TYLER.

CHURCH.—The word "Church" is necessarily one of very frequent occurrence in the PB. Some different usages may

1. Introductory. be distinguished. (1) In a few instances it is used of the building used for public worship; this occurs chiefly in rubrics, e.g., in the 4th rubric bef. HC, "in the body of the Church, or in the Chancel." (2) In some passages (e.g., in Pref. to Order of Confirm., "openly before the Church") it signifies the congregation assembled for worship. (3) When the Ch. of Eng. is signified, this limitation is generally expressed (e.g., Ord.⁸ Q. 1), but occasionally the reference is to the Ch. of Eng. even where no such limitation is laid down (e.g., Pref. to Order of Confirm., "The Church hath thought good to order"). (4) In the vast majority of instances "Church" means the Ch. Universal. The epithet is sometimes supplied (e.g., Lit., "thy holy Church universal," and Post-Comm. Prayer, "thy whole Church"), or we have such a phrase as "Christ's Church," "the Church of God"; but even without any such addition the Catholic Ch. is usually signified; it is enough to refer to such Collects as Trin. 5, 15, 16, 22, 23, St. Simon and St. Jude. The two first usages hardly need comment, and the third is the subject of a separate art. (CHURCH OF ENGLAND). The present art. is concerned with the origin, constitution, and functions of the Universal Ch. With regard to the etymology of the English word "Church," it need only be said that, though the derivation is by no means free from difficulty, the best etymologists now agree in accepting the connection with κυριακόν (sc. δῶμα) = "belonging to the Lord," the term being applied first to the fabric and then to the body of the faithful (see NED, s.v. "Church").

¹ Ὁ τὰς κοινὰς ταύτας καὶ συμφώνους ἡμῖν χαρισμένους προσευχάς, ὁ καὶ δυοὶ καὶ τρισὶ συμφωνοῦσιν ἐπὶ τῇ δόγματι σου τὰς αἰτήσεις παρέχειν ἐπαγγελῶμενος αὐτοῖς καὶ νῦν τῶν δούλων σου τὰ αἰτήματα πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον πλῆρωσον, χορηγῶν ἡμῖν ἐν τῷ παρόντι αἰῶνι τὴν ἐπίγνωσην τῆς σῆς ἀληθείας, καὶ ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι ζωὴν αἰώνιον χαρισόμενος.

(1) The Church in the New Testament. In order to understand the origin and constitution of the Ch., it is essential to look back first to the method and injunctions of our Lord, and to the action of the Apostolic Ch., as recorded in the NT. "Church" is the translation of the Greek ἐκκλησία, which was used in classical Greek for an assembly of citizens, and in the LXX = Heb. kāhāl, the "congregation" of Israel. It does not mean a number of people "called out" of the world, but its previous usage made it the natural word to apply to the Christian community, whether assembled for worship or simply viewed collectively. The word occurs 115 times in the NT and is esp. frequent in Acts, Pauline Eps., and Rev. In the Gospels it occurs only in two passages of St. Matt. (16 18, 18 17), of which the latter implies that the disciples would form a congregation with powers of discipline, and the former points to an organised society of believers, built on a foundation of rock and indestructible. Christ's intention as to a Ch. must however be looked for not only where the word ἐκκλησία occurs, but in his action and teaching as to discipleship. Christ's method was not that of promiscuous preaching or working of miracles, nor did he compose any sacred book or code of laws. He made a few disciples, among whom there was an inner circle of Twelve Apostles. These he taught, tested, and trained, made witnesses of his Resurrection, and to them he gave the command to make disciples of all nations. For his disciples he instituted Sacraments; the one, Bapt., as a Sac. of initiation into the Ch.; the other, HC, as the means of preserving spiritual life among members of the Ch.: in both cases there was a visible token of membership in a visible society. Account must also be taken of his teaching as to the kingdom of God; and, though the idea of the kingdom is wider than that of the Ch., the Ch. may be regarded as the earthly anticipation of, and school of training for, the kingdom of God. This view of Christ's intention is confirmed by the action of the Apostles after Pentecost, and by the records of the Apostolic Ch. in the Acts and Eps. We do not find isolated believers, nor is the Ch. an afterthought. Every baptised believer is by Bapt. a member of a visible society, the Body of Christ. This society exists at first at Jerusalem, gradually it becomes conscious of its universal mission, and admits Gentiles on equal terms; as the Gospel spreads to Samaria, Antioch, Galatia, Asia, Greece, Rome, the centre of gravity shifts from Jerusalem, and in every city a local Ch. springs up. The word ἐκκλησία is used of these local Churches, even of a Ch. in a private household, and often occurs in the plural; but there is never any hint of rival "Churches" in the same area. In St. Paul's Eps. we find a real discipline in the local Churches, and a real bond of union linking the different Churches, although there was as yet no developed system of government. St. Paul exercises his Apostolic authority, appeals to commands of Christ and to customs of other Churches, while the esprit de corps and sense of brotherhood and of separation from the world serve as incentives to discipline even in communities so imperfect as the Ch. of Corinth. There was intercommunication between different Churches, and the Apostolic authority was a bond of union between them. The universal ἐκκλησία, on which St. Paul dwells in Eph. and Col., is not an afterthought, or the result of the federation of a number of local ἐκκλησίαι. In St. Paul's view the universal Ch. is the sum not of a number of local Churches, but of all individual Christians, and the local Ch. is the representative in each place of the whole Society. (See Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 168, though he seems to minimise apostolic authority, and to overestimate the independence of local ἐκκλησίαι.)

Thus the Ch. in the NT is a visible and coherent, though as yet not fully organised, society of faithful believers, who are admitted by Bapt., and united by a common faith, a common worship, including the sacramental "breaking of bread" (Acts 2 42), and a common "way of life" (886s). In relation to each other, members of the Ch. are "brothers," and as distinguished from those outside they are "saints" (ἅγιοι), i.e., men set apart for God's service. They are subject by their own choice to discipline and authority, and we find the early stages of an organised ministry, apostles, "apostolic delegates" such as Timothy and Titus, presbyter-bishops, and deacons, while there is also a "charismatic" ministry of prophets, evangelists and teachers. (See ORDERS, HOLY; EPISCOPACY.) The Ch. is everywhere a witness to Christ; it is open to all the world without distinction of rank or nationality; it offers a spiritual home, a school of training in this life and of preparation for the life to come; and, in spite of obvious imperfections, it is "holy," as being the dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit, the temple of God, the Bride of Christ, and the Body of Christ.

(2) The Period of Development—Patristic Doctrine of the Church (A.D. 100-500). The four centuries which followed the Apostolic age were a period of growth and development. It was a time of continuous expansion both in respect of numbers and in geographical extent. In the 4th cent. the relations between the Ch. and the World underwent a momentous change; and during the whole period the ministry and the system of government and organisation were gradually developed; while at the same time the doctrine or theory of Ch. unity and order was discussed and systematised by a series of writers, among whom may be named Ignatius, Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Cyril of Jerusalem,

3. Patristic Doctrine.
A.D. 100-500.

Optatus, Augustine, and Leo the Great. Both for practice and for theory the period is one of vital importance.

In the form of the Nicene Creed quoted by Epiphanius in 374 we find the words "one Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church." The word "Holy" was unfortunately omitted in our version of the Creed, but, as the Apostles' Creed witnesses, this does not imply any disbelief in the holiness of the Ch. The clause summarises four leading characteristics or "notes" of the Ch.—Unity, Holiness, Catholicity, Apostolicity—on each of which stress was laid in patristic teaching, while the importance attached to them is clearly apparent in the actual development of Ch. history. It may be convenient to take these four "notes" in detail, as an examination of them will bring before us most of the leading features in the system and theory of the Church.

(a) We saw in the NT a real but unsystematised Unity. The obligation is clearly acknowledged, and measures are already taken to

4. Unity. secure unity; indeed, the dangers from HERESY and SCHISM are apparent in the 1st cent. These dangers became greatly accentuated as time went on, and stronger measures were necessary to secure unity, while the insistence on unity as a doctrinal truth was correspondingly emphasised by a whole series of theological writers, and called forth special treatises De Unitate Ecclesiae from Cyprian and Augustine. On the practical side, divisions were repressed by the exercise of discipline, including, in the last resort, separation from Catholic Communion. There was no attempt to secure unity through a spiritual despotism, or by the autocratic government of any single see, though Rome, as the metropolis of the ancient world, naturally acquired a primacy of honour and influence. Unity was not understood to involve absolute uniformity of ritual or custom, as is plainly shown by well-known utterances of St. Augustine and Gregory the Great, e.g., "in una fide nihil officit consuetudo diversa." It was only gradually that the expression of doctrinal belief came to assume uniform shape in the Creeds, though substantial unity of fundamental doctrines was from the first regarded as necessary. When persecution relaxed, and it became possible for Christians from different places to meet freely, Councils began to be held, first provincial, then ecumenical. In spite of the strifes and scandals connected with them, they served a great and providential purpose in maintaining unity, and the "Nicene" Creed, the most widely accepted of all the Creeds of Christendom, was itself the product of successive Councils. But the great instrument of unity was the Episcopate. In every city the bp. was the living symbol of unity, as well as the officer specially charged with maintaining it; and to be in visible communion with him was to be included in the unity of the Ch. Sacramental life was indeed regarded as having an essential connection with unity, both internal and external. Bapt. was the beginning of union with Christ; the Holy Euch. was the means of maintaining this inner union with Christ, and through him with all fellow-Christians; and at the same time participation in these Sacraments was regarded as the sign and seal of external unity. The Episcopate everywhere was held to constitute a single body, each member of which had the same authority; and, although there are instances of individual bps. falling into schism, it is difficult to exaggerate the unifying influence which was exerted by the office. Reasons of space forbid the insertion of detailed references to patristic statements on the unity of the Ch.: many references will be found in Dr. Darwell Stone's book, The Christian Church, c. 5, where there is a valuable exposition of the patristic doctrine. Only one or two points can be noticed here. The insistence on unity is not confined to any one part of this period, or to any one portion of the Ch. It is found in Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, and Dionysius of Alexandria, as strongly as in Cyprian's De Unitate, or St. Augustine's anti-Donatistic treatises; and the numerous and vehement assertions of it in the Ignatian Letters (e.g., Philadelph. 3, 4; Smyrn. 8) early in the 2nd cent. disprove the view that it was a comparatively late development. Cyprian did not stand alone in his view that outside the unity of the Church there was no salvation, though perhaps he states it more clearly than any other writer (De Unit. Eccl. 6, 7, 8), and such a view is more in harmony with his entire rejection of heretical Baptism than with the opposite principle which the Ch. finally accepted. Finally, it should be noted that, though schisms were formed, the principle of disunion was never defended; the schismatics regarded themselves as the true Ch., from which others had fallen away by the denial of some essential principle: they did not maintain the legitimacy of having rival Churches in the same area, or of establishing a new "Church" without historical continuity.

(b) Holiness is the second note of the Ch. Just as St. Paul could address the Christians at Corinth as "saints," although

5. Holiness. the Ch. of Corinth was troubled with factions and moral abuses, so throughout this period the ideal holiness of the Ch. was always maintained, and the obligation of holiness insisted on, while the actual imperfection of the Ch. was fully acknowledged. This imperfection became more manifest as time went on. Christianity became more hereditary and conventional. In times of persecution such Christians could not stand the strain, and yielded to some form of apostasy. When persecution relaxed, the evils of nominal Christianity appeared more plainly; when Christianity became the established and favoured religion, and still more when men were forced by persecution to become Christians, the moral standard was inevitably lowered. Hence there arose a series of "Puritan" protests against laxity, and sects were formed which claimed the enforcement of a higher standard and a more vigorous discipline: hence also came the ascetic movement towards monasticism. Montanism, Novatianism, Donatism, and Priscillianism were all due to the wish to vindicate the holiness of the Ch. as an actual and not merely an ideal "note." The principle at issue is exemplified in the controversy with Montanism, and there can be no more forcible statement of the Puritan principle than is to be found in the later writings of Tertullian (e.g., de Pudicitia, de Jeuniis, de Corona Militis, etc.). On the other hand, the principles on which the Ch. acted in opposition to the exaggerated claims of the Puritans are clearly expounded in the treatises which St. Augustine wrote against the Donatists and in the writings of Optatus. St. Augustine laid special stress on the teaching of Christ in some of the parables of the Kingdom (e.g., the Tares and the Draw Net), and he refuted the Donatist view that the efficacy of Sacraments depends upon the personal sanctity of the minister by emphasising the objective character of Sacraments. St. Augustine is the first writer in whom we find any explicit identification of the Kingdom of God with the Ch.; but, while he made this identification, he was always painfully conscious of the actual imperfections of the members of the Visible Ch.; and this feeling, combined with his doctrine of Predestination, led him to formulate the distinction between the communio sanctorum, the elect, and the communio externa, which includes unworthy as well as worthy members, though the former are only in the Kingdom until, like the tares, they are rooted out, and are not really of it (see Robertson, Regnum Dei, Lect. v). But this idea of a Visible Ch. with true and false members is a different thing from the later idea of an Invisible Ch. without any ecclesiastical unity, though both are attempts to explain the contrast between the ideal holiness of the Ch. and its actual shortcomings.

(c) After "holiness" comes Catholicity. The word katholikos does not occur in the NT as an epithet of the Ch.; indeed it

& Catholicity, is not found there at all. The first instance of its application to the Ch. is in Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 8), "wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church." The sense here is simply that of "universal" as opposed to local or partial. Christ is represented as standing to the universal Ch. in the same relation as the bp. to each local Ch. The idea of the universality of the Ch. did not originate with Ignatius: it is already found in the NT, esp. in St. Paul's Eps., where there is a full consciousness of its universal mission and of its independence of national and racial limitations. The expression "Catholic Church" is found more than once in the Martyrdom of Polycarp in the middle of the 2nd cent., but the technical sense of the word cannot with certainty be traced back further than the Muratorian Fragment (about A.D. 200) and Clement of Alexandria. In the 3rd and 4th centuries the technical usages spread, and under the pressure of schisms the word naturally underwent a slight change of signification. The heretical or schismatical bodies were contrasted with the Catholic Ch.; they were local and partial, the Ch. was one and universal, and maintained the fides catholica. Hence Catholic came to connote not merely universality, but orthodoxy as opposed to heresy, and unity as opposed to schism. In the 4th cent. patristic writers expanded the meaning of the word and read into it a fresh significance. The best-known passage occurs in St. Cyril of Jerusalem, who in his lectures on the Creed (Catech. 18 a) gives three reasons for the use of the epithet: (1) because the Ch. extends throughout the whole world; (2) because it teaches universally all the doctrines that man needs; (3) because it heals universally every kind of sin and possesses every form of virtue. The connection between the usage of the word and the growth of divisions in the Ch. is well illustrated by Pacian (A.D. 370), who asks how a man could distinguish the true Ch. in a city where there were different bodies of Christians, except by inquiring for the "Catholic Church." The Arian and Donatist controversies especially did much to draw out the significance of the word and to establish its technical use, and the letters and controversial writings of Augustine and others against the Donatists contain many discussions of the subject. It must not be forgotten that some writers (e.g. Irenæus) may be full of the idea of Catholicity without actually using the word. The foregoing remarks have been mainly concerned with the theory of Catholicity, but in the Ch. of the first five centuries the practical acknowledgment and application of the principle must not be overlooked. The process of geographical extension went on steadily, and, with the "establishment" of Christianity, the Ch. became the religious counterpart of the great imperial system of Rome. The proclamation of Theodosius, De Fide Catholica, limited the name Catholic to orthodox believers in agreement with the bps. of Rome and Alexandria, and branded all other Christians as heretics liable both to divine vengeance and to temporal punishment.

(d) The last of the four notes of the Ch. is Apostolicity. The exact meaning of this word does not lie on the surface, and it has been interpreted both in a looser and in a more definite sense. Apostolic, as an epithet of the Ch., might imply that the Ch. always preserved the ideals and principles of the Apostles, or that it is the same Ch. which was built upon the Apostles as on a foundation; or, in the light of patristic teaching on apostolical succession, it may be taken as definitely implying a continuous historical link with the Apostles through the ministry, and the recognition of the principle that ministerial authority cannot be delegated from below, but must be handed down so that there may be no interruption of the ministerial commission received by the Apostles from above. For a full discussion of this question reference must be made to the article on APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. The view which is taken of apostolical succession will naturally be affected by the view which is accepted as to the original apostolic commission. If it is held that the Apostles received no commission of government from Christ, but were only commissioned by Him to preach, and were afterwards entrusted with authority to govern by consent of the Church and "delegation from below," this view would naturally be adverse to apostolical succession as a necessary principle of Ch. order. But to the present writer it appears that such a view is erroneous, and that it is impossible to explain away such passages as those in which Clement of Rome at the end of the 1st cent., and Irenæus and Tertullian before the close of the 2nd, insist upon the principle of continuous succession from the Apostles (cp. the passages from these writers referred to in Dr. D. Stone, The Christian Church, pp. 141-3). It should also be remembered that, although apostolical succession has been associated with episcopacy and the threefold ministry, it is a more fundamental principle than either, and does not logically involve a particular theory of the development of the ministry. And in practice, whether the principle of succession does or does not represent the injunction of Christ, it was jealously observed in the Ch. throughout the world from the 2nd cent. until the Reformation.

(3) Doctrine and System of the Church after the Division of Christendom. In the previous section some account has been given of the development of the system and theory of the Ch. in the undivided Christendom of the early centuries. It remains to trace briefly some variations due to the great divisions which subsequently took place. It is evident that such breaches of unity as the great Schism of East and West or the Reformation introduced anomalous conditions and created fresh problems, more far-reaching in their character than those which confronted the Early Ch. in dealing with successive heresies and schisms. It may be convenient to glance in turn at the views held in the Eastern Church, the Church of Rome, the Anglican Communion, and the non-episcopal bodies established at or since the Reformation.

3. Later Views.

A. Of the Eastern Church it may be said that, as in other respects, so in its doctrine of the Ch., it has maintained a conservative attitude. It has preserved the old patristic doctrine, and lays stress on each of the four notes of the Ch. It also emphasises very strongly the necessity of orthodox adherence to the faith; and this is expressed in the epithet Orthodox which forms part of the title of the Eastern Church. Moreover, it rigidly upholds the principles of succession and episcopacy. Divided as it is into independent Churches, it regards these different branches as being sufficiently united by their common creed, by sacramental intercommunion, and by the episcopate. It regards the Ch. of Rome as having violated the unity of Christendom through her aggressive ambition, and condemns the abandonment of the principle of unity by Protestant bodies. The stricter writers of the Eastern Ch. would appear to class Anglicans with non-episcopal Protestants, and to exclude Anglicans, Protestants, and Roman Catholics alike from the Visible Ch., and therefore from the covenant of salvation. But there is no General Council of the whole Orthodox Eastern Ch., and there appear to be no authoritative and universally binding pronouncements on the subject.

B. The Church of Rome also maintains the four "notes" and the patristic doctrine of the 10. Church of Rome. Ch., but in respect of the unity of the Ch. Rome has put forward claims which are of vital importance.

This is not the place to discuss the growth of the Papal power on the historical basis of the Papal claims; on these points reference should be made to such works as F. W. Puller's Primitive Saints and the See of Rome, or Gore's Roman Catholic Claims. Briefly, the contention amounts to this—that, while Christ is the Head of the Ch., the Pope, as successor of St. Peter, is the Vicar of Christ, and therefore Head of the Ch. on earth. Consequently, communion with the See of Rome and obedience to the Bp. of Rome are made the tests of membership in the Universal Ch., and the Creed of Pope Pius IV acknowledges One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Ch. According to this test the Orthodox Eastern Ch. and the Anglican Communion are excluded from the Catholic Ch. no less than Lutheran or Calvinistic bodies, though Rome so far makes a distinction as to acknowledge the validity of the ministry and the Sacraments in the Eastern Ch. The development of the Roman claims, which were intended to secure a centralised unity for Christendom, has in fact proved the most fatal source of disunion and disruption. They postulate a single visible Head for the Visible Ch., and for this visible Head universal authority, temporal as well as spiritual, was claimed in the Middle Ages, while at the Vatican Council of 1870 there was a formal declaration of Papal infallibility, which has proved to be a fresh obstacle in the way of restoring the unity of the Church.

C. The Anglican theory of the Ch. is more difficult to describe than either the Eastern or the Roman. Even in the cases of the East and of Rome, theologians would vary to some extent in their statement of principles. In the case of the Ch. of Eng. there would be the widest possible variation in the views of the Ch. held by her members, and a very wide difference between the theologians of repute within her borders. It is necessary therefore to turn to her official statements. It cannot be denied that these are incomplete and in some respects ambiguous.

11. Anglican Views.

In some cases indeed (e.g., Arts. 19, 23) the ambiguity is no doubt intentional, and the lack of explicit statements in the Cat. on the subject of the Ch. may be ascribed to divergences of opinion. Yet there are certain general principles which are sufficiently clear, as being expressed or implied in the Thirty-nine Arts. or in the language of the PB. The Reformation in England was primarily a revolt against the Papal jurisdiction; hence we have in Art. 37 an explicit repudiation of that claim. In Art. 19 Rome is spoken of as one portion of the Ch., liable to error like other portions, but no countenance is given to the Puritan contention that Rome must be "unchurched" as "Antichrist" or the "Synagogue of Satan"; and, plainly, the position taken in the Arts. is that the Ch. of Eng. recognises the Roman and Eastern Communions as being like herself true members of the Ch. Catholic, while she condemns errors and abuses which had grown up within their borders. As to the validity of non-episcopal ministries and Sacraments the Arts. seem to be intentionally obscure (19, 23). On the other hand, the Arts. assert some central principles, e.g., that the Ch. is a Visible Ch. (19, 26) in which good and evil are mingled; the Ordinal maintains the principles of succession, episcopacy and a threefold ministry; the use of the three Creeds testifies to unity in fundamental doctrine; and the Arts. (20, 34) enforce the claim, which is evident in the PB as a whole, that a particular or national Ch. has power to decree or alter rites and ceremonies, though in doing so she is bound to respect the principles of tradition, edification, and conformity to Scripture. The authority of Scripture is indeed emphasised several times in the Arts. (6, 8, 20, 21, 34), which however avoid the Puritan extreme of rejecting all customs and ceremonies not explicitly prescribed in it. The title page of the PB reflects the general position of the Ch. of Eng.: the Sacraments, rites, and ceremonies are those "of the Church" (Catholic) "according to the use of the Ch. of Eng.": local variation is regarded as compatible with Catholic continuity. Whether the Ch. of Eng. at the Reformation made changes which were inexpedient or were not really justifiable on her own principles is a different question, but there is no doubt as to her claim to have preserved the "notes" of the true Ch., and that claim is based on an appeal to primitive as opposed to later mediæval principles of Catholic unity. As we have already seen, the claim is not admitted by the Ch. of Rome, or by the Eastern Church.

D. Protestant Theories of the Ch. The Reformation was at first a revolt against the extravagant claims of Rome and against great practical abuses (e.g., Indulgences, simony and moral corruption), and there was not in its early stages any deliberate desire to set up a new system of Ch. order in place of the Catholic system. But the Reformation soon liberated forces which gave birth to a number of new principles and theories that proved irreconcilable with the existing order. It is not possible to include in a single formula all the different systems advocated or established by different Protestant bodies in England or on the Continent, but some characteristics may be observed as either universally or very commonly prevalent. (a) The jurisdiction of Rome was universally repudiated, and the hatred of Roman abuses often led to the rejection of customs and principles which were not peculiarly Roman but really Catholic. (b) The doctrine of a Visible Ch. was not absolutely rejected; it is found (e.g.) in Luther's writings and in the AUGSBURG CONFESSION; but there grew up alongside of it a tendency to emphasise the Invisible Ch. (consisting of the Elect, or the true saints) at the expense of the Visible. This tendency is most prominent in the countries affected by the Swiss Reformation. (c) There was a general neglect or rejection of the established principles as to the ministry. In some Protestant bodies episcopacy disappeared altogether, and was replaced by Presbyterianism; in others the name and administrative functions were preserved, but the succession was not maintained. The Independents introduced the principle of congregational autonomy, which was more destructive of Ch. order than the Presbyterian system, and the Society of Friends dispensed altogether with both ministry and Sacraments, and relied on the illumination of the individual by the Holy Spirit. Thus experience has shown that abandonment of the principle of succession has produced a great variety of religious sects, based on conflicting principles, and ranging from an orderly Presbyterianism down to mere individualism, in which the idea of a Ch. reaches vanishing-point. (d) One more characteristic must be noticed—the position given to Holy Scripture. When the authority of the Ch. was minimised or denied, it was natural that a substitute for it should be sought elsewhere, and this was found in the emphasis laid upon the Bible. It was a natural reaction, not without wholesome elements, but it was carried to excess in the Bibliolatry of the Puritans, who sought in the Bible a complete Ch. polity, system of worship, and code of morals. This view of the Bible has exercised a profound influence on popular religion in England, and, since the interpretation of the Bible was assigned to the individual rather than to the Ch., it has tended to produce the type of individualistic, undenominational religion now so prevalent among us, in which the individual selects whatever is congenial in Bible-teaching or Christian morality, and neglects the Sacraments and discipline of the Ch. and the doctrinal system of the Creeds, often regarding the very idea of a Ch. system (and still more the principle of ministerial succession) as mechanical and unspiritual.

In the preceding paragraphs some attempt has been made to trace the effects on the theory and system of the Ch. of various breaches of the principle of unity. A state of disunion is inconsistent with the essential principle of the Ch., though unity does not imply uniformity or a centralised ecclesiastical despotism.

13. Conclusions.

Disunion therefore introduces anomalous conditions; difficult problems arise for which there is no clear solution, and hard cases for which no satisfactory provision can be made. Rigid theorists do not hesitate to apply their principles deductively without reference to these anomalous conditions; but in practice we cannot ignore (e.g.) such facts as that there is at present no appeal to a General Council, or that members of the Ch. of Eng. are debarred from communion in Roman Catholic countries, and that therefore provision must be made for them unless they are to join the Ch. of Rome. Among similar difficulties may be mentioned the questions whether "Church" should be used to denote any Christian denomination, and whether members of "separated" bodies should be reckoned as belonging to or as outside the Visible Ch. As to the former point, although the wider use may seem to concede the principle at stake, it is almost impossible to avoid it owing to reasons of convenience and courtesy, if not of legal claim: as to the latter, it appears to the present writer that, although the obligation of unity is clear and the principle of succession is historically true, there is a wider sense in which even those who contravene those principles may be said to be included in the Ch. For, if the Ch. was right in her deliberate decision that heretical and schismatical Baptism are valid, it would seem to involve the principle that the breach of unity and order does not wholly exclude men from a corporate relation to the Body of Christ. In this view a member of a separated body in England could not properly claim to take part in the affairs of the Ch. of Eng. while he remains in a state of separation, but he should not be regarded as altogether outside. His membership is, as it were, suspended by his own act, but has not ceased to exist.

(4) The Church and the World. (a) The Universal Mission. The preceding sections have been concerned with the origin and nature of the Church; it remains to consider it in relation to the World, which is the scene of its operations. The epithet "Catholic" implies the universality of the mission of the Ch. This universal mission has generally been acknowledged, and is distinctly stated in the injunctions of Christ at the close of each of the Synoptic Gospels and in Acts 1 8, while it is implied in many other passages in the Gospels. Dr. Harnack has maintained that this universalism was not part of Christ's teaching, but an after-thought on the part of the Apostles: his view, however, seems to be arbitrary and a priori, and involves the re-writing of the Gospel record, while it seems impossible on his principles to account for the general acceptance of the universal mission which we find in the writings and recorded actions of the Apostles (cp. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, bk. 1, cc. 4, 5; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 35-41; Hobhouse, The Church and the World, pp. 348-350).

14. The Church's Mission.

(b) The Geographical Extension of the Church. It would be impossible to trace in any detail here the stages by which the Ch., in fulfilment of her universal mission, gradually extended the sphere of her work throughout the known world. In the Acts and the Eps. of St. Paul we have the incomplete record of the labours of the apostolic generation. A second stage is marked by the expansion which had been attained before the conversion of Constantine: of this a full and excellent account is given by Harnack (ib., bk. 4). After this comes the spread of Christianity in the Roman Empire as the favoured religion, and afterwards as the officially prescribed religion; then the evangelisation of the barbarian races which overran Europe, a process spread over many centuries; the missionary efforts in the New World from the 16th cent. onwards; and the revived sense of missionary opportunity and obligation which is one of the features of our own time. The consciousness of her universal mission has sometimes seemed to be almost dormant in the Ch., but has never been wholly extinguished, and the degree of clearness with which it is realised is no unfair test of the vigour and health of the Church's life. (See further, FOREIGN MISSIONS.)

(c) The Method of the Church in the Conversion of the World. In the NT we see the Apostolic

Ch. embarking upon the task of converting the world by bearing witness to Christ and His Resurrection, by 15. Methods of Extension.

preaching the good tidings of salvation, by making disciples of and baptising those who responded to their message. For nearly three centuries this task was carried on in the face of hostile opposition, if not of actual persecution; during that period Christianity could only make way on its merits, by carrying conviction to men's minds and consciences or by satisfying the religious instincts and cravings of their hearts. It cost much to become a Christian, and this acted as a check upon the promiscuous and nominal acceptance of Christianity. A new stage began with the conversion of Constantine. Christianity was first tolerated, then favoured, and finally enforced by law. The Ch. readily accepted this new condition of things, and saw in it the opportunity of accelerating the desired conversion of the world. Was this course right and inevitable, as has been generally supposed? The present writer can only answer the question in the negative, for he believes that the example and teaching of Christ point to an intensive rather than to an extensive method for the Ch., and that He laid stress on the voluntary nature of discipleship and its exacting character, while He discouraged promiscuous and half-hearted acceptance of His teaching. The result, moreover, of the new policy seems to have been a great lowering of the moral and spiritual standard of the Ch., and the adoption of methods of coercion and persecution which lasted for many centuries. For the detailed justification of this view, reference must be made to The Church and the World (Bampton Lectures, 1909), especially Lectures iii, iv. At the same time it must be pointed out that historians have for the most part approved the alliance of the Ch. with the world under Constantine, regarding it as a providential arrangement by which the Roman Empire was Christianised before it fell, and the new barbarian races were brought under the educating and civilising influence of the Ch. But whichever view is correct, the Ch. began in the 4th cent. to pursue a more comprehensive method, and to attempt with the help of the secular power and of external motives to make itself co-extensive with the world.

(d) Church and State. The problem of the relations of Church and State may be said in a sense to date back to the time of

17. Church and State.

Constantine. A relation like that which we describe as "establishment" began with his legislation. The Emperors gave patronage and protection, and exercised a power of control, e.g., in the settlement of disputes and the suppression of heresy. The Catholic Ch. ultimately became the sole recognised religion of the Empire. At a later stage the rise of the Papal claims led to an encroachment on the temporal sphere by the spiritual power; but according to both the Papal and the Imperial theories in the Middle Ages there was the closest possible connection between the Ch. and the Empire, and the temporal power, if not subject to the spiritual, was bound to support and defend it. The Reformation destroyed alike the unity of Christendom and the reality of the mediæval Empire, but it did not at first dissolve the intimate relation of Church and State; it only made the nation the religious unit, and subjected each national Ch. to the religious policy of the ruler. The policy of religious toleration was a later, and a very slow, development; and it has introduced into the relations of Ch. and State many anomalies which still exist and many problems which are still unsolved. Thus (e.g.) in England "Establishment" dates back to a time of religious coercion and uniformity; it now exists under conditions of complete toleration and the utmost diversity, and the Ch. is legally subject to the control of a Parliament composed of men who may hold any form of belief, or none. This is not the place to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of an ESTABLISHED CH.: it is only necessary to draw attention to the immense change which has been caused by the prevalence of religious toleration and equality in the relations of Ch. and State.

LITERATURE. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, and Judaistic Christianity; Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity (Eng. Trans.); Gore, The Church and the Ministry; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry (from a Presbyterian standpoint); A. J. Mason, Principles of Ecclesiastical Unity; Darwell Stone, The Christian Church; T. A. Lacey, The Unity of the Church, as treated by English Theologians. On the relations of the Ch. to the World and the State, see the present writer's Bampton Lectures (1909), The Church and the World in Idea and in History; and for the view opposed to his, cp. H. Hensley Henson, The National Church; J. H. B. Masterman, The Rights and Responsibilities of National Churches; Bp. Creighton, The National Church.—A2. WALTER HOBHOUSE.

CHURCH (BUILDING OF).—In building a C. at the present day it is rarely desirable to make any considerable deviation from the plan that has, with slight modifications, been used for centuries. First, it is desirable, unless the position makes this impossible, that worshippers should face towards the east, as has been the general English custom. Ordinarily, no better arrangement can be made than that of a nave with aisles, and a chancel also with aisles. A square-ended CHANCEL is most in accordance with English custom, and it is the most economical form both as to space and cost. In a large and lofty building an apsidal chancel is very dignified, if the C. has a vaulted roof. Without this there is little beauty in an APSE. The ALTAR (LORD'S TABLE) should never be placed flat against the apse wall, but should stand clear on the chord of the latter. Further, the full beauty of the apse is only obtained when an aisle is carried round it, and it thus stands upon an open arcade.

1. The Chancel and its Fittings.

The TRANSEPT was most in use in conventual and collegiate Cs., where it was of practical convenience in affording room for a series of chapels facing eastwards. The symbolism of the cruciform plan no doubt helped its popularity. One chapel may now well be formed on the east side of a transept, and, in town Cs. with frequent services, if a second chapel were placed against the opposite transept, a congregation could assemble there without disturbing an earlier service in the first chapel not quite completed. A chamber for the ORGAN, opening both towards chancel and transept, is a good position for sound, especially if it is placed on an upper level above a chapel.

In the earlier periods of Gothic architecture chancels were always entered by an arch from the nave. Later, this was omitted, and nave and chancel were covered by one continuous roof. "In times past" there was always a high open SCREEN of stone or wood at the chancel entrance, and further emphasis can also be given to the chancel by richer decoration of the roof.

As the first object of a C. is Worship, all its arrangements should be made towards this end. The Altar, as that to which all should tend, should be sufficiently raised to give it dignity. This is best done by placing steps in proximity to it rather than by having many of them at the entrance of the chancel. It should be in length about one-third of the breadth of the chancel, and rarely less than 8 ft. 6 in. long and 2 ft. 6 in.

to 3 ft. broad. Its height should be about 3 ft. 4½ in. It should be of the best materials, but of not too elaborate design, as it is directed by canon 82 to be covered with "a CARPET of silk," etc.

On the south side of the Sacrament Table there should be placed a CREDENCE Table for the altar cruets, alms dish, etc. A PISCINA is often placed near it, but, whether this is done or not, a piscina should be provided in the Sacristy. These, like the Font, should be made to empty into a soak-away and not into a common drain.

Above the altar is the REREDOS, which now, as in old times, must take very different shapes in different places. St. Albans and Carlisle, Wells and All Souls', Oxford, call for very varying treatment. It should be remembered that the early low-silled east window probably gave place to the heightened Reredos on account of the painful glare of light which resulted from the older usage.

At the chancel gate there need not be more than one or two steps. In old days the floors of the nave and chancel were often on the same level. In front of the Altar there should be a footpace quite 3 ft. broad, and the two steps adjacent to it should be of sufficient breadth for the accommodation of the assisting ministers. Between these steps and the place for Communion there should be a clear space at least 4 ft. broad to allow for the ministrations of the clergy; and again there should be another 5 ft. between the rail or desk for communicants and the ends of the singers' seats. It is of importance that the rail should never stand above more than one step. If there are two or more it adds to the labour of the ministrants, and is dangerous for the feeble.

Further west are the singers' seats in two or three rows on each side of the chancel. They must not be too high, or kneeling is made difficult, and it is better that books should be held in the singers' hands when standing. This tends to an upright position, and the latter again is good for the voice. Two ft. are a sufficient height for boys' desks. In old times the chancel seats were returned, that is to say, one row of seats was placed with its back to the Screen and facing eastwards. This arrangement is often adopted now. It may be noted here that the position of these stalls is a reason why formerly the chancel floor was not raised above the nave.

The chancel SCREEN is now often only a low parapet wall, but the adoption of the old high Screen is much to be desired. It adds dignity to the church. Gates at the chancel entrance are often a necessity when Cs. are left open.

We now come to the NAVE. This should not be less than 24 ft. wide, and it should have a central passage at least 5 ft. broad.

2. The Nave and its Fittings.

An even greater width is desirable. Chairs may then be placed at the ends of the rows of seats, and these can be removed at times of weddings, funerals, etc. The Litany desk (FALDSTOOL) should be placed in this passage near the chancel gate.

It is well that there should be doors towards the west end of both aisles. These, to prevent draughts, should be double. They should open on a wide cross-passage passing behind the west end of the seating. To the west of this at the end of the Nave is generally the best position for the FONT. It is sufficiently near the church entrance, and is also convenient for administration of Bapt. in the presence of the congregation. As fresh water is now used at each time of Bapt., there must be a drain to the Font which should be connected with a soak-away under the floor. It is directed by canon 81 that the Font shall be of stone. If it is of porous stone, it should be lined with lead. Unrepealed directions order that there should be a cover for the Font, and that it should be kept locked.

A passage, 3 ft. wide at least, should be provided in each AISLE. As mentioned before, the aisles should be continued along the sides of the chancel. This provides a path for communicants to retire from the chancel without having to face those approaching up the nave. There should also be a cross-passage in front of the chancel-screen.

The PULPIT is ordinarily best placed at one side of the east end of the nave, but in very large churches it may be placed against one of the piers of the nave arcade. A sounding board, besides being useful, may be dignified. The LECTERN should be placed on the opposite side to the pulpit, and not in the centre of the chancel.

The Pews should be placed far enough apart for kneeling purposes. For this about 3 ft. are required with a length of 20 in. for each person. The height of the backs (which are better nearly upright) should be 32 inches, and the tops should be flat without any projections. Shelves for books should be placed fairly low down, or they hit against the chests of those kneeling against them. Trouble is often caused by pews being closed in down to the ground. This adds greatly to the labour of sweeping.

The position of the ORGAN has been touched on in speaking of the transepts. Whether there are transepts or not, it is very desirable that the organ should be raised up, and that the console should be placed on the floor where the player may hear what he is doing and keep in touch with the singers.

The Vestries (see VESTRY) are generally better as subsidiary buildings than as portions of the main structure. They are places where business has to be transacted, and this should be removed from the hearing of those in the church. Clergy and choir should have separate vestries. There should be communication between them, besides access to the C. and to the chancel, and also outside entrances. [It is convenient that the choir vestry should be amply large, so as to serve also as a meeting place for various purposes.]

2. The Vestries.

Leaving the plan and arrangements, something may be said as to the Structure. As a C. is built for the highest of all purposes and is intended to last for generations, it should be built of the very best materials obtainable. Dressed stone is one of the best, but it should be remembered that Bath stone soon perishes out of doors in towns. Brick is very durable, but, though it has been used internally by well-known architects, it can hardly be considered suitable for such purposes. After a time it presents a dingy appearance and, should wall decoration be desired, it is a very intractable surface to deal with. Next to dressed stone a plaster surface seems the most desirable for inside purposes.

4. The Structure.

Most often a church has a CLERESTORY standing above the aisles, but in other cases nave and aisles approximate in height. If sufficient window space is provided, this arrangement has much to commend it. If the walls are of sufficient height, it gives a sense of spaciousness. Frequently a fairly lofty nave is flanked by insignificant aisles, and there is a tendency now to sacrifice height in the interest of economy. In this we have something to learn from contemporary usage on the Continent.

While the mediæval open timber roofs are among the architectural gems of the country, it is seldom desirable to follow this type at the present time. We can rarely afford to work in oak or chestnut, and we must use our material less lavishly. Better effect can be obtained by barrel or waggon roofs with moulded ribs surrounding boarded or plastered panels. With carved bosses and coloured decoration great richness of effect can be produced. The internal ceiling is also a protection against extreme heat or cold. The finest of all roofing is a vaulted one, but it must be real vaulting and not a plaster sham. Wooden vaulting was used in old times, but care was taken that it should not be an imitation of stone.

For an outer covering, lead or copper is the best. Lead must be so secured that, while it can expand and contract freely, it cannot "creep." It may be seen hanging over the eaves of some old roofs like metallic icicles. Boarding under the lead must be ventilated to prevent dry-rot, and, if oak boarding is placed in contact with lead, the latter will perish. Tiles should be used with discrimination, as many sorts are liable to decay, and, if not very carefully laid, they are not always watertight. Slates, when copper-nailed, are safer if less picturesque. Those of a green or silver-grey tint are to be preferred to those of the colour usually called "slate."

Gutters are often a source of trouble. Where they have to be formed behind parapets or between gables, they should be of lead weighing seven or eight pounds to the square foot. Recently asphalt has been used for this purpose and also for flat roofs. It must be laid by special workmen, and its great advantage is the absence of all joints through which water can work its way. Asphalt as a roof-covering seems likely to be much used, and this will probably leave its influence on design. A flat roof-covering will entail a fairly flat ceiling, and the latter will call for more lofty walls than are needed for a high-pitched roof.

As to floors, while tiles have a fine appearance, they are cold, slippery and noisy. Nothing, however, is more dignified than a marble pavement in black and white squares. Wood block solid floors are very generally used under seats, and for passages have none of the disadvantages of tiles. By paying more attention to the pattern, and by the use of woods of different colour, better effect could be obtained than is usually done.

Little can be said as to Ventilation, but it should not depend on windows only. There should be up-cast shafts for the admission of fresh air, and shafts in the ceiling for the extraction of foul air. An inner ceiling is a help in this matter. Fresh air inlets are better out of sight, or they will soon be closed. Where air can be warmed before it enters the building it is an advantage. (For Heating and Lighting, see FITTINGS.)—R6. H. B. WALTERS.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840.—(3 and 4 Vict., c. 86).

This Act was passed during Lord Melbourne's administration to provide one uniform course of procedure in criminal suits and proceedings against clerks for offences against eccles. law (§ 23). If complaint is made of any such offence, or if scandal or evil report of such an offence exist, or (if he think of it) mero motu, the bp. of the diocese may: (a) with the consent of the clerk and complainant (if any), himself pronounce sentence, without further proceedings; (b) after hearing and considering the complaint, issue a commission to five persons (one being his vicar-general or an archdeacon or rural dean) to inquire as to the grounds of the complaint or report. If the commission report that there is a prima facie case for proceedings, the bp. may try the case himself with assessors (§ 11), or appoint a commissary for its trial; (c) by Letters of Request send the case direct for trial by the court of the province. This is, in fact, the course usually adopted. Where the bp. is patron of any preferment held by the party accused, all action in the case, except letters of request, must be by the archbishop.

Appeal from the bp. lies to the provincial court, and from the latter to the judicial committee of the privy council (§ 15). Pending trial, the bp. may inhibit the clerk (see INHIBITION).

A suit founded on a conviction for a common law offence must be commenced within six months of the conviction: other suits within two years of the commission of the offence. The scope of the Act includes, inter alia, simony, the promulgation of erroneous doctrine, unlawful repulsion from communion, as well as the use of unauthorised ritual. The procedure, but not the substantive law, was modified by the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874.

Offences against morality are taken out of the scope of this Act by the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 14 (3), Bowman v. Lax, L.R., 1910, P. 300.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

CHURCH MILITANT (PRAYER FOR THE).

—The Prayer for the Church Militant corresponds to the Great Intercession

1. Its Origin. of the early Liturgies. In the Eastern Liturgies it occurs generally in close connection with the Consecration, on the principle that the Pr. of Consecration is the great central act of pleading the Merits of Christ through Whose mediation all Intercession is offered. In the Roman Mass it occurs partly before and partly after the Consecration. In the Scottish Communion Office it comes after Consecration, but it precedes Consecration in all the English PBs. In the Gallican and Mozarabic it is found in the same position as in our present PB (Hammond, Lit., p. 315 ff.).

A Pr. for the whole state of Christ's Church has from time immemorial naturally formed part of the Service which expresses the Communion of all Saints with God in Christ, and therefore with one another (cp. 1 Tim. 2 1-3 and Barry's Teachers' PB, s.v.).

In 1549 the Pr. followed the Pre-Reformation usage of including the dead as well as the living.

2. Its Contents.

It was then "for the whole state of Christ's Church," and it ended with a special thanksgiving for the grace and virtue declared in all Saints, especially the "most blessed Virgin Mary," and "the Holy Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles and Martyrs"; and it had a commendation to God of those departed in faith, with pr. that He would "grant them mercy and everlasting peace," and that we and they may at the Great Day "be set on His right hand." In 1552 all this was deleted, the words "militant here on earth" were added to "for the whole state of Christ's Church," and the Pr. ended with the petition for those in "adversity." In 1662 it was proposed to begin with the words "Let us pray for the good estate of the Catholic Church of Christ," but the proposition was not accepted. The closing sentence, however, commemorating the faithful departed was inserted, taking the place of the fuller form of 1549. On this subject consult the Coll. aft. the Lord's Pr. in the Burial Service; Barry's Teachers' PB, s.v.; Cosin's Works, v, pp. 169, 373, 379; Wheatley on the PB, pp. 277-9; Wickham Legg, The Burial Service (SPCK), p. 17; Blunt's Annotated BCP, p. 380; Jacobson, Fragmentary Illustrations of BCP (Bp. Wren), p. 77; Procter and Frere, BCP, p. 482; and also Dowden's Annotated Scottish CO., pp. 217-18. The Pr. in its present form naturally falls into three main divisions, viz., (1) the Oblation; (2) the Commemoration of the living, including all sorts and conditions of men; (3) the Commemoration of the faithful departed.

We add a few notes on special points. "Militant here in earth." The Church here on earth is a Church Militant, i.e., at war with sin, as distinguished from the Church hereafter in heaven, which will be Triumphant and at rest. The words "and oblations," which were added to "alms" in 1662, have been variously interpreted. According to some, "oblations" mean what was given for the clergy, or all offerings of the people other than alms for the poor. According to others, the fact that the words were inserted in 1662 along with the preceding rubric, "the priest shall then place upon the Table... Bread and Wine," when taken in connection with the fact that the Scottish rubric of 1637, from which the revisers clearly borrowed, directs the priest to "offer up" the bread and wine, seems to point to a reference to the elements. But, on the other hand, the Scotch Office of 1637 directs that the deacon or churchwarden "shall reverently bring the said bason with the oblations therein," and afterwards the Priest "shall offer up," etc. Bishop Patrick, in his Mensa Mystica (1667, Works 1 115) and his Christian Sacrifice (1670, Works 1 377), interprets the word oblations of the elements, but the primary reference seems to be to the "other devotions of the people." (See Dowden's Further Studies in the PB, 1908, p. 176; Simmon's Alms and Oblations, reprinted from the Churchman, 1882; CQR, April, 1884; Procter and Frere, BCP, pp. 482-3.)

2. Special Points.

"Indifferently," i.e., impartially; so in Amer. PB. "Lively," i.e., living; cp. 1 Pet. 2 5.

The Pr. for the Church Militant ends the Introductory or ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE.—H.

J. F. KEATING.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF. (For other Chs. cp. App. A1.)

CHURCH RATES.—The claim made upon parishioners to contribute towards the upkeep of the parish ch. dates from very early times; indeed CR., as they existed in England from time immemorial, are only a particular development of the universally recognised obligation that the members of the Ch. should take their share in the upkeep of the fabric and the cost of divine service.

1. Early Origin.

This obligation may be regarded as contemporaneous with the Ch. itself, and not of the Christian Ch. only, but of the Jewish Ch. also. The prescribed contribution for the maintenance of the Jewish Tabernacle (Ex. 30 12-16) passed into the similar claim for the upkeep of the Temple Services, which our Blessed Lord both recognised and obeyed (Matt. 17 24-27). The antiquity of CR. in the Eng. Ch. is proved by a passage in a letter written by Canute on his return from Rome, A.D. 1026, in which he entreats "all my bishops and all the sheriffs by the fidelity which they owe to me and to God, that the Ch. dues, according to the ancient laws, may be paid before my return; namely, the plough alms, the tithes of cattle of the present year, the Peter pence, the tithe of fruit in the middle of August, and the kirk-shot at the feast of St. Martin's to the parish Church" (Spelman, Concil., 537).

Beginning with the claim on all parishioners to bear the cost of repair of the nave of the parish ch. and the fences of the graveyard, the scope of the CR. was gradually enlarged till it included also the provision of the necessary requirements for divine service.

2. Scope and History.

Up to the time of their abolition in 1869 the payment of CR. was recognised as a common law obligation, and was confirmed by statute law. The levying of CR. was by vote of the Parish Vestry, and the amount was recoverable at law. Compulsory CR. were abolished by 32 and 33 Vict., c. 109. It still remains within the power of the Vestry to levy a rate for the same purposes as heretofore, though it has no power to enforce its payment, and in many county parishes this method is welcomed as the fairest and most satisfactory way of meeting primary obligations of parochial finance. See also EXPENSES (CHURCH).—A6. G. R. BULLOCK-WEBSTER.

CHURCHING OF WOMEN.—The full title of this service has been since 1552 "The Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth, commonly called The Churching of Women," but, as often, the "common" phrase has persisted on the lips of the people. Its contents are: (a) Exh.; (b) Psalm of Thanksgiving, 116 (for deliverance from peril), or 127 (for the gift of the child); (c) Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., Vv.; (d) Pr. of Thanksgiving.

The office ends abruptly, as it should be followed by the HC whereat the woman is to receive.

The rubrical direction "decently apparelled" is related to the old custom of wearing a white veil, which in the early 17th cent. was still obligatory, but which was evidently neglected under the Commonwealth. Abp. Grindal (1571) required penance bef. this service could be used for an unmarried woman. The dropping of the title "Purification of Women" in 1552 did not pacify the Puritans, who thought the occasion unworthy of special thanksgiving. Consequently Hooker (Eccles. Polity 5 74) answered this cavil.

The C. of Women has its roots in the Jewish rite of Purification (see Lev. 12; cp. Lk. 2 22), but it retains no trace of the Levitical idea of uncleanness attaching to the mother as the result of childbirth. The dominant thought is one of thanksgiving for deliverance from peril.

The PB office is mainly derived from the Sar. Manual, Pss. 121, 128 being replaced by 116 and 127, and an Exh. added. The Vv. practically reproduce the Sar. But the aspersion of the woman with holy water and her formal introduction into the church by the priest have been omitted.¹—MIO.

H. E. SCOTT.

CHURCHWARDEN.—Cs. are the responsible lay church functionaries of a parish.² Officers having the care of the church ornaments and utensils are mentioned by Optatus and St.

Augustine under the name of seniores ecclesiastici, and have from early times existed throughout Christendom. They are referred to as guardiani ecclesie in Lyndwode's Provinciale in the 15th cent., and have ever since been known in England by the name of Cs. But in the canons they are also called questmen, with reference to their duty of inquiring after and presenting for censure parishioners guilty of heresy or other ecclesiastical offences. This duty had been originally assigned to independent questmen, who were also called synodmen, from attending the diocesan synod to make their presentments. But in course of time the title synodmen, corrupted into sidemen or sidesmen, became attached to the assistants of the churchwardens (can. 90), while the churchwardens themselves became the questmen. From the 16th cent. until recently the churchwardens of ancient parishes were charged under various statutes with the administration of the poor law and other civil duties.

The bells, bell-ropes, church plate and other moveables of the church, money given for the church, and church account books are under their care and in their possession as a quasi-corporation. They are charged with the care and maintenance in good repair and order of the church (including, except where the rector is bound to repair it, the chancel) and of the churchyard and its fences (can. 85), but only so far as they have funds for the purpose; and the freehold of the church and churchyard is not in them but is either in the rector or in the incumbent. Consequently, as against the incumbent they have no right to the key of the church, but only to access to the church for the performance of their duties. They were formerly supplied with funds by church rates, but must now depend on voluntary endowments or contributions. So far as they have funds, they must provide the necessities for divine service, books for entering the names of preachers and registering baptisms, marriages, burials and banns of marriage, and a Table of the Prohibited Degrees of Marriage (cans. 52, 70, 80-84, 99; Marriage Act, 1823, s. 6). But they cannot remove, alter or add anything in the church or churchyard without a faculty (see FACULTY). If they do so, they are guilty of an ecclesiastical offence, for which they may be prosecuted in the ecclesiastical courts and be censured and condemned in costs. They have a joint control with the incumbent as to the ringing of the bells (can. 88). As the officers of the bishop for the purpose, and under his directions in case of disputes, they arrange the seating of the parishioners in the church, including the chancel, subject to the rector's right to seats in the chancel and to the existence of any private pews or aisles (cp. art. Pew); and they have the duty of keeping order in the church and churchyard during divine service and at other times (cans. 19, 85, 90). They can remove from the church persons guilty of misbehaviour during divine service, and can apprehend and take before a justice of the peace a person guilty of violent or indecent behaviour in a church or churchyard with a view to his summary conviction for brawling. But they cannot interfere with the conduct of divine service by the minister, unless he is guilty of such unseemly conduct as would amount to the technical offence of brawling (cp. art. BRAWLING). The collecting of money in church is under their control; and money given at the OFFERTORY before the Prayer for the Church Militant in the Communion Office is at the disposal of the incumbent and churchwardens jointly, or, if they disagree, of the Ordinary. But money collected in church at other times is under the control of the incumbent unless it is collected for church expenses, in which case it is entrusted to the churchwardens.

¹ "Deinde Inducat eam sacerdos per manum dextram in ecclesiam, dicens Ingredere in templum Dei ut hab eas vitam aeternam et vivas in saecula saeculorum. Amen." (Sar.)

² See further, Smith's Law of Churchwardens and Sidesmen.

When a vacancy occurs in the benefice, they are usually appointed sequestrators and, as such, receive the income, and provide thereout, under the bishop's directions, for the ministrations of the parish, and hand over any balance to the new incumbent on his admission to the benefice. On receiving the prescribed notice of his intended admission from the bishop, they post it up at the church door and after leaving it there for a month return it to the bishop. In the few parishes in which the right of appointing the incumbent is vested in the parishioners, the churchwardens conduct the election.

At the expiration of their year of office they are bound to render an account of the money received and expended by them and to hand over to their successors all money, books and church property then in their possession (can. 89).

Churchwardens, whether of ancient or of new ecclesiastical parishes, ought to be resident householders of the parish of full age; and a non-resident churchwarden can be removed by legal proceedings. A woman can hold the office.

2. Qualifications.

Jews, aliens, and persons convicted of felony, fraud or perjury, are disqualified from serving; and in new ecclesiastical parishes the churchwardens must be members of the Church of England. In ancient parishes persons chosen for the office can be compelled to serve, either in person or, in the case of Roman Catholics and Protestant dissenters, by deputy, unless they can claim exemption on the ground of being peers, members of Parliament, ministers of the Church of England or of some other religious body, Quakers, practising lawyers or medical men, or of serving in some public, military, naval, judicial or civil capacity. But all such persons, if chosen and otherwise qualified, are at liberty to serve, should they so desire.

In ancient parishes, unless there is a local custom to the contrary, two churchwardens are annually chosen at the Easter vestry by the incumbent and parishioners jointly or, if they cannot agree, one by the incumbent and the other by the parishioners (cans. 89, 90), that is to say, the inhabitant householders or occupiers of rateable hereditaments in the parish of both sexes. If a poll is demanded, their voting power depends on the annual value of their rateable holding, which entitles them to one vote if under £50 and, if above that figure, to one vote for every complete £25 of the assessment up to £150, but in no case may any one have more than six votes. The incumbent, having nominated his own warden, cannot also vote as a parishioner; but, perhaps, in the event of a tie, would, as chairman of the vestry, be entitled to a casting vote. By custom, however, there may be only one churchwarden or more than two, and the parishioners may elect both churchwardens, or the right of appointment may be otherwise vested. In new ecclesiastical parishes at a meeting in the nature of a vestry, held at Easter in every year, the incumbent nominates one warden and the parishioners elect another. In case of a poll each parishioner has one vote only. Where there is an independent church without a parish or district attached, the minister selects one warden and the pew-renters the other, or, if there are no rented pews, the minister appoints both. In every case the duties of the parson's warden and of the people's warden, as they are popularly called, are identical, and neither of them has legal precedence over the other. But churchwardens are always eligible for re-appointment, and one who has continuously held office longer than his colleague is properly regarded as the senior. They are chosen for one year, but their office lasts until their successors, after being appointed, are admitted by the archdeacon at his annual visitation or, in the year of an episcopal visitation, by the bishop or his chancellor. For this purpose the newly elected churchwardens attend at the visitation and pay for it the parochial fee of 18s., and make and sign a declaration that they will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of their office for the year for which they are appointed. Until this has been done, they are not actually in office. At the same time the outgoing wardens send in their written replies to questions as to the church and parish, and make any presentments in relation thereto which circumstances require. A C. who is elected ought to be readmitted on his re-election, but the readmission is not absolutely necessary to the validity of his subsequent acts. If there is a disputed election and the case is not absolutely clear, both claimants are admitted, and their respective rights are left to be determined by legal proceedings. Sometimes this can be conveniently done by one bringing a county court action against the other for the possession of the church books. A C. cannot resign office during the year, but he vacates it on a conviction for treason or felony followed by a sentence to imprisonment with hard labour or exceeding twelve months, or to a heavier punishment, and he may be removed from it for misconduct or on ceasing to reside in the parish. A vacancy by death during the year is not usually filled up unless both wardens die.

3. Appointment.

A contract by a C. binds himself personally, irrespective of his term of office, unless he expressly limits his liability to such parochial funds as he may have in hand to meet it; and the contract does not bind his colleague, unless a party to it, nor his successors in office. Cs. are liable for neglect in not keeping the church or churchyard in repair or in not providing for the services of the church so far as it is their duty to do so, and so far as they have funds in hand for the purpose. But they are under no obligation to incur expenses which they have no money in hand to meet.

4. Liabilities.

They are also liable to criminal proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts and to monition and censure and condemnation in costs, if they are guilty of any other gross neglect or misfeasance in discharging the duties of their office.—A3. P. V. SMITH.

CHURCHYARD.—By a C. is meant a portion of land adjacent to a church, and dedicated to the purpose of the burial of the dead. This dedication is formally effected by the bishop's CONSECRATION of it. The sanctity of the mortal remains of the blessed dead is clearly assumed by the institution of Cs.—an institution which dates from the 6th cent. It is not necessary to suppose that our reverence for the bodies of the departed is based only on the belief that the same material frames will be raised to life in the general Resurrection—a belief not generally held in the literal sense now. Christians likewise remember that man was made in the image of God and that the human form was that assumed by the Son of God, who also was laid in a sepulchre. Nor do they forget the commendation uttered by our Lord on her who anointed His Feet with precious ointment "against my burial."

Such being our feeling with regard to our Cs., we next inquire how we can best give it expression.

2. Plants and Flowers. Two dominant thoughts are suggested by the resting-place of our dead:—(1) the solemnity of eternity, and (2) the blessed hope of everlasting life. The British Christians symbolically represented (1) in their Cs. by planting yew trees—some of which still survive after thirteen cents. and mark the sites of Celtic graveyards. This custom still remains, and other evergreens have been added on the same principle. (2) is suitably suggested by living flowers. Artificial flowers should be discouraged, if not prohibited—they can mean nothing except that those who lay them on the grave do not wish to have the trouble of coming from time to time with fresh flowers. Purple and white hyacinths in spring, forget-me-nots, roses, lilies, and other symbolical flowers tell their own tale of loving care.

The names of the departed are usually inscribed on monuments of various forms and materials.

3. Monuments. English climate, even when carefully tended. Granite and Portland stone are more suitable in this country. A recumbent cross is the most satisfactory form of monument. Upright headstones, unless supported on a brick foundation, sink away from their positions and present an unsightly appearance collectively. It is usual to prohibit monuments exceeding a certain height.

One or two further points may be noted. The drainage of a C. should be carefully attended to.

4. Miscellaneous. When a C. is first laid out a map is drawn to scale by the surveyor, marking the sites of the grave-spaces and the course of the drains. This map should be most strictly followed in digging the graves. It should also be remembered that willows and poplars are undesirable in a C. because their roots get into the drains and block them. The consequence is that graves when opened will be found to contain water which flows in as fast as it is baled away. Sycamores are undesirable for another reason—their roots penetrate into the coffins.

At least 4 ft. of earth should rest on the coffin- lid of an adult, 3 ft. on that of a child under eight. No fund is so easy to raise as a fund for keeping a C. in good order. Well kept turf, well chosen trees and shrubs, absence of weeds, simple and appropriate flowers, all contribute to the general effect of peace and reverent care.—oe.

H. GIBSON SMITH.

CHURCHYARDS, LAW OF.—A parish ch. usually has a burial ground adjacent to it, which is known as the churchyard. The C.,

1. Status. like the site of the ch. itself, is consecrated ground. Old Cs. are presumed to have been properly consecrated; when new Cs. or additions to old Cs. are made, a ceremony of CONSECRATION takes place. In earlier days the practice of burying the dead in the ch. commonly obtained; but subsequently such interment was reserved for specially holy or important persons, and land adjoining the ch. was enclosed as a burial ground for more ordinary people. Now no one may be buried in the interior of the ch., except in the enjoyment of a prescriptive right, unless a Faculty be obtained.

The freehold of the C. is normally vested in the rector or incumbent of the parish; but his rights over the soil are severely qualified, and he may not use the C. for any purpose inconsistent with the object of its consecration. He has however the right to cut, mow and graze the herbage growing there, and to fell the trees there for the purpose of repairing the ch. or the parsonage. Certain indefinite powers of control over the C. may be exercised by the churchwardens; it is their duty to see to the fencing and repair of the C., and they may intervene to prevent irreverent behaviour there.

Every inhabitant of a parish or person dying within its bounds has a right to be buried in the

2. Rights of Burial. parish C. The right to burial however does not imply the right to designate the particular part of the C. where the burial is to take place. On that point the incumbent and churchwardens have a discretion. And in general an exclusive right to the use of a vault or any portion of the C. can only be secured by a Faculty; but under the Acts of Parliament, granting special facilities for the extension of existing Cs., the grantor of additional land is enabled to reserve an exclusive right of burial in a part of the added territory. Nor does the right to burial include the right to erect a monument. In strictness a Faculty is required; but a Faculty is seldom sought for that purpose, the leave of the incumbent or churchwardens being regarded as a sufficient authority. A monument erected in a C. remains the property of the person who has set it up during his life, and then it would seem pass to the heirs of the dead person in whose honour it was erected.

No fee for burial in a C. is due at Common Law, but in any particular parish it may be due by immemorial custom. Such burial fees are usually payable to the incumbent; though they may be payable to the churchwardens, or partly to the one and partly to the other. But in any case no burial fees are payable where no service is done. Besides the ordinary burial fees, special fees are generally paid in respect of the erection of monuments, construction of vaults, or the like, or on the burial in the C. of strangers to the parish. It has been recently decided that an incumbent who has a beneficial occupation of the C. by reason of fees received in respect of exclusive rights of burial or the erection of monuments there is liable to be rated to the Poor Law.—oe.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

CIRCUMCISION. — See FESTIVAL, § 12; CHRISTMAS (RATIONALE), § 3.

CITATION by a written document served on the proposed defendant is a necessary preliminary to any eccles. cause. It is a judicial act whereby he is summoned to appear and answer. It must set forth:—(1) the name of the judge and the style of his court; (2) the name of the party cited; (3) the day and place where he is to appear; (4) the cause of suit; (5) the name of the party suing and the nature of his interest. It must state the diocese of the defendant in order to show (canon 94) that he is not cited out of the diocese where he dwells. In cases of heresy, the abp. may (Stat. 23 Hen. VIII, c. 9, § 2) summon any person in his province, if the bp. (a) consent or (b) has failed to do justice. Cs. must be taken out for named individuals (canon 120). But a general C. of all persons interested (and to the incumbent and churchwardens personally, if not parties to the application) must be issued before the grant of a FACULTY; and a "citation against opposers" must be set up on the door of the church in which the archiepiscopal confirmation of a bp.'s election is to be held.

Citation is the name given also to the summons to elect proctors in convocation.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

CLERESTORY.—A range of windows placed above the roof of an aisle or other subordinate building.

In important churches it was a serious problem to mediæval builders to carry a stone vault upon a tall C. Its solution was found by reinforcing the clerestories with flying buttresses. But in an ordinary parish church with a timber roof the construction of a C. is not a difficult matter, and in the 15th cent. clerestories and flat roofs were frequently added to older churches. Nevertheless many churches, especially in the West Country, are without clerestories, while in certain districts their use is almost universal.—R6.

C. A. NICHOLSON.

CLERGY.—The word is derived from Gk κληρος = "lot," as used in LXX, Num. 18 20, Deut. 10 9, 18 1, 2; of Levi, "The Lord is his portion"; and Deut. 32 9, "The Lord's portion is his people." So in NT Acts 1 17. The double sense in which the word is used, viz.: (1) "those who are chosen to belong in a special way to the Lord," and (2) "those, the lot of whose inheritance is the Lord," is noted by St. Jerome ad Nepot. (cp. St. Aug., Enarr. in Pss. 77 19).

"Clerus," of the clergy, is first found in Tertullian (200 A.D.). In his time a sacerdotal view of the ministry had become current in the Church (see Lightfoot, Phil., pp. 181 ff, criticised by Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood). At first it was applied to the threefold ministry, and in later times all members of the Minor Orders who had received the tonsure were included; as were, later still, members of religious orders, and even any educated man.

To distinguish them from the laity, their dress must be sober in shape and colour. Trade, stage-plays, gambling, arms, and female society, were forbidden them. They claimed immunity from civil courts, and trial by Canon Law. Such privileges are everywhere abolished, as in England, A.D. 1768. (Bibliography: Vacant, Dict. de Théol. Cathol., fasc. 18, pp. 225 ff.; Bingham, Antiq. i. 5 7.)—A3, 1.

J. E. SWALLOW.

CLERGY, DISABILITIES, IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF.

—Before the conversion of the Empire the clergy naturally had neither privileges nor disabilities in virtue of their office. After the conversion of Constantine they were made supreme in eccles. questions, and bps. could not be summoned as witnesses in the courts, or put on oath privately, nor could priests be examined by torture. The decisions of bps. in civil cases were recognised, and they acquired special privileges of intercession for condemned criminals and for the weak and oppressed. They also had various rights of affording sanctuary and of censorship. They were, moreover, exempt from the poll-tax and certain other charges, and were for a time made free from all bearing of civil office, till this led men to take Minor Orders to escape from public service. The tendency of later times was to exempt them from all political burdens, but to retain those that were bound up with the possession of property. These rights, as recognised in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian, became part of Roman law and passed from Byzantium to the West, and out of them was built up the whole structure of Canon Law.

At the present day Canon Law is concerned almost entirely with eccles. matters, and secular disabilities, and immunities are few. The clergy are by Common Law not bound to serve in any temporal office, even if holding lands which otherwise would involve an obligation to do so. By Canon Law secular offices and employments are forbidden them, though kings may appoint them to such. They are not bound to serve in war. As to their persons, they are not liable to arrest and may not be obstructed in going to or coming from divine service. They are exempt from serving on juries. A clergyman cannot be an approver, nor be amerced after the quality of his spiritual benefice, but after his lay tenement and after the quality of his offence. The sheriff cannot levy of his eccles. goods, and he is exempted from paying toll at turnpikes when on parochial duty, though he is not free from other tolls and charges. How far sermons not printed and published are public acts, and therefore not exempt from criticism, does not appear to be settled.

The clergy cannot sit in the House of Commons. This was originally forbidden on the ground that they formed a separate estate of the realm and sat in Conv., and is now a disability in virtue of a special Act passed in 1801. Nor may they be elected mayors, councillors, or aldermen of municipal boroughs, though they may act as Justices of the Peace and Guardians of the Poor, and may hold the office of chairman, alderman, or councillor of a County Council, or of mayor, alderman, or councillor of a Metropolitan Borough. A clergyman may not, without the consent of his bishop, take a farm of above 80 acres, nor may he engage directly in trade. The necessary business involved in keeping a school does not come under this definition.

By the Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 91), a clergyman can execute a deed of relinquishment of his clerical profession and become a layman in the eyes of the law, thereby divesting himself of all privileges and disabilities attached to Holy Orders. Such a course is directly forbidden by canon 76, and it should be remembered that if he takes advantage of the Act, though Holy Orders are indelible, it will be impossible for him to exercise his spiritual functions again in England, though the Colonies still offer him a field of work.

(DCA, art. Immunities and Privileges of the Clergy; Bingham, Antiquities, v. 2, 3; Phillimore, Eccles. Law, 2nd ed., 1 473, 2 909; P. V. Smith, The Ch. Handbook, 1907.)—TA.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892.—This statute was passed in Lord Salisbury's second administration to provide a simpler course of procedure for dealing with offences against morality on the part of the clergy.

1. The first section of the Act obliges the bp. to declare void the preferment (if any) of a clerk in holy orders against whom judgment has been given by a temporal Court in respect of any of the undernamed temporal offences, and to vacate the licence of any unbeneficed clerk similarly adjudged; (a) if sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour, on indictment for felony or misdemeanour; (b) if a bastardy order is made upon him; (c) if in a divorce or matrimonial cause he is found to have committed adultery; (d) if a judicial separation order, or (e) a separation order under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878,¹ is made against him. The declaration must be made within twenty-one days "after the date at which the conviction, order, or finding becomes conclusive." If not so made, it shall be made by the archbishop.

1. Convicted Offenders.

2. The second part of the Act provides for the case of a clerk: (a) convicted by a temporal court of an eccles. offence,² or (b) alleged to have been guilty of an "immoral act, immoral conduct or immoral habit,"³ or "of any offence against the laws ecclesiastical" (e.g., simony, non-residence, the pursuit of certain secular employments), "being an offence against morality and not being a question of doctrine or ritual." In either case the clerk may be prosecuted by any of his parishioners, or by his bp. But if, in the opinion of the bp., a complaint made against the clergyman be too vague or frivolous to justify the proceedings, he must disallow the prosecution. If the prosecution is not disallowed, the clergyman may elect to submit himself to the bp. without a hearing before the CONSISTORY COURT, and thereupon the bp. has power, with the written consent of the clergyman and of the party complaining, to pronounce such sentence as he sees fit, not exceeding the sentence which might be pronounced in due course of law.

Failing settlement in one of these ways, the cause will be tried by the Consistory Court with assessors, the Chancellor of the Diocese presiding, and deciding questions of law, questions of fact being decided by (a) his assessors unanimously, or (b) the Chancellor and a majority of the assessors.

Assessors for the purposes of the Act are appointed triennially in each diocese: (a) three elected from their own number by the chapter, prebendaries and honorary canons of the cathedral; (b) four elected from their own number by the beneficed clergy of each arch-deaconry; (c) five elected from the justices of the peace of each county by quarter sessions.

When the presence of assessors is required, three clergymen and two laymen shall be chosen out of the assessors on the list by ballot conducted by the registrar.

If a clergyman is adjudged guilty, primary regard is to be given to the interest of the parish concerned, and he may be deprived

4. Sentences. or suspended for a definite term.

If a clergyman wilfully disobeys a sentence under the Act, the Consistory Court may condemn him to be deprived as well as to other eccles. censures, but imprisonment under a writ de contumace capiendo is not to result from such sentence.¹ If by virtue of the Act, or of any sentence passed thereunder, the preferment of a clergyman becomes vacant, and if it appears to the bishop that he ought also to be deposed from holy orders, the bishop may, by sentence and without any further formality, depose him (s. 8). In this way the offender will be absolutely and for ever prevented from holding any preferment for which holy orders are an essential qualification.

Either party to a case may appeal either to the provincial court or direct to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

5. Appeals. the decision of the latter court being final. But an appeal on the facts must have preliminary leave from the appellate court.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

CLERK.—(Lat. clericus.) Since the days of St. Augustine, the C. has existed in England as a Ch. minister and one of the clergy, inferior to those in holy orders, but appointed by the priest without the sanction of the bp. (Concil. Carthag. IV, canon 10). His office was to assist the priest in all possible ways, and could only be performed by a man of education and some knowledge of Latin. His main duties were four.

1. Main Functions.

¹ An additional canon was in 1892 made and duly ratified as follows:

"If any beneficed priest shall, by reason of any crime or immorality proved against him, become legally disqualified for holding preferment, it shall be the duty of the bp. of the diocese wherein his benefice is situate to declare without further trial the benefice with cure of souls (if any) vacant, and if it should not be so declared vacant within twenty-one days it shall be declared vacant by the abp. of the province or under his authority."

2. Eccles. Procedure.

¹ This is construed strictly, and an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, for separation on the ground of "persistent cruelty," does not entitle the bishop to act (Sweet v. Bp. of Ely, L.R., 1902, 2 Ch. 508).

² "Indecent behaviour during the celebration of divine service" is such an offence (Girt v. Fillingham, L. R., 1901, P. 176). They have been also held to include conduct "dangerous to the reputation and unworthy of the character of ministers of religion" (Sweet v. Young, L.R., 1902, P. 37; see also L.R., 1904, A.C. 266).

³ By § 12 the words in quotation-marks "shall include such acts, conduct, and habits as are proscribed by" canons 75 and 109, of which the text is as follows.

"75. Sober conversation required in Ministers. No Eccles. person shall at any time, other than for their honest necessities, resort to any Taverns or Alehouses, neither shall they board or lodge in any such places. Furthermore, they shall not give themselves to any base or servile labour, or to drinking or riot, spending their time idly by day or by night, playing at Dice, Cards, or Tables (backgammon), or any other unlawful games: but at all times convenient, they shall hear or read somewhat of the holy Scriptures, or shall occupy themselves with some other honest study or exercise, always doing the things which shall appertain to honesty, and endeavouring to profit the Church of God, having always in mind that they ought to excel all others in purity of life, and should be examples to the people, to live well and Christianly, under pain of Eccles. censures to be inflicted with severity, according to the qualities of their offences."

"109. Notorious Crimes and Scandals to be certified into Ecclesiastical Courts by Presentment. If any offend their brethren, either by Adultery, Whoredom, Incest, or Drunkenness, or by Swearing, Ribaldry, Usury, and any other uncleanness and wickedness of life, the Churchwardens or Questmen and Sidemen in their next Presentments to their Ordinaries, shall faithfully present all and every of the said offenders, to the intent that they and every of them may be punished by the severity of the Laws, according to their deserts, and such notorious offenders shall not be admitted to the holy Communion till they be reformed."

(i) To sing, e.g., the Grail and Alleluia at Mass, and the Pss., Cants. and Responds in the Divine office. He was therefore often entitled "psalmista," and appointed ruler of the choir. His musical gifts were noted until the middle of the 18th cent., and he gave out the hymns "to the praise and glory of God" until the middle of the 19th cent., sometimes reading each verse before it was sung.

(ii) To read the Epistle, if no sub-deacon were present. For this purpose, after the Reformation, the Clerk's Book of 1549 contains some of the Epistles, e.g., for Communion of the Sick and Burial of the Dead. In the middle of the 19th cent. the clerk in some places still read the Epistle and first Lesson.

(iii) To teach in school the children of the parishioners, a duty which was not invariably performed.

(iv) To assist in ministering sacraments and sacramentals. For this purpose, one of the Cs. must always be present in the parish, and ready to accompany the priest, especially when he anointed and communicated the sick, carrying a light and the stole and oil-flask. The Clerk's Book of 1549, besides the Epistle, gives the C.'s part in responding at the Litany, singing Introit, Gloria, Creed, Offertory and Communion Anthems, and Agnus Dei, at HC; Pss. and Responses at Holy Matrimony; Anthems, Pss. and Responses at the Visitation of the Sick with Ps. after anointing; Introits at the Communion of the Sick and Burial, with introductory verses and two Anthems in the Burial Service; Ps. at Purification of Women; Miserere and Anthem, "Turn thou us," on Ash-Wednesday.

Lesser duties were: (1) To ring the bells; also to see that they were in good order and provide ropes and grease. Bells were rung before Mass, and evensong; also at funerals, on All Souls' Eve, passing bells, and when the bp., king, queen, or prince, came. (2) To light the candles and lamps in the sanctuary, the portable tapers, and those on the rood beam. (3) To fold up the vestments, and have them washed and mended, keeping them with the vessels of the altar, books, jewels and other ornaments. (4) To vest the altars, bringing out of the store all the ornaments required for festivals or ferial days, and replace them in store after use. (5) To provide fuel and fire, whenever incense was to be used, and also for the blessing of fire on Easter Eve. (6) To keep the ch. clean, sweeping it regularly and looking to the gutters and pipes, especially after snow. (After the Reformation, Bishops' Visitation Articles inquire if this be done.) (7) To light the lanterns and scones in the church in winter time, and "do them out" again. An extinguisher is still in some places called a "douter." (8) To serve the priest at low Mass, and, as above, to read the Epistle. In rare instances, this was still the custom in the first half of the 19th century.

In addition to the above, which are given in the Statutes of St. Mary Ottery, may be noted: To open and shut the doors; before closing the ch., he is often required to search it, for fear of sleepers. To carry the pax round the church for the people to kiss, as ordered in all ancient English marriage rites. To keep the registers of baptisms, marriages, and burials, at any rate after 1536 A.D. To provide water on Maundy Thursday for washing the altars, and on Easter Eve and Whitsun Eve for the hallowing of the font; also on Sundays for the holy water. The C. carried holy water and holy bread each week to every household in the parish, receiving a fee as part of his stipend. Thus the C. in parish churches performed duties which properly belonged to the offices of sub-deacon, acolyte, reader, and door-keeper. In some churches the Cs. were called deacons, and occasionally were in deacons' orders, and for lack of others properly qualified were sometimes men of position.

The C. has been usually appointed by the vicar of the parish, though the parishioners have occasionally maintained the custom

3. Status. of election. He held a freehold, and could only be dismissed by a suit in the eccles. court, until the Act of 1844 empowered the archdeacon, on cause shown, to remove him. Sometimes the vicar has appointed a friend or assistant curate to the office, its duties being performed by a deputy. An assistant curate's tenure of the office is on the same terms as that of his curacy. Between the Reformation and the Restoration, parish Cs. sometimes presumed to administer the chalice, to baptise infants, to say the service, to church women, and bury the dead; the churching and burial occasionally with the bishop's licence. Down to the middle of the 19th cent. he not only announced the hymns, but gave out other notices which sometimes concerned secular business. During service, the C. was vested in surplice or rochet, and his seat was near the parson's. Where, in later days, a "three-decker" was erected, he occupied the lowest stage. In small parishes there was but one C., and it is not clear whether the second (when there were two) performed the sexton's duties, or whether the C. or Cs. were always assisted by a sexton. The C. performed the duties which elsewhere fell to sacristan, collet, and server, the sexton those of vergier, or beadle. A C.'s wages sometimes included house and garden, with rights to offerings in kind and fees, e.g., for marriages and burials.

(Bibliography: Dr. Wickham Legg, The Clerk's Book of 1549, HBS; Phillimore, The Book of Church Law.)—A3. J. E. SWALLOW.

COADJUTOR.—A term applied to an assistant bp. to whom some defined share of the responsibility of the Diocesan is assigned. Right of succession is usual, but not invariable, except where, as in some Ang. churches, the right is established by canon.—A3. G. HARFORD.

COLLATION.—The term used of the act of the bp., which takes the place of presentation and admission in the case of a benefice in his own gift.—1a. G. HARFORD.

COLLECTION.—See ALMS; CHURCHWARDEN, § 1; OFFERTORY.

COLLECTS.—The Collect is a special feature in the worship of Western Christianity, and in its simplest, purest form we seem able to trace its origin to the early Roman Church, whether Leo the Great (†461) be its first author, as is commonly held, or not. The longer and fuller "Gallican" forms bear more resemblance to the prayers of the Eastern Churches, though their use at time of service conforms more or less to that of Rome. Practically, all the C. of the PB which are ancient (i.e., of Pre-Reformation date) are translations more or less free of "Roman" C., whilst those that were composed in 1549 or 1662 have a tendency (it may be unconscious) to exhibit some of the characteristics of the "Gallican" type.

L. Preliminary.

The word in "Roman" Latin is usually collecta, and in the "Gallican" books collectio, but the former is only a low Latin form of the latter (just as Missa = Missio, Ascensa = Ascensio, etc.), and therefore it is unlikely that the original sense of the one term is different from that of the other, even though the form collectio is used freely of almost any of the prayers in the Liturgy, and not only of what are technically called the C. in "Roman" books, whilst only the form collecta appears in the phrase ad collectam, which suggests the most probable origin of the term. According to this theory collecta first signified either the congregation (convectus) or the service for which it was assembled: hence the pr. ad collectam was that which summed up the silent petitions of the people in service time, which had been previously "bidden" under various heads, and thus collecta (collectio) came gradually to be used of the pr. itself. No doubt the act of so gathering up the people's petitions was sometimes called colligere orationem, and that gave rise to another theory of the origin of the term as if it were the "collected" pr.; but this is far less plausible than the former explanation. The idea that the Coll. is so called because it condenses the teaching of the day (e.g., in its Epistle and Gospel) is merely fanciful and not borne out by the facts of the case. Still less reasonable is the idea that it is the pr. which demands a "collected" mind in those who offer it.

So much by way of general introduction. When we turn to the C. of the PB, we find that, with some exceptions, the term 2. Collecta is confined to the C. properly in PB, so called of the HC service, viz., "the C. of the Day or season."

The whole body of the prayers which partake of the nature of a Coll. in the PB may be classed in three groups, which represent three types or stages in development, viz. (a) those which are ancient or Pre-Reformation, and those put forth (b) in 1549, (c) in 1662. Nearly two-thirds belong to the first group, while the second contains nearly four-fifths of the remainder, though one must remember that many of the older C. have received important additions or modifications in 1549 or 1662, or at both dates.

The first group may again be divided into three sub-groups: viz. (i) those C. which can be traced back to the earliest Sacramentary, the so-called "Leonian" (Leo.)¹; (ii) those which are found in the "Gelasian"² Sacramentary (Gel.); (iii) those which were in use in the "Sarum" books (Sar.)³. But here again it must be borne in mind that practically all (i) and (ii) are included in (iii), and all (i) in (ii), but not all (iii) in (ii), nor all (ii) in (i). Six or seven C. are found in the "Leonian" book, about twenty in the "Gel.," and at least forty-five come from the Sar. service books (chiefly from the Missal, but in one or two cases from the Brev. or Manual).

As has often been pointed out, in spite of an infinite variety of detail, the Coll. is in general constructed on a threefold plan:

3. Structure. (a) the Invocation, (b) the Petition, (c) the Pleading of Christ's Name, or the Ascription of Glory to the Godhead.

As to (a), the general rule is that God the Father is invoked; but in the PB there are three C. now addressed to the Son, viz., those for St. Stephen's Day, the 3rd Sunday in Adv. and the 1st Sunday in Lent, while the Coll. for Trin. Sunday is probably intended to be addressed to the Blessed Trinity in Unity rather than to the First Person. The Invocation is often but not always enlarged or enriched by mention of one or other of the Divine attributes or actions and—especially in the later specimens—there is frequently a more or less direct employment of Holy Scripture. The older the Coll., the less direct and the more subtle as a rule is the appeal to the Bible, and the more recent its composition is, the more direct and the fuller is its use of Scripture. Compare, for instance, the 2nd Good Friday Coll., which is originally Gel., with that for the 6th Sunday after Epiph. (composed in 1662); it is obvious that the thoughts of the ancient pr. are drawn from Bible sources, whereas in the modern prayer there is a masterly and explicit employment of almost the very words of 1 John 3 2, 3, 8 (from the Epistle of the Day).

Then as to (b), which forms the main body of the pr., we often find appended to the particular boon asked for a statement of the happy effect which may be expected from it. Take, for instance, the Coll. for the 2nd Sunday in Lent: here the Petition is "Keep us both outwardly . . . and inwardly," and the effect desired "that we may be defended from all adversities . . . to the body and from all evil thoughts . . . (in) the soul." The same conditions under which the Bible is used or referred to are found in this part of the Coll. as have been noted in the Invocation.

Lastly, as to (c), the commonest, simplest, and probably most ancient form of ending is ¹ This is a MS. of the early 7th cent., but a large portion of its contents belongs no doubt to earlier times.

² Gelasius was Bishop of Rome at the end of the 5th cent., but whether the books which bear his name really contain his recension is not at all certain.

³ The term "Sarum" rather than "Gregorian" (Greg.) is generally used as covering nearly the same idea and at the same time being more intelligible to English Churchmen.

"through Jesus Christ our Lord." To this is added "the same (Thy Son)" before "Jesus," if the Second Person has been mentioned in the clause just before. There are also a large number of smaller variations and additions to the form "through JC. our Lord," which it is unnecessary to give in detail. At the great Festivals an Ascription of glory is added to or substituted for this ending, as an inspection of the C. for Christmas, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsunday will show. (See also C. for 1st Sunday in Adv. and Septuagesima.) Of the three C. mentioned above as addressed to Christ, two (for 3rd Sunday in Adv. and 1st Sunday in Lent) end with an adaptation of the form of Ascription found in the Festival C., and the third (for St. Stephen's Day) has a scriptural ending entirely unlike other endings (see also Coll. for 4th Sunday in Adv., which was originally and more appropriately addressed to the Son).

We can now proceed to take the variable Communion C. one by one, and briefly consider their history and contents. (For the fixed C. or prayers of this and other services see the arts. on those services themselves in loco.)

Adv., 1st Sunday, 1549, one of the finest of our Reformers' efforts. Except in its direct employment of Scripture (viz., Rom.

5. Adv., 1st Sunday. 13 12 from the Ep. of the Day) and its slight redundancy of expression, it reminds one of the very best ancient C. "Observe how skilfully the writer has combined in it the two lines of Adv. meditation, the retrospect of the First with the anticipation of the Second Advent" (Goulburn), and also how full of Christian faith and doctrine it is throughout, without which in due proportion our prayers must fail in expression and force.

2nd Sunday, 1549, built up out of materials in the Epistle of the Day (Rom. 15 4, 5, 13).

6. 2nd Sunday. Both the opening and the ending are unique: (1) "Blessed Lord" represents the Greek εὐλογητός (Lat. benedictus)—an epithet confined to God in NT—as distinguished from "the blessed hope" mentioned lower down (Gk. μακάριος, Lat. beatus); (2) strictly speaking, there is no mediation-ending, since "the hope of everlasting life," which the Scriptures contain, is happily described as consisting in, not granted through, Him of Whom they speak, a fitting sequel of thought to the preceding Collect.

3rd Sunday, substituted (1662) for the translation of the old Sar. Coll. which had stood since 1549 (viz., "Lord, we beseech thee give ear to our prayers, and by thy gracious visitation lighten the darkness of our heart by our Lord Jesus Christ"). There was nothing to object to in this, but it was a little colourless, and the new Coll. introduces a new thought of great value which fits in very well with those of the two preceding C. and is obviously suitable for us at an Ember tide, which this week is. It lays stress on the Christian Ministry being the living agents of God's Word and Sacraments in preparing men for the Second Advent, as the Baptist did for the First. We notice that the method of employing Scripture (viz., the Epistle of the Day, 1 Cor. 4 1 ff.) is even more direct and exact in 1662 than it is in 1549. For Invocation see above (§ 3).

4th Sunday. A free and expanded translation of a Gel. Coll. which runs thus in the Sar. books:

Excita Domine potentiam tuam
(cp. Ps. 80 a Vulg.) et veni et 4th Sunday. magna nobis virtute succurre, ut per auxilium gratiae tuae quod nostra peccata praepediunt, indulgentia tuae propitiationis acCELERET. Qui vivis, etc.

We note (1) the change from the Second to the First Person of the Trinity, and these additions "among us," (1549); "and wickedness," "sore let and" (1549); "in running . . . before us" (1662), cp. Heb. 12 1, 2; "and mercy" (1549); "help and" (omitted 1549, restored 1662); "through the satisfaction," etc. (1549).

Christmas, 1549. The phrase "as at this time," substituted (1662) for "this day," which rendered the Coll. rather unsuitable

9. Christmas. for use during the Octave as directed, and was also needlessly definite as to the date of the Nativity. The whole pr. is an admirable summary of PB teaching as to the necessity of growth in holiness (sanctification) following upon baptismal regeneration (for which see esp. the Priest's Exh. before Lord's Prayer in Bapt. of Infants). The Irish and Amer. PBs also retain the translation of the Sar. (also Gel.) Coll. for the Vigil which appeared in 1549, for use at the first of two celebrations (if there be two) on this Festival.

Deus qui nos redemptionis nostrae annua expectatione laetificas, praesta ut Unigenitum tuum, quem redemptorem laeti suscipimus, venientem quoque iudicem securi videamus Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum filium tuum. Qui tecum, etc.

St. Stephen. The present Coll. may almost be said to be the creation of the Revisers in 1662, though it is based on the 10. St. Stephen. 1549 translation of the old Sar. Collect.

Da nobis quaesumus Domine imitari quod colimus ut discamus et inimicos diligere: quia eius natalicia celebramus qui novit etiam persecutoribus exorare Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum Filium tuum (Acts 7 60). Qui tecum, etc.

Neither in the original, as we see, nor in the first translation, was the Second Person addressed as now.

St. John Evang. Translated (1549) from the Sar. Coll., but with the important clause added (1662), "may so walk . . . truth that," and the last clause altered from "may attain to thy everlasting gifts" to its present form, the idea of "light," which is prominent in the Epistle (1 John 1 2, 5, 7), being thus carried on right to the end of the prayer.

Ecclesiam tuam quaesumus Domine benignus illustra ut beati Johannis Apostoli tui et Evangelistae illuminata doctrinis ad dona perveniat sempiterna per Dominum.

Holy Innocents. The Gel. Coll., which had appeared (1549) more literally translated than usual, was almost entirely remodelled (1662), the reference to Ps. 82 in the Invocation being suggested by the old Sar. Officium of the Day.

12. Holy Innocents.

Deus cuius hodierna die praeconium innocentes martyres non loquendo sed moriendo confessi sunt, omnia in nobis vitiorum mala mortifica ut fidem tuam, quam lingua nostra loquitur, etiam moribus vita fateatur per Dominum.

Circumcision, 1549, but to some extent suggested by a "Greg." Benediction (Menard, p. 13). Note (1) that "the" was put for "thy" before "Spirit" (1662), which is in better agreement with St. Paul's meaning in Rom. 228, 29, from which no doubt the expression arises; only then it should be "spirit," not "Spirit"; (2) that the "we" before "may obey" is an interpolation of the printers, who did not understand the grammar of the sentence.

Epiph. Sar. trans. (1549), but less happily than usual, as the antithesis between faith and sight in the last clause is now 14. Epiphany, obscured.

Deus qui hodierna die Unigenitum tuum gentibus stella duce revelasti: concede propitius ut qui iam te ex fide cognovimus, usque ad contemplandam speciem tuae celsitudinis perducamur per eundem.

1st Sunday after Epiph. Sar. trans. (1549), but with (a) several additions, viz., "and grant," "and know," "grace and,"

15. 1st Sunday aft. Epiph. "faithfully"; (b) two inadequate renderings, viz., "prayers" for vota (= desires or vows), and "mercifully" for caelesti pietate¹ (= with heavenly compassion).

Vota quaesumus Domine supplicantis populi caelesti pietate proseguere: ut et quae agenda sunt videant et ad implenda quae viderint convalescant per Dominum.

2nd Sunday. Sar. (1549). Three points may be noticed: (a) simul is omitted in our version; (b) "govern" repre-

16. 2nd Sunday. sents not the usual gubernare (= to steer ships), but moderari (= to bridle horses or tongue); (c) "all the days of our life" is an improvement on nostris temporibus (= in, or to, our times).

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui caelestia simul et terrena moderaris: supplicationes populi tui clementer exaudi et pacem tuam nostris concede temporibus per.

3rd Sunday. Sar. (1549). See Coll. for 3rd Sunday in Lent. Note (a) the addition of

17. 3rd Sunday. "in all our dangers and necessities" and of "help and"; (b) the omission of maiestatis.

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus infirmitatem

¹ Pius and pietas express the tender relations that exist between father and son.

nostram propitius respice: atque ad protegendum nos dexteram tuae maiestatis extende per Dominum.

4th Sunday. Sar. (1549), but in 1662 (a) "for man's frailness" was altered to "by reason . . . nature," "uprightly"

18. 4th Sunday.

to "upright"; (b) the original petition "Grant to us the health of body and soul that all those things which we suffer for sin by thy help we may well pass and overcome through Christ our Lord" was wholly altered and made to assume its present form. The prayer is still well illustrated by the first part of the Gospel (Matt. 823 ff.).

Deus qui nos in tantis periculis constitutos pro humana scis fragilitate non posse subsistere: da nobis salutem mentis et corporis ut ea quae pro peccatis nostris patimur te adiuvante vincamus per Dominum.

5th Sunday. Sar. 1549. The first part identical with the first part of Coll. for 22nd

19. 5th Sunday.

Sunday aft. Trin. though differently rendered; in both cases inaccurately, as continua pietate custodi means "guard with (thy) continual protection," not "keep in continual godliness" or "continually in thy true religion" (see foot-note to § 15). The remainder, however, is admirably translated and full of beauty.

Familiam tuam quaesumus Domine continua pietate custodi: ut quae in sola spe gratiae caelestis innitur, tua semper protectione muniatur per Dominum.

6th Sunday. Composed in 1662, no separate provision having been made for this Sunday before. It is based on two verses of the Epistle (1 John 38, 3), and skilfully made appropriate for the approach of either Lent or Adv. (see Rubric).

20. 6th Sunday.

Septuagesima. Sar. (1549). The expression "by thy goodness" represents nothing in the Latin. The doxological ending was 21. Septuagesima. with some propriety added by the Reformers.

Preces populi tui quaesumus Domine clementer exaudi: ut qui iuste pro peccatis nostris affligimur, pro tui nominis gloria misericorditer liberemur per Dominum.

Sexagesima. Sar. (1549). The point of interest here is that the original Coll. alludes to the protection of St. Paul (cp. 1 Tim. 27 and 2 Tim. 11), no doubt in reference to the ancient Roman "station" on this Sunday being ad sanctum Paulum (still retained in Roman Missal); the Reformers very properly removed this allusion and put merely "by thy power" in its place.

22. Sexagesima.

Deus qui conspicias quia ex nulla nostra actione confidimus: concede propitius ut contra omnia adversa doctoris gentium protectione muniamur per Dominum.

Quinquagesima, 1549; based on the Epistle 1 Cor. 13: (cp. Coll. for 14th Sunday aft. Trin.).

23. Quinquagesima. On the eve of the Lenten Fast it is most fitting that we should ask for the gift of true charity, without which all our efforts are unavailing.

Ash-Wednesday. Practically new in 1549, nothing but the first clause of the Invocation

24. Ash-Wednesday. coming from mediæval sources (viz., from the Sar. Benediction of Ashes: Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui . . . nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti, dissimulans peccata hominum propter paenitentiam—cp. Wisdom 11 24). The Petition is based on Ps. 51 10, 17.

Lent, 1st Sunday, 1549. The Invocation (for which see § 3) refers to Matt. 4 2 (from the Gospel). Note (1) the important

25. Lent, 1st Sunday. comment on the Lord's Fast "for our sake" and (2) the wise moderation inculcated, "such abstinence that," etc. For "motions" cp. Rom. 7 5 (AV) and Hastings' DB, s.v.

2nd Sunday. Sar. (1549). The enlargement of the Invocation "no power . . . ourselves" brings out more clearly the connection with the Gospel (Matt. 15, esp. v. 25). The gain is likewise great from the expansion of the Petition.

26. 2nd Sunday. Deus qui conspicis omni nos virtute destitui: interius exteriusque custodi ut ab omnibus adversitatibus muniamur in corpore et a pravis cogitationibus mundemur in mente per Dominum.

3rd Sunday. Sar. (1549). Note the happy addition of "hearty" to "desires" and the extension of the final clause by the phrase "against all our enemies," which is perhaps suggested by the Gospel (Luke 11 14 ff.) and also serves to give variety to a prayer which has much in common with that for 3rd Sunday aft. Epiph. (q.v.).

27. 3rd Sunday. Quaesumus omnipotens Deus vota humillium respice, atque ad defensionem nostram dexteram tuæ maiestatis extende per Dominum.

4th Sunday. Sar. (1549). Cp. the Coll. for Septuagesima. In 1662 affligimur, which is common to both C. and was in 1549 translated "are punished" in both places, was here skilfully modified into "deserve to be punished," in order doubtless to fit in with the thought of "Refreshment" Sunday (Dies Refectionis), which also underlies respiremus (= mercifully be relieved) in the Petition.

Concede quaesumus omnipotens Deus ut qui ex merito nostræ actionis affligimur, tuæ gratiæ consolatione respiremus per Dominum.

5th Sunday. Sar. (1549). A rather colourless Coll. for "Passion" Sunday, for which in 1689

28. 5th Sunday. Bp. Patrick was instructed to substitute a fuller and more appropriate one. The one he produced was characteristic of the period (see Goulburn 1 289, and Blunt, Annot. Bk. of CP 1 95), but, though good in its way, it was not adopted after all.

Quaesumus omnipotens Deus familiam tuam propitius respice: ut te largiente regatur in corpore et te servante custodiatur in mente per Dominum.¹

¹ The forced antithesis of the Petition and the alliterative subtleties of the original are to be noticed.

6th Sunday. Gel. (1549). While the magnificence of the original Invocation is much enhanced by the translators, it may be doubted whether they were as happy as usual in their rendering of the Petition, which should run "mercifully grant that we may be enabled both to learn the lessons of his patience and to be partakers of his resurrection." Even so it is not quite easy to see why only patience should be learnt from the far larger example of Christ's humility (see Epistle, Phil. 2 7, etc.).

(+ Omnipotens sempiterne Sar.) Deus qui humano generi ad imitandum humilitatis exemplum Salvatorem nostrum carnem sumere et crucem subire fecisti: concede propitius ut et patientiæ eius habere documentum (-ta Sar.) et resurrectionis eius consortia mereamur Christi Domini nostri, qui tecum vivit, etc.

Good Friday. (N.B.—Only the first of these three C. was directed to be used at Mattins in 1549; the others were to be added at H.C.)

29. Good Friday

I. Sar. (1549). The pr. "super populum" for Wednesday bef. Easter, substituted for the old Good Friday Coll., which was open to objection. The reference to the betrayal made it specially appropriate to its former use.

Respice Domine quaesumus super hanc familiam tuam pro qua Dominus noster Jesus Christus non dubitavit manibus tradi nocentium et crucis subire tormentum, qui tecum vivit, etc.

II. One of a series of prayers in Gel. and Sar. books interspersed between the biddings of the special Good Friday Lit., somewhat freely translated (1549). Note that the true and proper order is "sanctified and governed," not vice versa; also that the following additions were made, "and prayers," "in thy holy Church," "vocation and ministry" (? = gradibus), "and godly."

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus cuius spiritu totum corpus ecclesiæ sanctificatur et regitur: exaudi nos pro universis ordinibus supplicantes: ut gratiæ tuæ munere ab omnibus tibi gradibus fideliter serviat per Dominum.

III. In part a sort of cento of three other prs. in the same series, put together and welded into a fine intercession (1549), though the wisdom may be doubted of still retaining in one chain "Jews, Turks, Infidels and Hereticks."

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui salvos omnes homines et neminem vis perire: respice ad animas diabolica fraude deceptas; ut omni hæretica pravitate deposita errantium corda respiscant et ad veritatis tuæ redeant unitatem per Dominum.

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui etiam Iudæam perfidiam a tua misericordia non repellis: exaudi preces nostras quas pro illius populi obcaecatione deferimus; ut agnita veritatis tuæ luce quæ Christus est a suis tenebris eruatur, per eundem.

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui non vis mortem peccatorum sed vitam semper inquiris: suscipe propitius orationem nostram; et libera eos ab idolorum cultura; et aggrega ecclesiæ tuæ sanctae ad laudem et gloriam nominis tui per Dominum.

(N.B. — The italics mark the parallel expressions to our Collect.)

Easter Even. Added (1662), being a free adaptation of the Coll. in the Scottish Liturgy (1637). Scriptural allusions as usual are numerous (see esp. Rom. 6 passim). The contents are suggested by the fact that this was one of the chief occasions of Bapt. in the ancient Church.

Easter Sunday. A free expansion (1549) of the Sar. Coll., which was itself a modification (in the Greg. books) of the Gel. form.

23. Easter Day. Though we now have here an admirable pr. on the subject of Grace (cp. 17th Sunday aft. Trin.), yet it will be seen below that the Gel. Petition is really more in accordance with the season.

Deus qui (+hodierna die Sar.) per Unigenitum tuum aeternitatis nobis aditum devicta morte reserasti :

(Gel.)	(Greg.)
da nobis quaesumus ut qui resurrectionis dominicae sollemniam colimus per innovationem tui Spiritus a morte animae resurgamus per Dominum.	vota nostra quae praeveniendo adspirans etiam adiuvando prosequere per eundem.

The Irish and Amer. PBs give for the first Communion (if there be two) this day a Sar. Coll., which in 1549 was to be said bef. Mattins with the last two of the present three "Anthems."

Deus qui pro nobis Filium tuum crucis patibulum subire voluisti ut inimici a nobis expelleres potestatem : concede nobis famulis tuis ut resurrectionis gratiam consequamur per eundem.

1st Sunday after Easter. Composed (1549) the 2nd Communion on Easter Day and for the Tuesday after as well as for this Sunday. The form of Invocation ("Almighty Father") is unique among the C. For the Scripture ref. see Rom. 4 25 and 1 Cor. 5 7, 8 (old Ep. for Easter Day).

"Truth" is prob. governed by "in," not "of," but see Goulburn in loc.

2nd Sunday, (1549). A masterly adaptation of 1 Pet. 2 21 (from Epistle). N.B.— "Only" was "holy" until 1596, apparently by a misprint.

3rd Sunday. First appears, though in a rather corrupt text, in Leo. A reference to Easter Bapt. is still to be traced throughout. The idea of "fellowship" introduced (1549).

Deus qui errantibus ut in viam possint redire (+ iustitiae Greg.) veritatis tuae lumen ostendis : da cunctis qui Christiana professione censentur et illa respuere quae huic inimica sunt nomini et ea quae sunt apta sectari per Dominum.

4th Sunday. Gel. (1549). First clause altered to its present form (1662) from "which dost make the minds of all faithful men to be of one will" (an exact translation). The ground of the Petition was thus materially altered and rendered more obvious.

Deus qui fidelium mentes unius efficit voluntatis : da populis tuis id amare quod praecipis, id desiderare quod promittis ; ut inter mundanas varietates ibi nostra fixa sint corda ubi vera sunt gaudia per Dominum.

5th Sunday. Gel. (1549). The addition of "holy" and "merciful" improves the rhythm, if not the sense, but the reasons for translating both bona and recta by "good" are not clear. The general connection with the Epistle (James 1 22 ff.) is obvious.

Deus a quo cuncta bona procedunt : largire supplicibus tuis ut cogitemus te inspirante quae recta sunt et te gubernante eadem faciamus per Dominum.

Ascension Day. Sar. The Gel. Coll. expresses the same thought in very different words. The original Petition was expanded 38. Ascension Day. (1549) by the addition of "heart and," and "thither ascend . . . continually" : but hodierna die is omitted and likewise redemptorem nostrum, and (in a measure) in caelestibus.

Concede quaesumus omnipotens Deus ut qui hodierna die Unigenitum tuum redemptorem nostrum ad caelos ascendisse credimus, ipsi quoque mente in caelestibus habitemus per eundem.

Sunday aft. Ascension. From an unique source, viz., the Sar. Antiphon for Vespers on Ascension Day, which was how-

40. Sunday aft. Ascension. ever addressed directly to Christ. For "comfortless" (lit. "orphans") cp. John 14 18. The second clause of the Petition was much altered (1549) from the original (which was based on Acts 1 4 and John 14 17, 15 26).

O rex gloriae, Domine virtutum, qui triumphator hodie super omnes caelos ascendisti : ne derelinquas nos orphanos sed mitte promissum Patris in nos spiritum veritatis.

Whit-Sunday. Sar. "A pr. for light and love" (Goulburn), very excellently translated

41. Whit-Sunday. (1549) with two significant additions, viz., "in all things" and "holy (comfort)." "As upon this day" was afterwards changed to "as at this time."

Deus qui hodierna die corda fidelium sancti Spiritus illustratione docuisti : da nobis in eodem Spiritu recta sapere et de eius semper consolatione gaudere per, etc., in unitate eiusdem, etc.

Trinity Sunday. Sar. (1549). The addition of "grace" is of value ; not so the alteration of the Petition (1662) from

42. Trinity Sunday. "through the steadfastness of this faith we may evermore be defended from all adversity" to its present form ; for thereby the use of steadfastness in the Faith as a defence from adversity is almost obliterated. The Coll. seems to spring from a period when Trinitarian doctrine was a source of danger to those who held it (e.g., under the Arian barbarians in the 6th cent.).

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui dedisti famulis tuis in confessione verae fidei aeternae Trinitatis gloriam agnoscere et in potentia maiestatis adorare! Unitatem: quaesumus ut eiusdem fidei firmitate ab omnibus semper muniamur adversis qui vivis.

1st Sunday aft. Trin. Gel. (1549). A beautiful pr. and thoroughly well rendered, save that "trust" should rather be "hope"

43. 1st Sunday aft. Trin. (so also in 4th Sunday) and "prayers" is somewhat weak for invocationibus. For the second part of Petition cp. vv. 7 and 21 of Epistle (1 John 4).

Deus in te sperantium fortitudo adesto propitius invocationibus nostris: et quia sine te nihil potest mortalis infirmitas, praesta auxilium gratiae tuae ut in exsequendis mandatis tuis et voluntate tibi et actione placeamus per Dominum.

2nd Sunday. Gel. for Sunday aft. Ascension, more literally translated (1549); 44. 2nd Sunday. reconstructed and expanded into its present form (1662).

Sancti nominis tui Domine timorem pariter et amorem fac nos habere perpetuum: quia nunquam tua gubernatione destituis quos in soliditate tuae dilectionis instituis per Dominum. (Notice the play here on destituis and instituis.)

3rd Sunday. Sar. The rather awkward rendering of 1549 received various improvements in 1662, esp. by the addition of the last clause, "and comforted . . . adversities"; but the expressive word deprecationem (= pr. against impending evils) is still not represented and "graciously" would be better for benignus than "mercifully" (which usually stands for propitius).

Deprecationem nostram quaesumus Domine benignus exaudi: et quibus supplicandi praestas affectum, tribue defensionis auxilium per Dominum.

4th Sunday. Sar. (1549). The following points may be noticed: (1) "trust" should rather be "hope" (as in 1st Sunday, q.v.); 45. 4th Sunday. (2) the addition of "increase and" is a great help to the meaning of "multiply," and so is "finally" to the meaning of "lose"; (3) the omission of "good" before "things" widens the scope of the Petition, though perhaps it weakens its point.

Protector in te sperantium Deus, sine quo nihil est validum nihil sanctum: multiplica super nos misericordiam tuam ut te rectore te duce sic transeamus per bona temporalia ut non amittamus aeterna (cp. 2 Cor. 4 18) per Dominum.

5th Sunday. Leo. (1549). The English version asks that the joyful service of the Church may be the result of the world's peaceful ordering, whereas the original only asks with less force for the two things co-ordinately. "It seems to have been suggested by the disasters of the dying Empire"

(Bright, Anc. Coll., p. 208). See Coll. for Trin. Sunday.

Da nobis (+ quaesumus Greg.) Domine Deus noster ut et mundi cursus pacifice nobis tuo ordine dirigatur et ecclesia tua tranquilla devotione laetetur per Dominum.

6th Sunday. Gel. Various points of interest are here: (1) the Invocation is based on 1 Cor.

29 (Is. 64 4); but (2) the original uses the phrase "the things which eye hath not seen," while the 1549 book uses " (the things which) have not entered into man's heart"; (3) the original phrase tui amoris affectum is here simply rendered "such love toward thee," whereas in 3rd Sunday aft. Trin. supplicandi affectum is more vigorously rendered "a hearty desire to pray"; (4) the Latin has both in omnibus and super omnia; in 1549 only the former was retained, in 1662 the latter was substituted.

Deus qui diligentibus te bona invisibilia praeparasti: infunde cordibus nostris tui amoris affectum ut te in omnibus et super omnia diligentes promissiones tuas quae omne desiderium superant consequamur per Dominum.

7th Sunday. Gel. (1549). One of our most forcible C. as it stands, but a paraphrase rather than a translation. We pray here that the Love of God may be implanted, grow and flourish like a healthy plant in the garden of the soul.

Deus virtutum cuius est totum quod est optimum: inserte pectoribus nostris amorem tui nominis et praesta ut in nobis religionis augmento quae sunt bona nutrias ac vigilantibus pietatis Greg. studio quae sunt nutrita custodias per Dominum.

8th Sunday. Gel. (1549). The faulty rendering of the Invocation, "God whose providence is never deceived," was corrected by a skilful paraphrase (1662), and nothing could be more satisfactory than the present pr. and its application of sound doctrine as to God's Providence.

Deus cuius providentia in sui dispositione non fallitur te supplices exoramus ut noxia cuncta submoveas et omnia nobis profutura concedas per Dominum.

9th Sunday. Leo. In 1549 the first part of the Petition was translated literally "that we who cannot be without thee," but altered to its present clearer form (1662), when "enabled" was also substituted for "able" further on.

Largire nobis Domine quaesumus (+ semper Gel. and Greg.) spiritum cogitandi quae bona (recta Gel. and Greg.) sunt promptius (propitius Gel. and Greg.) et agendi ut qui sine te esse non possumus secundum te vivere valeamus per Dominum.

10th Sunday. Leo. The Invocation and Petition were altered in the Gel. book more or less to the form used in Sar. and translated (1549). A most valuable request that we may pray aright.

49. 10th Sunday.

(Leo.)

Ad aures misericordiae tuae Domine supplicum vota perveniant et ut possimus impetrare quae poscimus fac nos semper tibi placita postulare per Dominum.

(Sar.)

Pateant aures misericordiae tuae Domine precibus supplicantium et ut petentibus desiderata concedas, fac eos quae tibi placita sunt postulare per.

11th Sunday. Gel. In 1549 the Petition was more literally translated thus: "Give unto us abundantly thy grace that we running to thy promises may be made partakers of thy heavenly treasure." This was altered and expanded into its present excellent form (1662).

52. 11th Sunday.

Deus qui omnipotentiam tuam parcendo maxime et miserando manifestas: multiplica super nos (cp. 4th S. aft. Trin.) gratiam tuam ut ad tua promissa currentes caelestium bonorum facias esse consortes per Dominum.

12th Sunday. Gel. (but the Leo. book has a parallel pr. containing one clause which—by a happy coincidence, for the MS. had not then been discovered—appears in the version of 1549, "qui plura praestas quam petimus aut mere-mur"). The first clause in the Invocation, "always more ready . . . pray," hardly represents the original abundantia pietatis tuae. The present end of the Petition was substituted (1662) for "that that our prayer dare not presume to ask."

54. 12th Sunday.

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui abundantia pietatis tuae et merita supplicum excedis et vota: effunde super nos misericordiam tuam ut dimittas quae conscientia metuit et adicias quod oratio non praesumit per Dominum.

13th Sunday. Leo. The somewhat more literal rendering of the Petition (1549), "we may so run to thy heavenly promises (cp. 11th Sunday) that we fail not finally to attain the same," was more freely paraphrased into its present form (1662), and "merits of" was then added. It is now an admirable pr. for the grace of faithful service.

55. 13th Sunday.

Omnipotens et misericors Deus de cuius munere venit ut tibi a fidelibus tuis digne et laudabiliter serviat: tribue nobis quaesumus ut ad promissiones tuas sine offensione curramus per Dominum.

14th Sunday. Leo. (1549). A little reflection will reveal a certain connection here with the present Epistle and Gospel; cp. also 1 Cor. 13.

56. 14th Sunday.

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus da nobis fidei spei et caritatis augmentum et ut mereamur assequi quod promittis fac nos amare quod praecipis per Dominum.

15th Sunday. Gel. (1549). An admirable version, except that "mercy" is rather weak for the unusual word propitiatio (cp. Luke 18 13) and "frailty" for mortalitas (= liability to die).

57. 15th Sunday.

Custodi Domine quaesumus ecclesiam tuam propitiatione perpetua et quia sine te labitur humana mortalitas tuis semper auxiliis et abstrahatur a noxiis et ad salutaria dirigatur per Dominum.

16th Sunday. Gel. (1549). The triple play on words (mundet, muniat, munere) of the Latin has of necessity been lost in translation. The simple sine te (= "without thee" in the last Coll.) has been enlarged into "without thy succour" here, and "goodness" added to "help" in representing munere. "Continued" would, perhaps, be better than "continual" and "preserve" should certainly be "govern."

58. 16th Sunday.

Ecclesiam tuam Domine miseratio continuata mundet et muniat et quia sine te non potest salva consistere tuo semper munere gubernetur per Dominum.

17th Sunday. Sar. (1549). The doctrine of grace could hardly be better summarised than it is here, as (a) originating all goodness; and (b) carrying it forward into right action (cp. C. for Easter Day, for Peace at Evensong, and "Prevent us," etc., at end of HC).

59. 17th Sunday.

Tua nos Domine quaesumus gratia semper et praeveniat et sequatur ac bonis operibus iugiter praestet esse intentos per Dominum.

18th Sunday. Gel. The first limb of the Petition was literally rendered (1549) "to avoid the infections of the devil," then changed and expanded into its present form (1662). Obviously the infectious nature of sin, which needs to be avoided, is a more unusual and subtle but not less valuable thought than the present.

60. 18th Sunday.

Da quaesumus Domine populo tuo diabolica vitare contagia et te solum Deum pura mente sectari per Dominum.

19th Sunday. Gel. (1549). The reference to the Holy Spirit was introduced (1662); before that the Petition ran: "Grant that the working of Thy mercy" (a rather bald rendering of the Latin phrase). "Rule" is a valuable addition to the simple "direct" of the original.

61. 19th Sunday.

Dirigat corda nostra quaesumus Domine tuae miserationis operatio quia tibi sine te placere non possumus per Dominum.

20th Sunday. Gel. (1549). Three small additions were made (1662): "O" before "Almighty," "most" before "merciful," and "we beseech thee" after "us"; and one happy and important change, viz., "cheerfully" for "with free hearts." The result is a beautiful pr., if somewhat more commonplace and less forcible than the original.

62. 20th Sunday.

Omnipotens et misericors Deus universa nobis adversantia propitiatus excludit: ut mente et corpore pariter expediti quae tua sunt liberis mentibus exsequamur per Dominum.

21st Sunday. Gel. (1549). Another, very exquisite pr., though again several points in the Latin are barely if at all represented, e.g., largire = bountifully grant, placatus = being appeased (cp. propitiatus in last Coll.); indulgentiam is more "favour" than "pardon," pariter (= at the same time) is omitted.

63. 21st Sunday.

Largire quaesumus Domine fidelibus tuis indulgentiam placatus et pacem: ut pariter ab omnibus mudentur offensis et secura tibi mente deserviant per Dominum.

22nd Sunday. Sar. (1549). Two points in the rendering are to be noted: (a) "in continual godliness" should be "with Thy continual fatherly pity" (so in 5th Sunday aft. Epiph., q.v.); (b) "devoutly . . . Name" is a good but perhaps over-free translation for the literal "devoted to Thy Name in good actions."

Familiam tuam quaesumus Domine continua pietate custodi: ut a cunctis adversitatibus te protegente sit libera et in bonis actibus tuo nomini sit devota per Dominum.

23rd Sunday. Sar. (1549). No important changes since. "Be ready to hear" is a happy expansion of adesto, but the telling echo of the same word in piis, pietatis, and the order of the clauses might have been retained: "the godly (or devout) prayers . . . being thyself the Author of all godliness (or devotion)."

Deus refugium nostrum et virtus, adesto piis ecclesiae tuae precibus, auctor ipse pietatis; et praesta ut quod fideliter petimus, efficaciter consequamur per Dominum.

24th Sunday. Sar. (1549). The archaic "assoil" was changed to "absolve" and "all" transferred to its present place from before "those sins" (1662). The thought is a fine one that the assurance of the Divine forgiveness is a necessary preliminary to our being set free from the bondage of our sins.

Absolve quaesumus Domine tuorum delicta populorum et a peccatorum nostrorum nexibus quae pro nostra fragilitate contraximus tua benignitate liberemur per Dominum.

25th Sunday. Sar. (1549). A most suitable prayer, as it now stands, in preparation for Adv., but hardly to be called a translation of the Latin except in the first clause. The original does not contain (a) any repetition of "plenteously," nor (b) any direct reference to good works on our part, nor (c) to our being rewarded. A more exact rendering of the latter part would be: "that the more plenteously we carry into effect the Divine working (of the Spirit), the greater assistance we may obtain from Thy fatherly goodness."

Excita quaesumus Domine tuorum fidelium voluntates: ut divini operis fructum propensius exsequentes pietatis tuae remedia maiora percipiant per Dominum.

St. Andrew. The Sar. Coll. was discarded (1549) for a new one, which based its Petition to bear troubles patiently on the tradition of the Apostle's crucifixion. This was again rejected (1552) for the present one, which bases its Petition to give up ourselves to the obedient fulfilment of God's Will on his call to follow Christ very readily obeyed; and this has scriptural authority (e.g., Matt. 4:18 ff., John 1:40).

St. Thomas (1549). The Apostle's doubt (recorded in the Gospel, John 20:24 ff.) which turned out for the more confirmation of the faith is made the occasion for enforcing the lesson that they have a special blessing, who having not seen yet have believed.

Conversion of St. Paul. In 1549 a fairly literal rendering of the Sar. Coll. was given, but this was amplified almost out of knowledge into its present shape (1662). The main idea however of St. Paul's being converted to become the teacher of the Gentiles is still kept prominent (cp. Coll. for Sexagesima).

Deus qui universum mundum beati Pauli apostoli tui praedicatione docuisti: da nobis quaesumus ut qui eius hodie conversionem colimus per eius ad te exempla gradiamur per Dominum.

Purification of B.V.M. Sar., in part Gel. (1549). "Everlasting" was changed to "everliving" (after 1604?). The Petition until 1662 ran: "So grant that we may be presented unto Thee with pure and clear minds." The pr. well suits the new title of the day, "Presentation of Christ in the Temple" (inserted 1662), which is in accordance with its oldest title, Hypapante (= meeting).

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus maiestatem tuam supplices exoramus ut sicut unigenitus Filius tuus hodierna die cum nostrae carnis substantia in templo est praesentatus, ita nos facias purificatis tibi mentibus praesentari per eundem.

St. Matthias (1549). "In," afterwards changed to "into," "Matthie" into "Matthias," and "thy twelve" into "the twelve." The appeal of Acts 1:24 to the Son (cp. John 6:70) is here transferred to the Father; and the same transference is found in other C. (e.g., St. Peter and St. Matthew). For "false Apostles" cp. 2 Cor. 11:13 and Rev. 2:1, 2.

Annunciation of B.V.M. Sar. (1549). This was the Post-Communion Coll., not that of the Day which contained doubtful doctrine. Nothing could be more appropriate, however, for a festival which, with rare exceptions, stands between Christmas and Easter, but always in the near neighbourhood of Good Friday.

Gratiam tuam quaesumus Domine mentibus nostris infunde: ut qui angelo nuntiante Christi Filii tui incarnationem cognovimus, per passionem eius et crucem ad resurrectionis gloriam perducamur per eundem.

St. Mark (1549). The Petition, based on Eph. 4:14 (from the Epistle), originally ran: "Give us grace so to be established by Thy holy Gospel that we be not like children carried away," etc.

68. St. Thomas.

64. 22nd Sunday.

65. 23rd Sunday.

66. 24th Sunday.

67. 25th Sunday.

68. St. Andrew.

70. Conversion of St. Paul.

71. Purification of B.V.M.

72. St. Matthias.

73. Annunciation of B.V.M.

74. St. Mark.

SS. Philip and James (1549). The Invocation rests on John 17 3 and the Petition on John 14 6 (from the Gospel). The present

76. St. Philip and James. ending, "that following," etc., dates from 1662; before that it ran somewhat feebly, if not lamely, "as thou hast taught St. Philip and other the Apostles."

St. Barnabas (1549), slightly touched up, 1662. The description of Barnabas in the Invocation is suggested by Acts 77. St. Barnabas. 11 24 (from the Epistle). For the "manifold gifts" see 1 Cor. 12 1-11 and Rom. 12 6-8.

Nat. of St. John Bapt. (1549). The misleading "penance" was changed to "repentance" (1662); see Luke 3 3, 8, etc. Note

77. Nat. of St. John Bapt. that "wonderfully" means "miraculously" (see Luke 1); "constantly" means "with constancy (or firmness)." As to "patiently," the Reformers appear to have held either that the incident recorded in Matt. 11 2 ff. was not a sign of impatience, or that our Lord's message in reply availed to restore his patience, which remained with him afterwards till the end.

St. Peter (1549). For the Invocation see on St. Matthias. The earnest (= thrice repeated) command is recorded in John 78. St. Peter. 21 15-17. Goulburn does well to point out (2 309) that "they" should be taken to include clergy as well as people (see 1 Pet. 5 4). Even so the unity of the petition (usually a striking feature of a Coll.) is a little marred by a reference to the people's duty of obedience.

St. Mary Magdalene (July 22). A new Coll. appeared (1549) for this festival, but has been withdrawn (with Ep. and Gospel)

79. St. Mary Magdalene (July 22). since 1552, presumably because only Apostles or those most intimately concerned in our Lord's Work and Person were then admitted to a special commemoration.

"Merciful Father, give us grace that we never presume to sin through the example of any creature, but if it shall chance us at any time to offend thy divine majesty that then we may truly repent and lament the same, after the example of Mary Magdalene, and by lively faith obtain remission of all our sins: through the only merits of thy Son, our Saviour Christ."

St. James (1549). We learn from the Gospels that the father Zebedee was alive and was able

80. St. James. to hire servants (Mark 1 20) and engage partners (Luke 5 10), and adroit use is made of these facts to impress on us that neither family nor business ties must stand in the way of following Christ.

Transfiguration of Christ (Aug. 6). The Amer. PB inserts a Coll. for this important commemoration, which runs as follows:

81. Transfiguration of Christ (Aug. 6). "O God, who on the mount didst reveal to chosen witnesses thine only-begotten Son wonderfully transfigured in raiment white and glistening:

Mercifully grant that we being delivered from the disquietude of this world may be permitted to behold the King in his beauty, who with thee, O Father, and thee, O Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth one God, world without end."

St. Bartholomew. The Invocation was new in 1549, but the Petition, which was then a

82. St. Bartholomew. literal rendering of that in the Sar. Coll. ("to love that he believed and to preach that he taught"), was altered to its present more satisfactory form (1662). The efficacious preaching of this Apostle is specially mentioned by Eusebius in his HE (v. 10 3).

Omnipotens sempiterne Deus qui huius diei venerandam sanctamque laetitiam in beati Bartholomaei apostoli tui festivitatem tribuisti: da ecclesiae tuae quaesumus et amare quod credidit et praedicare quod docuit per Dominum.

St. Matthew (1549). Here the attributing of the Son's action to the Father is less absolute than in the case of St.

83. St. Matthew. Matthias or St. Peter (see John 5 19, 14 10). The Petition is naturally suggested by the evil reputation under which tax-gatherers commonly lay, and carries the lesson of the Coll. for St. James, as it were, a stage farther.

St. Michael and All Angels. Sar. (1549). "All" was omitted before "Angels" and "they 84. St. Michael and All Angels. which alway, etc., may by thy appointment," etc., altered to the present wording (1662). The phrase "by thy appointment" is an important addition to the original, but there seems no good reason for rendering dispensas by the perfect nor for omitting vita nostra.

Deus qui miro ordine angelorum ministeria hominumque dispensas: concede propitius ut a quibus tibi ministrantibus in caelo semper assistitur, ab his in terra vita nostra muniat per Dominum.

St. Luke (1549). "An Evangelist and" was added before "Physician," and "it may please thee by, etc., of his doctrine

85. St. Luke. to heal all, etc., through thy Son," etc., altered to the present form (1662). Dean Goulburn has some judicious remarks in defence of the statements about St. Luke here which, if not completely convincing, are well worthy of being considered (2 349 ff.).

SS. Simon and Jude (1549). "The congregation" changed to "thy Church" (1662). The teaching of the Coll. is based on 86. SS. Simon and Jude. Eph. 2 20 ff. (cp. Is. 28 16), which is not, however, from the Epistle of the Day. For "unity of Spirit" cp. Eph. 4 3, 4.

All Saints (1549). "Holy (Saints)" altered to "blessed (Saints)," "virtues" to "virtuous," and "all" between "for" and

87. All Saints. "them" omitted (1662). Note that (a) "the elect" = "the baptised" (as in Catechism "me and all the elect people of God," and Art. 17); (b) "virtuous and godly" = "moral and spiritual."

At the end of the Communion Service, after the Blessing, is printed a series of six excellent C. for use "as often as occasion shall serve."

88. Collects after Communion
Office.

They were first placed there (1549), partly, we may presume, though not entirely to represent the former "Post-Communion" prayers, and have so remained untouched ever since. Three of them are ancient, viz., the first two and the fourth.

(1) Gel., from a Missa for one going on a journey, to which its language is most appropriate. In the Sar. use it is in the Missa for pilgrims and also after Prime.

Adesto Domine supplicationibus nostris et viam famulorum tuorum in salutis tue prosperitate dispone ut inter omnes (+ viae et Sar.) vitae huius varietates tuo semper protegantur auxilio per Dominum.

(2) Also from the Sar. office at end of Prime. Since 1662 it is likewise the concluding pr. at Confirmation.

Dirigere et sanctificare et regere dignare Domine Deus quæsumus corda et corpora nostra in lege tua et in operibus mandatorum tuorum ut hic et in æternum te auxiliante sani et salvi esse mereamur per Dominum.

(4) From the Sar. Missa for 2nd Saturday in Lent, but the final clause and other enrichments are due to our Reformers. Note that its ancient connection with the Spring Embertide is retained by its being placed as the "Post-Communion" in our present Ordinal.

Actiones nostras quæsumus Domine et aspirando præveni et adiuvando proseguere: ut cuncta nostra operatio et a te semper incipiat et per te coepta finiatur per Dominum.

(3), (5) and (6) were new (1549). Of these (3) is based on James 1:21 ff.; (5), which Dean Comber called "a pr. to supply the Defects of our other Devotions," is based on Matt. 6:8, Rom. 8:26, etc.; and (6) on John 14:13, 14, 16:23, 1 John 5:14, 15, etc.¹

By far the most valuable sources of instruction are Dean Goulburn, The Collects (2 vols.), Rivingtons, 1880, and Dr. Bright's article in the 88. Bibliography. Prayer Book Commentary, S.P.C.K., 1905 (pp. 82 ff.), to which should be added the latter author's Ancient Collects, Parker, Oxford, 1887. The various books on the PB (e.g., Proctor and Frere, Barry, Blunt, etc.) all contain a certain amount of information.—G.

CHARLES LETT FELTOE.

COLLEGE.—A few distinctive points of usage may be noted. The 12 Apostles are called "the apostolic C.," and the seventy cardinals who form the Pope's Council and elect to the papacy from their own number are styled "the sacred college." The term has been used for "a community or corporation of clergy living together on a foundation for religious service," etc.—A3.

¹ The Coll. at the beginning of the office of HC, commonly called the Coll. pro Puritate, is not in Gel., but occurs in Sar. as part of the priest's preparation for Mass. The translation dates from 1540. The original Latin will be found in CANON OF THE LITURGY, § 2, near the beginning of the Ordinalium Missæ (Sarum).

G. HARFORD.

COLLEGIATE CHURCH.—"A ch. which is endowed for a body corporate or chapter, but has no bishop's see" (NED), like Westminster Abbey, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Eton College Chapel has also been styled a collegiate ch., because connected with a college.—A7.

G. HARFORD.

COLLET.—(Sarum Missal Acolitus.) He attended on the Sacred Ministers at High Mass, e.g., at the Epistle, and preparation of the chalice. He brought the sacred vessels to the credence, placed the corporas on the altar, and carried out the vessels after the ablutions. On festivals he carried the Cross in the procession and at the Gospel (see CLERK and ACOLYTE).—A3.

J. E. SWALLOW.

COLONIAL CLERGY ACT (37 and 38 Vict., c. 77).—This Act regulates the right of those ordained in colonial churches to officiate or receive preferment in England. The value of its provisions has been variously estimated.—A4.

G. HARFORD.

COLOURS.—To see moral, spiritual, or mystical significance in the C. which distinguish the objects of our sight seems to be

1. General Considerations. a natural instinct in man. Full scope is given to this instinct in the language of the Bible. In the ordering of matters concerned with the services of the Tabernacle and Temple under the Old Law some importance is attached to the C. to be employed in the making of vestments and other things; hence it is no matter for surprise to find that, when ordinances of worship under the New Law came to be arranged, the C. of vestments, altar-hangings and such-like matters became a subject for ecclesiastical regulation.

In the Eastern Churches down to the 13th cent. only two C. were used: White, both for Feasts and ordinary occasions; Red, for Fast days and funerals. At the present day in the East no strict rule as to C. is observed.

Some writers maintain that originally only these two C. were employed in the West; the first indication of a more elaborate scheme of

2. Colours in the West. C. is found in a work by Pope Innocent III (1198-1216). He describes the use of the Roman Church in his day, and says that four C. were used: White, on Feasts of Virgins and Confessors; Red, for Apostles and Martyrs; Black, on fasting days, for the dead, during Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter; Green, on ferial days.¹ This scheme seems to leave most of the chief days and times of observance unprovided for; in course of years it was greatly developed in the Roman Church, and a cognate development took place in all Latin Churches. We cannot stay here to trace that development in general, we must confine ourselves to the consideration of the shape it had taken in England at the time of the compilation of our PB.

In 1542 the Southern Convocation enjoined the observance of the Sar. Use on the whole Province of Canterbury. Of course this did not affect the Province of York where other Uses prevailed. This ordinance of Convocation does not, however, help us much to 4. Sarum Colours.

¹ Benedict XIV, De Missæ Sacrificio, Sectio i. 52.

a knowledge of the actual use of our Church as to C. in the middle of the 16th cent.

To begin with, our knowledge of Sar. Use as to C. is very incomplete. The Rubric on C. in the Missal prescribes: White, for the whole of Eastertide whatever the day (except on the Invention of the Cross), on Feasts and commemorations of the Blessed Virgin, of St. John (27 Dec.), of St. Michael, and at the Dedication of a Church; Red, on all Sundays out of Eastertide, on Ash-Wednesday and Maundy Thursday, on both Feasts of the Cross, and on Feasts of Martyrs, Apostles and Evangelists out of Eastertide; Yellow, on Feasts of Confessors; Black, for the Dead. From other Rubrics we gather that Red was used on Good Friday, but we have no information as to the C. for Advent, Christmas, the Epiphany, the Ascension, Pentecost, Trinity Sunday, Corpus Christi, or All Saints.

Uncertainty is increased by what we learn from Clement Maydeston, the well-known authority on the practical carrying out of the Sar. Rite (15th cent.); he assures us very positively that the Sar. Rubrics were of two kinds: (1) those that regulated the text of the Offices; these were regarded as of universal obligation wherever the Sar. Rite was used; (2) those which concerned Vestments and other ceremonial matters; these were for the most part considered to be binding only on the clergy of the church of Salisbury. How did this affect the use of the Sar. scheme of C.? We do not know.

The Inventories of Church Ornaments and other documents which describe the actual use of vestments, etc., do not make things clearer. We find evidence of the use of C. not named in rubrics and in ways not contemplated by liturgical books; one thing is put beyond doubt, that throughout England White vestments were provided as appropriate for use in Lent; no rubrical or liturgical authority can be produced for this.

When we turn to diocesan Uses (other than that of Sar.) we find only fragmentary records. The

5. Colours in other English Uses.

Wells scheme of C. (1340) is, however, fairly complete; it shows affinity with, but not complete conformity to, the Use of Sarum. The Easter Colour is Red. But the most complete records which we have of English usage as to C. are to be found in the Ordinale of Bishop Grandisson of Exeter (c. 1337), and in the Pontificals of Bishop Clifford of London (1406-21) and of Archbishop Chichele of Canterbury (1414-43). These schemes were evidently intended to be for diocesan guidance, and are plainly stated to be arranged juxta morem Curie Romanae; they agree in general with each other and with the present Roman Use, but they differ from it and from each other in a number of details. To describe and discuss these variations would be interesting, but would carry us far beyond our limits; we must be content to sketch Bishop Clifford's (London) Use.

White was to be used at Christmas; on St. John's Day (27 Dec.); on the Circumcision and the Vigil and Day of the Epiphany; on Maundy Thursday; on Easter Eve and during all Eastertide; on the Ascension; on Trinity Sunday; on Corpus Christi Day; on the Nativity of St. John the Baptist; on Feasts of the Blessed Virgin, of Angels, and of Virgins; on All Saints' Day; at the Dedication of a Church; and during the Octaves of any of the above named Feasts.

Red was to be used on the Vigil and throughout the Week of Pentecost; on all Feasts of Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs, except the Beheading of St. John the Baptist and Holy Innocents' Day, when Violet was to be used; but Red was to be used on the Octave of the Innocents, and on both Feasts of the Cross.

Yellow was to be used on Feasts of Confessors and on St. Mary Magdalen's Day. (It is noted that the Roman Colour for Confessors is White.)

Violet = Purple was to be used during Advent; from Septuagesima till Maundy Thursday (or Passion Sunday, on and after which Red or Black was perhaps sometimes used); on Rogation and Ember Days (not in Whitsun-Week); and on Vigils.

Green = Yellow was to be used from the Octave of the Epiphany till Septuagesima and from Trinity to Advent, on all Sundays and Ferias.

Black = Violet was to be used at Offices for the Dead; and on Good Friday, but on this day Red might be used until after the Solemn Prayers.

Documentary evidence makes it certain that at the date of the origin of our PB (1) no one order of C. was of obligatory use throughout the Church of England, (2) that in practice an almost unlimited variety of use was at least tolerated. Any scheme of liturgical C. arranged on the lines indicated by the Sar. and other Rubrics, by the schemes in the Pontificals, by the Consuetudinaries and other such-like documents, or in the Inventories, may fairly claim to represent the tradition of the Church of England.

6. Colours at Present.

In the matter of liturgical C. the Church of England in no way differed from the neighbouring continental Churches, in the records of which we find the same lines as to C. followed as in our own Church, with like variations and uncertainties. It was not until the impulse towards centralisation (one of the results of the course taken by things at the Council of Trent) had made great progress that, even within the limits of the Roman Communion, it was thought necessary to insist on strict uniformity in the use of liturgical C., and even yet there exists within these limits more variety in practice than many are aware of.—R4. TWOS. I. BALL.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—These extracts from Scripture, except the first, are based on HERMANN'S CONSULTATION (1543).

1. Their Source.

which contains two others, viz., John 3 35, 36 and Acts 10 43. In Hermann the sentences come between the Conf. and the Absol. The first sentence appears in Hermann's preliminary discourse on the Lord's Supper (fol. 87, verso; cp. Dowden, Workmanship, p. 26-7). The expression "comfortable" seems to have been suggested by Hermann's words, "Höret den Evangelischen Trost" (Dowden, Further Studies, p. 46). For its use in the sense of "comforting" cp. Ps. 54 6, 69 17 (PBV).

In all the reformed Service Books, including the Order of Communion, the words follow the Absol.

2. Their Position and Meaning.

Their object is to hearten the penitent with "the comfortable salve of God's Word," and to affix its seal to the Church's Absol. But in 1549, as in the Scotch Office of 1764, the whole section came, not as at present before Consecration, but between Consecration and Communion. We may note that in Hermann only one of the sentences is directed to be used at a time.—H2. J. F. KEATING.

COMMANDMENTS, TABLES OF. — See TABLES OF COMMANDMENTS.

COMMANDMENTS (THE TEN).—The position of the Ten C. in the Communion Office is peculiar to the Anglican Service-books. They were introduced in 1552, and correspond to the Lectons from the OT in the Liturgies; e.g., in the Syrian Rite (Brightman, Liturgies, p. xlvii) the reading of "the Law and the Prophets" is directed, and was very general until the 7th cent. at least. Their introduction in 1552 was as a standard of self-examination, and was partly, no doubt, a consequence of the abolition of obligatory private Conf. before Communion.

The direction that the celebrant should turn to the people in rehearsing them was adopted from the Scottish Rite of 1637 at the suggestion of Bishop Wren, of Norwich.

In the English Nonjurors' Office (1718, printed in Hall's Fragmenta Liturgica) the summary of the Law (Mt. 22 37-40) is substituted for the Decalogue, and it occurs likewise in the Scottish (1764) and American (1789) Offices, in the former case as an alternative, in the latter as a permissible addition to the Decalogue. The Amer. PB of 1892 sanctions the omission of the Decalogue "provided it be said once on each Sunday," and adds "whenever it is omitted the Minister shall say the Summary of the Law."—HI. J. F. KEATING.

COMMEMORATION.—Some have supposed the word Cs. occurring in the Pref. "Concerning the Service, etc." to mean the short office, consisting of antiphon, V., R. and Coll., used either to commemorate a festival when it fell on a day on which it could not be fully observed, or in honour of some saint, some sacred mystery, etc. But in England such an office was not called a C. (as it is in the Roman Brev.) but a Memorial (Lat. memoria). Here the word Cs. means certain votive offices which were allowed, on one or more week-days in each week, to be used to the exclusion of the office proper for that day: an abuse which grievously interfered with the due recitation of the Psalter and the orderly reading of Scripture. In the Sarum Brev., beside the C. of our Lady every Sat., Cs. were allowed on one, if not two, other week-days in each week, of the patron saint of the place, the patron saint of the diocese, etc.—HB. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS.—The importance of giving letters of commendation by the clergy to those of their people migrating from one parish to another has always been recognised. And yet, strange to say, it is a much neglected duty, owing, it may be, to the fact that the parishioner leaving does not think it necessary to have an introduction of a spiritual nature, and therefore takes no trouble to inform his parish priest of his moving to another district. Sometimes, too, it may be that the clergyman himself does not think of it or deem it necessary; but, whatever the cause may be, it is to be regretted that both clergy and laity do not more generally use this method of introduction. The help afforded by this means to a new-comer settling in a fresh parish can scarcely be over-estimated, and no doubt many are lost to the Church through the neglect of this obvious duty. And, if letters of commendation are necessary for the Church at home, a fortiori are they necessary for the Church abroad. Emigrants leaving the Mother Country for the Greater Britain beyond the seas should never quit these shores without carrying with them some communication from their clergy; it will be found most helpful to a stranger in a strange land far from home and kindred. Clergy in our Colonies complain that they do not hear of the arrival of the new settlers, chiefly because the emigrant has no letter of introduction from the Church at home. At most of the ports where our emigrants land the SPCK. has placed a Chaplain to welcome them in the Church's name, and to guide them by good advice. The emigrant would be greatly helped by having some document to show the port Chaplain that he is a member of the Church of England. Suitable forms of Commendatory Letters may be obtained from the SPCK.—re. J. BRIDGER.

COMMUNION.—A special service for use on Ash-Wed., intended to take the place of (1) the benediction and distribution of ashes, and (2) the ejection of penitents.

The order of these ancient services was as follows. Aft. Sext there was to be a sermon; then the seven Penitential Pss. were said, kneeling, followed by the Lesser Lit., the Lord's Pr., versicles, responses and Collects. After this came the blessing of ashes, which were then put on the heads of all present, beginning with those of highest dignity. Then, if any persons were to be put to open penance, they were conducted down to the door of the church, and were put out by the officiant—viz., the bishop or his deputy—having been presented to him for this purpose by the archdeacon or some other priest. Those who were thus ejected on Ash-Wed. were solemnly readmitted on Maundy Thursday.

In the C. service in the PB the address at the beginning seems to represent the sermon. From the way in which it refers to the expulsion of penitents, it would seem that that part of the old Ash-Wed. services had fallen into disuse. The insertion of the cursings against sinners was a novelty, as regards the services on this day. But there was in the Middle Ages (see Myrk's Instructions for Parish Priests, line 675 ff.; also No. 609, Paston Letters, Gairdner's ed., 1895) a form of anathema against sins of various kinds, which was to be read out solemnly in church twice or thrice in the year, with tolling of bells and extinction of lights at the pronouncement of the sentence of cursing, which in all probability suggested this feature in the C. service, and may possibly also account for its being (from 1552 onwards) suggested for use on other days. The rest of the Penitential Pss. having been allotted to MP and EP on Ash Wed., only the 51st is here said. The V. and R. that follow the Lord's Pr. are those of the ancient service, and the Coll.¹ is the first of the seven formerly said in this place. The next pr. is founded partly on others of the old Colls. and partly on the pr. said at the blessing of ashes. The Conf. of sins that follows was originally an antiphon; the conclusion, "Through the merits, etc. . . . Amen," and the form of blessing aft. it, were only added, at Cosin's instance, in 1662. As at first arranged, the C. service would be followed by HC without any break, exactly as Mass followed the corresponding services in the older rite.—PB.

¹ "Exaudi, Domine, preces nostras et confitentium tibi parce peccatis, ut quos conscientiae reatus accusat, indulgentiae tuae misericordia absolvat. Per." (Gal.)

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

COMMISSARY.—A clergyman selected by a bp. or other official as his deputy for certain specified purposes. A bp. serving abroad usually appoints one or more home clergymen as his C. or Cs., but the arrangement does not always work well in practice, from lack of leisure, knowledge, or discretion.—A3.

G. HARFORD.

COMMIXTURE (ἄμικτος, commixtio).—C. is the name given to the ceremony of putting a particle of the consecrated bread into the chalice, this mystically signifying our Lord's resurrection. It occurs in all the traditional Liturgies both Eastern and Western, and can be traced back at any rate to the 8th cent. It must be distinguished from Intinction, "the infusion of the whole contents of the paten into the chalice with a view to the communion of the people in both species at once" (Brightman, Eastern Liturgies, p. 582), from which however it has probably arisen. The ceremony of C. has formed no part of the Ch. of Eng. services since 1549.—HC.

J. W. TYRER.

COMMON PRAYER.—Prayer is said to be Common, when two or more people join in the same prs. (cp. "common supplications" in Pr. of St. Chrysostom). The Book of Common Prayer is usually understood to mean the book which contains all the services authorised for use in the Church of England: but it is to be noted that the full name of the book as printed on the title page has no less than four other names associated in it. The five names are:—(1) Common Prayer; (2) Administration of Sacraments; (3) Other Rites and Ceremonies; (4) The Psalter or Psalms of David; (5) The form or manner of making, ordaining and consecrating of Bishops, Priests and Deacons.

The five parts thus indicated in the title page represent five of the Service Books which were in use prior to the Revision of 1549: viz., I Breviary, II Missal, III Manual, IV Psalter, V Pontifical. The intention of the revisers at that time was expressed in a sentence of their Pref. which was omitted in 1662: "by this Order the Curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book, and the Bible: by the means whereof, the people shall not be at so great charge for books, as in times past they have been." They therefore included in the BCP all the services usual in a parish ch., viz., the above (1), (2) and (3), leaving out the Pss. because they could be sung from the Bible; the PB of 1549 ended with the Communion. The Bible of 1539 known as the Great Bible still provides the Pss. for the services: hence, after other Versions were printed (1568, 1611), people required in ch. both the new Version for the Lessons and the Great Bible for the Psalms. The printers, therefore, began the practice of adding the Pss. at the end of the PB. The revisers of 1662 adopted this plan when retaining for the Pss. the Version of 1539, and adopting for the Lessons, Eps. and Gospels that of 1611 (see Pref., Order how Psalter, etc.). The Pss. used to be printed with a separate title page, as follows: "The Psalter, or Psalms of David, after the Translation of the Great Bible. Pointed as they are to be sung or said in Churches." But this was cancelled in the Sealed Books, though the phrase about the Great Bible retained its place in many editions till 1708, and that as to the Pointing till 1801 or later.

Of the five parts indicated on the title page, this art. is concerned with MEP only.

MEP are services derived directly from the Day Hours of the Sar. and other Latin Breviaries. They are so much alike in structure that we are apt to overlook the very great differences which exist between them. Both the similarity in structure and the differences in detail are qualities which they inherit from the Latin Services. The Pss., Lessons, Cants., and Second and Third Colls. are always different. Indeed, on Lit. Days, the only parts which are the same in both are the Conf. with its adjuncts, Versicles, Preces, Coll. of the Day, and two final Prs., together with the Lord's Pr. (twice).¹ But the structure is always the same, as follows: I (Introductory)—(a) Sents., Exh., Conf., Absol., II (Praise)—(b) Lord's Pr.; (c) Versicles (forming a short Ps.), Ps. 95 (MP only), Pss.; (d) Two Lessons (OT and NT), each with Cant.; (e) Ap. Creed: III (Prayer)—(f) Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., and Preces (6 couplets); (g) Three Colls., three or more Prs. (or the Lit.), Pr. of St. Chrysostom, and "The Grace."

We may here note that the service is varied throughout by several forms of interchange. The Conf., Lord's Pr. and Creed are said by all; the Pss. and Cants. antiphonally; the Lessons are read by a single voice; the Preces are said responsorially; the Colls. and Prs. by a single voice, with the people's Amen. This interchange secures interest by its variety and helps the people to preserve due attention (see Hooker, EP 5 30).

I. (a) The introductory part of MEP may be compared to the Vestibule of a great Reception Room. That which disqualifies a man for waiting upon God is unforgiven sin: hence his first need is to divest himself of his sins by Confession; thus Ezra (9 6), Daniel (9 4-19), St. Peter (Luke 5 8), Isaiah (6 5-7), Jeremiah (14 20, 21), the Publican in the parable (Luke 18 9-14). The Exh. is a sermon, with eleven texts, setting forth this need, and the Absol. admits the penitent to the presence of God. Cosin, in 1619, rightly described this part as a preparation to the Service.

¹ [The Pr. for Parl. and Gent. Th. will also be often reduplicated.]

II. (b) The Service proper begins with the Lord's Prayer. As the summary of all that follows, the Lord's Pr. assumes

4. The Praise-Portion. the character of Praise or Prayer or Thanksgiving in accordance with its place. The elementary idea of worship contemplates two who are parties to it—God and the worshippers. Thy Kingdom come is said as Praise when we think of God and the glorious majesty of His Being and Power; it is said as Prayer when we think of our poverty of motive or of the slow advance of Christian consistency. These, then, are the two sides of Worship—Praise and Prayer. Because God and the worshippers are the two parties to it, everything must fall under one or other of these. It is Praise when we are thinking mainly of God; and it is Prayer when we are thinking of man and man's needs or defects. The whole of the Lord's Pr. can thus be used as Praise in accordance with the intention of the worshippers; or the whole of it can be used as Prayer. In the former case the Doxology is appended (added in 1662); in the latter the Lesser Lit. is prefixed. Thus, without a rubric, unity of intention is secured.

(c) The portion of Worship which is thus begun with the Lord's Pr. includes Pss., Lessons and Cants., Creed. There is a progress herein; for the acknowledgment of God as revealed to the Psalmist and in the OT passes on to the fuller revelation of the NT, and finds its climax in the Creed where the whole Bible-thought of God is condensed and offered in plain confession of eternal facts. Each of these stages has its own Doxology: for the Pss., Gloria Patri; for each Lesson, a Canticle; for the Creed, the Amen: and the climax is marked by the consensus of all voices in the recitation of the Creed and its Amen.

The four Versicles and Responses ("O Lord, open" etc.) form a link between the Lord's Pr. and the Praises which follow. VENITE (Ps. 95) is the first Ps. every morning and was formerly said with an INVITATORY, which was an anthem or antiphon, varying with the season. Thence Venite is sometimes called the Invitatory Psalm. The Communion furnishes an instance of a Ps. used as Pr. (cp. also Preces, Lit.). But here the Pss. are used as Praises of God in his works and providence.

(d) The OT Lesson takes up this thought and develops it; lections which speak of Creation, Control or Providence may suitably be followed by the Cant. Benedicite; those which display the Promise, or Need, of a Saviour by the Cant. Te Deum.

The NT Lesson advances to the fuller revelation of Christ, presenting either some feature of His Coming and Work, His Life on earth, Death, Resurrection, Ascension; or of some event or truth resulting therefrom. The Cant. Benedictus is a fitting conclusion for lections of the former kind, Jubilate for those of the latter. Similar provision of appropriate Cants. is made for EP, Magnificat corresponding to Te Deum, Cantate Domino to Benedicite, Nunc Dimittis to Benedictus, and Deus Misereatur to Jubilate. Thus, the twofold character of the Lessons in either Testament is provided for both at Mattins and at Evensong.

(e) The essential attributes of God in Three Persons are summarised in the Creed. Whatever the OT has set forth concerning the Unity, or concerning Sin and Salvation, and whatever the NT has added about the Son of God and about the Holy Spirit, all is stated in miniature in the Creed. It is therefore a fit crown to the Praise-portion of MEP. The agreement of all voices at this stage and the addition of Amen by all are to be noted. It should be noted also that the Apostles' Creed is that which exhibits least consciousness of contention concerning the great verities of the Faith. Just as when Moses, anticipating dispute and opposition, asked (Ex. 3 13) the Name of Him whose messenger and agent he was himself to be, and received the answer "I AM," so here we are contemplating God as HE IS, and praising Him in His essential Being: we are not here replying to the doubts and misgivings of opposition and contention.

"The Lord be with you," "And with thy spirit." This mutual Salutation may be taken as the close of the Praise-portion of the service. Formerly it occurred more frequently, but it has been omitted in all places except where it marks plainly the beginning of a new section, and encourages to new effort of worship. The conventional adoption of it as the God be wi' ye, or Good-bye, of those who are parting was nearly reached when the revision of the PB was in progress, and it seems to us most probable that it is here placed as an Adieu. Nevertheless, it may by some be regarded as the beginning of the Prayer-portion; by others again as a link which partakes of both characters. (See DOMINUS VOBISCUM.)

III. (f) The words, Let us pray, mark the beginning of the Prayers, and the Lord's Pr.

has its place here as their summary. 5. The Prayer-Portion. Prefixed to it is the Lesser Lit., which fixes the intention of the Lord's Pr. (viz., supplication). The Preces now consist of 6 couplets, anticipating, with brief interjectional petitions, the subject-matter of the 6 Colls. which follow. The Lit. still furnishes two examples of a Coll. anticipated by Verse and Respond. In MEP the Verses and Responds are grouped together, instead of being distributed to the several Collects. The first couplet corresponds generally to the Coll. of the Day; the 2nd, 3rd and 4th to the Prs. for the King, Royal Family, and Clergy and People; the 5th to the Coll. for Peace; the 6th to the Coll. for Grace to live well. (See VERSICLE.)

(g) The three Colls.,¹ the first varying with the season or day, the others fixed, which follow the Preces, ask for spiritual gifts. There was in 1549 no order to add anything after the Colls. The Salutation and Benediction were omitted; yet it seems likely that prs. were intended to be added. The rubric of 1552, ordering certain optional Prs., uses the phrase "after the Colls.," as if it were a recognised place for insertions: the addition of Memorials (see COMMEMORATION) in the Day Hours would explain why the need of a rubric about it was overlooked. There are three sets of Prs. now provided for use "after the Collects," or "before the two final prayers": (a) Prs. for the Sovereign, Royal Family, Clergy and People (these were, before 1662, printed before the two final Prs. of the Lit.); (b) "PRAYERS AND THANKSGIVINGS upon several occasions" now printed after the Lit. (two of these were, in 1549, printed after HC); (c) Six Prayers now printed after HC. It is clear that these, although allotted to different pages of the book, must be regarded as one series from which a selection is to be made for MEP. It was, doubtless, intended that the three printed before the Pr. of St. Chrysostom should be always used except when Lit. follows Mattins. The six prayers after HC belong partly to the sphere of COLLECTS, and partly to that of final prayers. Those after the Lit., like the Prs. for the Sovereign, etc., are intercessory. The Minister has therefore the duty of determining the order of the Prs. which he selects. But the LITANY is the fullest form for use as the continuation of Mattins. [See also STATE PRAYERS.]

We must now consider the History of the PB services of Mattins and Evensong. They are compilations from, and abbreviations and simplifications of, the seven (or eight) HOURS OF PRAYER observed in English monasteries before the Reformation. These, in turn, were developments of prayer-customs which date back to NT times, being part of the Christian inheritance from the Temple and the Synagogue. In Acts 6:7 we read that a great company of the Priests were obedient to the faith: naturally they would bring into Christian use such customs of Temple or Synagogue worship as lent themselves to the faith and worship of the Church. Already Peter and John (Acts 3:1) are reported as going to the Temple at the 9th hour because it was the "hour of prayer." At that same hour (Acts 10:3) Cornelius received the answer to his prayers whereby he was instructed to send for St. Peter. St. Peter's preparation for this summons took place when on the next day (Acts 10:9) he "went up upon the housetop to pray about the 6th hour." The first gift of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was when "they were all together in one place" at "the 3rd hour of the day" (Acts 2:1, 15). These Hours of Prayer—the 3rd, 6th, and 9th—were apparently observed by Peter and John and Cornelius and the rest in some continued relation to the Temple worship. This agrees with Ps. 55:18, "In the evening and morning and at noon-day will I pray" (PBV), and explains Dan. 6:10. Thus the division of the day of twelve hours into four parts came to be associated with the 3rd, 6th, 9th, and 12th hours, reckoning from sunrise to sunset, and hence arose a system of day services, appropriated not to the end of each interval, but to such place in the space of three hours as suited the different communities.

6. Origin of Hours of Prayer.

Something of the same kind appears to have been the history of night services during the twelve hours between sunset and sunrise. St. Jerome (Ep. 22) writes of five day-services (terce, sext, none, twilight, and vespers) and adds "twice or thrice in the nights." Mark 13:35 (cp. Luke 12:38) names four divisions of the night, but we have not found any connection between these night watches and stated times of prayer. Paul and Silas in prison at Philippi were praying and singing hymns unto God (Acts 16:25) about midnight when the earthquake released them. The unusual circumstances, and the probable disorder of such a prison, forbid us to infer from this that there was at that date a custom of holding a midnight service. It is more likely that disturbance made by the other prisoners had given occasion to the two Christians to occupy themselves in prayer and praise. Such occurrences were, doubtless, frequent; and they must have contributed to the formation of the habit mentioned by St. Jerome: his language implying, in its turn, that there were no fixed hours and no settled services during the night. And, although stricter rules were attempted, the night services tended to become introductory to Mattins.

Naturally enough, in religious communities these Hours of Prayer were adopted and developed. We cannot here enter into the history of that development. It must suffice to give a brief description of the Sarum Hours¹ as they existed in England bef. the Reformation.

7. The Sarum Hours.

The Hours were eight (or seven) in number: (1) Nocturns, (2) Lauds—the two being sometimes reckoned as only one Hour, Mattins—(3) Prime, (4) Terce, (5) Sext, (6) None, (7) Vespers, (8) Compline.

Each Hour began with the Lord's Pr.: "Ante initium Horarum dicitur semper Oratio Dominica." The Pss. were the foundation upon which the whole system was built: Lessons, or a short passage from the Bible (Capitulum), followed the Pss. in each of the Hours: and the Lord's Pr. with other Prs. formed the conclusion. The Nocturns and Vespers of every week shared between them the whole Book of Pss., excepting about 24 which occupied special positions in the other Hours (see PSALTER, LITURGICAL USE OF). By uniting two Pss. under one Gloria, 90 out of the first 108 psalms were arranged under 45 portions, 9 such portions being allotted to Sunday, on which day there were 9 Lectons, and the rest to the week-days. Thus Nocturns consisted of Pss. and Lessons concluding with Te Deum, and were preliminary to Lauds. Lauds began with selected Pss., after which was a Capitulum, a Metrical Hymn and Benedictus, ending with the Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., and other prayers. At Prime, Terce, Sext, and None, the Metrical Hymn preceded the Pss., and Quicumque vult followed them at Prime, which had also Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., Versicles (with Conf.), and Prayers. Vespers were similar to Lauds in most respects, but the Pss. were "in course," 5 each day (109-150); the Cant. was Magnificat. Compline had similar arrangements, its Canticle being Nunc Dimittis. Thus the Psalter provided two courses (1-108, 109-150) for Nocturns and Vespers, and those omitted "in course" were allotted to the other Hours.

¹ The Bp. is and was the fountain of authority for the liturgical use of a diocese: and, for many years before the joint revision of 1549, the Bps. of other Eng. dioceses had inclined to the imitation and adoption of the customs and usages of Salisbury (Sarum—see Usr).

¹ The invariable Colls. (2nd and 3rd) at MEP are taken from early sources, three from the Galatian Sacramentary, the fourth (3rd Coll. MP) from the Gregorian; all, of course, are found in the Sarum. We append the original Latin. (1) Deus, auctor pacis et amator, quem nosse vivere, cui servire regnare est, protege ab omnibus impugnationibus supplices tuos: ut qui defensione tua fidimus, nullius hostilitatis arma timeamus. Per. (2) Domine sancte, Pater omnipotens, aeternae Deus, qui nos ad principium huius diei pervenire fecisti: tua nos hodie salva virtute; et concede ut in hac die ad nullum declinemus peccatum, nec ullum incurramus periculum, sed semper ad tuam iustitiam faciendam omnis nostra actio tuo moderamine dirigatur. Per. (3) Deus, a quo sancta desideria et recta consilia et justa sunt opera, da servis tuis illam, quam mundus dare non potest, pacem; ut et corda mandatis tuis dedita et, hostium sublati formidine, tempora sint tua protectione tranquilla. Per. (4) Illumina, quaesumus Domine, tenebras nostras, et totius noctis insidias repelle propitius. Per.

It will appear from this brief description that the Services of Matins and Evensong, which are now in the PB, are the free rendering of those Latin Services into English words, and into a more manageable system. The Pref. of the PB still mentions several important particulars of the break-down of the Daily Hours. The weekly reading of the Pss. and the yearly reading of the Bible had failed through the frequent interruptions due to Festivals. The Antiphons and Verses with Responsds, beautifully chosen and most devotional in the mind and mouth of the well-instructed, were too intricate for others. The Latin language added a very serious hindrance to worship: it had always been thought necessary to use the vernacular for parts of the Marriage Service, and now it was recognised that the same necessity applied in various degrees to all the services. But a still greater evil existed: the Hours had been designed for use every day. In order to relieve the pressure of so great a task, two or more of them had, by custom or carelessness, been said together. In many places the duty of saying them was neglected by the clergy, or performed with slackness and irregularity. Cardinal Quignon (see QUIGNON'S BREVIARY) had under the direction of the Pope published two attempts to revise the Brev. in 1535 and 1536: a comparison of his reforms with those effected in Eng. in 1549 is of the greatest interest. These Eng. changes must now be indicated.

2. Morning Hours Simplified.

The Pref. of 1549 declared the aims of the revision to be:—(1) regular use of the Daily Services in Ch., (2) intelligent response of the congregation, (3) continuity of Pss. and Lessons. The methods adopted to carry out these aims were:—(1) simplification (including translation into English, abolition of interruptions, diminution of number of rules), (2) completeness (the whole Psalter and virtually the whole Bible to be read in Ch.), (3) uniformity in all the dioceses. [Cp. RITUAL, § 18.]

In order to secure the regular use of the Daily Services, they were combined into two—Morning Prayer (or Mattins) and Evening Prayer (or Evensong). Nocturns and Lauds were already so closely related that we often doubt whether to speak of them as two services or as one: their joint name is Mattins.

Prime also, following Lauds so closely in time, had become all but united to it. The union of these three services was thus suggested by previous practice. A similar course was similarly recommended with regard to Vespers and Compline. The revisers of 1549, therefore, adopted these combinations, and omitted the three Hours (Terce, Sext and None) which consisted mainly of the daily recitation of the 119th Psalm.

The combination of Nocturns, Lauds and Prime had already brought together into one service, on Sundays and Festivals, the Ps. Venite at the beginning, Jubilate and Benedicite amongst the Pss., Te Deum after the Lessons, and Benedictus after the Capitulum. In re-arranging the Pss. and Lessons these older provisions were kept in mind, Te Deum taking its place after the First Lesson, Benedictus after the Second; Benedicite was made alternative to the former, and (in 1552) Jubilate alternative to the latter. In like manner the combination of Vespers and Compline brought together Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, now allotted severally to the First and Second Lessons; another of the daily Pss. at Lauds—Deus misereatur—was (in 1552) made alternative to Nunc Dimittis; and Cantate Domino, which had formerly been only sung in course on Saturdays, was (in 1552) given a special place as alternative to Magnificat.

The adjustment of the Lessons to these re-arrangements was performed by a return to the old system which had become disorganised through the multiplication of Festivals. In order, however, to relieve the length of the Morning Lessons (Nocturns), the continuous reading of the Bible was divided between the Morning Service and the Evening, where it took the places of the Capitula of Vespers and Compline. There was ancient precedent for the arrangement that an OT Lesson should be followed by one from the NT. Further, the provision for Festivals, although it had been responsible for the disturbance of the continuous reading of the Bible, was retained by the simple expedient of spaces in the Calendar for Special Lessons. Of course, Sundays and such Festivals as have not fixed dates remained to interrupt the course: but the proportion of interruptions became a small fraction; the course was restored to its place as the rule, to which the special Lessons were the exception.

3. Lessons and Psalms Re-arranged.

The break-down of the Hours has been attributed as much to the length of time which they occupied in the lives of those who were busy and earnest as to the indifference of others. It was important to make a substantial reduction of the number of Pss. said at Nocturns, particularly now that Lauds and Prime were added to it. The old plan had failed to secure the weekly recitation of the Psalter. It was therefore re-arranged on a simpler scheme in a monthly course with only four interruptions, vis., Christmas Day, Easter Day, Ascension Day, Whitsun Day (to which Ash Wed. and Good Fr. were added in 1662).

The effect of the re-arrangements was that the ancient structure of each service was retained, together with the original design of saying the Psalter and reading the Bible in course. Adaptation to the Christian seasons had formerly been attained by varying Antiphons, Capitula, etc. These were not included in the revised services, because of the interruption and complication which they caused.

It will now be evident that the MEP of 1549 are lineally descended from the Day Hours.

The general plan—Lord's Pr.,
10. General Venite, Pss., Lessons with Cants., Results.

Prs.—is that of the Day Hours; the recitation of the whole Psalter and the reading of the whole Bible were planned, not to supplant, but to fulfil the original intention; the Cants. were allotted nearly to their old positions, and when, in 1552, alternative Pss. were, in three instances, provided, all but one of them were chosen from those to which special places had been allotted in the Hours. Similar regard for ancient use also governed the order of the Prs. after the Lessons and Canticles. The general structure—Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., Preces, Coll., Memorials—was retained. In 1549 even the Creed was left in its old place after the Lesser Lit.: but the Preces were reduced in number, and the Conf. and Absol.

omitted. In 1552 this omission was remedied by placing them as an introduction to the whole Service, and at the same time the Creed was placed bef. the Lesser Lit. The Colls. were increased by the inclusion, as Second Colls., of those for Peace; but no provision was made, in 1549 or 1552, for the concluding Prayers after the Colls., for Memorials, or for any other manner of concluding the Services. It was probably left to the guidance of ancient custom, or reserved (like the Calendar) for some future revision.

It is instructive to compare one of the old Brevs. with a PB in which the rubrics are printed red, in order to realise the diminution of the rubrics. By means of (1) general rules prefixed or appended to the whole book or to particular services, and (2) the omission of variable Antiphons and some of the alternative provisions, the redness of the pages was reduced materially. (3) Another alteration conducing to simplicity was the reduction of the number of Holy-days. Indeed, the question of what are called BLACK-LETTER DAYS was postponed in 1549 and not really dealt with until 1604.

The following Table will show how the various Hours were combined to form MEP. It will be noted that the amalgamation was carried out, so to speak, laterally; by the union of Pss. with Pss., Lesson and Cant. with Capitulum and Cant., Prs. with Prayers.

11.
Comparative Table.

I. MORNING.

NOCTURNS.	LAUDS.	PRIME.	MATTINS (1549).	MP (1662).
1. Lord's Pr.	1. Lord's Pr.	1. Lord's Pr.	1. Lord's Pr.	15. Conf., Absol., etc.
2. Versicles and Gloria.	2. Versicles and Gloria.	2. Versicles and Gloria.	2. Versicles and Gloria.	1. Lord's Pr.
3. Venite .			3. Venite .	2. Versicles and Gloria.
4. Pss. } in course (three sets).	6. Pss. (special).	6. Pss. (special).	4. Pss. (in course).	3. Venite .
5. Lessons }			5. 1st Lesson (OT).	4. Pss. (in course).
7. Te Deum .	8. Benedicite .	11. Quicumque vult .	7. Te Deum , or }	5. 1st Lesson (OT).
	6. Pss. (special).	9. Capitulum.	8. Benedicite . }	7. Te Deum , or }
	9. Capitulum.		5. 2nd Lesson (NT).	8. Benedicite . }
	10. Benedictus .		10. Benedictus — with (11) Quicumque vult (on 6 great Festivals).	5. 2nd Lesson (NT).
		12. Lesser Lit.	12. Lesser Lit.	10. Benedictus , or }
		13. Lord's Pr.	14. Apostles' Creed.	6. Jubilate .
		14. Apostles' Creed.	13. Lord's Pr.	14. Apostles' Creed; or (11) Quicumque vult (on 13 Festivals).
		15. Preces (with Conf. and Absol.).	15. Preces (without Conf. or Absol.).	12. Lesser Lit.
	16. Coll. (of the day).		16. 1st Coll. (of the day).	13. Lord's Pr.
	17. Memorials.		17. 2nd Coll. (for Peace—from Memorials at Lauds).	15. Preces , as in 1549.
		18. Coll. (of Prime).	18. 3rd Coll. (for Grace—from Prime).	16. 1st Coll. } as
19. Concluding Versicles.		19. Concluding Versicles.		17. 2nd Coll. } in
				18. 3rd Coll. } 1549.
				17. Concluding Prayers.
				20. "The grace."

II. EVENING.

VESPERS.	COMPLINE.	EVENSONG (1549).	EP (1662).
1. Lord's Pr.	1. Lord's Pr.	1. Lord's Pr.	12. Conf., Absol., etc.
2. Versicles and Gloria.	2. Versicles and Gloria.	2. Versicles and Gloria.	1. Lord's Pr.
3. Pss (in course).	4. Pss. (special).	3. Pss. (in course).	2. Versicles and Gloria.
5. Capitulum.	5. Capitulum.	5. 1st Lesson (OT).	3. Pss. (in course).
6. Hymn.	6. Hymn.		5. 1st Lesson (OT).
7. Magnificat.		7. Magnificat.	7. Magnificat, or } 4. Cantate. }
	8. Nunc Dimittis.	5. 2nd Lesson (NT).	5. 2nd Lesson (NT).
		8. Nunc Dimittis.	8. Nunc Dimittis, or } 4. Deus misereatur. }
	9. Lesser Lit.	9. Lesser Lit.	11. Apostles' Creed.
	10. Lord's Pr.	11. Apostles' Creed.	9. Lesser Lit.
	11. Apostles' Creed.	10. Lord's Pr.	10. Lord's Pr.
	12. Preces (with Conf. and Absol.).	12 Preces (without Conf. or Absol.).	12. Preces (as in 1549).
13. Coll. (of the day).		13. 1st Coll. (of the day).	13. 1st Coll. } as
14. Memorials.		14. 2nd Coll. (for Peace —from Memorials at Vespers).	4. 2nd Coll. } in
		15. 3rd Coll. (for Aid—from Compline).	15. 3rd Coll. } 1549.
16. Concluding Versicles.	15. Coll. (of Compline).		14. Concluding Prayers.
			17. "The grace."
	16. Concluding Versicles.

MEP were styled Mattins and Evensong in the revision of 1549; and those names are retained in the Tables of Proper Lessons and Proper Psalms. They formed a single chapter until 1662, when they were printed separately with a common heading—

"The Order for MEP daily to be said and used throughout the year." The present plan of printing out in full the Order for EP was adopted in 1662. Previously, Evensong was ordered by rubrics which referred back to Mattins, except where the difference was complete (Cants. and Colls.). That plan still survives in the rubric of MP directing Gloria Patri to be said after all Pss. and Cants. of MEP (except Te Deum).

In 1552 a Conf. and Absol. (which had been omitted from the Preces in 1549) were prefixed to MEP, but the rubric "Then shall the Minister begin the Lord's Prayer" continued to mark the beginning of the Praise-service. In 1662, when the rubric was altered to its present form, a printers' direction was written in the margin of Cosin's book: "Place here a fleuron," "Set here a fayre compartment before this Title." The "fayre compartment" was at first placed and printed after the Absolution, and there is no authority for its omission.

In separating MEP (1662) the rubrics for Evensong, which had formerly referred back to Mattins, were now printed as at Mattins. Thus the first rubric for Mattins, "At the beginning both of MP, and likewise of EP, the Minister shall read, etc.," was now divided and made a first rubric for each Service. The rubric before the Evening Colls., "Then shall follow the Creed with other prayers as is before appointed at MP after Benedictus, etc.," was dropped, and the printer was directed to print the whole text: "as at MP all to be inserted here word for word to ye end of ye suffrages—thy holy spirit from us."

It may be observed that a slight difference in the phrase—"shall never alter" (MP), "without alteration" (EP)—was retained, evidently without any difference of meaning. The words "all kneeling" were at this time added to the rubric of MP, but this addition was not made in correcting for EP; it is, of course, an accidental omission.

"In Quires and places where they sing here followeth the Anthem." This rubric was added after the Colls. in 1662. At the same time the five concluding prayers were brought to this place from the latter part of the Lit.; and the rubric referring to the use of the Lit. was inserted. We must regard all these as provisions for prs. after the Colls. The ANTHEM was, however, captured by the musicians and used for praise and prayer alike; it should here be a pr. (cp. the ancient Anthems).

The Creed, Lord's Pr., and Cants. appear to have been so well known in Latin that in 1549 the rubrics contained the direction that they were to be said "in English"—a phrase still found in our present PBs in three cases (Te Deum, Magn., Nunc Dim.). A curious doubt appears to have arisen in the 17th cent. as to whether the Absol. were to be said by the Priest, standing or kneeling. Hence it was made quite clear in 1662, by a fresh rubric, that the Priest was to stand while pronouncing it.

The Scottish PB of 1637 and the Irish PB follow pretty closely, so far as MEP are concerned, the PBs of 1552 and 1662 respectively. The chief variations are the following.

12. Scottish and Irish PBs.

I. In the Scottish PB:—(a) the Absol. is partially rewritten; (b) the Lord's Pr. has the Doxology always appended; (c) "The Lord's name be praised" is added (so in 1662); (d) the Pss. are taken from the AV; (e) Ps. 23 is substituted for Benedicite; (f) the Lit. (or its five final Prs.) is added at MP aft. the 3rd Coll. (so in 1662). II. In the Irish PB:—(a) Ps. 148 may be used instead of Te Deum or Benedicite; (b) the rubric ordering the recitation of Quicumque vult on certain days is left out; (c) at MP, the Lesser Lit. and Lord's Pr. following may be omitted when the Lit. is said; (d) at EP, the 2nd of the 6 Colls. at end of HC may be used instead of "Lighten our darkness"; (e) among the concluding Prs. is one "for the Chief Governour or Governours of Ireland."

The Order for MEP, as contained in the Amer. PB of 1789, had many striking differences from that of the Eng. PB, among these being the omission of Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis at EP. The revision of 1892, however, reverted to the Eng. use in this and some other respects, and the most important variations are now the following:—(a) a considerable number of additional opening SENTENCES; (b) at EP, permission to omit the Exh. and substitute "Let us humbly confess our sins unto Almighty God"; (c) the use, as an alternative, of the Absol. from HC; (d) omission of "O God, make speed to save us," "O Lord, make haste to help us"; (e) omission of the last four verses of the Venite and, in their place, insertion of Ps. 96 9, 13; (f) permission to omit the Gloria Patri aft. each Ps., provided it is always said at the end of the Pss., and to substitute for it, at EP, the Gloria in excelsis; (g) at EP, Ps. 92 1-4 and Ps. 103 1-4, 20-22, allowed to be used as alternative Cants.; (h) permission to say the Nicene instead of the Apostles' Creed, and omission of Quicumque vult; (i) omission of the Lesser Lit. and 2nd Lord's Pr.; (k) at MP, omission of the Preces, except the first and last couplets, and, when HC follows, of the Coll. for the day; (l) necessary omission of all mention of the King and Royal Family; (m) addition, after 3rd Coll., of "A Pr. for the President of the United States and all in Civil Authority"; (n) the "Pr. for all Conditions of Men" and the "General Thanksgiving" placed bef. the Pr. of St. Chrysostom.

(On Irish and Amer. Services see further, RITUAL: for variations allowed by the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872, see SHORTENED SERVICES ACT: and, for further information on the whole subject, consult Blunt, Annotated PB; Procter and Frere, New History of the BCP; and other Commentaries on the PB).—D.E. PERCIVAL JACKSON.

COMMUNICANT.—(i) A person who at a particular celebration receives the Sacrament; (ii) one who is living in sacramental communion with God through Christ. The PB orders that every parishioner "shall communicate at the least three times in the year, of which Easter to be one." A roll would therefore naturally be made up from those who communicate at Easter, i.e., on Easter Sunday or during the week following.

The compiling of such a roll is of importance if the body of Cs. is regarded as constituting the Congregation which elects a Church Council. All who intend to approach the altar should be asked to send in their names on a form provided for the purpose. Those temporarily absent should be asked to say where they intend to communicate, and those living outside the parish should get the form countersigned by the vicar of the parish in which they live. The intention to communicate should be accepted, and no attempt should be made to see if the intention is fulfilled; the responsibility of a false statement must rest with the person who makes it. The communicants' roll should be made up from these notices, and failure to send one in for two consecutive years should remove a name automatically. There is little danger of people communicating for the sake of "qualifying" for a vote or office, if it is recognised that to be on the list involves obligations and not privileges. "Communicants' teas" or social gatherings should be carefully avoided, unless it is made quite clear that they are self-supporting, and that no material advantage is gained by being a C. The counting of numbers of Cs. and publishing statistics is, to say the least, a questionable practice.—A2.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

COMMUNION, HOLY.

Sections—

- I. 1. THE PRIMITIVE SERVICE OF HC.
2. THE ANCIENT LITURGIES.
3. EASTERN LITURGIES CLASSIFIED.
4. WESTERN LITURGIES.
5. THE HISPANO-GALLICAN RITE.
6. THE ROMAN RITE.
7. THE ANCIENT ENGLISH RITE.
- II. 8. VARIATIONS BETWEEN OFFICES OF 1549 AND 1662.
9. REASONS FOR THESE VARIATIONS.
- III. 10. THE PRAYER OF CONSECRATION.
11. ITS INTRODUCTORY PART.
12. THE INVOCATION.
13. THE RECITAL OF THE INSTITUTION.
14. THE FRACTION.
- IV. 15. BIBLIOGRAPHY.

I. HC, which is the most distinctively Christian service, has been celebrated from the earliest times with the greatest reverence, devotion and care. No complete form of service earlier than the second half of the 4th cent. has come down to us, and there is considerable doubt as to whether the Liturgy was committed to writing before that time. But there are many references to it and some descriptions of it with a few quotations of Euch. formulæ in certain Ante-Nicene documents, such as the Didache and the Canons of Hippolytus and in the pages of some Ante-Nicene writers such as Justin Martyr, St. Cyprian and others. We cannot here quote the various passages referred to,¹ but the general result of their consideration is to establish the conclusion that the ancient Liturgies, as they are called, and as we possess them, though no doubt enlarged and elaborated from time to time, fairly represent the form of Euch. service in use in the Christian Church from the earliest times.

Before considering our own Anglican Liturgy, or Service of HC, something must be said about these ancient Liturgies. There is great wealth of material, and only a summary description of them will be possible.

There are now considered to be six main families of Liturgy, four of them being of Eastern and two of Western origin and use. They are labelled by the names of the Apostles or Saints with whom the Liturgies have been traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they have been or are still in use.

Group 1. The Syrian rite, associated with the name of St. James. This group includes the Clementine Liturgy (so called from being contained in the 8th book of the Apostolic Constitutions, which claim in their title, though erroneously, to have been compiled by St. Clement, the third Bishop of Rome after SS. Peter and Paul); the Greek Liturgy of St. James; and the Syriac Liturgy of ¹ They will be found put together in chapter 3 of the Liturgy and Ritual of the Ante-Nicene Church, SPCK., 1897.

St. James. No less than sixty-four more Liturgies of this group have existed, the titles of most of which are given by F. E. Brightman (Eastern Liturgies, pp. lviii-lxii); and Latin translations of them may be read in Renaudot's Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio, Frankfurt, 1847.

Group ii. The Egyptian rite, associated with the name of St. Mark. This group includes the Greek Liturgies of St. Mark, St. Basil, and St. Gregory, and the Coptic Liturgies of St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Cyril or St. Mark, the Liturgy of the Ethiopic Church Ordinances, and the Liturgy of the Abyssinian Jacobites known as the Liturgy of the Apostles, together with a few less-known Liturgies.

Group iii. The Persian rite, associated with the names of SS. Adaeus (i.e., Thaddaeus) and Maris. One Liturgy bears their joint names, the two other extant Liturgies of this group are those of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius. The Liturgy of the Christians of St. Thomas, on the Malabar coast of India, originated in this group, but it was largely assimilated to the Roman rite by Portuguese Jesuits at the Synod of Diamper in 1599.

Group iv. The Byzantine rite, associated chiefly with the names of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom. The Greek Liturgies of St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Dialogus or The Presanctified, are the existing representatives of this rite. The Greek Liturgy of St. Peter is merely the Roman Canon of the Mass inserted in a Byzantine framework, and seems to have been in use at one time by some Greek communities in Italy. The Armenian Liturgy also belongs to this group, the form of it now in use being connected with the name of St. Athanasius.

We now pass on to the two Western groups of Liturgies, which, if we except a few borrowed

4. Western Liturgies. Greek words and sentences, are found universally and only in Latin, so far as the liturgical text is concerned, though the vernacular of various Western countries occasionally occurs in rubrics.

Group v. The Hispano-Gallican rite, associated with the name of St. John the Divine. This group, which once prevailed widely in Western Europe, has been almost universally superseded by the Liturgy of the Church of Rome. Where it survives it has been more or less assimilated to the Roman pattern. It prevailed once throughout Northern Italy, France, Spain, Great Britain, and Ireland. There are various theories as to its origin, and the point is still undecided. It has been supposed to be an importation at a very early date from Asia Minor, and because Ephesus was the residence there of St. John, it has been termed Ephesine. But there is no proof forthcoming of such an origin, and the term Ephesine and the theory which it connotes are being abandoned. Another theory is that it represents a survival of the original Roman liturgy, before the present Roman Canon of the Mass took shape. Another theory is that it is an importation into Western Christendom from the East through a Milanese channel. This is the latest theory, and has the support of Duchesne (Christian Worship, SPCK., London, 1904, 2nd ed., p. 94).

Among the proofs or traces of Eastern influence or affinity are the following. (a) Various proclamations made by the deacon, including that of silentium facite before the Epistle. (b) The presence of a third lesson preceding the Epistle, taken from the OT. (c) The occasional presence of preces, or a series of short intercessions, resembling the Greek Ektene or Deacon's Litany. (d) The position of the Kiss or Peace at an early point in the service, before the Canon, instead of in the Roman position after the Pr. of Consecration. (e) The exclamation "sancta sanctus," or "Holy things to holy people," occurring in the Mozarabic rite, and being the counterpart of the Eastern exclamation, "Tà ἁγία τοῖς ἁγίοις."

(f) Frequent instances of the Epiklesis, or Invocation of the Holy Ghost, in its regular Eastern position, after the words of Institution. The following is only one out of many examples. It is taken from a 5th cent. Gallican Missal: "We beseech thee that thou wouldest bless with thy blessing this sacrifice, and pour upon it the dew of the Holy Spirit, that it may be a pure, true and perfect (legitima) eucharist to all who receive it through," etc. (Missale Richenovense, No. v, ed. of J. M. Neale and G. H. Forbes, p. 15). On the other hand, the great variability of its parts and the immense number of its Proper Prefaces ally it to the Western Families of Liturgy.

The chief Liturgies belonging to this group are the following:

(1) The Mozarabic Liturgy. This was the national Liturgy of the Spanish Church till the close of the 11th cent., when the Roman Liturgy was forcibly substituted for it. It however lingered on, till in the 16th cent. Cardinal Ximenes, anxious to prevent its becoming quite obsolete, had its books restored and printed, and founded a college of priests at Toledo to perpetuate its use. It survives now only in several churches in Toledo, and in one chapel at Salamanca, and even there not without some Roman modifications of its original text and ritual.

(2) The Old Gallican Liturgy. This was the national Liturgy of the Church of Gaul, or France, till the commencement of the 9th cent., when it was suppressed by order of Charlemagne, who directed the Roman rite to be everywhere substituted in its place. It then practically disappeared from sight until three ancient Gallican Sacramentaries were discovered and published by Thomasius in 1680 under the titles of Missale Gothicum, Vetus Missale Gallicanum and Missale Francorum; and a fourth was published by Mabillon in 1687 under the title of Sacramentarium Gallicanum. Fragmentary discoveries have been made since then. More discovered fragments of eleven old Gallican Masses, and published them at Carlsruhe in 1850. They were published again by J. M. Neale and G. H. Forbes under the title of Missale Richenovense (Burntisland, 1855). Other fragments from St. Gall have been published by Bunsen (Analecta Ante-Nicaena 3 263-6), and by Mal from the Ambrosian Library at Milan (Scriptt. Vet. Vat. Col. iii. 2 247). A single page discovered in Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, was published in Zeitschrift für Kath. Theologie 6 370. These documents, illustrated by early Gallican canons, and by allusions in the writings of St. Gregory of Tours and other early Gallican writers, notably in two letters of St. Germain of Paris, enable us to reconstruct the greater part of this ancient Liturgy.

(3) The Ambrosian Liturgy. This Liturgy has for a long time past become so assimilated to the Roman rite that by many liturgiologists it is placed in group vi; but if we consider the important variations from the Roman rite which still exist, and the yet more important variations which confront us in the older printed and MS. copies of the Ambrosian Missal, we shall detect in it an original member of group v. Charlemagne adopted the same policy towards the Milanese as towards the Gallican Church. He carried off all the Ambrosian church books which he could obtain, with the view of substituting Roman books in their place; but he was foiled, partly through the attachment of the Lombards to their own rites, partly through the intercession of a Gallican bishop named Eugenius (Mabillon, Mss. Ital. i. 2 106). The tradition preserved in the older Proper Preface for St. Barnabas' Day, attributing the composition of this liturgy to that saint, cannot be proved, and is not likely to be true.

(4) The Celtic Liturgy. Only fragments remain of the liturgy of the ancient Celtic Church of Great Britain and Ireland,¹ but they are sufficient to prove that it was of the Hispano-Gallican type, and that it should be placed in this group v.

Group vi. The Roman Rite, associated with the name of St. Peter. There is only one Liturgy to be

6. The Roman Rite. enumerated under this group, viz., the Liturgy of the Church of Rome. This, though originally local in character and use, has come to be nearly co-extensive with the Roman Church, sometimes superseding earlier national Liturgies, as in Gaul and Spain, sometimes incorporating more or less of the ancient ritual of local churches into itself, and producing from such incorporation a sub-class of distinct Uses, as in England, France, and elsewhere. These subordinate Uses, so far as they are connected with dioceses rather than with monastic Orders, have for the most part become, or are rapidly becoming, extinct, the genius and policy of Rome being in favour, as far as possible, of uniformity.

The date, origin, and early history of the Roman Liturgy are obscure. The first Christians at Rome were a Greek-speaking community, and their Liturgy must have been Greek, and is possibly represented in the Clementine Liturgy, although that Liturgy has no claim to the title of Clementine, and no discovered connection with St. Clement, the early bishop of Rome. But the date when Greek ceased to be the vernacular of Roman Christians, when and by whom the present Latin Liturgy was composed, and whether it is an original composition, or, as its structure seems to imply, a survival of some earlier form of Liturgy—these are questions which are waiting for solution, and to which no certain answer can at present be given.

The Liturgy in use in the Church of England from its foundation in 597 by St. Augustine was the Roman Liturgy, modified in unessential points, especially after the Norman Conquest, by the introduction of Gallican features and peculiarities, which, grafted on to a Roman groundwork, constitute a Missal of the Sarum, or of some other less widely spread local Use, such as York, Hereford, etc.

The great difference in order and in language between the Sarum Missal and First Reformed PB of 1549 has been shown by the use of parallel columns in the art. CANON OF THE LITURGY.

II. The PB of 1662, that is to say, our present PB, which, subject to certain revisions and alterations, dates from 1552, exhibits the following important variations in the Office of HC from the PB of 1549. There are in addition a great many textual variations, some of little, some of great importance, of which no account can be given here,² but the important variations, chiefly structural, are the following:

¹ They have been collected and printed in the Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church, Clar. Press, Oxford, 1881.

² [See full variorum test of these rubrics under RITUAL § 36-38.]

(1) Abolition of the INTROIT.

(2) Expansion and farsing of the ninefold Kyrie eleison with the ten COMMANDMENTS, a tenth KYRIE being added for the purpose.

(3) Removal of GLORIA IN EXCELSIS from its original position early in the service to a late post-communion position.

(4) Placing the Prayer for the CHURCH MILITANT next after the OFFERTORY, instead of next after the SANCTUS and immediately preceding and leading up to the Words of Institution.

(5) Placing the short Invitation, CONFESSION, ABSOLUTION and COMFORTABLE WORDS after the Pr. for the Ch. Militant instead of after the Pr. of Consecration.

(6) Placing the SURSUM CORDA and PREFACE after the Comfortable Words instead of next after the Offertory.

(7) Omission of the BENEDICTUS QUI VENIT after the SANCTUS.

(8) Placing the Prayer of HUMBLE ACCESS before the Pr. of Consecration, instead of after it and just before the act of Communion.

(9) Alteration, by enlargement, of the WORDS OF ADMINISTRATION, combining the formulæ of 1549 and 1552.

(10) Omission of the AGNUS DEI.

(11) Omission of the 22 Post-Communions.

(12) Position of the LORD'S PRAYER after the Communion of the people, instead of at the end of the Canon, before the Communion.

(13) The Pr. of Oblation removed from its position at the close of the Pr. of Consecration, and transferred to the POST-COMMUNION, where it is made an alternative to a Pr. of Thanksgiving.

(14) Omission of rubric ordering all things to be said at the altar until after the Offertory, though there be none to communicate with the priest, on Wednesdays and Fridays.

(15) Omission of rubric ordering the use of round UNLEAVENED BREAD without all manner of print.

(16) Omission of rubric directing the priest to place the Sacrament of Christ's Body in the mouths of the people, instead of in their hands.

(N.B.—The rubric ordering RESERVATION for the sick, also omitted, is not found here, but in the service for the Communion of the Sick.)

The liturgical differences between the First PB of Edward VI in 1549 and the Sarum Missal which it superseded were great and important (see CANON OF THE LITURGY), and the further differences between the PB of 1549 and that of 1662 were likewise, as will be seen by the above list, great and important. It looks as if there was a desire to introduce changes for changes' sake, and to make the new service as unlike the old as possible. Nevertheless, the changes were made by men who were steeped in the ancient service books, and who understood what they were doing. And we believe that all the above changes, with one exception, may be justified by the desire for abbreviation or simplification, or by some kind of liturgical precedent, or by their own inherent beauty. Let us take these changes seriatim.

(1) This promotes simplification, and is no loss, because, without being printed under each Sunday and Festival, Introits can always be supplied from the Psalter or Hymn-book.

(2) This may be explained and defended in two ways.

(a) The Commandments may be regarded as the invariable OT section of the English rite taken from the 20th chapter of Exodus. In the ancient Gallican and Mozarabic Liturgies, as in the Ambrosian Liturgy to-day, a lesson from the OT always preceded the Epistle and Gospel. (b) Again in the Sarum Missal, on the greater festivals, the ninefold Kyrie eleison was farsed, that is to say, sentences were interspersed, not taken directly from Holy Scripture, but referring to events recorded in Holy Scripture, or bearing on special events commemorated on different days; and, in three out of the nine sets of farsed Kyries, a tenth and concluding sentence was added. It seems very probable that this feature in the older Service-book suggested the arrangement of the Commandments and Kyries in the reformed PB.

(3) There seems to be no liturgical precedent for the altered position of Gloria in excelsis, but there is great beauty in it, and it seems more appropriate after Consecration and Communion than before. Bishop Jeremy Taylor comments thus upon it: "Observe that in the prudent institution of our Church, to hold forth the consolation we have in Christ, after the participation of his body and blood in the blessed Sacrament, it teacheth us to break out altogether into a jubilee, 'Glory be to God on high: we praise thee, we bless thee, we glorify thee,' etc. For when we are full of that holy feast, and have eaten angels' food, we fall into the tune of angels, and signify immediately before we depart, how much our spirit rejoiceth in God our Saviour" (Works, ed. 1822, I 130).

(4) The Pr. for the Church Militant corresponds in its range of subjects to the great Intercession for quick and dead, an integral portion of every ancient Liturgy. Its position was very varied. In the Hispano-Gallican family of Liturgies, with which, in some of its forms, the Reformers were acquainted and from which they drew, it occurred at or just after the Offertory.

(5) (6) (8) The new position of all this Preparation of the Communicants may not seem so suitable as the position in 1549; but it has the grand effect of leading up to the Consecration Pr. and Administration as the central features of the service, in exact analogy with the Office for Holy Baptism.

(7) The omission of the Benedictus at the conclusion of the Triumphal Hymn (or Tersantus) finds a precedent in the Clementine Liturgy, and in all the Liturgies of the Alexandrian family.

(9) Cp. the Sar. formula in the Office for the Communion of the Sick, "Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat corpus tuum et animam tuam in vitam aeternam." There was no form provided in the mediæval Missals for the Administration of the Chalice. In the Canon of the Mass itself (Sar.) there was no provision for the communion of any save the celebrant.

(10) There is liturgical precedent for the omission of the Agnus Dei in the Clementine and other Eastern Liturgies, and in Western Liturgies of the Hispano-Gallican group.

(11) These Post-Communions were not Colls., as their title might lead one to suppose, but short passages of Holy Scripture, twenty-two in number, one of which was to be said or sung after communion of priest and people. There is no exact liturgical precedent, but similar verses are provided to be sung during communion in the Mozarabic and early Irish Liturgies (Lit. and Rit. of the Celtic Church, pp. 177, 242). Their loss is easily supplied, if desired, from the same source.

(12) The Lord's Pr. occupies this Post-COMMUNION position elsewhere only in the Ethiopic Liturgy. It is made to follow the principal act of the HC in our PB, as it does in the Services of Holy Bapt., Confirm., Matrimony, and Burial of the Dead. It is just when we have knit ourselves together in the highest act of Christian union, and have received a fresh token of the spirit of adoption, that we can most appropriately unite in saying "Our Father, which art in heaven."

(13) This is the most indefensible and inexplicable of all the changes made in the Service. In every ancient Liturgy, as in the PB of 1549 and in the present Scottish and American Communion Offices, the Oblation comes in what is obviously its appropriate place, in the Pr. of Consecration and before Communion. The only possible explanation seems to be that our Reformers may have thought that it was after reception rather than before reception, when all have united themselves in the closest band of union, that we can most appropriately offer the Pr. that "we and all thy whole Church may obtain remission of our sins, and all other benefits of his passion." But this dislocation cannot affect the validity of the whole service. The act of Oblation, whether verbally expressed or not, is necessarily involved in the Pr. of Consecration, and in the presentation and celebration of the Euch. service. There was no verbally expressed oblation, so far as we know, in the first celebration of the Euch. in the upper chamber at Jerusalem: but the oblation was there. In this Pr. our Church must be considered to recognise the oblation rather than make it.

(14) What was ordered on Wednesdays and Fridays is still ordered on Sundays and Holy-days, if there be no Communion, by the first rubric after the Blessing. There is plentiful mediæval evidence for the practice of a Missa sicca or Missa Catechumenorum, or Table Prayers, or ANTE-COMMUNION (see Dr. W. Legg, Three Chapters in recent Liturgical Research, London, 1903).

(15) (16) The omissions of these rubrical directions gave freedom, and did not necessarily involve prohibition. But the use of unleavened or wafer bread has been held to be forbidden under the fifth rubric at the end of the Service. Still the wording, "it shall suffice," etc., seems to indicate non-enforcement rather than suppression of the old custom¹; and this was the view taken in the Injunctions of 1559 and in the correspondence thereon. There is now also, since 1552, a direct order, in the rubric preceding the formula of administration, to place the consecrated Bread in the hands of communicants. This is in accordance with primitive practice for which there is the clearest evidence from the 2nd cent. downward (see Scudamore, NE, 2nd ed., p. 721).

III. The only constituent part of the Service for Holy Communion to be treated of in this article is the Pr. of Consecration (for other parts see separate arts.). Compactness and completeness seem to be its distinguishing marks. Singularly unlike the Roman Canon of the Mass, and the Anaphora of Eastern Liturgies, so far as length and structure are concerned, it at the same time singularly resembles the Consecration Pr. of the Hispano-Gallican group of Western Liturgies, as may be seen by the Mozarabic text printed below.¹ It clearly consists of three parts.

¹ [But see editorial note on UNLEAVENED BREAD.]

(a) The Introductory part—from "Almighty God" to "until his coming again"—containing a recital of the work of Redemption by Christ's oblation of Himself on Calvary, and of his command for its perpetual commemoration. This is extraordinarily brief in comparison, for example, with the commemoration of the work of Redemption, preceding the commemoration of the Institution of the Sacr., in the Clementine Liturgy (Hammond, Liturgies E. and W., pp. 16, 17). The word "memory" in 1549 was equivalent to "memorial," and is used in that sense in the Injunctions of King Edward VI in 1547 (Cardwell, Documentary Annals, Oxford, 1844, I 14), and in the Device for Alteration of Religion in 1558 (Burnet, History of the Reformation, Oxford, 1865, 5 303).

11. The Introductory Part.

(b) The Invocation from "Hear us" to "blessed Body and Blood." This is, as to position and form, though not in exact words, equivalent to the following passage of the Sarum Canon of the Mass, redundant in its accumulation of adjectives: "Quam oblationem tu, Deus omnipotens, in omnibus, quaesumus, bene + dictam, ascrip + tam, ra + tam, rationabilem, acceptabilemque facere digneris, ut nobis cor + pus et san + guis fiat dilectissimi Filii tui Domini nostri Jesu Christi."

12. The Invocation.

Neither the English nor the Latin passage can be considered as equivalent to the Eastern Epiklesis, which always invokes the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the elements and is always placed after and not before the words of Institution;² yet identification is sometimes claimed, and might seem to be corroborated by such a passage as the following occurring in a Mozarabic Epiklesis under the title of Post Pridie: "Completes igitur atque servantes precepta Unigeniti Filii tui, precamur, omnipotens Pater, ut his creaturis superpositis altario tuo sanctificationis munus infundas; ut per transfusionem celestis atque invisibilis sacramenti, panis hic transmutatus in carnem, et calix transformatus in sanguinem, sit offerentibus gratia et sumentibus medicina" (Migne, PL 85 650). (See EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.)

(c) The Recital of the Words and Actions of Institution, accompanied by the prescribed MANUAL ACTS on the part of the priest. Two features in the Anglican recital call for notice. (A)

13. The Recital of the Institution.

The employment of the present tense, in the phrases "which is given," "which is shed." (B) The Roman Canon, following St. Matthew and St. Mark, has only "Hoc est corpus meum." The Anglican Canon adds "which is given for you," following St. Luke, "διδόμενον" (Luke 22 19), "quod pro vobis datur" (Vulg.); and St. Paul, "κλάμενον" (1 Cor. 11 24), "quod pro vobis tradetur" (Vulg.). The majority of Eastern Liturgies have the addition in the present tense: "θρυντόμενον," "κλάμενον," "διδόμενον," "διαδιδόμενον"; but the Coptic Liturgies of St. Cyril and St. Basil employ the future tense. No old Gallican Canon has survived. The Mozarabic has the addition but in the future tense—tradetur. In the Consecration of the chalice, the Roman Canon, following the Vulg., employs the future tense effundetur; the Anglican Canon following the Greek text of the first three Evangelists has the present tense, "which is shed" "ἐκχυνόμενον." All the Eastern Liturgies except the Coptic St. Cyril and St. Basil employ the present tense: "ἐκχυνόμενον, ἐκχέμενον, ἐκχέμενον καὶ διαδιδόμενον." The only instance of a present tense in the West is "effunditur" in the Sacramentarium Gallicanum and in the Sacramentarium Gellonense; but this may be a mere blunder, due to the frequent confusion in early MSS. between "e" and "s." As the compilers of the English Pr. of Consecration in 1549 evidently drew their Epiklesis—immediately preceding the Words of Institution—from an Eastern source, they may have adopted their present tenses from the same quarter. NT usage would influence them strongly in favour of so doing.

One point may need further remark and explanation, namely, the omission of any equivalent to "et benedixit." This brings its language into closer conformity with Holy Scripture; into exact conformity with Luke 22 19 and 1 Cor. 11 24, and into near conformity with Matt. 26 26-28 and Mark 14 22-24, where either εὐλογῆσας or εὐχαριστήσας is employed, but not both expressions at once. There is no doctrinal meaning or consequence in the omission of "et benedixit."

The solemn act of breaking of bread, known as the FRACTION, not for distribution to the communicants, but as symbolical of Christ's death and passion, is a marked feature in all Liturgies. It was formerly a separate ritual act at a later point in the service, but the Reformers abolished it as a separate rite, and incorporated it in the Pr. of Consecration to accompany the words "he breaks it." This seems a most appropriate position, and we are not astonished to find that there is evidence for the ¹ It may be of interest to print the Mozarabic Consecration Pr. from an 11th cent. MS. de Silos, recently discovered and printed by D. M. Férotin. It is headed Missa Sacra, and comes between a Post Sanctus and a Post-Pridie.

"Dominus noster Jesus Christus in qua nocte tradebatur accepit panem, et benedixit, et gratias egit, ac fregit, deditque discipulis suis, dicens: Accipite et manducate: Hoc est corpus meum quod pro vobis tradetur. Hoc facite in eam commemora + tionem.

"Simpliter et calicem postquam cenavit, dicens: Hic calix novum testamentum est, quod pro multis effundetur in remissione peccatorum. Et hoc facite quotienscunque biberitis in meam commemora + tionem. Quotienscunque manducaveritis panem hunc et calicem istum biberitis, mortem Domini annuntiabitis donec veniat in claritate de celis.

"R. Sic credimus Domine Jesu" (Liber Ordinum, Paris, 1904, p. 238).

The points in which this text differs from the Roman and approximates to the Anglican textus receptus of the Pr. of Consecration are very marked, and will be easily discovered.

² A recently discovered fragment is possibly an exception.

custom of Fraction at this point in rubrics of various mediæval Missals. There is an echo of the custom in the Sarum rubric at this point, "Hic tangat hostiam." This subject is treated, as so many subjects are, with a wealth of illustration, in Scudamore's NE, 2nd ed., p. 606.

IV. Bibliography.—It is impossible here to give anything like an adequate or complete Bibliography of the enormous number of books bearing on this subject. Space forbids us to mention any devotional Manuals, or Commentaries on the BCP, or treatises on some special Liturgy. And of the rest we must confine ourselves to a few prominent or representative works.

A.—Works, wholly or partially, on HC in the early Ch.:—J. Bingham, Antiquities of the Christian Church (reprinted in 2 vols., Reeves and Turner, 1878); F. Probst, Liturgie der drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderte, Tübingen, 1870; F. E. Warren, Liturgy and Ritual of the Ante-Nicene Church, SPCK., 1897; A. J. (now Bp.) Maclean, Recent Discoveries illustrating early Christian Life and Worship, SPCK., 1904.

B.—Texts of Liturgies. The most accessible text-books for Liturgies in general are:—H. A. Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, 4 vols., Leipzig, 1847; C. E. Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford, 1878. The texts of the most important Eastern Liturgies will be found in:—E. Renaudot, Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio (reprinted Frankfurt, 1847, 2 vols.); C. A. Swainson, The Greek Liturgies, Cambridge, 1884; Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford, 1896 (vol. i only, containing the Eastern Liturgies, as yet published). A handy translation of the Greek Liturgies is contained in Neale and Littledale's Liturgies of St. Mark, etc. The largest collection of ancient Western Liturgies is in L. A. Muratori's Liturgia Romana Vetus (2 vols.); and the Liturgies it contains (with others) will be found reprinted in the various vols. of Migne's Patrologia.

C.—Other Books:—E. Burbidge, Liturgies and Offices of the Church, London, 1885; T. Comber, Companion to the Temple, vol. iii, Oxford, 1841; J. (the late Bp.) Dowden, The Workmanship of the Prayer Book, London, 1899, and Further Studies in the Prayer Book, London, 1908; T. W. (now Bp.) Drury, Two Studies in the Book of Common Prayer, London, 1901, and Elevation in the Eucharist, its History and Rationale, Cambridge, 1907; W. Maskell, The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, 3rd ed., Oxford, 1882; W. Palmer, Origines Liturgicæ, 2 vols., Oxford, 1839; J. Parker, The First Prayer-Book of Edward VI., Oxford, 1877; W. E. Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, 2nd ed., London, 1876.—HB. F. E. WARREN.

COMMUNION IN ONE KIND.—The refusal of the Cup to the lay-people, which is characteristic of the Ch. of Rome and which forms the subject of Art. 30, is more correctly the restriction of the Cup to the celebrant. Though according to Roman custom, which enjoins upon every priest the duty of saying mass daily, the one is tantamount to the other, and was so treated in the struggles of the 15th and 16th centuries, the distinction is not unimportant, pointing as it does to the origin of the practice, which was intended to guard the contents of the chalice from risk of accident, and not to mark a difference between clergy and laity. As no mass may be celebrated without the communion of the officiating priest in both kinds, the witness to the reception of the cup as integral to the rite is maintained even where it is denied to be so. For the same line of argument which justifies abstention on the part of the people is equally applicable to the priest, and the instinct which recognises that the full communion of the congregation with its Lord in the Sacrament cannot be realised if the cup be withheld from the representative lips of its minister ought to have prevailed to prevent a departure from the principles of the Institution in the case of the individual members.

This perverse custom of the Western Church, conflicting with what would at least seem to be the plain reading of the NT, began to spread from about the beginning of the 12th century, was discountenanced by authority and definitely forbidden by more than one pope. But, when it had become too strong for authority and the demand for its suppression was made by those who on other grounds were hostile to the papacy, it was enjoined by the Council of Constance in 1415, and finally reaffirmed and justified by the Council of Trent (1551). The motive behind it was doubtless a false reverence for the consecrated species, coincident with the growth of the materialistic conception of the Presence, at length stereotyped in TRANSUBSTANTIATION, deductions from which ultimately became the ground upon which the practice was made to rest.

The action of the court of Rome in the matter is characteristic of the papacy. There is something sophistical in every argument advanced to cover and enforce a tradition which it was no longer convenient to resist, and which the hostility of the Reformers made it at last a point of honour to maintain. Because the anti-papal party, appealing to the NT, held that all Christians ought to receive in either kind, the statement was met by Trent with an anathema. Constance, while admitting that the Cup had been given to His disciples at the Last Supper by Christ, claimed for the Church a regulative authority, by which it might be withheld from the people. Trent justified it on the ground: (a) that, while the Sacrament is divinely instituted and therefore unchangeable, the accessories of its celebration may be modified by the Church, which would apply equally to the withdrawal of the Bread from the people or might even dispense the celebrant himself from communion, and ignores the fact that "Drink ye all of it," addressed to the apostles when not themselves the ministers of the rite¹, is as much a part of the Institution and therefore of the Sacrament as the benediction of the cup itself: (b) that, inasmuch as the living Christ must be present wherever His Body is, any further act of communion is rendered superfluous by the reception of the Sacrament of the Body; which is an audacious attempt to override the terms of a divine mystery by the conclusions of a rationalising theory; and to which it might rather be objected, if it were admissible to press arguments, that there was no communion at all, because it is through eating the Flesh of the Son of Man and drinking His Blood, that is, through union with Christ, not in His Incarnation, but in His Death and Sacrifice, that we are one with Him and He with us.—HC.

¹ The Louvain editors did not see this, when they interpolated the text so as to read "Drink, all ye twelve, of this."

J. G. SIMPSON.

COMMUNION, MANNER OF.—The rubrics in the PB relating to the giving of the HC to the communicants are in entire accord with the practice of the ancient Ch. "Then shall the Minister first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and then proceed to deliver the same to the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, in like manner." It may be noted that the Puritan abuse of the minister not receiving himself, or else receiving last, is here excluded. The rubric goes on: "and after that to the people also in order, into their hands, all meekly kneeling." The delivery to communicants "in order" is very ancient and universal in the Ch.; used in regard to the laity, the phrase "in order" might have suggested the separation of the sexes and of married folk from single. The delivery of both kinds to all is plainly enforced, and "into their hands" ensures that the communicants will receive the Sacrament of the body of Christ in the hand in the primitive way and not in the mouth or the fingers, and it naturally follows that they must also take the chalice in their hands. It is also clear that the WORDS OF ADMINISTRATION must be said to each communicant; "when he delivereth the Bread to any one, he shall say." The expression "the Minister that delivereth the Cup," implies that this may be done by another than the celebrant; normally of course by the deacon, as specified in the Order of Communion of 1548 and the First PB (1549): "If there be a Deacon or other Priest, then shall he follow with the Chalice."

The words "all meekly kneeling" order the continuation of the mediæval custom which had long been the use of all the

2. Kneeling. West, so far as the laity were concerned. The maintenance of this reverent custom was bitterly resented by the Puritans, who opposed it by a demand, not for the primitive and Eastern custom of standing, but for the innovation of sitting, in supposed, though inaccurate, imitation of the Last Supper (Cardwell, Conferences, pp. 310, 321, 354), a strict reproduction of the conditions of which would logically have excluded women! All through the struggle with the Puritans, even the celebrant received kneeling, a custom enforced in the 17th cent., as we learn from Visitation Arts., but which has now largely died out, and appears contrary to the continuous practice of all the rest of the Ch. In primitive times the communicants received standing with some gesture of reverence (Cyril Jer., Cat. Myst. 52, 22), as they still do in the East. (See further, POSTURE OF REVERENCE, § 2.)

That the Euch. was delivered into the hands of communicants is clear even from the time of

3. Manner of Reception.

Tertullian (De Idol. 7). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in the middle of the 4th cent., instructs the newly-baptised: "When you draw near, do not come with your palms wide open, or your fingers apart; but making your left hand a support for your right . . . and making your palm hollow, receive the Body of Christ" (l.c.). Later on, at, or perhaps bef., the beginning of the Middle Ages, the practice grew up of administering both kinds together with a Spoon; this known as Intinction (see COMMIXTURE), has remained the use of the Orthodox East for the laity, and survived in the West till the 12th cent., although there was at times a strong Western feeling against it. In the 8th and 9th cents. in the West the custom spread from Rome of giving communion from the chalice by means of a reed or metal tube, and about the same time, or a little later, there also grew up the practice of placing the consecrated host directly in the mouth of the communicants, a practice which was ordered in the First PB, and is still the use of the Roman Church.

In the Middle Ages, under the influence of Euch. controversy with certain real or supposed heretics, such as Berengarius, somewhat materialistic views began to be current in the West regarding the real presence of our Lord in the Euch., coupled with a superstitious dread of the loss of any particle. Hence arose the gradual withdrawal of the chalice, first from the laity on certain occasions, then in the smaller chs., afterwards in the larger chs., and finally from almost all but the celebrant. This was helped by the custom of giving communicants unconsecrated wine to drink aft. communion, a practice which was latterly sometimes mistaken for communion with the chalice, and, though common in France in the 17th cent., was suppressed in many places for that very reason. The chalice began to be withdrawn in the 12th cent.; St. Thomas Aquinas, writing in the 13th, speaks of it as a precaution observed in some chs., and also as the custom of many chs.. In 1287 the Synod of Exeter, adopting a Durham canon of 1220, ordered priests to "instruct the Laity that under the species of bread they receive that which hung on the Cross, and that in the Cup they take that which was shed from the Body of Christ." In the 14th cent. such survivals of communion in both kinds became more and more uncommon, and in 1415 the administration in one kind only was so far universal that the Council of Constance decreed it as a law. Here and there partial survivals remained, as at St. Denys, Paris, where as late as 1759 the deacon and subdeacon received in both kinds on Sundays and Festivals. There was also the important exception of Bohemia, where the attempted enforcement of the decree led to a schism, and where in consequence communion in both kinds was allowed for a time—a permission granted also by the Council of Trent. The spread of Intinction in the West in the early Middle Ages was no doubt due to the same fear of losing particles of the Euch., which afterwards led to the withdrawal of the chalice. (See also COMMUNION IN ONE KIND.)

4. Denial of the Chalice.

In a few chs., such as St. Michael's and Holy Rood, Southampton, the use has continuously survived

5. Minor Ceremonies. of the HOUSELLING CLOTH, i.e., a white linen cloth now placed upon the altar rails, but anciently held before the communicants, so as to catch any crumbs. The RAILS seem to be a 17th cent. introduction to guard against Puritan irreverence. In some places till recently the communicants entered the chancel at the words "Draw near with faith" in the EXHORTATION (SHORT). In Scotland, in the older congregations of Aberdeenshire, the whole railful remains kneeling until the last person has received; it has likewise been traditional there, since the times of the Non-jurors, for communicants to receive with hands crossed, as directed by St. Cyril, and for the women to have a clean handkerchief on the left hand (this latter custom is now all but obsolete). Each railful was generally dismissed with a kind of blessing.

In the Orthodox Eastern Ch. the celebrant in receiving from the chalice drinks thrice, and then gives communion in both kinds separately to the deacon. Other priests present then approach the Holy Table and take the Euch. from it themselves, going behind to consume it. The people are communicated outside the screen, standing; the priest holding the chalice with the particles of the consecrated bread in it. He places both kinds together in the communicants' mouths with the spoon, the deacon standing by and holding one end of the silk PURIFICATOR beneath each communicant's chin, and afterwards wiping the communicant's mouth with the other end.—R2.

F. C. EELKS.

COMMUNION OF THE SICK.—See SICK, COMMUNION OF.

COMMUNION, PREPARATION FOR.—See under PREPARATION.

COMMUNION TABLE.—See ALTAR, LORD'S TABLE.

COMPLINE.—The last of the HOURS OF PRAYER, recited before going to rest. Originally said in the dormitory, but transferred to the choir by St. Benedict. Its name (completorium) indicates its character, as completing the daily series of offices.—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

CONCORD.—See PEACE AND CONCORD.

CONCURRENCE.—See OCCURRENCE.

CONFERENCE.—See COUNCIL.

CONFESSION.—[This art. refers to Liturgical forms only. For doctrine, etc., see REPENTANCE.] In the Pre-Reformation services only one form of public C. of sin was used, viz., the CONFITEOR. In the "Order of Communion" (1548) an entirely new form was provided. This was incorporated into the service for HC in the 1st PB (1549) being placed aft. the Consecration, and was retained in 1552 though in a new position, coming much earlier in the service. In this position it has remained ever since. In 1552 another and much longer form of public C. was prefixed to the office for MP, with a direction that it should also be used bef. EP. This has been retained ever since, and in 1662 was printed in full bef. EP. In the Confiteor, when used liturgically, C. of sin was first made by the officiant, and the congregation pronounced a short precatory form of Absol., then the congregation made their C. in the same form, and the officiant pronounced the same Absol., followed by an additional one, which included both himself and the congregation. This reciprocal form of C. was not retained in either of the forms introduced at the Reformation. The C. in HC is now directed to be said "by one of the ministers"; but until 1662 the direction ran thus: "either by one of them (the communicants) or else by one of the Ministers, or by the Priest himself": so that in any case it was to be said by one person only, on behalf of all the communicants. Some have thought that this is the meaning of the rubric as it stands now, but the wording hardly seems to support this view. The C. bef. MP and EP is to be said "after" the Minister—no doubt, clause by clause—this being originally prescribed because it was a new form, unfamiliar to the people, many of whom at that time were unable to read. Cosin (1662) wished to alter "after" into "with," but his suggestion was not adopted by the revisers. The wording of the C. in HC was in part suggested by Daye's translation of HERMANN'S CONSULTATION, and the phrase, "by thought, word, and deed," seems to be the only feature retained from the old Confiteor. The C. bef. MP and EP is the composition of the revisers of 1552. In the VS, though C. of sins is recommended, no form of C. is provided. In the prayers to be used at sea, the form of C. is that from the HC.—Pb.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.—See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, § 1.

CONFESSOR.—Anyone who confesses Christ in the face of persecution. From the time of Cyprian the word began to be used of "one who avows his religion in the face of danger, but does not suffer martyrdom" (NED). Later on, voluntary asceticism succeeded to confessorship in this sense, and "C. became the general title for ascetic in the old service books" (Wordsworth, Ministry of Grace, p. 209); hence our Edward the Confessor. Holy men are associated with martyrs in 4th cent. commemorations (Duchesne, Christian Worship, pp. 142, 173, 284, 420). In the Gel. Sacramentary 141, "Cs." are placed between the doorkeepers and virgins, and may perhaps be singers. In the Canons of Hippolytus 643-47, such persons are to be held in equal honour with presbyters, and some persons have argued that they were therefore allowed to act as such without ordination.—A3.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

CONFIRMATION (or Laying on of Hands).—C. is the Western name for the rite, and has been traced back to the 5th cent. In 1. Origin. the English "order," after imposition of hands, the bishop prays for those "upon whom (after the example of thy holy Apostles) we have now laid our hands"; canon 60 also refers to the action as "a solemn, ancient, and laudable custom in the Church of God, continued from the Apostles' times." Can this be justified? Benediction by laying on of hands was familiar to the Jews and would naturally be taken over by the Jewish-Christian community. In the OT, apart from blessing with this outward sign (Joseph's sons), it was used also for the transferring of authority and spiritual endowment (Joshua, Levites, etc.). The infant Church utilised this inherited symbolic act, after prayer, for separating members for a special work (the Seven for ministry, Barnabas and Saul for missionary effort). Brief reference must be made to such laying on of hands by the Apostles as may be regarded as corresponding to C. After the Pentecostal outpouring, which needed no human agent, immediate mention of the act is not made, but two typical cases are given later.

(i) Acts 8 12 ff. Peter and John were sent to the city of Samaria to complete the work of Philip, who had baptised the converts, but seemingly the expected phenomena of the reception of the Holy Ghost had not followed. After prayer, "then laid they their hands on them, and they received (the) Holy Spirit one by one." (ii) Acts 19 1 ff. When Paul entered upon his sojourn at Ephesus he found some disciples from whom he discovered that they had not "heard of holy Spirit." Teaching was followed by Bapt., and that, probably after prayer, by imposition of hands, when the Pentecostal tongues and prophecy were at once manifested. The conditions seem to have been exceptional, yet there is nothing to imply definitely that Paul's action was abnormal: there is a presumption that such imposition would follow for those baptised by the Apostle's helpers, and that external effects had come to be looked for, if they were not the rule. It is noteworthy that the unexpected bestowal of the Pentecostal gift upon Gentiles (Acts 10 44 ff.) was followed by Baptism, just as the laying on of Ananias' hands upon Saul by extraordinary commission for the receiving of the same gift (9 17) was also succeeded by Baptism.

Heb. 6 1 ff. cannot be regarded as affording quite so certain a mention of the rite among Christian fundamentals. The plural "teaching of baptisms" seems to imply instruction about various washings rather than the rite as such, while "laying on of hands," the second of two complementary parts of perfection (6 1) or enlightenment (6 4), would include, if not be limited to, what we call C. (cp. 2 3 f., 6 4, 10 39).

Apparently the visible extraordinary effects of the illapse of the Spirit ceased very early. Paul's own policy (1 Cor. 12) would tend to check their display: they passed into greater disrepute with Montanist excesses, yet have continued to recur at times of revival to our own days. This fact does not affect the operation of the Divine indwelling (which Paul especially taught) for the continual guiding and strengthening of personal Christian life.

Other passages which may refer to C. are 2 Tim. 1 6 f. (laying on), 2 Cor. 1 22, Eph. 1 13, 4 30 (sealing), and perhaps to the dual rite 1 Thess. 1 6, 4 8, 2 Thess. 2 13, Gal. 3 5, 4 6, Rom. 5 5, 8 15, 1 Cor. 2 12, 6 11, 12 13, 2 Cor. 5 5, 11 4, Tit. 3 5, for the most part implying a definite time of giving and receiving. Outside Pauline writings, Ja. 4 5, 1 Jn. 2 20, 27 (anointing), 3 24 are apposite for the gift of the Spirit.

It appears to be an inference fully justifiable that prayer and the outward sign, coupled locally, it may be, with anointing, formed the normal complement of Baptism in the apostolic age. From the time of Leo the rite has been supposed to be due to an injunction of the risen Lord (Acts 1 3).

It is no easy matter to state the nature of the mysterious gift in C., especially as in early times the laying on of hands was so closely

2. The Gift. associated with Bapt. Now that the rites have been so long separated in the West, it would appear true to say that the Holy Spirit is given in both, in different ways and for different purposes. The primitive adult Baptism was followed by the conscious abiding of the Spirit in the one incorporated by the Spirit into the holy fellowship.

Space forbids any catena of patristic quotations referring to this part of the subject, but it would not be far wrong to admit that, even where the two rites are closely related, it is with imposition of hands that the reception of the Spirit for continued dwelling in the Christian is associated (cp. e.g. Tert., Cypr., Ambr., Aug., Pacian, Leo, for the West; Origen and Cyr. Jer. probably, Athan., Cyril, Chrys., in the East). Sometimes gift and sign (unction) are identified (Hippol., Cyr. Jer.).

The relation of our formularies to this question is touched on in the art. HOLY GHOST, but that C. is truly the perfection or completion of Bapt. is a doctrine that has never been lost to view in the English Church, and this is the teaching of the Eastern churches still as to the corresponding Unction. The later and less definite Roman doctrine of C. as augmenting grace seems to be due to the forged Decretals and St. Thomas Aquinas, as well as to the gradual separation of the rites. The whole discussion concerning the gift is rather academic than practical. The spiritual coming of Christ, however designated, is in accordance with the human capacity to receive: experience is more than logic. On the subject of the "sevenfold gift" various treatises and manuals on C. may be consulted.¹

In NT times the minister of C. was ordinarily one of the Twelve, or an apostle like Paul, or one with a special commission like

2. The Minister. Ananias. Bef. episcopacy became universal, it is natural to suppose that, in parts of the Church with a less fixed organisation, missionary leaders having a quasi-apostolic office such as the prophets of early days administered the symbolic rite of imposition of hands. When a more settled condition is found to exist, the Bp.—as president of the local community—is regularly the minister.

This has remained in principle the custom of the Western Church. Although in periods of rapid growth

¹ The emphasis of the Reformers on the grace of strength as a special feature of the gift may be seen in the original opening rubric, "that they may receive strength and defence," and in the later alterations in the Bp.'s Pr., "Strengthen them, etc.," and in the words spoken over each candidate, "Defend, etc."

presbyteral C. seems to have been common (Gallican, Irish), yet the normal transmitter of "the Comforter Spirit" was the bishop, and that with laying on of hands and anointing on the brow. As to the Eastern Church, unction gradually gained prominence and then took the place of imposition of hands, while administration that was once episcopal became presbyteral, only with episcopally consecrated chrism, as it is to this day, though the custom is admittedly due to "the successors of the Apostles."

There is no doubt that in restricting the act to the bishop the Church of England has adhered to a usage that is primitive, as also that the PB is scriptural and apostolic in the mode of administration ordered—prayer and laying on of hands—and in discarding later and local customs (chrism, cross, blow, etc.).

To trace the various phases of the C. service up to 1549 would take up too much space:

suffice it to say that probably
4. The from the 4th cent. onwards Order.

C. in the West followed upon Bapt. (with presbyteral unction) at a less or greater interval, and its essential elements were the prayer¹ for the Holy Spirit's sevenfold gift (which has changed its form but little through Sacramentary and Pontifical) and the episcopal signing of the brow with chrism. The Sarum rite merely placed versicles before and a Collect and the Blessing after the necessary acts.

For the First PB the Reformers boldly restored the primitive imposition of hands, omitting the chrism and praying rather for inward unction, while retaining the sign of the cross on the brow before the laying on of the bishop's hand upon the head. The beautiful closing Collect was abbreviated from that in Hermann's Order of C. In 1552 both the petition for inward unction and the sign of the cross were eliminated, while the present prayer at the act of imposition was substituted. (The Crossing seems to have been sometimes retained; it is permissive now in the Scottish office.)

At the last revision the service was separated from the first part of the Catechism which had preceded it, and therefore at the close of the title "come to years of discretion" was substituted for "able to render an account of their faith according to the Catechism following." The early portion of the long rubrics before the Cat. was incorporated in the Preface which now opens the Order, and, in lieu of the bishop "apposing" the candidates, the solemn question and answer succeed it. By this the divine side of the rite has been regrettably obscured, because "ratifying and confirming" takes up "ratify and confirm" of the Preface due to the substitution (1552) of "confirm" for "confess" in the second rubric, thus bringing the human aspect forward, which in the Lutheran service is predominant. But the great importance of the change in relinquishing the unction which had been primary, and setting the renewal of the Bapt. promises thus in the forefront, must not be underestimated.

¹ "Deus omnipotens Pater Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui regenerasti famulos tuos ex aqua et Spiritu sancto, quique dedisti eis remissionem omnium peccatorum, tu, Domine, emitte in eos Spiritum Sanctum tuum Paraclitum, et da eis spiritum sapientiae et intellectus, spiritum consilii et fortitudinis, spiritum scientiae et pietatis; adimple eos spiritu timoris Dei in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, cum quo vivis et regnas Deus semper cum Spiritu Sancto, per omnia saecula saeculorum" (Gal.).

Further, the fitting addition of the Lord's Prayer rendered the ensuing portion of the office more normal, and a Collect from the close of the Communion service follows the prayer for the Spirit before the Blessing. The final rubric makes it plain that the confirmed alone have the full rights of Christian citizenship.

Here perhaps attention should be called to the 3rd rubric at the end of the Cat. demanding a sponsor to be witness of C.¹ This wholly admirable rule of spiritual kinship and guardianship is regaining its due observance. In the mediæval rite the duty of the sponsor was to bind linen upon the head of the confirmed to retain for a while the unction. (For adults and such as have not had sponsors the Scottish office permits the substitution of an address for the Preface and the modifying of the question. A partial adaptation is made in the American order.)

Apart from the present service it should be noted that Art. 23 seems to imply that C. comes either "from the corrupt following of the Apostles," or is a "state of life" approved in Scripture. The wording is loose: neither description is strictly true. It may be the order as formerly known with ceremonial accretions and loss of the primitive imposition of hands that was then in view. The contradiction was marked by the Puritans. In the Homily of Common Pr. and Sacrs., C. appears among the rites and ceremonies retained, with the human side emphasised; "C. of children, by examining them of their knowledge in the Articles of the faith, and joining thereto the prayers of the Church for them," and is apparently classed among "ordinances for the instruction, comfort, and edification of Christ's Church."

Just a few words about some related ceremonies and usages.

(1) Chrism. Although the simplest form and matter have been retained for the rite in our branch of the Church, it has passed through various phases of ceremonial. The most ancient usage, perhaps dating from the apostolic age, relinquished in 1549 was that of unction with CHRISM. Apart from the anointing of the sick, this action is alluded to literally or symbolically in close connection with sealing and the gift of the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:21), and the anointing received is linked with "teaching" and "truth," which are the Spirit's care (1 Jn. 2:20, 27). Unction is referred to by the early Fathers, apparently in relation to the twofold initiatory rite (Theoph. Tert., Hippol., Cypr.). The common custom of anointing may have suggested its emblematic usage for the Christian's priesthood after the cleansing at incorporation. Chrism is primitive, and its use has remained for C. both in East and West. In the Roman West it has ousted the actual imposition, and further than this, though hallowed by bishops, it is administered in the Eastern churches by presbyters.

(2) Cross. The chrism upon the brow was at the same time a sealing with the sign of the cross, and from the close of the Middle Ages in the Latin Church this act has been succeeded by a blow on the cheek. In early times the crossing was prior to the act of imposition of hands, and both East and West have retained it with the unction. At the end of the pr. for the sevenfold Spirit in the Sarum rite the petition ran "Sign them with the sign of the holy cross, confirm them with the chrism of salvation unto eternal life," or similar phrasing, followed by the act and words, "I sign thee . . . with the sign of the cross, and confirm thee with the chrism of salvation. In the name," etc. (The change in 1549 is noted in § 4.)

¹ Cp. Bapt.³ Exh. to Godparents.

(3) Dress. Just as the white robe (CHRISOM) used to be delivered at Bapt., and was worn for C. and for some days after, when the rites were hardly separate, so it is still fitting that females at least should be clad in white. Dress and veil should be of the simplest, and similar, if it might be, for all; rather than that elaborate clothing, even though it be white, which frequently mars the seemliness and simplicity that should mark the appearance and demeanour of the candidates.

(4) Adjuncts to the Service. If the clergy have duly and sympathetically prepared the candidates in heart and mind, there should be little need of an episcopal address bef. imposition of hands. Afterwards, considering the exhaustion following upon the frequently protracted nerve strain, short, pithy guidance and spiritual encouragement which will live in the memory of the young people and sustain their ideals are required; further instruction should precede first Communion.

No hymn as such, not even the Veni Creator, should separate the Bp.'s Prayer from the act of laying on of hands. Verses from some fitting hymn or a special Litany may be used during the movement of batches of candidates, but hymns suited to adolescence with its exuberant vitality are wanting in Church hymn-books.

In primitive times the majority of those baptised and confirmed were doubtless adults, in most cases receiving the rite of initiation at Easter or Whitsuntide.

6. Age.

Infant Bapt. appears to have occurred in the 1st cent. (e.g., Polycarp), and Infant C. is a well-known custom in the 3rd; but when Bapt. in infancy became established (5th cent.), C. began to be separated, whether from the absence of a bp. or other reason. In the East, though the rites were distinguished, they were administered together, but voices were raised on behalf of preparatory instruction before C., and the custom was admittedly not apostolic.

It is striking that the Church of England, which boldly demanded years of discretion in 1549, had retained early C. longer than Continental dioceses; e.g., several English synods in the 13th cent. required the bringing of infants under two, three or seven years, while the tendency of that time abroad to make seven the lowest age grew steadily, and this was the limit fixed by the Council of Trent. Not only did the compilers of the PB say "it is most mete to be ministered when children come to that age, that partly by the frailty of their own flesh, partly by the assaults of the world and the devil, they begin to be in danger to fall into sin" (3rd Rubric), but also "it is agreeable with the usage of the Church in times past" that they should be "of perfect age" and "should openly profess their own faith" (4th). Thus, candidates must be at least of the age of childhood, but this limit has tended to be raised, from the Injunctions of 1559 (twelve or thirteen) onwards. Seeing that originally "years of discretion" were the normal age, such a return to primitive usage is quite within the right of a national Church; but no fixed rule can be made, individual cases of late or early development must be considered, once the subjective aspect is recognised. Even if the candidates be adults, "children" in the religious sense, preferably to "servants," they remain. [Cp. AGE, CANONICAL.]

The revelation through modern religious psychology supports the demand "that the Spirit of God may prevent youthful lusts," and suggests very plainly the beginning of adolescence as the time during which positive direction is most needed to control and develop the religious sense which marks the period of unfolding life. Then the final visual appeal of a symbolic and impressive office means much, often unconsciously, for the guiding of the new energies, intellectual, religious and social, which, controlled by the "gifts" received with joy and thanksgiving, will serve to produce the "fruits" of the Spirit. It seems essential that the training for C. and the sacramental rite itself should normally precede the height (at sixteen approximately) of religious manifestation in the adolescent. This relation of physical development to religious instruction has been far from sufficiently recognised and utilised. Nor can the drift after school-age be stemmed, unless the young life be won to the Christian ideal before leaving the formative influences of parents, teachers and clergy for the outer world of work.

On PREPARATION but few words need to be said. Much has been written on the subject, and lines of treatment cannot be laid down here. Faith and life, creed and conduct, form the two-fold instruction. Nothing can be better than the course of teaching which the Cat. suggests, and the mode of its presentation depends on the age, needs and circumstances of the candidates. Nor would it be easy to improve on the Cat. as an outline for self-examination in the personal preparation of prayer. The desire for grace for all the needs of life must be aroused and the necessity of it felt, as well as the responsibility for the fulfilment of the baptismal vows appreciated.

7.

Preparation.

The social side of the religious life demands more emphasis, especially as so little provision is made on the whole for the outflow of youthful energy: definite opportunity of Christian service should be afforded. Moreover, though a preliminary general confession has never been obligatory, a complete and sympathetic frankness is needful for the individual training of the soul to allay the fears of the developing religious life. The guidance will continue during the instruction before first Communion which should naturally follow Confirmation.

Among modern works the data are set forth by Mason, The Relation of Confirm. to Bapt.; Wirgman, The Doctrine of C.; also Hall, Confirmation; and recently Chase, C. in the Apostolic Age. On the side of the psychology of adolescence, see Dr. G. S. Hall, Adolescence, most full, esp. 2 265 ff., dealing with Confirmation.—L. E. W. WINSTANLEY.

CONFITEOR.—The first word of the Latin form of Conf. of sins, whether made in the public offices of pr., or in private. The C. was said in public bef. Mass, at Prime and at Compline. The form in common use in England ran thus: "I confess to God, Blessed Mary, all Saints, and to you, that I have sinned exceedingly in thought, word, and deed, by my own fault. I beseech holy Mary, all the Saints of God, and you, to pray for me." "Confiteor Deo, Beatae Mariae, omnibus Sanctis, et vobis, quia peccavi nimis cogitatione, locutione, et opere, mea culpa; precor Sanctam Mariam, omnes Sanctos Dei, et vos, orate pro me" (Sarum Missal, etc.).—PB. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE. — See ELECTION OF BISHOPS.

CONGREGATION.—A term used as synonymous with "the people." In Art. 19 the Ch. is defined as "a C. of FAITHFUL," i.e., baptised, men; the newly-baptised child is received "into the C. of Christ's flock"; the C. is offended by notorious and evil livers and satisfied by their repentance; the General Confession is "said of the whole C." It is assumed that the whole people is Christian, and that all come to worship. This conception of a visible Ch., coterminous with the nation, is the Christian counterpart of the OT Jewish idea, which appears constantly in the Psalms (cp. Hastings' DB, art. Congregation), and was adopted in the PB in conscious opposition to the Puritan and Congregationalist theories of an invisible Ch. of the elect, or of the Faithful in the subjective sense.

As a consequence, the C. was considered to be represented by the ratepayers' Vestry and by the Churchwardens elected by it. It was natural that the Government should seek to secure uniformity in Ch. services (see RITUAL, § 10-13). On the other hand, worship is regarded in the PB as offered by the whole body ("we have erred and strayed," "we offer and present unto Thee"); the PRIESTHOOD, though authorised and duly ordained, is ministerial and representative; the vernacular is used; and, while the Greek liturgy has four agents—the priest, the deacon, the choir, and the people—and the First PB apportioned many parts to "the clerks," our whole present service is antiphonal between priest and people.

This identification was possible before the rise of dissent, and in country parishes; but the change to industrialism, with its increase of population and growth of town life, has caused a return to a condition of things more like that of Pre-Constantinian days. Church-goers are a minority, and include mere attendants as well as communicants, as then they were composed of catechumens as well as of the "faithful." Mapping out of areas is more than ever necessary, but the bounds of parishes no longer represent natural divisions. People choose their own places of worship, and a C. has come to mean either those who on one particular occasion are worshipping together, or those who do so habitually.

This causes no great practical difficulty till questions of self-government by representative COUNCILS arise, and a definition is required of a layman as a member of a C. Often there is no organisation other than the Vestry and its elected churchwardens and sidesmen, but obviously a money qualification, limited to heads of houses, who need not even be baptised, is unsatisfactory. Hardly less objectionable is it to identify the C. with seat-holders who pay for sittings. In some cases, a roll of the C. is drawn up in which people ask to have their names inscribed, but clearly it is not possible to leave the matter subject to the mere choice of individuals without conditions or responsibilities. In some, the C. is held to be composed of all who are baptised (or baptised and confirmed) and of full age, but, apart from the difficulty of compiling a list of such, the Ch. knows nothing of the legal qualifications of age. In some, the list is restricted to those residing in the parish, but often many of the workers and supporters of the ch. come from outside. Against the somewhat complicated definition [see further, FRANCHISE] of the qualifications of parochial electors for the Representative Ch. Council all the above objections can be raised, and it is difficult to see what is gained by making it a special qualification to refuse the means of grace when no impediment exists. The only workable solution of the problem would seem to be to follow the practice of the primitive Ch., implied in the wording of the PB, which identifies the C. with the body of communicants (see COMMUNICANT).

The difficulty of interparochialism disappears as soon as the difference is recognised between the duties of the Ch. to the world and that of Christians to the Ch. The former are in large part organised territorially, by dioceses and parishes. A particular C. accepts the duties of ensuring the administration of the sacraments, the opportunities of public worship and instruction, care for the poor, etc., for all within the area of the parish. So far the parochial system has remained untouched. But Churchmen wishing to support the Ch. by prayer, alms, or personal service, are at liberty to do so where they will, and to affiliate themselves to any C. they wish. Where, however, they do not associate themselves with their own parish ch., but with some other, it should be with the cognisance of the Vicar of the parish in which they live, and their certificate of membership, where existing, should be countersigned as a discharge of his obligations towards them. (Cp. Publications of the Church Reform League, Church House, Westminster, S.W.)

As a result of the growth of towns, smaller areas in them tend to become homogeneous. In the country all classes are represented, and each individual has a definite social relationship

4. How to Define Membership.

1. Wide Meaning in PB.

2. Function of the C.

3. Town Problems.

5. Relation of C. to Parish.

to the others; while in large towns parishes are filled with people of one class and often of one occupation. Thus they can be classed as "poor," "middle class," or "well-to-do"; but in each case parochial work tends to become specialised. This is intensified by the modified congregationalism described above, since worshippers of one school of thought tend to collect at one ch. Moreover, in the country, everyone must be reckoned with, while in large towns whole masses must be ignored. This allows of great developments in organisation, music, preaching, education, ritual, etc., in town parishes. On the other hand, it makes a country parish in many ways a better training ground for normal work. Methods of parish work have for the most part originated in the country, and their adaptation to town conditions, and the scientific construction of new methods suited for the special conditions of city life, are among the most pressing problems of the day.—A2.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

CONGREGATIONALISTS. — See INDEPENDENTS.

CONSANGUINITY. — See PROHIBITED DEGREES.

CONSCIENCE.—C. (συνείδησις, conscientia, a "knowledge with oneself" of the better or the worse) is the power by which we pass judgment on the inner spring of our actions, and to some extent on the actions themselves. "The notions of right and wrong as peculiar to moral cognition are unique and unanalysable" (H. Sidgwick).

Thus, questions of the origin of C. are not relevant. Herbert Spencer's doctrine is that "experiences of utility, organised and consolidated during all past generations of the human race, have been producing nervous modifications, which, by continued transmission and accumulation, have become in us certain faculties of moral intuition."¹ Even if this account of the evolution of C. be true, which may be questioned, yet the new elements contributed by evolution are true elements and often of vast importance. We do not discredit the powers of reason, on the ground that they may be developed out of quite rudimentary instincts.

(1) C. acts as our guide, showing us what is God's will. It is the inner witness to the eternal moral law of God (Rom. 2 14, 15; cp. Jer. 31 31-33, Heb. 8 8-12).

By the schoolmen a distinction is made between synteresis, i.e., the practical intellect, the potentia or habitus of moral principles, and conscientia, i.e., the application of these to the individual act.

(2) C. is the judge of our inner state. It may acquit us, so that we have a "good C." (Acts 23 1), or it may convince us of sin. It is this function of C. to which the PB chiefly refers.

C. must be strengthened by obedience to its dictates. It may be blunted or even perverted through disobedience (1 Tim. 4 2). And it needs to be enlightened through earnest thought and study, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; e.g.,

¹ Spencer's Letter to Mill, ap. Bain's Mental and Moral Science, p. 721; Paulsen, Syst. of Eth., pp. 340 ff.

St. Paul always followed his conscience (Acts 23 1), but before his conversion his C. was in the dark (Acts 26 9). The same Apostle prays that his converts may grow in that "perception" (Phil. 1 9, 10, αἰσθησις), by which they will "approve things that are excellent." There is no better education for conscience than the contemplation of the character of Christ, as the Holy Spirit reveals it to us (John 16 14, 15). We cannot limit the means which the Holy Spirit uses: His illumination may come especially through the Church¹ and its Ministry: thus, the Priest is exhorted at his ordination to try and bring the people committed to his charge to "that ripeness and perfectness of age in Christ that there be no place . . . either for error in religion or viciousness in life." The aim of the priest should be so to instruct and influence his flock that each member of it may have a strong and enlightened C. of his own.

Peace may be brought to an unquiet C. by the consciousness of God's forgiveness, which implies removal of the sin and restoration to fellowship with God (Heb. 9 14). The first Exhortation in the HC shows how this peace may be gained including self-examination, contrition, confession, amendment, and, if necessary, restitution. But if a person cannot "quiet his C." by these normal means but requires "further comfort and counsel," he should come to "some discreet and learned minister of God's word and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's holy word he may receive the benefit of Absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice to the quieting of his Conscience."

So in the VS, "the sick person shall be moved to make a special Confession of his sins if he feel his C. troubled with any weighty matter: after which Confession the Priest shall absolve him, if he humbly and heartily desire it."—K3. It is Christ's Truth which instructs the C., and Christ's Grace which cleanses it. He may do the work immediately, or through the agency of His Church. [For Cases of C., see CASUISTRY.]

Literature: Butler's Sermons; Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory; Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics. For theories of evolution of C., see Herbert Spencer's Data of Ethics, and Paulsen's System of Ethics.—K 3.

J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS.—See ORDINAL.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES AND CHURCHYARDS.—The term consecration has

¹ On 1 Pet. 3 21 Swete (Holy Spirit in NT, p. 325) writes: "Baptism saved them, not the external use of water, but that re-awakening of the C. to the call of God which the Resurrection of the Lord had brought through the gift of the Spirit in the sacramental act."

for many years been applied to the ceremony by which a church is set apart for the worship of God. Strictly, the proper term is 1. Preliminary, dedication, the word consecration being confined to such objects as sacred vessels, and benediction to other objects, especially persons. The effect of the ceremony, performed by the Bishop as the representative of God, is to separate the building from profane and common uses, to accept it on behalf of God, and devote it to His worship as a place wherein He vouchsafes His continual presence and accepts the devotions of the faithful.

God is everywhere present, yet Jacob (Gen. 28 18) and Solomon (1 Kings 8) set apart places hallowed for worship and communion with God. The "Upper Room" was regarded as a sacred building (Cyril Jer., Catech. 16 4). The martyrology ascribed to St. Jerome (D'Achéry, Spicel. 4) has an entry "Romae, dedicatio primae ecclesiae a beato Petro constructae et consecratae." The first authentic accounts we have regard the cathedral at Tyre and the church of Constantine at Jerusalem (Euseb., HE. x, 3, 4, Vit. Const. 4 43, 45), yet these give little detail. Sermons were preached, and the holy mysteries solemnly celebrated. Down to 538 the Roman Church had no ritual for the dedication of churches. A church was dedicated by the fact that Mass had been solemnly said in it. There were two kinds of churches, those for ordinary worship, and those which enclosed the tomb of a martyr. A practice grew up and became general of placing in a small cavity in the altars of churches of the former class relics (often unimportant) of a Saint buried elsewhere. Failing these, portions of the Gospel and, down to the 13th cent., consecrated hosts were used. The inclusion of the relics was, ceremonially, a funeral service. In the earliest type of Roman rites, this, with the blessing of altar furniture, was only the introduction to the Mass. Another (Gallican) type corresponds with the ceremonies of baptism and confirmation. The altar and the church are consecrated by ablutions and anointing. Only after the altar had been consecrated were relics introduced. Later Pontificals (from the 8th cent.) combine the two types, not always skilfully. English Pontificals, down to the 14th cent., do not speak of the use of relics, which they term mos Romanus, as indispensable. The Byzantine use corresponds with the Gallican in many respects. All coincide in making the Eucharist a necessary feature of the C. An additional ceremony was the formation by the Bishop's staff of the letters of the Roman and Gk. alphabets on rows of sand laid down diagonally between the corners of the nave; and, before his entrance, the Bishop thrice struck the closed door of the church, with the words, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," etc., and twelve crosses, both within and without the walls, were anointed with chrism, a candle being lit beside each of them.

The first noteworthy post-Reformation form is Bp. Andrewes' (Winton), 1620. After Ps. 24 came the prayer of David (1 Chr. 29 10), a prayer to the three Divine Persons separately, and to the B. Trinity, asking for the presence of God to "accept, sanctify, and bless this place to be a Sanctuary for the most High, and a church of the living God . . . that it may be the House of God to Him, and to us the gate of heaven." The Bp., in procession, visited and laid his hands on the font, pulpit, lectern, and altar with special prayers—dedicated the holy vessels and ornaments of the altar "that . . . may be . . . consecrated . . . these Patens and Chalices which I offer . . . may be accepted by thee . . . continue hallowed vessels in thy house"; with prayers at the place of marriage; and at the pavement, for such as shall be buried beneath it; and in the churchyard. Next, in the Sanctuary, that "this place . . . may be hallowed by the sanctifying power of thy holy Spirit," and for worshippers in prayer, oblation, song and hearing. MP followed: Pss. 84, 122, 132; Lessons, Gen. 28 10, Jn. 2 13. After third Coll. a long prayer for separation of the Church to various sacred purposes. At the close of Lit. that God, "who dwellest not in temples made with hands," may grant his presence here. At HC after Coll. for Day, "Most bl. Saviour, . . . presence on F. of dedication . . . consecrate us unto an holy Temple . . . dwelling in our hearts by faith." Ep., 1 Cor. 3 16; Gosp., Jn. 10 22. Then a prayer, reciting Solomon's dedication of the Temple, from 1 Kings 8 27 ff., 2 Chr. 7 12-16. The Act of C. was promulgated by the Bp. seated and covered, who signed and laid it on the altar. "Offero hic Tibi, O B. Trinitas, Ecclesiam jam Tuam et Nominis Tuo consecratam. . . ." Next a prayer for blessing upon "this day's action." After the Gloria, a Blessing of God's Name and prayer for the founder of the Church.

The Irish form (1666. Imprimatur. Ia. Armach.: Mich. Dublin) provides short lessons at various parts of the church, a "dedication of a material altar," a solemn presentation of ornaments: "Grant that these gifts may be received into the lot and right of God and of religion . . . sanctify this house and these gifts . . . by the effusion of thine holiness." Also a prayer from the close of the Epistle of St. Clement, "the Anathematism" (from Pss. 79, 83, 129), and an "Euphemism" (from Pss. 150, 68, 87, 99, 100).

A form was drawn up and amended, but left unfinished, by Convocation in 1712 and 1715. This was commonly used by Bishops until the middle of the 19th cent., and was reprinted in 1833 by Archd. Clerke, with a few verbal alterations. It is largely indebted to Bp. Andrewes, shortening the lengthy prayers, omitting those of David and Solomon, changing the position of many which it retains, and leaving out the procession to the different parts of the church: thus minimising the effect of "the genius and liturgical instinct of Bp. Andrewes," and reducing the service to the level of "the staid and reserved attitude of the religion of the eighteenth century" (Bp. Wordsworth).

The petition to consecrate the church is received by the Bp. at the W. door. Ps. 24 is sung in procession: the instrument of donation and endowment is presented to the Bishop, seated, who lays it on the altar: an introduction, on the setting apart from common uses of houses for the worship of God: a prayer (kneeling) claiming the presence of God with "us who . . . consecrate this place to the honour of thy great Name; separating . . . it from all unhallowed, ordinary, and common uses: and dedicating it to thy service, for reading thy holy word, for celebrating thy holy sacraments, for offering . . . the sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving, for blessing thy people . . . and for all other holy offices." The Bp. stands and turns to the people to pray for all to be baptised, confirmed, communicated, hearers of God's word, those to be married, those who give thanks, confess their sins, or ask for necessities. The Sentence of C. is read, signed and laid on the altar. MP: Pss. 84, 122, 132; Lessons, 1 Kings 8 22-62, Heb. 10 19-26; after Collect for the day, Collect¹ on presence of Christ at Feast of Dedication; after Thanksgiving, Prayer¹ for founder. Then HC: Introit, Ps. 26 6-8; Collect for acceptance of Dedication . . . prospering of this undertaking . . . "reverence and awful apprehension of thy Divine Majesty"; Ep., 2 Cor. 6 14-17; Gosp., Jn. 2 13-18; after Creed Ps. 100; before Blessing, Prayer¹ for blessing on the "performance of this day."

The authorised form of the Amer. Church (1799) varies from this in changes of expression, the omission of petition to the Bishop and second Coll. at MP; in the Lessons, Gen. 28 10, Rev. 21 10; and in placing Prayer for founder before MP. Later editions (1889 and 1892) remove a rubric which recognised the omission of HC. The Irish PB (1878) varies the order and some expressions in the prayers said facing the people, with prayer for those to be ordained, instead of for those who give thanks; omits Prayer for founder and second Coll. at MP; places Coll. for day after special Coll. at HC; Ep., Eph. 2 13; and Coll. for Unity as second Postcommun.

In 1887 and 1898 Bp. John Wordsworth revised the form (52, Church Historical Society). After petition, procession round church (and churchyard). Special features: Prayer for entrance of Angels, three knocks on closed door with Staff, delivery of keys to Bp., "Peace be to this House from God our heavenly Father . . . from His Son, who is our Peace . . . from the Holy Ghost the Comforter," the laying of the Keys on the altar with prayer, pause for silent prayer, Veni Creator, Litany and prayer (from Gk. Euchologion), procession with short lessons and prayers, at the Font ("bless this font, which we . . . hallow . . . that it may be a laver of new birth"), the Chancel-Steps, Lectern, Pulpit, Clergy Stalls, Choir Seats, Sanctuary Steps ("hallow this Table as Thine own, for the purposes of that heavenly mystery; grant that the memorial of His death may here be made . . . the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving be offered . . ."). The ornaments being placed on the holy Table, V. "Be ye clean, ye that bear the vessels of the Lord"; Ans. "I will wash my hands . . . so will I go to Thine altar" ("grant that these vessels . . . may be hallowed by Thy blessing"), prayer for communicants. Ant. "Christ hath reconciled us unto God in one body by the Cross, having slain the enmity thereby. Surely the Lord is in this place. This is none other than the House of God and this is the gate of Heaven." Series of prayers.¹ Ant. "Behold, a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to Heaven, and behold the Angels. . . . Surely, the Lord . . . gate of Heaven." At HC three Collects (2nd for founder, 3rd Michaelmas), special Postcommun.

This form has been to a large extent followed in other dioceses. Birmingham adds prayer for the entrance of God into the House, a special invocation beginning with Sursum corda, a Sentence of C. ("By virtue of our sacred office in the Church of God, we do now consecrate, and for ever set apart from all profane and common uses, this House of God, under the name of — and to the glory of the ever-blessed Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost"), and a Eucharistic Collect (transl. of "O Deus, qui invisibiliter"). The first part of the Litany is also sung in procession round the interior of the Church. London (1903) adds to the Litany (first part) two suffrages: "That it may please Thee to bless this place, and to give Thy holy Angels charge over it," "That it may please Thee to bless and hallow this Church to be consecrated to Thine honour in the name of —." All provide for a procession round the outside of the Church, and Bp. Wordsworth insists on the celebration of HC by the consecrating Bp. as indispensable. If the C. be late in the day, HC must follow next morning. Winchester reprints a modified form of Bp. Andrewes' rite. A more elaborate form, with translations of many ancient Collects, was used, 1903, by the Bp. of London at St. Cyprian's, N.W.

In olden days, a cemetery, having four crosses erected at each corner (sometimes a fifth in the middle) each bearing three lighted candles, was sprinkled by the Bishop, in procession, with holy water, Ps. 51 (50) and a Lit. being sung. Prs. were recited towards E., W., S. and N., that it might be cleansed, blessed, consecrated and hallowed, and that the souls and bodies of the faithful therein buried might rest in peace, and might, reunited after the resurrection, enjoy eternal bliss. Ps. 141 (140) was sung, the cemetery censed, and a blessing given. Mass was then said in the church.

Bp. Andrewes, as part of C. of churchyard, prayed for the "perfect consummation and bliss" of those to be buried, and that God, who had taught us the difference between the spirits of man and beast, and to choose places of rest for the bodies of His saints, might accept the dedication of the cemetery. Bp. J. Wordsworth (procession having taken place previously, with Pss. 16, 23, 49, 115, or 139) recites Ps. 23 4, 16 11 and 17 13, and, after the Lord's Prayer, asks our Lord, the Resurrection and the Life, that those whose bodies will be buried here may rest in the hope of resurrection to eternal life. A blessing is invoked to sanctify and keep holy this fit resting-place for the bodies of the Saints. Some dioceses add the declaration by the Bp. that he "consecrates this ground to be the resting-place of the dead." The sentence of C. is then read and signed by the Bishop. The Irish form adds three prayers for mourners.—

¹ Based on Bp. Andrewes.

J. E. SWALLOW.
s4.

CONSECRATION OF ELEMENTS (IN HC).—See EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.

CONSECRATION, PRAYER OF.—See COMMUNION, HOLY, § 10-14.

CONSENT TO MARRY.—Canon 100 provides that "No Children (liberis) under (qui nondum compleverint) the age of one and twenty years complete shall contract themselves or marry without the consent of their parents or of their guardians (tutorum) and governors if their parents be deceased."

The consent required to the issue of a Marriage Licence to a minor (not being a Widow or Widower) is prescribed by Statute as under:

1. During the lifetime of the Father: The Father solus.

2. After the death of the Father: The Mother if surviving, either

(a) Alone, when no guardian had been appointed by the Father; or

(b) Jointly with any guardian appointed by the Father; or

(c) When no guardian has been so appointed and in the event of any guardian so appointed being deceased or refusing to act—jointly with any guardian or guardians appointed by the Chancery Division of the High Court.

3. After the death of both Father and Mother: The guardians appointed by the Father and (or) Mother.

Where appointed by both parents guardians must act jointly.

4. Where guardians have been appointed by the Court without the intervention of the parents or when both the parents are dead:

The guardian or guardians so appointed.

There is no statutory obligation to obtain consent in the case of a Marriage after Banns, but it is enacted that a public dissent renders the publication of Banns void.

Consent need not be in writing nor a formal act, but may be collected from all the circumstances and may be retracted. It is prudent to obtain a written consent or personal assurance in all cases. Guardians must each consent, and—if unable to agree—may apply to the Chancery Division for its direction. If the Father be non-compos, or the Mother and (or) guardian be non-compos or beyond the seas or unreasonably or from undue motives withhold their consent, application may be made to the Chancery Court. It seems a pity that the Mother is not authorised to consent without application to the Court where the Father is non-compos or beyond the seas.—ma.

T. H. ARDEN.

CONSISTORY COURT.—The ordinary court of justice of a diocesan bp., held in his cath. ch., formerly presided over by himself, with some of his clergy as assessors or assistants; but now by the CHANCELLOR OF THE DIOCESE in his capacity of OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL, or by some other COMMISSARY appointed by the bp. Such a court exists as of course in every diocese of England, and has cognisance of all eccles. matters arising within its limits. In the case of the diocese of Canterbury it is called the Commissary Court. Such jurisdiction was originally exercised by the ARCHDEACON; but, later, episcopal commissions to archdeacons imposed limitations of both territory and powers. The Consistory Court is a court of appeal from the archdeacon's court; and has original jurisdiction in all matters civil and criminal that the bp. cannot, or does not, delegate to his archdeacons. Before the Reformation appeals to Rome at the first opening of a cause very frequently ousted its powers, the pope appointing judges delegate for the hearing and decision of the particular cause; and then, as now, the court's powers were often ousted by an appeal to the Provincial Court.¹

The Chancellor of the diocese sits in the Consistory Court as ORDINARY, uncontrolled by the bp.: consequently the latter may sue in his own court, e.g., in a civil suit under the Pluralities Act, 1838, where the penalties are recoverable by a person authorised by the bp. The appeal from the CC. is to the Provincial Court (in Canterbury the Court of Arches, in York the Chancery Court). As to appeals under the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, see that heading.

Until 31 Dec., 1857, CCs. had within their dioceses concurrent jurisdiction with the Provincial Courts in matters and causes testamentary and in cases of intestacy (see now 20-1 Vict., cc. 77, 85). Their inherent jurisdiction in matrimonial and divorce proceedings, which was at the same time transferred to the Divorce Court, had been concentrated, from the time of Elizabeth, in the CC. of London.²

One result of the CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840, was practically to put an end to the criminal jurisdiction of CCs. over clerks; but this has been revived by the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, in the case of "an offence against morality . . . not being a question of doctrine or ritual." If a question of fact (other than that of the conviction of the defendant by a temporal court) arises in such a case, and if either party so requires, it must be decided in the prescribed manner with the concurrence of Assessors, as set out above under that heading.

A bishop may appoint a commissary who will have all necessary powers to preside over a CC. at a distant part of the diocese (canon 125) to avoid trouble and vexation to parties in places so remote that the Chancellor cannot conveniently call them to the episcopal consistory. Such a commissary's powers are limited by the terms of his appointment: he is not an Ordinary.

In recent years objection has been taken by some to the jurisdiction of the Consistory Court. It is admitted to be itself a truly Eccles. Court, validly constituted; but its jurisdiction has been declined (e.g., Oxford, Bishop v. Henly, 1907, P. 88; 1909, P. 317) on the ground that the final appeal from it is to the privy council (which is not recognised by the protesters), and that the law that it must administer is therefore not church law. Rules of procedure of the CC. of London were issued in 1877 and 1878 (Stat. Rules and Orders, 1904, IV. Eccl. Court, Eng. 1). The rules of other courts vary considerably: see a list in Phillimore 2 998-1008. Solicitors have the full right of practising in all CCs. (40-1 Vict., c. 25, § 17).—A5. R. J. WHITWELL.

¹ This is now effected by Letters of Request: see, e.g., 3 and 4 Vict., c. 86, § 13.

² In other respects, the jurisdiction of CCs. over laymen—which had dwindled to occasional proceedings for Church rates (abolished 1868, 31-2 Vict., c. 109)—had long been obsolete. A single belated attempt of a CC. to cite a lay offender "to appear and answer touching and concerning his soul's health, etc.," occurred in 1876 (L.R., 1 P.D. 487).

CONSUBSTANTIATION.—See LORD'S SUPPER, § 12.

CONTRITION.—See REPENTANCE, § 3.

CONVERSION.—The word C. only occurs in the PB in connection with "the C. of St. Paul," and in the third Good Friday Coll.

1. Name. The fact is certainly there. C. is the conscious turning of the soul from self to God, from sin to righteousness; to this home-coming of a sinner into right relation with God the PB bears constant witness.

C. should be the first step in the regenerate life. The new life, which is given at the new birth, comes from the one Life-giver,

2. Conversion and Regeneration. God. Normally it is given at Bapt. (John 3 3, 5, Tit. 3 5).¹ Since the Sacraments are "moral means of Salvation," the gift can only become effective when the soul responds to it with Repentance and Faith. Both these spiritual acts are represented in C.: it is a turning away from sin, and a trustful surrender to God. C. comes of God's grace, but it requires the co-operation of man's free will.

In NT ἐπιστρέφειν is sometimes used intransitively, representing the act of the sinner who turns (Luke 22 32, Acts 3 19; also—after Is. 6 10—Matt. 13 15, Mark 4 12, John 12 40); sometimes transitively, with reference to God who turns him (Luke 1 16, Acts 26 18, Jas. 5 19, 20, 1 Pet. 2 25).

Both are combined in the cry of Ephraim (Jer. 31 18, echoed in the Communion Service), "ἐπιστρέψον με καὶ ἐλεησέν με."

C. implies a shifting of the centre of interest from self to God. Self may be represented by gross self-indulgence (as in the case of the woman who was a sinner, Luke 7 36-48), or covetousness (e.g., Zacchæus, Luke 19 1-10), or self-satisfaction and self-will (e.g., Saul of Tarsus).

This willing acceptance of the sovereignty of our Lord may be the result of a sudden crisis, or it may be gradual. The PB seems

3. Gradual or Sudden. to regard the latter course as normal. "The child of God often begins at once to correspond to the privilege bestowed upon it, and freely turns from what is wrong to what is right, as a flower bud turns from the shade towards the sun."² On the other hand, the old Adam is busy in most children, and the surroundings in which many of them live do not help this happy, steady growth. Moreover, it is a fact of experience that the age of adolescence is often a time of moral and spiritual crisis. The Church enables us to take full advantage of this in Confirmation. Very many date their self-surrender to God and conscious acceptance of Christ as King from the time when they received special gifts of the Spirit. Of course, there have also been wonderful examples of real C. in later life.

¹ See SACRAMENTS, § 8, 9; REGENERATION; BAPTISM, § 10-14.

² Mason, Ministry of Conversion, p. 11. As regards steady progress in later life, "It is a matter of observation that those who have been taught to look to HC as the instrument of grace and sanctification arrive at the same spiritual condition by a safer, calmer and saner process than that of the Methodist" Inge, Truth and Falsehood in Religion, p. 81).

It is the whole man—intellect, affections, will—that turns to God. Nothing can be more mischievous than a mere awaking of emotional excitement. The tactics of the Revivalist are sometimes those of the Hypnotist. There is an important place in our Church life for special missions, but a wise mission-preacher seeks for a change of will resulting in lasting Christian character, and uses the appeal to conscience rather than to the emotions.

Some interesting investigations have been made as to the psychological processes which precede and accompany C. Much stress is laid on the workings of the "subliminal consciousness." There are processes of the mind at work below the margin of our conscious thought. "Spontaneous awakenings may often be the fructification of that which has been going on" in this subconscious region. It is often at the moment of self-surrender that these forces become effective. Doubtless God can act upon this subconscious self quite as freely as on our conscious thoughts and volitions.

Literature: St. Augustine, Confessions; Mason, Ministry of Conversion; James, Varieties of Religious Experience; Starbuck, Psychology of Religion; Coe, The Spiritual Life.—PD. J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

CONVERSION OF ST. PAUL.—See FESTIVAL, § 28; SAINTS' DAYS, § 6.

CONVOCAION.—Convocation is the usual short title of the eccles. assembly which canon 139 describes as "the Sacred

1. Introductory. Synod of the nation, in the name of Christ and by the King's authority assembled," "the true Ch. of Eng. by representation."

The history of this assembly and its connection with primitive forms of synodical action as well as with Parl. have been traced by well-known writers with great care and in much detail. A few broad facts only need now be stated: (1) its continuity, in respect of constitution and representation, from Pre-Reformation times to the present day; (2) the momentous change brought about in 1664 when, under Archbishop Sheldon, the clergy surrendered the privilege of taxing their own body and allowed themselves, for taxing purposes, to be dealt with by Parl. alone; (3) the virtual suppression of the assembly by means of continual prorogations, a consequence of the Bangorian controversy, dating from Feb. 14, 1718; and (4) the revival of its deliberative and, to a very limited extent, of its legislative action, dating from the year 1852. From that year its sessions have been regular and the transaction of its business continuous.

In practice, for many centuries there have been as two Convs., the Conv. of the Province of Cant., and the Conv. of the

2. Constitution. Province of York, each presided over by its own Abp. Both these Convs. consist of Bps., Deans, Archdeacons, and Proctors for Chapters and Clergy; both are formally cited under a Royal writ with each new Parl., and formally dissolved when each Parl. ends; both sit generally in two Houses, the Upper House consisting of Diocesan Bps. only, and the Lower House consisting of Deans (with the addition of the Provost of Eton in the Cant. Conv.), Archdeacons and Proctors. In both also the President has large, though undefined, powers of directing and controlling the times and order of business. There is, however, one noticeable difference between the two Lower Houses, viz., as to the number of Proctors for the Clergy. In the case of Canterbury there can only be two Proctors for each diocese, although in some cases (the majority) the whole of the beneficed clergy elect, while in a few cases the clergy elect by archdeacons, and in one case, the diocese of Lichfield, the six elected by the three archdeacons elect two of their number to represent the whole diocese. In the case of York, on the other hand, the clergy of each archdeaconry elect two Proctors. One necessary consequence of this difference is that in Cant. if, under an Order in Council, an addition is made to the number of Archdeacons by the creation of a new archdeaconry, this does not add to the number of Proctors for the clergy, who still remain two for the whole diocese. In York, however, the creation of a new archdeaconry adds two more to the number of Proctors for clergy elected for the particular diocese.

All diocesan Bps., Deans and Archdeacons (also the Provost of Eton in Cant.), are members of the Conv. ex officio, and are formally and individually cited to attend each Conv. Bps. Suffragan and others in episcopal orders are not members of either Upper House, but, not infrequently, are members of a Lower House as Deans, Archdeacons, or Proctors.

The Lower House of each Province elects, to preside over its sessions and to be the medium of communication with the President and the Upper House, one of its members who is entitled "the Prolocutor." He is elected, or re-elected, with each new Conv., and he is presented to the President that his election may be confirmed, before he enters upon the discharge of his duties. Upon the Prolocutor rests the responsibility of the conduct of business in the Lower House under the President of the whole Conv. In York another officer is appointed called the Synod Clerk, who also is a member of the Conv.; in Canterbury the President appoints an officer who is designated the Actuary, and his duty is to keep an accurate minute of proceedings in the Lower House. The President of each Conv. also appoints a Registrar who is in attendance in the Upper House.

Both Convs. assemble in session during the time when Parl. is sitting and not when it is in recess. The sessions, however, do

4. Sessions. not cover any lengthy period.

Usually they extend to ten or twelve days in all in one year, three or four at each of the following dates: (1) soon after the opening of Parl., (2) at the end of April or the beginning of May, (3) during the first week in July. Occasionally a fourth group of sessions has been held during an autumn session of Parl.

The work of preparing business for the sessions rests in theory with each President and each

Prolocutor, but in practice is carried out to a large extent by

5. Preparation of Business. means of Committees and Joint Committees, which can sit at any time irrespective of Parl. being in session. These Committees and Joint Committees draw up and present Reports, and have permission to distribute their Reports but not to publish them, before they are presented. After they have been presented, either the Reports themselves, or the resolutions appended to them dealing with the subject-matter, form the basis of discussion in the House or Houses. There is constant inter-communication between the two Houses in regard to Reports and Resolutions, and frequently a discussion in the Lower House takes the form of a resolution to concur or otherwise with resolutions previously discussed in the Upper House and sent down with a request for such concurrence. If such resolutions are agreed to first in the Lower House, they are sent up through the Prolocutor to the Upper House with a respectful request that the President and the Bps. will consider them.

Other means of starting discussions are by motions ad hoc following upon a Petition or a statement, and, in the Lower House, by the presenting of a Gravamen which, after discussion, may or may not become an Articulus Cleri. An Articulus Cleri is sent up from the House itself, a Gravamen which does not become an Articulus Cleri is sent up signed by a member or members if the right is claimed by the signatories. From time to time it is thought advisable by the President that the whole Conv. should meet in Full Synod, and on such occasions the President presides. There have been also occasions, though rare, when the two Convs. have deliberated together.

To these legally constituted Convs. of the Clergy were added in recent times the Houses of Laymen which, however, are

6. Houses of Laymen. not summoned or dissolved by Royal writ, and are bodies voluntarily assisting in obedience to a voluntarily framed and accepted constitution, sanctioned by the respective legal Convocations.

A further development of this important voluntary addition to the Convs. is the Representative Church Council, which consists of the Upper and Lower Houses of the two Convs. together with the two Houses of Laymen.

7. Representative Ch. Council.

The Council sits and debates as one body, but under its constitution—one voluntarily drafted and accepted—a vote by Houses may be demanded, the three Houses being (1) the House of Bps. (the Upper Houses of the two Provinces), (2) the House of Clergy (the Lower Houses of the same), and (3) the House of Laymen (the two separate Houses of Laymen voting together).

At the time of the assembling of a new Parl. the Conv. of Canterbury meets according to long-established custom first of all in St. Paul's Cathedral. The Lit. is there solemnly chanted, the Bp. of Salisbury as Precentor of the Province officiating, and a sermon in Latin is preached by some member of the Lower House chosen by the President for the occasion.

8. Opening of Session.

The members of both Houses then repair to the south choir aisle where the return to the Royal writ and other legal documents are read, and the President directs the members of the Lower House to withdraw for the purpose of electing a Prolocutor and, at the same time, names the day and place for the presentation of the Prolocutor so elected that his election may be formally confirmed. This election takes place without delay, sometimes in the same south aisle, at other times in another part of the Cathedral. At this election, by long prescriptive right, the Dean of St. Paul's presides, or some other member duly appointed as his substitute. With the election and the choice of two members to present the Prolocutor to the President the proceedings end, and the Conv. is prorogued to meet at Westminster on the day and at the time appointed by the President.

The proceedings on this day appointed begin with a celebration of the HC in the Chapel of K. Henry VII in Westminster Abbey. The President, Bps. and members of the Lower House assemble in the Jerusalem Chamber and walk in procession to the Chapel. After the service they proceed to the Church House, and the Upper and Lower Houses assemble separately, unless it should be deemed fit by the President that for any reason the Conv. should first of all assemble in Full Synod. In either case, whether the Conv. meets in Full Synod or as the Upper and Lower Houses, the first business is the presentation of the Prolocutor. The Latin language is used by all concerned in the ceremony of presenting him, as well as in that of the confirmation of his election.

The regulation of proceedings in the Upper House is entirely in the hands of the President, and there are no Standing Orders. The House

9. Procedure. not infrequently sits in Committee of the whole House when reporters are not present, and it rests with the President to decide when the Conv. should be prorogued and when it should sit again. Strictly speaking, the Lower House has no right to continue sitting after the schedule of prorogation has been placed in the hands of the Prolocutor, but this rule is often relaxed to further the conduct of business and the convenience of members. The President nominates all members of Committees of the Upper House, and it rests with him also to direct the appointment of Joint Committees, to determine the number of members of the Upper House to serve on any Joint Committee, and to require the Lower House to nominate two members of that House for each member of the Upper House. The Prolocutor is the channel of communication between the two Houses, and often attends with his assessors either at the request of the Lower House or in compliance with a summons from the President.

The conduct of business in the Lower House is regulated by the Standing Orders. These date in part from a time anterior to the silencing of the Conv. in the early 18th cent., but they have been frequently altered and amended since Conv. was allowed to sit again, and they are necessarily somewhat difficult of interpretation without occasional reference to the practice of Conv. as embodied in the decisions of successive Prolocutors. All questions of order rest for solution absolutely with the Prolocutor for the time being, but at the beginning of each session the Prolocutor nominates a body of assessors with whom he consults when difficult points arise. These assessors accompany him when he proceeds to the Upper House either by request of the Lower House or in obedience to the President's command.

At the beginning of each session the members are "preconized" by the Actuary, i.e., the Deans, Provost, Archdeacons and Proctors are called upon to say each in turn whether they are present. Of late years it has been the custom to print a Roll of Attendances with the last number of the Chronicle of Convocation in each year. After Preconization the Prolocutor names the assessors, and the business proceeds according to the directions of the Standing Orders. The minutes of each session's (i.e., each day's) proceedings are read after the appointment of assessors on the following day. They are then confirmed and "according to the ancient practice of Conv.," ordered to be reduced into Acts. But at the end of the last of a group of sessions, before the Conv. is prorogued, the minutes of that day are read, confirmed and ordered to be reduced into Acts as the last of the day's proceedings. When the Prolocutor has to proceed to the Upper House another member may preside during his absence, but no vote of the House may be taken.

10. Order of Proceedings.

The necessity for some reform of the Conv. of Canterbury, especially as regards the number of Proctors elected to represent

11. Reform. the clergy and the admission of unbeneficed clergy to the ranks of the electors, was one of the first subjects to occupy the attention of the members after the revival for business purposes in the middle of the last century, and has continued to be discussed from time to time up to the present day. Between the years 1854 and 1902 the subject was discussed at length and with great care many times over, and every method of raising it allowed by the Standing Orders was tried again and again. The proposals embodied in the Reports of different Committees and Joint Committees in regard to a wider representation may be briefly summarised under two heads: (1) those which sought to carry a Declaratory Bill through the Houses of Parliament, giving power to the Conv. under certain careful regulations to reform itself in this respect; (2) those which have tried to procure the necessary sanctions for a definite reform of the representation on lines worked out in detail in the shape of a Draft Bill or otherwise. The simpler question (from one point of view) of the admission of unbeneficed clergy to vote at elections for Proctors has never been forgotten in these proposals, but is to a certain extent separate from them, inasmuch as it has been claimed as a right, or considered as a possibility, even under the existing conditions of representation. The hindrances to carrying out any scheme of reform have been due neither to want of accord between the two Houses, nor to acute differences in the Lower House itself, but to the general consensus of competent legal opinion against the possibility of the changes proposed. And thus a reform generally acknowledged to be wise and necessary remains still to be carried out.—A2.

J. E. STOCKS.

COPE.—A large cloak of silk or other material, semicircular in shape and fastened across the breast by a metal clasp (morse) or, more commonly, by a band. It is usually adorned with a broad orphrey, or strip of embroidery, along the front edge, and a hood of varying shape hangs from the shoulders. Formerly the C. was intended chiefly for outdoor use in processions and Lits., and on wet days the hood—now merely an ornament, usually shield-shaped—was drawn up over the head; hence the name pluviale by which it was also known. It was worn by all orders of the clergy, and occasionally by choristers, in the Western Church.

The rubrics of the First PB of Edward VI required a C. or Vestment to be used by the celebrating priest at the service of HC, and by a bishop executing any public ministration in the church; but this use was forbidden by the Second PB of 1552. The 24th canon of 1604 prescribes the use of the C. by the bishop or principal minister at the ministration of HC, but only in cathedral and collegiate churches. The C. was in continuous use in Durham Cathedral and in Westminster Abbey until the middle of the 18th cent., and is at the present day used regularly at the celebration of HC in Lichfield Cathedral. It is probable that its use has never died out since the Reformation. It is worn by bishops and other dignitaries at the Coronation of the sovereign and on other state occasions.

Those of the parochial clergy who use the C. in the Church of England at the present day base their authority for so doing, as in the case of other Vestments, upon the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, the retention of which at the revision of 1662 they declare to have superseded the canon of 1604. The C. is therefore worn by such clergy, not at the ministration of HC¹, but at Festal Evensong, in Processions, and occasionally at Weddings and Baptisms. By many of the bishops it is worn at Ordinations, Confirmations, and other occasions of their public ministration. See RITUAL LAW, H 29 f; 82.—83. J. O. COOP.

CORONATION.—Government from the beginnings of human society has been regarded as possessing a religious character, and the regal office as especially sacred. In Homer, e.g., the sceptred king is the shepherd of the people, receiving his glory from heaven. Christianity, while more sharply distinguishing temporal from ecclesiastical rule, has nevertheless added a higher consecration to loyalty. In J. H. Newman's phrase, "The pageant of earthly regality has the semblance and benediction of the Eternal King." The appropriateness of inaugurating a new reign with religious rites has, therefore, been recognised from an early date. But the C. of our kings bears traces also of military, democratic and feudal ideas. Crowning is in itself but the most honourable of a number of investitures. In the earliest Anglo-Saxon Ordo the prelates place a helmet (galerus) on the king's brows. But the "corona" was originally at Rome a garland (afterwards golden) received by a successful commander (imperator) from his soldiery; subsequently, the imperial guard created the emperor of their choice with corona and purple robe (Ammonius Marcell. 20 4). The diadem (e.g., as offered to Julius Cæsar) was an importation from the East, and resented as symbolising autocratic and supernatural kingship. Enthronement was originally the Teutonic levatio (elevare in regem), or raising of the new ruler upon a shield (Tacitus, Hist. 4 15)—the rubric still says: "The King is lifted up into his throne." The Franks and Lombards delivered also a spear, "pro sceptro." Christianity infused a religious significance into these and other ceremonies. But the first emperor to seek an actual consecration was Theodosius, c. 379, who dreamed he saw Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, putting a crown and royal robe on him (Theodoret, HE 5 6). The earliest example in the West is the "ordination" and "benediction" with laying on of hands (this phrase is actually found in the English crowning of a consort until George II in 1727; cp. Confirmation) of King Aidan by St. Columba at Iona on the Stone of Destiny, now part of the C. chair. It was done by command of an angel, bearing the crystal book of the "Ordination of Kings." Crowning is not mentioned, nor yet unction. But when the regal "sacrosancta unctio" is first mentioned (in Spain, 636) it was evidently no novelty. Saxon monarchs are found receiving the holy anointing early in the 8th cent., but they used the style "Dei gratia" still earlier. In France unction, whether borrowed from England or copied from the OT, seems to have begun with Pepin the Little, 752. Henceforth the sacring and anointing rather than the C. of our kings is usually spoken of. They are "hallowed to king," "eled to king"—as in the OT. The mystical associations of kingship are deepened, and pr. is made for the Lord's anointed that he "may nourish and teach, defend and duly order the Church of the Anglo-Saxons"—theocratic phrases imported into France, probably through Alcuin.

¹ [But according to the First PB of Edward VI, which is referred to in the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, the C. is, except in the case of bishops, ordered to be worn at HC, and at no other service.]

The English C. Service is of extraordinary interest as practically the sole survival of the ancient Western rite. In spite of much defacement, it has come down to us essentially unaltered from before the period of Ethelred, and this unique continuity has persisted through changes of dynasty and times of great political and social upheaval. The Reformation aimed at the exaltation rather than the depression of monarchy, and the Revolution of 1688 endeavoured to disguise itself as much as possible under ancient forms. The utilitarian tendencies of the Reform era would have abolished, and did sorely mutilate, the rite; but the counter-stream of romanticism was already strong enough to save it. At an earlier epoch the Conqueror took care to be crowned with the English rite beside the tomb of the Confessor, and mediæval weakness of title ever sought to strengthen itself by the time-honoured supernatural sanctions. Even Cromwell was inaugurated (in Westminster Hall) on the Scottish Stone of Fate. Since Edward I brought the Regale Scotiæ to Westminster, the English coronations have by it been linked with far-off Celtic ones.

2. The English Rite.

The earliest extant English Ordo (Archbishop Egbert's—Martene de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. ii, 10) is earlier than 736. Its character is essentially benedictory. In a later and fuller English Rite. Order (called by Ethelred's name, HBS, vol. 19), "benedictio" has become "consecratio," as though the king's office were committed to him by the rite itself. (Until Edward VI a king's regnal years were counted from his Sacring.) The language is more theocratic, but, on the other hand, the monarch now promises to observe the precepts of governance traditionally laid down. A third Order (Norman or early Plantagenet) is marked by the first appearance of the sacred CHRISM or compounded balsam, in addition to the simple oil of anointing (for the distinction cp. Exod. 30 23-25 and Luke 7 46). The latter answered to the oleum infirmorum and the oleum catechumenorum consecrated each Maundy Thursday; the former to the chrism hallowed for confirmations and ordinations. Only the Kings of England and of France received the twofold unction, those of Jerusalem and Sicily and also the Emperor being hallowed with olive oil only. A fourth C. Order, set forth in the famous Liber Regalis preserved at Westminster (HBS, vol. 5), while returning in some features to an earlier model, brought the rite to an elaborate perfection which remained the basis of all subsequent coronations. (Copies were printed for the use of the compilers even of the 1821 coronation.) No vital change was introduced in the 16th cent., Edward VI and Elizabeth being both crowned, with slight omissions, according to the Liber Regalis and with the Latin Mass. The Lit. however was sung on both occasions in English, and Elizabeth, finding that Oglethorpe—the only bishop who would consecrate her—insisted despite her prohibition on elevating the Host, withdrew before Mass began into her traverse. This at least is Prof. Pollard's interpretation (Eng. Hist. Rev., Jan., 1910, p. 129) of her remark (April, 1571) to the French ambassador, "qu'elle avoit esté couronnée et sacrée sellon les cérémonies de l'esglise catholique, et par évesques catholiques, sans toutefois assister à la messe." At Edward's C. eleven mitred bishops had assisted; at Elizabeth's also there were copes, crucifixes and incense. The next C. was that of James I, forty-five years later. Then, if ever, radical remodelling might have been expected. But a conservative reaction against Calvinism had begun, and the old service was used pretty much in its integrity, save that it was in English and that the reformed Order of HC in both kinds was used. Even in this some ancient details were retained, such as the houselling towel, a special Offertory, Secret and Communion, personal oblations, and the service of the Sovereign himself, subdeacon-wise, at the altar-step. Incense (the "perfuming-pan") was still used in the procession, and so continued till the 19th cent. On the other hand, there was henceforth only one anointing, viz., with chrism, and this was not the miraculous unguent given by our Lady to St. Thomas of Canterbury for the C. of the English sovereigns—though the rubric speaks of "the Ampull wherein is the oyle with which anciently the Kings and Queens have been anointed"—for it seems to have come to an end. Mary Tudor, because of the Interdict, had received a supply from overseas. If there were any defects in James I's C.—possibly the anointing was not done "in formâ crucis"—they were set right in the very careful Order drawn up for Charles I (HBS, vol. 2). "My lords," said Laud at his trial, "I had liturgies all I could get, both antient and modern." The charges of innovation brought against him by Prynne, and since repeated uncritically by Stanley, were easily disproved. At the Restoration another opportunity occurred, had it been desired, for modifying the character of the C., the feudal system being in 1660 legally abrogated. But the services of "grand serjeantry" were expressly excepted from this abolition, and the knightly and quasi-mystical investitures of the Sovereign, his Vigil and that of the Companions of the Bath—who, on St. George's Day, 1661, for the last time rode with their Sovereign from the Tower to Westminster—were carefully retained. This C., Clarendon records, was performed "with the greatest solemnity and glory that ever any had been." It is really from the next reign, and not from the Reformation, the Great Rebellion or the Revolution, that the rite suffered its first serious impairment. When Sancroft was bidden " (keeping to the Essential) to abridge the extreame length" of the C., it was understood that "abridgement" was a euphemism. For the first time the Euch. was omitted. James had only brought himself with the greatest reluctance to accept C. from Anglican prelates—at this time disappeared the words, after "us unworthy," "yet consecrated by the authority of the holy Apostles"—and to meet his scruples the high, sacramental language of the service was lowered, as well as certain lofty expressions about the nursing-fatherhood of the King as the bountiful comforter of the Church and of holy societies. "The Bread" was substituted for "the Body" in the Administration rubric. The "ornaments"—sword, ring, or crown—were no longer hallowed, and with the blessing of the "Ring of England" disappeared also the curious petition—referring to the charisma of blessing cramp-rings belonging to the possessor of St. Edward's sapphire—that "whatsoever he shall sanctify may be holy." The double C. of 1689 (HBS, vol. 19) restored, of course, the celebration of the Euch.—though William was an unconfirmed Calvinist—for resentful and jealous eyes were fixed on the new reign, and Compton, reverting to early precedents, made the Celebration not the sequel to the C. ceremonies but their organic framework. The sacring of a king, like that of a bishop (which it resembles in a number of particulars), now comes between Creed and Offertory. The Lit., with Veni Creator, Sursum corda and a consecratory Pref., had been displaced in 1689 from just before the anointing, but Veni Creator and a consecratory pr. were now restored to that place. The pr. contained a new feature, the explicit petition, "Regard, we beseech Thee, the supplications of Thy congregation. Bless this Oyl," with a direction to the archbishop to lay his hand upon the ampulla. Analogous words had in 1662 taken the place, just before the administration of Bapt., of the preliminary benedictio fontis discontinued in 1552; and it seems clear that Compton intended the new formula to take the place of the consecrating of the balm on the morning of the C. by a member of the Westminster Chapter, if a bishop—usually the dean was one. In 1702 however these words disappeared, but the direction for the manual act remains to this day. It should be added that Compton introduced an explicit statement of the grace bestowed by the anointing, viz., the Spirit's sevenfold gift—"as in Confirmation," Grosseteste had answered an inquirer centuries earlier. In 1689 the places anointed were reduced to three—head, breast and hands. The crowning was put at the end of the investitures, and a new ceremony was borrowed from the consecration of a bishop—the delivery of the Bible, previously carried with the regalia and the sacred vessels in the procession. Bale has a story of Edward VI, when he saw Curtana and the swords of spiritual and temporal justice, asking for a fourth sword, the Word of God, and Macaulay, Stanley and others unnecessarily accuse James II of omitting this ceremony, which had no existence. The William and Mary rubric did not mention the vestures which have usually been worn, such as the alb (colobium sindonis), the supertunica or dalmatic, and the armill or stole. The C. no longer took place on a holy-day. An important change was made in the Oath—vulgarily confused with the Accession Declaration which is usually made in Parliament. The promise to "keep and confirm to the people of England the laws and customs to them granted by the Kings of England, your lawful and religious Predecessors," disappeared, and the promise to hold and keep the laws and rightful (droiturelles) customs which the folk and people (Henry VIII, noblys) of the kingdom shall have chosen (aliter, shall have) was modernised. Then followed a vow to maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel (Tudor addition), and "the Protestant Reformed Religion established by Law," as well as the rights and franchises of the clergy—the phrase, "granted to them by the glorious King, St. Edward," being omitted. Synodical objection had been made to the word "Protestant," but it was argued that a Romanist sovereign might put a "false and subdulous construction" on the sentence without it. It is balanced by the phrase, "defence of the Catholick faith," in the delivery of the Ring. The present Oath contains also an engagement to "preserve inviolably the Settlement of the Church of England, and the Doctrine, Worship, Discipline and Government thereof." At this C. the Commons, with their Speaker, were given a prominent place in the north transept; at a later date they actually had a gallery built for them over the high altar. But they have no constitutional recognition in the Solemnity.

From 1689 to 1821 the service underwent very little change, though a Mattin office substituted in 1689 for the King's Vigil was discontinued, and the "trunk-hose C." of George IV was one of quite feudal splendour, albeit shorn of some ecclesiastical features. At William IV's accession the Reform agitation was at its height, the Times spoke of the C. as a barbarous ceremony, "compounded of the worst dregs of popery and feudalism," and Lord Grey urged the King to declare it unsuited to modern ideas. Under pressure from Archbishop Howley the King consented to be crowned as a concession to scrupulous consciences, but the cost was to be as small as possible, and the ceremony confined to the service in church. The very ancient ceremonies in Westminster Hall before the C. were abolished, as well as the subsequent Banquet with all its picturesque chivalric services, the Champion and the rest, though these are expressly only in abeyance; also the great liturgical Procession of the King and his Consort (under canopies borne by the barons of the Cinque Ports), his nobles, judges and high estates of the realm, on a raised flower-strewn platform from the Hall to the Abbey church, with standards flying, trumpets blowing, drums beating, perfumes burning, richly vested choirs singing psalms and antiphons, prelates in copes bearing the sacred vessels, and great officers of State the Regalia. In the service itself some minor changes were made. The King was anointed only on the head and hands, Queen Adelaide only on the head. There was no girding with the Sword, no houselling Pall, no ceremonial gloves or under-vestures—the King wore an admiral's uniform with trousers—no kiss received from the consecrating prelates (osculum episcoporum): the crown of St. Edward was not exchanged at the end of the service for the crown imperial, and the tone of the ps. was in several places lowered. The C. of seven years later was on similar lines, but a procession from Buckingham Palace to the Abbey did something to supply an outdoor spectacular element, and revived in a modern form the ancient Progress from the Tower on the day before the C. In 1902 the King and Queen made a progress through London on a later day. The last-mentioned C. was carried out with much care and reverence, but the expectation that features abandoned in 1831 would be restored was disappointed, save that King Edward VII was anointed on the breast, as well as on his head and palms, the Sword was girt upon him, and the vestures were specified in the rubric. The first Oblation (a rich pall and ingot of gold) was merged in the royal Oblation at the Offertory, and a very important alteration was made by the Fealty of the Bishops and the Homage and Sustentatio coronae of the Princes and Peers, being performed by the first only of each Order. An equally inevitable change was the discontinuance of the Princely Largess, a relic of Byzantine donatives, but given afterwards a spiritual symbolism as a type of the gifts of the enthroned Christ. The ancient Secret was retained at the Offertory, but for some reason the Proper Preface was omitted. The Bishop's "Caps" are not mentioned—until James II mitres seem to have been used. The King's Imperial Crown is spoken of, but, owing to his recent illness, his Majesty is said only to have worn the lighter St. Edward's Crown—in the rubrics the Confessor is again called "Saint." His name clings to the ornamenta (including the Chair of Anointing) used in the service, though the ancient jewels and vestures, some of which may actually have been his, were destroyed in 1649 by the Long Parliament. The whole of the high solemnity centres round St. Edward's shrine, the symbol, in our fathers' eyes, of the nation's continuity.

The parts of the rite are briefly these: Processional Entrance and Anthem (ladatus sum); humble Adoration to the Altar; Recognition, or Presentation of the Sovereign to the Homagers (anciently to the People) from the four sides of the Theatre, and Acclamation; First Oblation and Pr. (Deus humilium); Delivery of Regalia to the Archbishop at the Altar; Lit. sung by two Bishops in Copes; Introit and Order of HC as far as the Sermon, during which the King sits covered "on the south side of the Altar"; Oath, the King first sitting, and then kneeling at the Altar-step with his hand upon the Holy Gospel which he kisses and retires to his seat; the Anointing, introduced by Veni Creator and a Consecratory Pr., after which, while Unxerunt Salomonem is sung, the King, disrobed and uncovered, goes with his supporters and high officers to St. Edward's Chair placed before the Altar, and, while four Knights of the Garter hold over him a rich pall, is anointed by the Archbishop, assisted by the Dean of Westminster, in the form of a cross, certain words being said at each anointing. Kings of France and some English ones knelt for the unction. The King then kneels at a faldstool and receives the Archbishop's blessing; after which he sits, and the Dean of Westminster puts on him the Colobium Sindonis and Supertunica, with girdle. This, the most mystical part of the rite, is followed by the knightly investitures performed by the Lord Great Chamberlain, and the deliveries of: (1) the Golden Spurs; (2) the Sword, "brought from the Altar of God," and, after he has been girded with it, offered by the King at the Altar-step, and redeemed; (3) the Armilla or Stole and Imperial Mantle, and Orb with the Cross (brought from the Altar and returned to it); (4) the Ring, the Glove, and Sceptres, with Cross and Dove; (5) the Crown, first presented with pr. at the Altar and then put "reverently" on the King's head by the Archbishop, assisted by other Bishops. Then follow Acclamations, Trumpets, Tower Guns, the Peers and Kings of Arms meanwhile covering themselves with their coronets; Pr. and Anthem (Confortare); Delivery of the Holy Bible, which is "reverently placed again upon the Holy Altar"; Solemn Benediction; Te D., during which the King goes in state to the "Chair of Repose" below his Throne on the Theatre; Inthronization; Fealty and Homage; Supporting of the Crown; Anthem, drums, trumpets, and acclamation; Consort's C.; Resumption of the Order of HC, the King uncrowned offering Bread and Wine; also gold. After communicating, the King and Queen resume their Crowns and Sceptres and repair to their Thrones. When the Blessing has been given, the King and Queen pass in full state through the Area or Sacrarium, north and south of the High Altar, into St. Edward's Chapel, when the Regalia are laid on the Altar. Arrayed in robes of purple velvet, crowned and carrying, the King, Orb and Sceptre with Cross, and the Queen, Sceptre with Cross and Ivory Rod with Dove, they proceed through the church to the West door. Since the exclusion of Westminster Hall from the solemnity, a temporary annexe has been built at the West end of the church. Westminster has not always been the scene of coronations, which took place in early Saxon times at Kingston-on-Thames, and have been celebrated also at Winchester, London, Oxford, Gloucester and Bath.

The present service of C. of a Queen Consort, despite some modernisation, is substantially the rite used a thousand years ago. After the Homage of the Nobles to the King, the Consort arises from the Chair on the Theatre and goes, supported by two Bishops, to the Altar-steps, where the Archbishop—in 1902 of York, but this was an innovation—says a consecratory pr. over her. She then arises and "cometh to the place of her Anointing," nearer to St. Edward's Chair. Four Peeresses holding a rich pall over her as she kneels, "the Archbishop poureth the Holy Oil upon the Crown of her head," the hair of which should be flowing; but until Queen Adelaide the Queens of England, like those of France and none other, were anointed also on the breast, the Great Lady Assistant first opening the apparel. Until the 17th cent. oil was used for the former anointing, chrism for the second. The Stuart Orders specified the form of a cross. The Queen then receives the Ring (like the King, on the fourth finger of the right hand), and her Crown brought from the Altar, whereupon the Peeresses cover themselves with their Coronets. This is followed by the delivery of the Sceptre and the Ivory Rod, after which the Queen is conducted to her Throne beside the King's, "bowing herself reverently to his Majesty as she passeth by him." The Byzantine emperors themselves crowned their Consorts, as the Tsar still does (cp. Esth. 2 17). The Queens of France were crowned not at Rheims but at St. Denys. It has been disputed whether an English Queen Consort has a right of C., apart from the "demand" of the Sovereign. Caroline of Brunswick was turned away from the Abbey doors in 1821; Henrietta Maria, in 1626, declined an Anglican C.; Anne of Denmark—like King John—would not communicate; Henry VII deferred the sacrificing of his bride, Elizabeth of York, for fourteen months after his own, that he might not seem to owe his authority to his alliance with her. The earliest record of a Queen Consort's C. is that of Judith, Queen of Ethelwulf in 856. The unprecedented ceremony of a double C. took place in 1689, when a chair was made for Mary resembling that of her husband. Anne's spouse had no part in her Coronation.—S3. DOUGLAS MACLEANE.

CORPORAL PRESENCE.—See BLACK RUBRIC.

CORPORAS.—Beside the "fair white linen cloth," as our rubric terms it, it has been long customary to spread another cloth on the altar on which the bread may be consecrated as the Sacr. Corpus Domini; hence the name of the cloth, "corporas" or "corporal"; this cloth was also sometimes called the "pall." Before the 5th cent. strict rules were laid down to secure that the C. should be of fine white linen only, in memory of the Saviour's winding-sheet; hence the name sindon for the C. in the Ambrosian Missal. Originally the C. covered the whole altar slab; subsequently it was reduced in size, but was still large enough to be used to cover over the Chalice and Hosts which lay on it; at last it was divided into two, one part becoming a cloth of some 20 in. square, on which the elements are placed for consecration; the other part, forming a cloth some 6 or 7 in. square, and generally called "the pall," being used to cover the Chalice. The PB of 1549 directed that at the Offertory the bread for consecration should be laid "upon the corporas,¹ or else in the paten": the pall is not mentioned, because at that time the division of the corporas had not taken place in England. A sort of portfolio, covered with silk, called the corporas-case or burse, was and is used to keep C. neat and clean. Anciently the C. was dedicated to its sacred use by a form of prayer.—R3.

T. I. BALL.

CORPORATION.—A C., whether lay or eccles., may be either "aggregate" or "sole," that is, either an organised group of two or more persons, or a single individual. In the former case the combination is regarded by the law as equally an entity with the latter, and in both cases the C. is invested with rights and responsibilities, arising out of the special objects of its existence, distinct from those of the persons concerned in their private capacity. Every C. aggregate, besides having a corporate name, under which legal proceedings may be taken by or against it, is bound to have a common seal, for the authentication of the documents which it issues and as a guarantee of bona fides, the seal being accepted as evidence of intentions and obligations in all disputes that happen to come before the law courts. Conspicuous among bodies of this kind are the ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION, the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, the administrators of QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Formerly, such Cs. could only be established by charter from the Crown or Act of Parliament, unless the title had been won by immemorial prescription. The changed conditions of modern times have, however, led to various enactments during recent years, which allow of the formation of similar societies apart from either authority, and with much the same character as Cs. strictly so called. In England churchwardens are regarded as quasi-corporations, though they have no common seal, and do not come within the legal definition.

A "corporation sole," as the term implies, consists of one person, such as the sovereign, the bp. of a diocese, and the vicar of a parish. All eccles. bodies of this nature and many others are liable to visitation, for the obvious reasons of securing efficiency, and keeping them within their powers, the rights of visitors being determined by the special character of the institutions concerned. The Crown is the legal visitor of the abps.; each abp. the visitor of the bps. in his province; and each bp. the visitor of the Cs. eccles. in his diocese.—A3.

G. WORLEY.

COTTA.—The name given to a short surplice reaching to the waist and edged at the sleeves and round the bottom with lace. It is a purely Roman vestment, and is warranted neither by authority nor by custom in the Church of England.—R3.

J. O. COOP.

COUNCIL.—Ch. Cs. are usually divided into five classes, viz.: General when representing several different nations, becoming Ecumenical when representative of, and accepted by, the whole Ch., National, Provincial, or Diocesan, if confined to a single nation, province, or diocese. The advantage, not to say the necessity, of such consultative meetings for the purpose of government and organisation is sufficiently obvious; and no less so for the consideration of doctrinal questions, especially when, upon the intrusion of heresy, it becomes desirable to ascertain the collective mind of Theologians upon the point at issue, and to have an authoritative pronouncement upon it for the guidance of the faithful. Under the Old Covenant provision was made for such necessities in the great C. of the Sanhedrin, which met at Jerusalem; the subordinate local courts answering much the same purposes as some of the modern diocesan and parochial institutions.

¹ [The C. is thus one of the "Ornaments of the Church" in use "by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of K. Ed. VI." and therefore strictly legal, though the patron may now not be dispensed with.]

The earliest recorded Council of the Christian Ch. assembled under the presidency of St. James to consider the debatable question of circumcision, and, after full discussion, decided against the imposition of the rite on Gentile Converts.¹

The Holy Orthodox Eastern Ch. recognises seven Ecumenical Councils as representing the whole of Christendom, viz.:—

2. General Councils.

(1) A.D. 325, Nicaea, condemned Arian heresy, and promulgated Nicene Creed; (2) A.D. 381, Constantinople, condemned Macedonian and other heresies, and reaffirmed the Creed; (3) A.D. 431, Ephesus, condemned Nestorian heresy; (4) A.D. 451, Chalcedon, condemned Eutychian heresy; (5) A.D. 553, Constantinople, condemned the survival of heresies previously mentioned; (6) A.D. 680, Constantinople, condemned the Monothelites; (7) A.D. 787, Nicaea, defined veneration due to images.

The Roman Church adds the following:—

(8) A.D. 869, Constantinople, deposed Photius; (9) A.D. 1095, Clermont, first Crusade decreed; (10) A.D. 1123, Rome (1st Lateran), confirmed Concordat of Worms; (11) A.D. 1139, Rome (2nd Lateran), condemned errors of Arnold of Brescia and others; (12) A.D. 1179, Rome (3rd Lateran), condemned the Albigenses and Waldenses; (13) A.D. 1215, Rome (4th Lateran), repetition of the previous Council, with further steps to the same end; (14) A.D. 1245, Lyons, deposition of Frederick II, and defensive measures against Mohammedans; (15) A.D. 1274, Lyons, attempted reconciliation of E. and W. Churches; (16) A.D. 1311, Vienne in Dauphiné, suppression of the Knights Templars; (17) A.D. 1414-18, Constance, condemned doctrines of Wycliffe and Huss, and healed the papal schism; (18) A.D. 1431, Basle, further attempted union of E. and W. Churches, and proposal of certain reforms; (19) A.D. 1438-42, Ferrara-Florence, continuation of preceding Council; (20) A.D. 1512-17, Rome (5th Lateran), annulled the Pragmatic Sanction, and confirmed the bull "Unam Sanctam"; (21) A.D. 1545-63, Trent, formulated most of the distinctive RC. doctrines; (22) A.D. 1869 (adjourned

¹ The conciliar element in Ch. polity is further considered under ORDER.

1870), Rome (the Vatican), decreed papal infallibility.¹

Whatever difference of opinion there may have been, and still is, amongst English divines, as to the authority of later Cs., there has been an almost unanimous agreement in accepting the decisions of the first four. The fifth and sixth have been received with some hesitation and reserve, which may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that these, as supplementary to the preceding two, were virtually included in them. But on the whole the English Ch. may be considered at one with the Eastern in recognising the validity of the seven great Cs. as truly Ecumenical, though the last of the number, as occupied with a purely local controversy (the Iconoclastic), is not one which concerns her.

In all these cases, to which the 8th may be added, the summons came from the civil ruler

3. Power to Summon. has been followed in our own branch of the Ch. by making "the commandment and will of Princes" an indispensable condition to such assemblies (see Art. 21). The Ch. of Rome, on the other hand, has set this principle aside, on the decision of the 5th Lateran C. (Sess. xi), which so far asserted the Church's independence of the State as to give the right of convocation and dissolution to the Pope for the time being. For the management of its own affairs, provision is made in the Ch. of Eng. by the councils known as CONVOCATIONS, which are subject to the fore-mentioned condition, in that they cannot be summoned without authority from the Crown, or enact any new canons without the royal licence, prerogatives secured by the statute of 25 Henry VIII, c. 19.

Etymologically, there is scarcely any perceptible difference in the terms for the various kinds of Cs. held in this country, all practically indicating the same thing, viz.: an assembly of people, whether clergy or laity, or both combined, for mutual consultation. In modern language and practice, however, a special significance has been acquired in each case, more or less accurately defining the nature, functions, and authority of the respective bodies, as will be seen from the following examples, chosen for their bearing on the history of the National Ch. and of the PB.

The Lambeth Conference, held at the official seat of the Abp. of Cant. which gives it its name, dates from 1867. The assembly so

4. Lambeth Conference. called was then convened for the first time, in response to a very general desire in the Episcopate of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION for opportunities of mutual consultation with the Primate, on such problems of the day as might present themselves for discussion, and admitted of settlement within the Ch., or on which her representatives might offer their advice. The experiment was repeated in 1878, and has since become a regular institution, held at intervals of ten years, with a marked increase in the attendance of bishops, which rose from under 80 on the first occasion to 242 in 1908, with a corresponding development of interest and influence in the meetings. These are purely consultative and advisory, but the resolutions there passed cannot but carry great weight, as embodying the collective opinion of the Anglican Episcopate on the questions at issue.

[The proceedings of the first three have been collected in a volume, those of the last two vols. in pamphlet form. In each case there is an Encyclical letter summing up the conclusions of the Conference, a series of resolutions embodying the points explicitly agreed upon, and the reports of the committees on the groups of questions specially considered.]

The Pan-Anglican Congress, held in June, 1908, was, as its name implies, a representative gathering of the Eng. Ch. and of the Churches in communion therewith throughout the world. Otherwise, it may be described as an

5. Pan-Anglican Congress. extension, for a particular purpose and occasion, of the Lambeth Conference, out of which it arose, and in connection with which it was arranged to take place in the same year that the Conference was assembled for its decennial meeting. Preparation was made for it about six years before, in the letter addressed by the United Boards of Missions of Canterbury and York on Dec. 15, 1902, to the Abps. and Bps. of the Anglican Communion, inviting them to the Congress, with a prospectus of the scheme, which included a thank-offering, to be presented at the final service in St. Paul's Cathedral, and used for the propagation of the Christian Faith throughout the British Empire and its dependencies. The Congress was not in the least intended as a demonstration of Anglicanism; on the contrary, it was approached in a spirit of prayer and humility, and the inaugural service, held in Westminster Abbey on June 16th, was distinctly of a penitential character, consisting mainly of intercessory prayer and confession of sin. The rest of the week was devoted to the reading of papers and discussions upon them, the subjects having been selected from those suggested by the delegates as the most urgent at the time, and most likely to further the cause of religion and civilisation permanently. The concluding service on June 24th was attended by some two hundred and fifty English and Colonial bishops, and, although the offering fell short of that originally proposed, the respectable sum of £333,208 was collected, and presented at the altar for the purposes designed.

The Church Congress, held for the first time as an experiment at Cambridge in the year 1861, has since become an annual institution, meeting at a different centre each year, for the objects stated in the circular issued by its Standing Committee in 1905, when it was placed upon a firm permanent basis by a thorough revision of its rules and constitution. The objects were then clearly set forth as follows:

¹ For an extensive and detailed study of the subject, the reader may be referred to the collections of councils by Hardouin (12 vols., Paris, 1715), and by Mansi (31 vols., Florence, 1759); also to Bishop Hefele's Conciliengeschichte (7 vols., Freiburg), partly translated into Eng. (T. and T. Clark).

"To bring together members of the Ch. of Eng., and of Churches in communion with her, for such free deliberation and exchange of opinion and experience as shall tend to the increase of the practical efficiency of the Ch., to the consolidation and extension of her work and influence, to the discovery and removal of abuse or defect, to the promotion of unity and mutual understanding and the deepening of spiritual life amongst her members, and to the arousing of a wider interest in these subjects among clergy and laity in different parts of the country."

The meetings are held early in October—usually in some important town or cathedral city—and the proceedings are inaugurated by a service and sermon in one or more of the principal churches, followed during the week by a series of papers and discussions on the topics selected, full particulars of which are given in the programme distributed on each occasion. For permanent reference, as a contribution to the history of the National Ch., the papers and speeches are afterwards printed in extenso in a yearly volume.

Diocesan Conferences, consisting of clergy and laity, are an institution less than fifty years old. The motive lies in a recognition of the principle that the laity are, equally with the priesthood, an integral part of the Christian body, as has all along been recognised in the Reformed Ch. of Eng. and provided for in her constitution, though for a long period more or less obscured. In 1902, when the scheme had been generally developed, the objects were set forth in a report of the Cant. Conv. for that year, wherein it is expressed that:

"If the lay churchmen in every parish and in every diocese, as well as in the country as a whole, could have a legal position assured to them, whereby they might be consulted as churchmen on questions of finance, education, discipline, and general policy, and be able to give effect to their wishes, through their participation in assemblies having certain legislative functions, their whole attitude in Ch. questions would probably be changed, in that they would be restored to the healthy participation in the work of the Body, which is the token and the privilege of living membership therein."

The Conferences are usually composed of ex-officio and elected members, both clerical and lay, the bishop of the diocese being the president by virtue of his office; and the meetings are, as a rule, convened by him once a year, the right of dissolution resting in his hands, the length of the session depending upon circumstances, and the procedure upon the arrangements made in each case by a standing committee.

Similar objects are answered by the REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH COUNCIL, the PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCILS, and the RURIDECANAL CONFERENCES. The "House of Laymen" (one for each province) is, as its name implies, composed entirely of lay members, and the clergy take no part in its deliberations, though the annual meetings are usually opened by the respective Archbishops.

[The Hampton Court and Savoy Conferences were specially convened and constituted by royal authority to consider demands made for alterations in the PB (see further HISTORY OF PB, § 15-17). Both included divines favouring the Presbyterian system.

Round Table Conferences were held at Fulham Palace at the invitation of Bp. Creighton to consider, as between differing schools of thought within the Ch. of Eng., the questions of Confession and Absolution, and the Christian Priesthood. (See REPENTANCE and PRIESTHOOD.)

The Mildmay Conference (founded by the Rev. S. Pennefather, vicar of St. Jude's, Mildmay Park) and the Keswick Convention for the promotion of practical holiness (founded by Canon T. D. Harford Battersby and Mr. R. Wilson) still unite Church-people and orthodox Nonconformists in pursuit of devotional and practical ends. There is no open discussion at these. Christian Conferences exist in several provincial towns where current questions of difference or difficulty are discussed by members of various denominations. The Edinburgh World's Missionary Conference in 1910 united in a remarkable manner all sections of the Christian Ch., except the Roman and Eastern Communions, in a frank, thorough and prayerful consideration of the problems of modern missions.—G. H.—A2. G. WORLEY.

COURTS.—Some of the main conceptions which underlie the later development of Ch. law may be discovered in the NT.

1. Primitive Usage.

(a) The Ch. exercised a discipline in criminal cases (1 Cor. 5, 1 Tim. 1 20), either (i) in a manner wholly fatherly (later, in interno foro episcopali), "that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord"; or (ii) where the accused did not submit himself (in externo foro) with a view to the purity of the Ch., "Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." (b) The Ch. also exercised a quasi-disciplinary office in matters of a more temporal character which was of necessity based upon the willingness of the disputants to accept her arbitration (Matt. 18 15-17, 1 Cor. 6 1-8).¹

The Ch. did not become a collegium licitum until the reign of Constantine. The sanctions, therefore, of her judicial authority were for three centuries purely spiritual.

An exception, however, must be made in the case of Paul of Samosata, who was in A.D. 269 deposed by a synod from the see of Antioch. On his refusal to leave "the house of the church" the matter was brought before the Emperor Aurelian, who decided that the house should be given to those to whom it was assigned by the bps. of Rome and Italy. Similarly, half a century later, when Caecilian and the Donatist Majorinus claimed the see of Carthage, Constantine appointed the bp. of Rome and other bps. to report on the charges brought against Caecilian. The case was a second time at the Emperor's command investigated by the eccles. authorities at the council of Arles (A.D. 314), and finally reinvestigated by the Emperor himself, who complained that the appellants relinquentes coelestia secularia perquirunt.

While the appeals to the Emperor were often related to matters which were certainly within his province, we may observe even at this time the beginnings of the confusion of the spiritual and the secular. Heresy was sometimes punished with exile. There was early a tendency for the bp. to judge clergy who were accused of civil offences. In such cases there was an inevitable tendency to confuse the sentence which he passed in the exercise of a delegated civil jurisdiction with the exercise of his authority as the representative of the internal discipline of the Ch. itself.

¹ For a recent survey of this branch of the subject see Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, 1910, pp. 142 ff., 206 ff.

The consensual quasi-jurisdiction of the bp. as arbitrator was recognised by Constantine, who decreed that judgments in such cases should be irreversible, and his legislation on the subject was adopted in substance by Justinian. It may be traced down to the time of Charlemagne, who fundamentally altered its character and still further confused the relations of the Ch. with the State by giving to either party the right to bring the case before the bishop.

A third source of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was the surrender to the Ch. of certain classes of matters, irrespective of the persons of the litigants being peculiarly suitable for her cognisance.

With the 4th cent. began the gradual formulation of a system of appeals. The fifth canon of Nicaea allows a cleric or lay-

2. Appeals. man who has been excommunicated by his bp. to appeal to the provincial synod. There is as yet no appeal for a bp. from the decision of his comprovincials. But, in the case of St. Athanasius, there were appeals from the judgment of the synod of Tyre which was reversed by a Roman synod and was confirmed at Antioch. The synod which met in the last place passed some legislation of permanent importance and laid the foundation of the system of the patriarchates by laying upon the metropolitan the duty of convening bps. from neighbouring provinces. In A.D. 347 the Council of Sardica endeavoured to establish in cases of bps. a system of appeals in which the Ch. of Rome played a great part. These canons were rejected in the East and in Africa. The 5th cent. saw the constitution of the great patriarchates. In the East the new Rome, Constantinople, acquired "like old Rome" special pre-eminence. Our own islands now abandoned by the Empire were independent of any patriarchate.

Along with this internal development there was a development of the jurisdiction received

4. Extended Jurisdiction. from the State over spiritual persons. Small civil offences were brought within the cognisance of diocesan synods in 376. Justinian ordained that for eccles. offences trials should take place before bps., metropolitans, synods or patriarchs; as regards civil matters prosecutors are allowed, though they are not compelled ("since there are civil tribunals"), to bring the case before the bp. (Cod. i. 4 29; Novell. 83 is more precise). The lay judge tries, but sends the convicted cleric to be degraded by the bp. before sentence is executed. Novell. 123 provides an alternative procedure. The trial may be before the bp. who degrades and sends the convicted person to the lay judge for punishment. But as early as the 6th cent. some capitularies of Frank kings forbid the judging of clerks by laymen.

It is clear, then, that the system which was inherited by the Anglo-Saxon Ch. had already gravely deviated from the norm of apostolic and primitive Christianity. It has developed one-sidedly and received an admixture of alien elements which obscured at once primitive conceptions of Ch. authority and the principles on which the relations of Ch. and State are, as a rule, best adjusted.

On English soil a new source of confusion entered. The sheriff and bp. sat side by side on the same bench, and the juxtaposi-

5. Anglo-Saxon Procedure. tion of jurisdictions must have obscured their distinction. Yet we must not exaggerate the confusion. If "in the most august assembly the bp. and alderman should be present, the one should interpret to the people the law of God, the other the laws of men" (Leges Edg., c. 5), and purely spiritual courts sat before the Conquest. Thus, under a law of the 10th cent. a priest was fined for referring to laymen a cause which should have come before consecrated persons, and there are allusions to summonses before synods. Disputes between clerks are of eccles. cognisance (cp. Makower, p. 392 f.).

The council of Clovesho had decided that appeals should lie to the synod of the province. The only appeal to Rome in Saxon times was that of Wilfrid, who appealed twice successfully against the division of his diocese. The Pope's decisions in his favour were ignored.

Confusion, however, was caused by the gradual growth of a system under which temporal penalties such as scourging, banishment, seclusion in a monastery, fines, were inflicted in commutation of excommunication. It is not clear how far these were willingly accepted or inflicted in invitum. The forum externum of the bishops is confused with the forum internum on the one hand, and with his civil jurisdiction on the other.

About A.D. 1070 William I laid the basis of the future development of the Ch. courts by ordain-

6. After the Conquest. ing that cases which concerned the government of souls should be tried not in the temporal but in the bp.'s court and that the bp.'s summons to attend should be enforced by the State. From the accession of Stephen clerks were amenable only to eccles. courts (Mak., p. 392). Thenceforward the Ch. persistently endeavoured to extend the competence of her courts, in respect both to persons and causes. Henry II in 1164 endeavoured in the Constitutions of Clarendon to regulate the matter, but his compromise was rejected by the Pope who won an almost complete victory. In the 13th cent. privilege of clergy was granted to all who could read, but could not be pleaded by a clerk who was "bigamous" (i.e., by consecutive marriages).

This privilege limited the forms of punishment, but it was subject to exceptions which made it possible for the royal officers to secure respect for civil enactments (Mak., p. 404).

By art. 8 of the Constitutions of Clarendon an appeal lay from the archdeacon to the bp., from the bp. to the abp., and in default of justice from the abp. to the King who was to order the suit to be determined in the abp.'s court, beyond which (to Rome) it was not to go without the assent of the King. This was in effect the Gallican Appel comme d'abus, which might resemble either the prohibition of our King's Bench against an excess of jurisdiction of the Ch. court or be a review of its procedure. The secular judge in such cases remitted the cases to the Ch. court for retrial by another judge (Ecc. Courts Comm. Rep. 1 173).

The subjects of the jurisdiction of the Ch. courts were as follows:—(1) Matrimony (as a sacrament). The Ch. rule that subsequent marriage legitimatised bastards was settled in the 12th cent. But the secular courts took the opposite view; Ch. and State failed to agree at the Council of Merton in 1236. (2) Wills; this only affected personalty. (3) Ch. lands (subject to Constitutions of Clarendon). (4) Benefices; but advowsons were real property and excluded. (5) Tithes; suits were in secular courts until Henry II (cp. Mak., p. 431). (6) Fabrics, ritual. (7) Pious gifts, until the development of Chancery. (8) Contract, as based on promissory oaths. (9) Criminal jurisdiction over laymen: non-indictable sexual offences, defamation, offences against clerks, brawling, etc., heresy, witchcraft, schism, apostasy. (10) To these offences add, for clergy, neglect of clerical duties.

7. Range of Courts.

It is clear that the disciplinary action of the Ch. as a spiritual society had been completely confused by secular privileges, duties and activities. Excommunication had become the means of executing secular judgments, and strong effort was made to use it for the enforcement of pecuniary compensations and so for the extension of the competency of Ch. courts in civil cases. In some cases they possessed technically or virtually punitive power. Thus under the Statutes against heresy the death penalty followed automatically on the judgment of the Ch. court.

Bishop Stubbs describes as follows the machinery which was devised for the benefit of the soul of the delinquent, a phrase which is at once scathing irony and the expression of a serious claim:

8. Verdict of Bp. Stubbs.

"The Courts had their own methods derived in great measure from Roman laws, with a whole apparatus of citations, libels and witness; the process of purgation, penance, and, in default of proper satisfaction, excommunication and its resulting penalties enforced by temporal law. . . . If the delinquent held out for forty days the King's court . . . ordered the sheriff to imprison him. The proceedings furnished employment for a great machinery of judicature. . . . (p. 373). The spiritual courts, while they imposed spiritual penalties, recognised perfunctory purgations, and accepted pecuniary fines, really secured the peccant clerk and immoral layman. . . . The Ch. courts became centres of corruption which archbishops, legates and councils tried to reform and failed, choosing rather to acquiesce in the failure than to allow the intrusion of the secular power. . . . Strange to say, part of the evil survived the Reformation itself. . . . To this the Ch. of Eng. owes the vexatious procedure of the ecclesiastical tribunals and the consequent reaction which gave such strength to Puritanism: nay Puritanism was itself leavened with the same influences" (Const. Hist. 3 403; cp. Bacon, Considerations touching the Purification . . . of the Ch., Spedding 10 iii).

Henry VII restricted some of the worst abuses of benefit of clergy, and early in the next 10. The Reformation and After.

reign in the Standish case his son showed himself to be against the principle. The right was gradually restricted and disappeared altogether in 1827. The competence of Ch. courts in civil cases was only slowly reduced. Two heretics were burnt in 1612 under the writ de heretico comburendo, a writ which survived until 1677, and Toleration was incompletely decreed in 1689. The courts in Whiston's case (1711) affirmed that the mediæval rights of Convocations in cases of heresy had not lapsed. Serious offences against morality are now of temporal cognisance, but the Ch. courts are still competent against laymen. There was an incest case in the Court of Arches in 1829, at York in 1829 a suit for incontinence and another in 1830 for immoral conduct. Many cases were removed from the Ch. courts by statute in 1562–3, tithe 1836, probate and matrimony 1857, brawling 1860. 31 Eliz. made simony a civil offence but did not touch the powers of the Ch. courts. In 1813 their right to excommunicate was restrained, the civil penalty being limited to six months' imprisonment. The text-books omit an interesting point. Under 9 & 10 Vict., c. 59, the liability of persons who do not attend Ch. to eccles. censure under 5 & 6 Edw. VI, c. 1, is reaffirmed, a saving clause being inserted for the benefit of dissenters who usually attend a chapel.

The greatest change made at the Reformation was the prohibition of appeals to the Pope and the substitution of appeals to the

11. The Royal Crown. In 1531 Convocations acknowledged the King to be "the Supreme Lord and, so far as the law of Christ allowed, also the supreme head of the Church and Anglican clergy."

The great Statute of Appeals (1533) declared the independence of the realm and defined the position of the clergy thus:

"Whereas . . . this realm of England is an empire . . . governed by one supreme head and king, having the dignity and royal estate of the imperial crown of the same, unto whom a body politic, compact of all sorts and degrees of people, divided in terms, and by names of spirituality and temporality, be bounden and ought to bear, next to God, a natural and humble obedience, he being also institute and furnished by plenary . . . power . . . to render justice to all manner of folk . . . in all causes . . . without restraint to any foreign princes or potentates of the world; the body spiritual whereof having power, when any cause of the law divine happened to come in question, or of spiritual learning, then it was declared, by that part of the said body politic, called the spirituality, now being usually called the English Church, which always hath been found . . . sufficient and meet of itself without the intermeddling of any exterior person or persons, to declare and determine all such doubts, and to administer all such offices and duties."

According to this Act, the immediate occasion of which was Catherine's appeal to Rome in the divorce suit, all "causes 12. Right of Appeal Unlimited.

testamentary, causes of matrimony and divorces, right of tithes, oblations and obventions" should be heard in the King's courts spiritual and temporal; appeals should lie to the abp. without any further process except in appeals touching the King which were to lie to the Upper House of Convocation. Bp. Stubbs has argued (E.C. Comm. 139) that this Act did not "explicitly make any matter capable of appeal that was not so before; and, if heresy and misconduct of divine service were not matters of appeal before, they are not now made so." But against the Bp. must be set the evidence of Mr. Droop (294-96, 430). (See also the learned but too controversial Lay Judges in Church Courts of Mr. J. T. Tomlinson.)

The intention of Parliament to include appeals of all kinds seems to be made clear by the Act of the following year, the Act of Submission of the Clergy and Restraint of Appeals (25 Hen. VIII, c. 19, repealed by 1 & 2 Phil. and Mar., c. 8, and revived by 1 Eliz., c. 1). This Act expressly applies to "all manner of appeals" and grants an appeal for lack of justice to the king in Chancery, whereon the King was on each occasion to appoint a Commission to review the case whose decision was to be final.

The inferior Church courts were not affected by the Reformation except that under 37 Hen. VIII, c. 17, married lay doctors of civil law were empowered to exercise eccles. jurisdiction. It was intended to revise the eccles. law of the Ch. of Eng., and in the draft scheme called Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum which never became law it was provided that "whenever the cause was of grave importance the appeal devolving on the King should be heard by the Provincial Council or in lesser cases by four bishops" (c. iii).

The Commissions of judices delegati thus created were termed collectively the "High 12. Courts of Final Appeal.

Court of Delegates in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Causes." The Elizabethan lawyers maintained that, by virtue of the supremacy as they understood it, the Crown could re-hear the case de novo. The appeals to Rome had always been subject to the possibility of such a review by the Popes (Stubbs, E.C. Comm. 147). The commissions always included delegates from Doctors' Commons. Between the years 1586 and 1838 there were only 193 cases of appeal to the delegates in matters which involved doctrine and discipline (ib.); and of these only seven appeals can be shown to have even remotely involved any question of doctrine. In five of these proceedings were discontinued, in one the appeal was rejected, and in one the decision varied the decree in a minor point, confirming the decision of the diocesan court. The report of the Royal Commission issued in 1830 showed that, although the proceedings of the delegates were somewhat expensive and dilatory, no substantial charge of injustice could be laid against them. They seldom reversed the decision of the provincial courts. There was a balance of opinion in favour of the continuance of the court (ib., p. 48). But in 1832 the powers of the delegates were transferred to the King in Council and in the following year to a "Judicial Committee of the Privy Council" then constituted. The reasons given for the substitution of the Privy Council are chiefly the superior qualifications of its members, the permanent existence of the tribunal, and the publicity given to the reasons of the judgments (E.C. Comm. 1, p. xlv). This last point turned out to be a grave drawback. Under the Church Discipline Act an episcopal member of the Privy Council is for the purpose of eccles. appeals a member of the judicial committee. Under the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, a definite number of abps. and bps. are assessors in eccles. causes.

Allusion must also be made to the following courts: The Court of High Commission was created by 1 Eliz., c. 1, for the execution of the supreme eccles. jurisdiction which belonged to the Crown under the Supremacy Acts. It was abolished by the Long Parliament in Act 16 Chas. I, c. 11.

The archiepiscopal Courts of Audience became obsolete at the beginning of the 18th cent.

14. Other Courts.

Originally the abp. sat in them in person, and afterwards when his official took his place as judge he often acted as assessor (Makower, p. 461).

The Prerogative Court was originally a division of the ordinary archiepiscopal court, which became independent. It was competent for testamentary and probate cases.

The Archdeacon's Court rested until 1836 upon usage, but its full competence was established by 6 & 7 Will. IV, c. 77. The archdeacon may act in person or through his official.

The court of the Rural Dean was destroyed by the archidiaconal court, except in so far as it survives in the jurisdictions of the deans of Jersey, the Arches, Bocking and Croydon.

Under the CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT of 1840 the bp., on the application of one of the complaining parties or if he himself thinks fit, issues a commission of five persons of whom one is his vicar-general or an archdeacon or rural dean. The Commission decides whether there is prima facie ground for further proceedings.

Under the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT of 1892 five persons are members of the consistory court for the purpose of deciding on questions of fact, the decision being either the unanimous decision of the assessors or that of the chancellor with the majority of the assessors. The assessors are three clergy chosen by ballot from a list of elected clergy and two laymen from a list of lay magistrates elected by the court of quarter sessions.

Under this Act the bp. may pronounce sentence by consent of the two parties without further proceedings. Under a clause of the Public Worship Regulation Act which has never been put into operation the bp. by consent of the parties may judge without appeal.

The King's Courts take cognisance of eccles. offences not only in appeal but also as courts of first instance under the Acts of Uniformity, the penalty for the third offence under these Acts being still imprisonment for life (1 Eliz., c. 2). The last prosecution was in 1795. Again, doctrinal and other ecclesiastical questions may be raised indirectly in the King's Bench as under the old writ quare impedit upon a refusal of the bp. to institute. In such cases the ultimate appeal is to the Lords.

The power of the temporal court to restrain the eccles. within the limits of its jurisdiction is exercised by a writ of prohibition. By circumspecta agatis (13 Edw. I, c. 4), the writ is not to be quoted in spiritual cases. The prohibition may issue either in respect of the court or in respect of the matter of the suit or in respect of an obvious denial of justice in the conduct of the suit (Phillimore, Ch. Law, p. 1112 f.).

An extremely interesting court and trial in that court remain to be mentioned. In 1888

15. The Lincoln Case.

the Ch. Association petitioned Abp. Benson to cite and try Edward King, bp. of Lincoln, for certain ritual acts alleged to be illegal. The Abp.'s court had only sat once since the Reformation, viz., in 1699, in the case of Watson, Bp. of St. David's, who was deprived for simony. If the Abp. had disclaimed jurisdiction he might have been compelled to exercise it by mandamus from the Queen's Bench. If he vetoed the case, he would have assumed a jurisdiction which might have been denied on appeal. He decided neither to assume nor decline jurisdiction and did not issue the citation, thus throwing upon the prosecution the onus of establishing the jurisdiction. The judicial committee of the Privy Council unanimously affirmed the jurisdiction, laid it down that it should be exercised in person, giving no opinion as to whether the abp. was bound to exercise it, and advised the Crown to remit the case to the abp.

The bp. appeared as respondent under protest claiming the primitive right of trial before the Metropolitan in his provincial synod, with the advice and consent of his fellow-bps. The abp. affirmed the validity of his own jurisdiction. He held that the canons of the first four general Councils are still part of the law of England as regards faith and doctrine, and in other matters so far as they were applicable and not contrariant to the law of the Ch. and the realm. The court could not satisfy itself that the authority of early Ch. councils established that the trial of a bp. ought to rest with a synod of bps. only; that the authority of the first four councils is doctrinal not disciplinary, and not binding as a scheme of judicature on the Ch. at large. He did not deny the authority of a comprovincial synod, but decided that the archiepiscopal jurisdiction in the case of suffragans had been from time to time continuously exercised in various forms. The abp. took the bold course of criticising and revising judgments of the Privy Council, which in 1892 confirmed the abp.'s judgments on all points except one which it left undecided (Eng. Ch. 19th Cent., F. W. Cornish, 236a f.).

The willingness of the Privy Council to revise its eccles. decisions is a fact of great importance. The usage is now established by the Privy Council itself that in eccles. suits there is no finality in any judgment of the Crown.

The history of the attitude of the Ch. to the appeal to the Crown must be briefly indicated.

In 1531 the clergy under threat of 16. The Church and the Royal Supremacy. PRÆMUNIRE submitted in the form cited above, refusing the unqualified statement prepared by the King.

The title "Supreme Head" was continued by Edw. VI and affirmed in the 36th Edwardian Art. The consent of Convocation which the Privy Council claimed for these Arts. was probably never given. The Council in effect forged the Church's signature and in doing so recognised the rights which it violated. The use of the title occurs in Mary's first proclamations, but was repealed in 1554 and never re-enacted. In 1559 a new Act was passed which gave the Crown the title "supreme governor" and large eccles. powers. But, when some of the clergy scrupled to take the oath enjoined by the Act, the Queen put forth an explanation in An Admonition to simple men deceived by the malicious, which was appended to the Injunctions of 1559. This document restrains the Henrican conception, which it professes to approve, to a claim to the authority "of ancient time due to the Imperial Crown to rule over all manner of persons . . . of what estate either ecclesiastical or temporal soever they be so as no other foreign power shall or ought to have any superiority over them." These Injunctions mark a change in the Royal policy which may be described as the substitution of visitatorial supervision for constant intervention in ordinary administration. The distinction may be compared to the distinction between the appel comme d'abus and the appeal to the King in Chancery or in Council. In the 37th Art. the Ch. accepted the Governorship as defined in the Injunctions. In the first canon of 1604 she accepts the "statutes made restoring to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the State ecclesiastical and abolishing of all foreign power repugnant to the same." [Cp. SUPREMACY, ROYAL.]

It may be claimed for the Court of Delegates that it possessed such spiritual authority as is implied by its recognition and acceptance by the Ch. and for the Privy Council that it inherited whatever spiritual authority belonged to its predecessor, for no difference of principle can be said to distinguish the two methods of the royal justice. Apart from this the special report of the Commission which recommended the transfer was signed by the Abp. of Canterbury and three bps. The bps. in the Lords can "agree together" "without the sacrifice of any principle being made by any one." The Abp., "on the part of the clergy, gave his cordial approbation" (June, 1840). The history of the subject proves that the State has not been in this matter guilty of any deliberate attack upon the spiritual prerogatives of the Ch. The present situation has arisen per incuriam.

On the other hand, it cannot be asserted that the Ch. ever conceded the principle which logically follows—that a secular court may determine matters of faith. In the General Report of the Commission of 1830 nine pages are devoted to eccles. including doctrinal offences, and an appeal is mentioned to the abp., nothing being said about the Privy Council. The battle raged round the question of the personal jurisdiction of the bp. in the Diocesan Court. The question of the Court of Appeal received very little attention (Ec. Courts Comm. Rep. 1, p. xlv).

17. Objections to the Privy Council.

It is probable that much of the feeling which has been aroused against the Privy Council is due to its paradoxical interpretation of the Ornaments Rubric rather than to its actual constitution. But it is also probable that, if a genuine court of the Church had tried Mr. Ridsdale, almost the same group of men would have arrived at the same judgment.

On the other hand, it is also true that there are grave objections to the Privy Council as a Final Court of Appeal in spiritual cases. Lord Brougham admitted in the House of Lords that his bill had injured "to a certain extent the security which the Ch. had possessed for the soundness of her doctrines," and that the Lord Chancellor agreed with him. He added that "he could not help feeling that the Judicial Committee of Privy Council had been framed without the expectation of eccles. questions being brought before it. It was created for the consideration of a totally different class of cases, and he had no doubt that if it had been constituted with a view to such cases as the present (the Gorham case) some other arrangement would have been made" (Hans. iii. 111 629).

The theoretical objections to a secular court of Final Appeal cannot be ignored and were perceived by men like Bp. Blomfield and John Keble at an early date. The former said in the Lords in 1850: "It is competent to decide all questions of eccles. law, but not matters of divine truth; for this office it is not qualified, with reference either to the Church's original constitution or to the personal qualification of the judges." Hooker, it must be remembered, described as "absurd" the view that kings and queens in their own proper persons are by judicial decision to determine questions which arise about matters of faith (Ecc. Pol. viii. 81; Rep. R. Comm. Ecc. Disc., § 356).

The point which is now clearly seen and strongly felt is that the decisions of a law court are often not merely automatic and declaratory. A personal element enters into all interpretation, and, when a judge applies a law to cases not contemplated by the legislator, he does more than interpret the law, he carries the principles expressed in the relevant legislation to points which the legislator did not contemplate. He interprets not the words but the mind of the legislator. His action differs in degree but not in essence from the action of the Ch. when she interprets the NT. A judgment, therefore, is often more and sometimes is much more than a mere declaration and in so far as it is more it is a legislative act. A series of such legislative acts made in the name of a religious society by an external authority may easily misrepresent its mind, and in the case of a society which has no remedy in speedy legislative action the results may easily by accumulation become serious. This argument which weighed heavily with Dean Church and Mr. Gladstone cannot be dismissed as merely doctrinaire or clericalist. Mr. Llewellyn Davies admitted to the Courts Commission the legislative action of the judge (4765). It has at any rate much to do with the present paralysis of the disciplinary action of the Ch. (Rep. R.C. Ec. Disc., § 356), and no one will doubt the unanimous judgment of the Commissioners who has read the evidence, and especially that of Abp. Davidson, which is not only authoritative but also intrinsically by far the weightiest contribution to the discussion of the Ch. controversy problem which has yet been made (Min. Evidence 2 12846 f.).

We now turn to the question of remedies. (1) It must be noticed that the difficulty pointed out in the last paragraph has been lessened by the willingness of the Privy Council to revise its decisions. This of course involves the inconvenience of uncertain law, but it greatly diminishes the possibility of the construction of a judicial tradition and the risk of a process of legislation by judicial decisions.

(2) A possible way out of the difficulty may be found in a clear distinction between the civil and temporal results of a decision (e.g., between the cure of souls and the right to the emoluments of a benefice). Mr. Justice Phillimore told the Courts Commission that he contended for the entire exclusion of the civil power from the passing of any spiritual censures. So far as the temporal incidents were concerned he would "not only admit but would almost invoke the civil power" (1399). "The State might revise

19. Virtual Legislative Power.

20. Suggested Remedies.

the sentence before allowing it to have any civil effect. He compared the Code Napoléon" (1371). Similarly Lord Halifax (967), Dean Church (6941-4), Chancellor Christie (7260), Canon Liddon (7402-5). Something like this seems to be the law in the Diocese of Easton (Adelaide), (Rep. E. Cts. Comm. 2 633).

(3) There seems to be no incompatibility between the objects of the two contending sections who offered evidence to the Courts Commission. The one insisted that the court must receive spiritual authority from the Ch., the other that there should be security for judicial methods and impartiality. Now it has been shown above that English law virtually provides an appel comme d'abus, and no one could object to the strengthening of the law in this respect.

If this is regarded by many as an inadequate protection, it would seem to be possible that the bps. or the abp. representing them and the Lord Chancellor might agree upon persons who were suitable both from a judicial and an ecclesiastical point of view. Dean Church in his evidence said that the bps. "may delegate their power of course" (6910). "The presence of duly commissioned laymen would not make the court cease to be spiritual" (6954). Mr. Mackonochie "would obey any court constituted by spiritual authority or resign" (6131, 8). So Wilkinson (1790), Body (3640), cp. Gedge (4274), Littledale (4882).

(4) It is important to observe not only that, as has been already pointed out, the difficulty of eccles. legislation exacerbates the problem of the judicature, but also that the courts have encroached upon the administrative functions of the Ch. A judge determines whether an incumbent has been guilty of scandalous conduct or negligence in such a sense as to compel the infliction of a penalty, when it should rather be the duty of an administrator to administer the law (subject to due safeguards) with regard to the interest of the parish. Again, ritual grievances would but seldom be remedied by the enforcement of the Law, as Gladstone pointed out in the debates on the P.W.R. Act. In Abp. Tait's original draft of that Act, the Bp. could act on administrative lines in co-operation with a Diocesan Council and subject to a final appeal to the Abp. (Life 2 191).

The Recommendations of the Eccles. Courts Commission (1883) may be thus summarised. (1) The retention of the bp.'s veto and the substitution of deprivation for imprisonment. (2) The appeal in the 21. The 1883 Courts Commission.

Abp.'s court should be heard either by his official principal or by himself with his principal as assessor. He may appoint not more than five assessors from the bps. of the province. (3) The final appeal to be heard exclusively by lay judges who should declare themselves members of the Ch. of Eng. (4) The lay judges should do no more than determine whether impugned opinions or practices are in such conflict with the formularies as to require correction. Only the actual decree in the particular case should be binding, and not the reasoning by which it is supported. (5) The judges should have the power to consult the abp. and bps. of the province or both provinces in the same form as the House of Lords consults the judges and on the demand of one of their number shall be bound to consult them.

The Report of the R. Comm. on Eccles. Discipline (1906)¹ is of much greater weight than its

22. The 1906 predecessor inasmuch as it is Ch. Disc. unanimous. Technically it is a Commission. State document for which the Ch. is not responsible. In reality it has the highest possible claims upon the respect of clergy and laity of all schools of thought.

The report when noting causes of the failure to check irregularities observes that: (1) "It has proved impracticable to obtain complete obedience to the Acts of Uniformity in one particular direction, partly because it is not now, and never has been, demanded in other directions" (§ 355). (2) "Another strongly operative cause of the failure to secure obedience to the law has been the constitution of the Court of Final Appeal. . . . Without being itself a Ch. Court and without pretending to possess spiritual jurisdiction, it has the duty of revising, where necessary, judgments given in Ch. Courts possessing spiritual jurisdiction" (§ 356).

The Commissioners conclude that: (1) the "law of public worship in the Ch. of Eng. is too narrow for the religious life of the present generation." "The Ch. has had to work under regulations fitted for a different condition of things, without that power of self-adjustment which is inherent in the conception of a living Ch., and is, as a matter of fact, possessed by the Established Ch. of Scotland." "An adequate power of self-adjustment . . . would secure obedience . . . and justify the Ch. in insisting on the obedience of all" (§ 399). (2) "The machinery for discipline has broken down." "The law gives no right to discriminate between small and great matters" (§ 402).

They make the following mutually dependent recommendations: (1) That certain disciplinary measures be taken. (2) That "letters of business be issued to Convocations with instructions (a) to consider the preparation of a new rubric regulating ornaments. . . (b) to frame changes in the PB which "may tend to secure the greater elasticity which a reasonable recognition of the comprehensiveness of the Ch. of Eng. seems to demand." (3) That within prescribed limits the abps. and bps. should be enabled to sanction and regulate additional services, etc. (4) Increased power to refuse institution. (5) The recommendations of the Eccles. Courts Commission in 1883 . . . should be carried into effect, with one modification—to substitute for the proposal of the earlier commission (numbered 5 above) the following: "Where, in an appeal before the Final Court which involves charges of heresy or breach of ritual, any question touching the doctrine or use of the Ch. of Eng. shall be in controversy, which question is not in the opinion of the Court governed by the plain language of documents having the force of Acts of Parliament, and involves the doctrine or use of the Ch. of Eng. proper to be applied to the facts found by the Court, such question shall be referred to an Assembly of the Abps. and Bps. of both Provinces, who shall be entitled to call in such advice as they may think fit; and the opinion of the majority of such assembly of the abps. and bps. with regard to any question so submitted to them shall be binding on the Court for the purposes of the said appeal." (6) An alteration of penalties. (7) The abolition of the episcopal veto and the repeal of the P.W.R. Act. (8) The power of the bp. by monition or otherwise to order the removal of ornaments, etc. (9) Visitations, inspections and articles of inquiry should be made more effective. (10) Subdivision of dioceses.

¹ The commission consisted of the following members: Lord St. Aldwyn, the Abp. of Canterbury, Lord Northampton, the Bps. of Oxford and Gloucester, Lord Alverstone, C.J., Sir J. Kennaway, Mr. J. G. Talbot, Sir S. Hoare, Sir Edw. Cartre, Sir Lewis Dibdin, Bp. (now) Drury, Mr. G. W. Prothero, Mr. G. Harwood.

A series of cases, of which the most noteworthy was Re the Bishop of Natal (A.D. 1864), decided that in colonies possessing self-governing legislatures letters patent were of no value, and soon after the Crown ceased to issue them in the remaining colonies.

24. Other Anglican Churches.

The judicial procedures of Anglican Churches abroad is summarised in the Rep. of the Ec. Cts Comm. 2, p. 617. The details vary greatly. (1) Cases of misconduct are generally treated otherwise than cases of heresy or ritual. (2) Usually the bp. or a diocesan committee determines whether the case shall proceed, or sometimes the diocesan committee takes over the conduct of the case. (3) The bp. or a chancellor tries with varying provisions for assessors. In most American dioceses trials are before boards of triers who consist with one exception of presbyters. The bishop often has power to order a new trial. In very many important dioceses the bp. may suspend the accused during proceedings, a most important provision. In Eng. a clergyman generally and perhaps reasonably assumed to be guilty of scandalous conduct probably exercises his ministry for twelve months before he is convicted. (4) The final appeal in Ireland is to the Court of the General Synod, which consists of one abp., one bp. chosen by the abp., and three laymen selected by ballot from a list of laymen selected by the General Synod from among persons exercising judicial functions in certain named courts. Usually the appeal is to the House of Bps. In U.S.A. the Ch. as a whole is inadequately organised, and there are no provincial appeals. (5) No courts outside England seem to have power to proceed against laymen who are expressly exempted by the enabling Act under which the Courts of Melbourne and Ballarat are constituted.

During the twelve centuries which elapsed between the civil recognition of the Ch. and the Reformation the ever-increasing confusion of spiritual with secular authority and the Romanisation and clericalisation of Ch. law almost entirely destroyed the primitive conception of Ch. discipline, and in the case of the discipline of the laity made it so unintelligible to the conscience that such discipline as survived the Reformation was incapable of adaptation to changing circumstances and gradually perished. It follows that its restoration must be brought about by the revival not of some mediaeval group of canons, but of that corporate activity and corporate conscience of the Ch. to which, for instance, St. Paul and St. Ignatius appealed.

25. Lay Discipline.

In so far as the Ang. Communion is concerned, if we exclude the missionary dioceses, it is at present exercised only informally, though not altogether ineffectively, by the public opinion created by the Christian conscience. Thus, for instance, there has been an improvement of the standard demanded of wardens and sidesmen. When, however, we turn to the missionary dioceses we observe that the administration of lay discipline is one of the functions of the organised corporate life of the whole Ch. I do not suggest that the experience of the mission field is so valid for that of European Churches that the canons of missionary churches can be adopted by them en bloc. But the matter which is adduced below illustrates the kind of way in which the restoration of lay-discipline may perhaps come about under conditions of Ch. life which are at present below the horizon and the kind of courts which are likely to administer it. Observation of the somewhat similar Presbyterian organisation does not encourage the view that cases of lay-discipline would frequently arise. That cannot be until the laity have recovered a high sense of the spiritual value of their church-membership. But such organisation would regulate, educate and give channels for the expression of the public opinion of the Ch. at large, and in doing so educate, strengthen and render somewhat more explicit those disciplinary processes which are continually purging the Ch., however informally.

My illustrations are taken from three of the most highly organised churches of the Ang. communion.

26. Missionary Experience.

I. Nippon Seikokwai (Ch. of Japan, A.D. 1887). Canon 8 adopts for the discipline of the clergy the preliminary hearing by the Diocesan Standing Committee (§§ 2, 3), an institution introduced by American bps. of this Ch. "If any person offend the brethren by any wickedness of life or denial of the Christian faith such person shall be repelled by the presbyter from HC." The presbyter reports to the bp. (§ 6).

II. West. Eq. Africa (A.D. 1906), sec. v. (1) "All baptised persons claiming to be members of the Ch. and conforming themselves to the common order of the Ch. shall be recognised as such." (2) It is the duty of every member of the Ch. to contribute "Church dues," (3) the minimum amount to be fixed by the Council of each district. (4) Only male subscribers vote for Lay Representatives. (5) A list is kept by the pastor or clergyman and affixed to the church or chapel. (6) He removes from the list persons liable to be repelled from HC. There is an appeal to the District Council, thence to the bp. whose decision is final. (7) The District Council consists of clergy, licensed laymen, lay representatives, and generally provides for the pastoral, evangelistic and educational work in its district.

III. Constitution, Uganda (Ch. Council of 1900 and Synods of 1909 and 1910). Canon 26: "The office of the Parochial Ch. Council shall be to advise the Clergyman, Reader or Teacher in charge in the yearly revision of the register of Communicants." 29: Any person whose name has been removed or whom the Clergyman, Reader or Teacher has refused to enter may appeal to the District Council (= licensed clergy, readers and lay representatives, and persons approved by the Diocesan Council). Thence the appeal is to the Diocesan Synod (= licensed clergy, readers and lay representatives), from which there is an appeal to the Tribunal of Appeal = "Bishop deciding with the advice of three Assessors" appointed by the synod of whom one must be a layman and one a clergyman (58, 59). Until the Diocese of Uganda shall form part of a Province possessing a Provincial Synod, there shall be a Tribunal of Reference, consisting of the Central Consultative Committee of the Lambeth Conference (67). The Tribunal of Reference shall until the constitution of a Provincial Synod exercise all the powers ordinarily committed to a Provincial Synod (68). There shall always be a right of appeal to the Tribunal of Reference . . . except when the decision of the Tribunal of A. is arrived at by the bp. with the unanimous advice of his Assessors, in which case there shall only be an appeal to the Tribunal of Reference on leave being given by the T. of R. to appeal (69). An interesting organisation which probably much facilitates the discipline of women is the annual women's conference of each district (= women teachers, recognised women workers, women representatives of women communicants). Every three years two representatives are elected to a women's Conference meeting at Mengo, presided over by the bp. or his representative. The Conference deliberates upon women's work only (48 f.).

IV. An extremely interesting Christian adaptation of one of the primitive institutions of the Indian village communities was described some years ago by Mr. Padfield in the Churchman. It is a council of five chosen by the congregation ad hoc, which (subject to appeals) decides petty squabbles (the ancient Christian arbitration) and scandals apparently with much success. It is called the Panchayat (पञ्च).

That it is possible that the Ch. might advance with general consent on such lines as those indicated in these canons is shown by a passage in the learned but too controversial work of Mr. Tomlinson: "Those who yearn to see 'Discipline of the laity' restored should study the Reformatio Legum (see also Bp. Hooper's Later Writings, Parker Soc., p. 51), which provides that some of the 'ancients of the parish' should be associated with the minister; and in the 'form of receiving penitents' the minister was 'to ask the people whether they would grant his desires'; who were to answer they would; then the pastor was to absolve, etc. This was regarded in the 16th cent. as a return to 'Church' Principles as contrasted with sacerdotal autocracy, and it is on these lines, if at all, rather than in 'Courts' and by 'personal' judges that the 'power of the keys' may be profitably exercised hereafter" (Lay Judges, etc., p. 101). Mr. Tomlinson, like many other controversialists, is at his best when he is constructive.

Cranmer was anticipated by Marsilius of Padua, a writer of genius, whose Defensor Pacis (1325) directly influenced Cromwell and the legislation of Henry, and probably lies behind the Eccl. Pol. Basing his argument on 1 Cor. 5 4, he says "If it were done by you of common assent or else by the superior appointed therewith by the higher power of the laity which is all one thing and therefore the apostle did not command the whole tragedy of this thing to be done by any priest neither did he write to any bishop or priest": "Albeit the pronouncement of such manner of sentence ought to be done by the priest" (Marshall's translation, made with Cromwell's approval; cp. H. J. Bardsley, Church and Parliament).

Maitland, Canon Law in Eng.; Makower, Const. Hist., c. 5; Reports of the Eccl. Cts. Commissioners, 1832 and 1883; Abp. Tait's Preface to Broddrick and Fremantle's Eccl. Judgments; Dibdin, Ch. Courts; Tomlinson, Lay Judges in Ch. Courts; Phillimore on Eccl. Jurisprudence (Enc. Brit. 11); DCA, arts. Jurisdiction and Penitence (cp. RITUAL LAW and Tables)—A5.

COUSINS' MARRIAGE.—The M. of cousins in any degree is permitted in the Ch. of Eng. These Ms. were not forbidden by the codes of the Pentateuch. At certain periods the M. of first cousins was forbidden by the law of ancient Rome. St. Augustine De Civ. Dei 15 16) says that in his day such Ms., though permitted by the laws, were rarely contracted: that men shrank from a lawful course on account of its nearness to the unlawful. The Council in Trullo or Quinisext (A.D. 691) forbade the M. of first cousins. The Emperors Leo the Isaurian and Constantine (A.D. 740) extended the prohibition to second cousins. In the West intermarriage came to be forbidden to the 7th generation. Thus the Synod of London in A.D. 1102 prohibits intermarriage usque ad septimam generationem. Such prohibition was, however, subject to dispensation. It has never been contended that the M. of cousins contravenes the law Divine. The Anglican table of PROHIBITED DEGREES has no prohibition of these marriages.—MA.

O. D. WATKINS.

COVENANT.—In the PB the word C. (1) is used once of an agreement between two human beings, viz., in the Marriage Service ("the vow and C. betwixt them made"). In this case mutual promises are exchanged, a "token and pledge" is given and received, and the significance of these is intensified by the solemn rite by which they are accompanied.

(2) It occurs also in Benedictus at MP (Lk. 1 72); in the Epistles for 4th and 5th Suns. in Lent, the Tues., Thurs., and Fri. bef. Easter, the 12th and 13th Suns. aft. Trin., and the Purif. of the VM.; and in the Gospels for the Mon. and Wed. bef. Easter.

We are thus led to consider the Biblical use of the word. The Hebrew word "berith" occurs nearly 300 times in the OT. The word

2. Biblical Use. "bond" perhaps best expresses in English the various uses of this word.

In the LXX the word διαθήκη (disposition, appointment) was adopted as the usual translation of "berith" and from the LXX the usage passed into the NT. In Classical Greek this had the meaning of "will." Hence the Vulg. in the Pss. and NT translates it by "testamentum" (elsewhere in OT "foedus" or "pactum"). The English versions followed the lead of the Vulg., and therefore in some of the Epistles above mentioned the word "testament" will be found. In the RV. "covenant" has been used in the text of the NT, and "testament" relegated to the margin (except in Heb. 9 16, 17, where see note in margin).

Beginning with the OT, we find mention of: (1) Cs. between man and man, e.g., between Isaac and Abimelech and between Laban and

3. OT Usage. Jacob (Gen. 26 and 31). We see that such Cs. consisted of a mutual agreement to observe reciprocal obligations, confirmed by an oath and by a sacrificial rite. Such a C. (a) implies two parties who are free and voluntary agents, (b) is always for the good of both parties, (c) creates a new relation between them, and (d) confers a "right" on each.

(2) Cs. between God and man, e.g., those made with Noah (Gen. 6 and 9), Abraham (Gen. 15 and 17), Israel under Moses (Ex. 24 and 34), and Phinehas (Num. 25). These God always initiates; man is not an independent party to the C. The C. with Abraham is rather a "promise" than a bargain (Gal. 3 15 ff.). Circumcision is not a condition so much as a sign and a seal (Rom. 4 11-13). The C. with Israel under Mt. Sinai is more of the nature of an agreement, pledging to mutual obligations (Ex. 24 7): "This do and thou shalt live" (Lk. 10 26-28, Rom. 10 5, Gal. 3 12).

St. Paul refers in Eph. 2 12 to the Cs. of the promise (cp. Rom. 9 3-5), and in Gal. 3 15 ff. he contrasts the C. of "promise" to Abraham and his seed

4. NT Usage. with the law, and regards the Gospel dispensation as the fulfilment of that C. In Gal. 4 24 he speaks of two Cs., represented allegorically by two women. Hagar represents the C. of Mount Sinai, which bare children to legal bondage; Sarah represents the C. of "Jerusalem that is above," "which is our mother" and "is free." [See Ramsay, Hist. Comm. on Gal., pp. 349-375.]

At the institution of the Lord's Supper our Lord used the significant phrase, "This is my blood of the C. which is shed for many" (Mk. 14 24 RV.; cp. Mt. 26 28). In Lk. 22 20 the wording is, "This cup is the new C. in my blood" (cp. 1 Cor. 11 25, and see RVm in Mt. and Mk.). How significant must these words have sounded in Jewish ears. "The blood of the C." recalled Ex. 24 8. The "new" C. recalled the ancient promise (Jer. 31 31-34) that the old C. was to give place to a new and better one. The Lord's words could mean nothing less than this—that the day so long foretold was now come. The new C. was to be "in my blood." Within 24 hours our Great High Priest was to offer the C.-sacrifice to God once for all. And in anticipation of this he instituted a new rite—like the Paschal feast, it was to be a C.-meal, based upon that sacrifice. The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews dwells at length upon "the new C." and draws out the contrast between "the first C." and the second (chaps. 8-13), the Jeremian promise being fully quoted.

In illustration of the importance attached to this idea by the early Ch., it may be noted that the Scriptures were from the time of Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 4 1) and Origen (De Princip. 4 1) known as the Old and New Testaments (i.e., Cs.—cp. 11 Cor. 3 14).

In 1712 was published posthumously Bp. Hopkins' well-known treatise on The Doctrine of the Two Covenants—the C. of works and the C. of grace; and in his Doctrine of the Two Sacraments he dwells upon the Sacraments as "seals" of the C. This was the view set forth by the Reformers generally in the 16th cent. (e.g., see Bullinger's three Sacramental Sermons in his Fifth Decade). Bp. Harold Browne in his Comm. on the Aris. (pp. 623-4) says: "Baptism is admission into the Christian C., as circumcision was admission into the Jewish C. Now a C. implies two parties . . . God's part in the new C. is this: He assures to us pardon, the Spirit, life eternal. We promise renunciation of sin, faith in the Gospel, obedience to the commands. This is the C. between God and man, made in Christ."

It is noticeable, however, that in the PB itself there is no use of the word "C." either in connection with Bapt. or HC, and we must be careful, if we use the phrase "Baptismal C.," to keep true to the NT thought of the C. as being primarily a Divine promise and not a legal bargain.—K1. J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

CRAFTS.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS.

CREDENCE.—This word is derived from the low Latin Credentia, which signifies merely a sideboard; it is used to designate the small table, fixed or movable, very generally placed against the south wall of the sacarium, to receive the articles required at the celebration of the Euch. till they are needed for actual use. The use of the C. is purely utilitarian, it has no doctrinal or mystical import whatever. It is doubtful if in mediæval times our churches were generally provided with C. Tables; a niche, a shelf, or the sill of a window serving often for this purpose at plain services. At high services in large churches where there were many clerks the things required were often conveyed at the appropriate time from the vestry to the altar, sometimes with considerable ceremony; a C. Table was then superfluous. The rubric of our present PB, which requires the Euch. elements not to be set on the Holy Table till a specified time in the service, makes the presence of a C. Table a great convenience. This was the view of the matter taken by the Privy Council in 1857, when in the St. Barnabas' Case a C. Table was allowed, though not explicitly required by any rubric. It is worth remembering that Bishop Andrewes (whom Archbishop Laud followed as his guide in these matters) furnished his chapel with a C. Table.—R3. T. I. BALL.

CREED.—The simplest distinction between C. and Art. may be found in the Ch. Catechism: "Rehearse the articles of thy belief." A C. proper is a summary of the things most surely believed. An Art. is a definition of one detail, or a subsidiary doctrine, in relation to the controversy of the day. The chief creed-making epochs have been:—(i) the 4th cent., when Christianity became a permitted religion, and the Arian controversy compelled theologians to define certain doctrines more exactly; and (ii) the 16th cent., when the discovery of the New World, the invention of printing, and the study of the Greek Test. after centuries of neglect, led to a great enlargement of men's minds, and a reconsidering of the foundations of belief.

Until the 4th cent. there was only one class of Cs., the Baptismal Creeds of the different Churches, although individual theologians were ready enough to express their opinions on the Rule of Faith. Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, may all be cited in this connection, and the general trend of theological opinion improving the analysis of the universal historic Faith culminates for the Ante-Nicene period in the Creed of Gregory the Wonder-worker.

After the Council of Nicaea we distinguish a second class of Conciliar Creeds. Our Nicene C. represents a fusion of the first with the second, since a section containing the debated term homousios, "of one essence," has been grafted into a Baptismal C., probably that of Jerusalem, revised by Cyril after 362 A.D., which became the Baptismal Creed of Constantinople. In the eloquent words of Mr. C. H. Turner: "If the Ap. Cr. is inalienably associated with the initial stages of the Christian life, a part of the preparation for the Sacrament of Bapt., the Constantinopolitan Creed has acquired an equally organic connection with the fullest expression of Christian life in the Sacrament of the Euch. . . . To this position no other form of C. ever aspired than that of Constantinople. Alike in the Greek, the Latin, and even the Coptic Churches, its majestic rhythm and its definite, but simple and straightforward, theology have marked it out as the Creed of Christian Worship."

Our Athanasian C. (Quicumque vult) represents a further development of individual teaching on the rule of faith, and is typical of a third class of Personal Creeds, which in this case has merited recognition and acceptance by the whole Church, although the Eastern Church does not provide for its use either as Creed or as Canticle.

Speaking strictly, there is only one Ecumenical C., the Nicene, which has superseded other forms of Baptismal C. in the East. This is the accepted standard of Christian Belief, and is recognised as such in the "Lambeth Quadrilateral."

[See, further, arts. on the several Creeds; also ARTICLES OF RELIGION for relation to Confessions of Faith; DOCTRINE, and AUTHORITY.]
—U. A. E. BURN.

CRIME is a general term for public wrongs,¹ and includes treasons, felonies and misdemeanours. A comparative table of felonies and misdemeanours will be found in J. F. Stephen, Gen. View Crim. Law, iv (1890), 65-6. In the canons (109, 113, 117) the word is used vaguely for gross offences: "Notorious Crimes" and "Scandals" in the title of c. 109 apparently corresponding respectively to "adultery, whoredom, incest or drunkenness," and to "swearing, ribaldry, usury, and any other uncleanness and wickedness."—A5. R. J. WHITWELL.

CRIMINOUS CLERKS.—It was a privilege of clerks in orders, when prosecuted in a temporal court, to be discharged thence and handed over to the Court Christian, in order to make canonical purgation. Henry II began to remedy this by the Constitutions of Clarendon, 1164; but the last relics of the privilege were not formally abolished till 1830.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

CROSS.—The purpose of this article is to treat of the cross as an ornament used in our churches, its history as such, its legitimate and appropriate use, and its symbolism.

1. Aim of Article.

The distinctive feature of the Christian altar up to the ninth cent. is the prominence and respect given to the holy table as the place of Oblation. In form it was a cube and not oblong, and it stood as a table in all simplicity, accessible from all sides. During this early period the altar was considered to be too sacred to bear any object save the Holy Mysteries and the ornaments absolutely required for the offering of the Christian Sacrifice.

¹ "Crimes are wrongs whose sanction is punitive, and is remissible by the Crown, if remissible at all"—Kennedy, Owl. Crim. Law (1909) 25.

To this general rule one exception is to be noted—the Textus, or Book of the Gospels, rested upon the altar from the commencement of the service until the Holy Gospel was read. But, in considering this solitary exception, it is to be observed that the Book of the Gospels was regarded as representing our Lord, as was the case later with the cross, and as the altar itself was regarded as His throne, sedes Christi. (See Ed. Bishop, Hist. of Christian Altar 5.)

All other objects, ornamental or symbolic, were of set purpose placed around, above, and apart from the altar—not upon it. This accounts in some measure for the absence of the altar C. proper in early times. In order to mark the sanctity of the Table of the Lord, it was surrounded and surmounted by a canopy resting on four columns, known as the ciborium (see Atchley, Ordo Rom. Primus 121, 22). From and between the four pillars veils were hung, enclosing the altar and hiding it from view. The ciborium served as a guard and a mark of honour, covering the seat of Majesty. Now it is to this ciborium that we must look for the origin of the ornaments which we are now accustomed to see placed upon the altar itself. Hanging lamps and crowns of precious metal studded with gems were suspended by chains from the inner dome of the ciborium, directly over the mensa of the altar; and, what is of moment in this article, the C. was specially honoured by a place upon the very apex of the ciborium. Where the C. was not so placed, it hung from the inner vault of the ciborium over the altar, sometimes surrounded by a corona, or was placed on the ground beside it: and this was the case also in regard to the altar candlesticks or standing lamps.

Here we find the origin of the altar C. and candlesticks of modern times. By the 13th cent. at least the C. had been transferred, in some churches, from the ciborium, and placed upon the altar itself; but it was only by slow degrees that this arrangement became widespread; in fact, it was not de rigueur in the West till the beginning of the 17th cent. This placing of the C. upon the altar appears to be the result of the disuse of the ciborium, on the summit of which, or depending therefrom, it had found its place.

At present the altar C. and lights seem to be in general use in the East, though their arrangement on the altar itself has come about later than in the West; whilst in Russia these ornaments are frequently placed, not on the altar but on the floor behind, showing the transition from the position on the ciborium to that on the altar itself, referred to above. In the 9th cent. we find permission to place upon the altar a reliquary—a chest containing relics (Thiers, Sur les principaux autels . . . , 1829ff.). The ancient principle of no unnecessary ornament being allowed upon the Lord's Board being thus surrendered, infringement in time went further, the C. and candelabra also finding place thereon.

As the ciborium arrangement was modified and gave way to later structural developments, the position of C. and lights on the altar became more common, until in our own day it has become practically universal in the West. But, from what has been said above, it will be seen that the use of a C. standing on the altar or on the base of the reredos is very far from being a Catholic usage: in fact, the extraordinary importance attached to having a C. on the altar during the celebration of the Eucharist cannot claim support from antiquity, but the reverse. The common notion that an altar without a C. thereon is a mark of Protestantism is to be resolutely combated, as being untrue to historical fact.

4. A Cross on the Altar not necessary.

The importance now attached to the altar C. is doubtless due to the absence in most Anglican churches of the rood—a central crucifix with attendant figures—in pre-Reformation times set up in a prominent position over the screen dividing the quire from the nave, which is the last place in passing up the church where a C. suggestive of suffering and death should be set up (see CRUCIFIX).

In early times, and for long after, all associations of the Christian altar were, from an artistic and symbolic point of view, suggestive of our Lord in glory; but, whilst this observation applies to the realistic crucifix and unadorned C., it must not be understood to exclude the C. decorated and beautified with precious metals, enamel, and gems. Thus glorified, the C. has been regarded as symbolical of our Lord's triumph over death, and not of death itself. This is abundantly manifest from the whole character of early Christian art in connection with the C. The triumphal character of the decorated C. finds a parallel in the familiar idea of the Passion as a victory over sin and death, so finely brought out in the Passiontide hymns, Vexilla regis and Pange lingua, and by the festal character of the old rites of Palm Sunday. An examination of the early mosaics, dating from the fifth to the twelfth cent., connected with the altar, results in the conclusion that the associations of the altar are normally with our Redeemer in glory, whilst representations of the Passion are but occasional variations.

In considering the C. in relation to the altar, it is to be observed that the C. regarded as the symbol of Christ's Person is of high antiquity; and that, like the Textus, laid upon the altar, it was held to signify Christ Himself, and even regarded as our crucified Redeemer in Person (see Didron, Iconographie C. 367; DCA, art. Cross). This idea is brought out in the significance given to the altar C. and lights by Innocent III (De sacro altaris mysterio 2 a): "The cross is placed on the altar between the two candlesticks, because Christ stands in the Church, the Mediator between the two peoples" (Jews and Gentiles), "the chief corner-stone, Who made both peoples one."

For evidence concerning the altar C. since the Reformation, see Hierurgia Anglicana, ed. Staley, 1, Index sub Cross. A typical example of the altar C. in modern times is found in that given by Q. Victoria to St. George's Chapel, Windsor; it is of silver gilt and studded with gems (illustrated ib., 3, plate 10).

Before the Reformation, the only C. considered a necessity was the processional C., which the parishioners were bound to provide (Lyndwode, Provinciale 3, tit. 2).

8. Processional Cross.

Considerable evidence exists that the upper part of the processional C. was frequently detachable from the shaft, and, placed in a socket or foot standing ready to receive it upon the altar, was used as the altar C. (e.g., see Boys' Sandwich 373—"the fote of syluer for the crosse"—processional—"to stand ther on the hygh auter"). Nichols (Illus. Manners and Expences of Antient Times in England 318) states that "the Protestant Bishops had their crosses borne before them, and wore copes, till Nov. 1, 1552." For further evidence or reference see Hier. Anglic., 1, Index sub Processional Cross.

The placing of the C. indiscriminately upon every available object in a church, such as 9. Need of reserve.

service-books, book-markers, alms-bags or cushions, is most undesirable. There does not appear to be any definite ancient English custom for putting a C. or crosses on the stole. The C. should not be figured in tiles or placed on mats and carpets to be trodden upon, but is to be treated with artistic restraint and much reverence, as the sign of our redemption; it should be reserved for the more important positions and ornaments.

It may well be set once on the outside of the church upon the gable of the roof or over the entrance, and within the church specially and most effectively upon the chancel-screen, at the division of quire and nave. This is the position in which its symbolism is obvious and most helpful to devotion—the C. so placed being of a fashion suggestive of the sufferings and death of our Redeemer. Any C. placed on the altar, or above it in sculpture or stained glass, should be the C. of glory, i.e., the C. not treated in realistic but in symbolic fashion. And, lastly, the C. should appear but once, and once only, in connection with the altar and its surroundings in signification of the one, perfect and sufficient Sacrifice of our glorified Redeemer. See Brightman, The Cross in its Relation to the Altar, St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. Trans. 3 105; Ed. Bishop, On the History of the Christian Altar, Downside Review, July, 1905.

[See also CROSS (ARCHIEPISCOPAL), PECTORAL CROSS, SIGN OF THE CROSS, STATIONS OF THE CROSS.]—R4. V. STALEY.

CROSS (ARCHIEPISCOPAL).—A cross on a staff, like a processional C., carried before an abp. in his own province as a sign of metropolitan jurisdiction; it is not the same ornament as the crosier, or PASTORAL STAFF, which the abp. or bp. carries in his own hand. Both C. and crosier are in use at the present day, although there are modern instances of misuse of the former. In Scotland, metropolitan jurisdiction is held in commission by all the seven bps., whose elected spokesman, or Primus, as he is called, is, therefore, not entitled to the C., though it is sometimes carried before all when acting together. In mediæval art an abp. is generally distinguished by being represented with the C. in his hand or placed beside him: in at least one foreign example the crozier is shown in one hand and the C. in the other.—R3.

F. C. EELES.

CROZIER.—(1) The person who carried the bishop's PASTORAL STAFF, e.g., the Bp. of Durham's "crozier" in 1290. "Master Mortun" was the Bp. of London's C. in 1558. (2) The Bishop's Crook—"the Crozier's Staff." (3) (Erroneously, rarely before 19th cent.) the Archbishop's Cross. Consult NED., and J. T. Fowler, Archæologia. lii.—R3.

W. A. WICKHAM.

CRUCIFIX.—A figure of wood, ivory, metal, or other material, representing Christ crucified, attached to a cross: a representation of the Crucifixion. In Christian art there are two classes of visible representations of our Lord: (1) those which are intended to portray His divinity and His lordship over all men; and (2) those which represent His humanity, and commemorate His passion and death. The earliest of the first class are those which represent Him as the Good Shepherd (see Liddon, Easter Sermons 27 137, 138); the earliest of the second class portray Him as the Lamb. Sometimes the two ideas are combined, as in the painting reproduced by De Rossi, 2 s, which has been held to be the crucifix of the early days of persecution. In the sixth cent. the Lamb bears the cross; and towards the end of that cent. the wounds are depicted on the sides and the feet of the Lamb. Amongst the many crucifixes of this order is one described by St. Paulinus of Nola, c. 395 (Ep. 32): "Sub cruce sanguinea niveo stat Christus in agno": in this instance the figure seems to have been white and the cross red. In 691 the Council in Trullo decreed that in future the figure of Christ, instead of that of the Lamb, should be placed on crosses.

It is difficult to determine which is the earliest representation of the Crucifixion now in existence. If we regard, with Hallam, the end of the 5th cent. as the commencement of the Middle Ages, the public representation of the Crucifixion in art must be considered, in point of time, to be a mediæval usage. Crucifixes do not seem to have been placed in churches until after the 7th cent., though earlier examples as objects of private and personal devotion are known, e.g., the pectoral C. or reliquary of Theodolinda, Q. of the Lombards, c. 590, now amongst the relics in the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza (illustrated in DCA 1 312), which has the form of the Crucified with nimbus round the head, and is clothed from neck to feet in a long robe. The clothed figure is symbolical in treatment, since it was the Roman custom to crucify criminals naked. From the end of the 7th cent. the artistic or ornamental treatment began to be common, developing into robed and crowned figures of our Lord, not under the dominion of pain and death, but "reigning from the tree."

No C. has been discovered upon the walls of the catacombs, and no certain reference to the C. is made by any Christian writer during the first four centuries; and there is no conclusive evidence that Christians during that period ever placed a figure upon the cross. It is true that, in the course of excavations made near the church of St. Anastasia on the Palatine hill, a representation known as "the blasphemous crucifix" was discovered, consisting of the figure of a man's body surmounted by the head of an ass, a slave standing beside in adoration, with the inscription, "Alexamenus worships his god." This irreverent caricature belongs to the ante-Nicene age, but it can hardly be said to prove the use of the C. at the time when it was rudely scratched in the catacombs. It was doubtless the outcome of pagan ignorance and confused ideas, founded on the calumny that the Jews worshipped the head of an ass, and the truth that Christians worshipped a crucified God. This remarkable caricature is attributed (Liddon, Bampton Lect. 7 396 ff.) to the beginning of the 3rd cent. For illustration, see DCA 1 316.

Reference should be made to the representation of the Crucifixion contained in the Syriac MS. of the Gospels, in the Medicean Lib. at Florence (figured ib. 1 313), dated c. 586, in which our Lord is shown clothed in a long robe, with hands and feet fixed to the cross by four nails. In one detail all the most ancient crucifixes agree, namely, they represent our Saviour with open eyes, in dignified repose, all traces of pain on His face being absent; frequently He wears a royal crown. On the whole subject see the full discussion in DCA, art. Crucifix.

In cases where the Crucifixion, portraying our Saviour under the power of death, is represented in churches, it should surmount the

4. Position of C. chancel screen, or rood-loft, and not be repeated on the altar, reredos, or in the east window; any realistic representation of the Crucifixion in these latter positions is symbolically inappropriate. Any association of the C. with the altar is of comparatively modern growth (see Cross, §6). The requirement of an altar-crucifix in the Roman Church was not enforced until so late as 1751. The C. about the altar first appears in Rome in the mosaics of the apse of St. Clement's in the twelfth cent., and is there treated symbolically and not in realistic fashion. For evidence of the use of the C. in the early times of the English Reformation, see Burnet, Hist. Reform. ii. 117-22; Hierurgia Anglicana, new ed., 1902, 1, Index.—R4.

V. STALEY.

CRUET.—The word is derived from the French cruchette, a little jug. It is of domestic origin, but, both in mediæval and modern times, it has been used to designate the vessels in which the wine (and water) used at the celebration of the Eucharist are brought to the altar, when only a small quantity of wine is required. Anciently the cruets were made of the precious or of the inferior metals; the modern custom, at once more convenient and wholesome, is to make them of glass.—R3.

T. I. BALL.

CRYPT.—A C. is a vault or chamber partly or entirely underground and with a structure over it (locus subterraneus, γῆ

1. Origin. ἀνδραπονον μέγας τοῦ ἱεροῦ). Walafrid

Strabo, De reb. eccl. 6, says "cryptæ sunt specus subterraneæ dictæ a profunditate abrupta." In the 2nd and 3rd cents. the Christians were in the habit of meeting for worship near the tombs of the martyrs. At Rome many of the martyrs were buried in the catacombs to the south of the city, and so the subterranean chambers with the relics of martyrs in them came to be the models of the earlier and humbler churches. In the 4th cent. we find that the relics of martyrs and saints were sometimes regarded as essential in the CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES, and this undercroft or C. became an almost indispensable feature of a church. Jerome describes (Com. Ezek., c. 40) the Cs. of his time as the places where the bodies of martyrs and others were buried, and he tells us how as a boy at Rome with other companions he was wont on Sundays to enter the Cs. and to pass round the sepulchres of the Apostles and Martyrs. Gregory of Tours says (De Glor. Mart. 1 50) that the body of St. Pothinus, the martyred bishop of Lyons, was buried in the C. of the basilica of St. John, and he tells how in the city of Galathea (ib. 1 8), about 150 miles from Constantinople, there was a basilica with a hidden C. or chamber in which was preserved in a chest the seamless robe of Christ.

It was natural that, as the relics which hallowed the church were preserved in the C. or subterranean vault, so the SACRARIUM of the church should be built over it, and thus arose the habit of raising the choir and chancel some feet higher than the nave to allow of the C. which was below it. Examples of this can be seen in the Dom at Trier, the basilica of St. Gereon at Köln, and the Dom at Speyer. Sometimes the C., by reason of some special cult as at Chartres, grew into a subterranean church. In England the best specimens of these early Cs. are to be seen at Hexham and Ripon and a smaller C. at York. There are also Cs. at Canterbury and Gloucester which illustrate this fashion; but, when once the custom was established, Cs. were built in churches (or included in the plan for their building), which are of a much later date. The C. itself reminds us of the days of persecution when Christians were few and the Christian religion was not as yet sanctioned by the Empire.—26. T. SCOTT HOLMES.

CUP.—See CHALICE; PLATE, § 1.

CUPBOARDS.—In the Clergy Vestry the necessary C. are for: (a) Robes (6 feet high, 5 ft. 6 in. wide, 1 ft. deep); (b) Communion Linen and embroidered materials (more convenient if fitted with drawers in which the articles may lie flat, the size and number of drawers varying according to the articles used in the service of any particular church); (c) Strong Box or Iron Safe (see FITTINGS). The Choir Vestry C. are for: (a) Choristers' Robes (6 ft. high by 1 ft. deep, and, for a choir of thirty men and boys, 10 ft. wide. Hooks for men's robes should be fixed 8 in. apart and 5 ft. 9 in. from ground; hooks for boys' robes 5 ft. from ground, below the men's hooks in alternate positions, not vertically beneath. Two curtains with rings and rod are better than either sliding or hinged doors, both on account of convenience and noise); (b) Music (best fitted with box-files which may be purchased cheaply in music size); (c) Altar Frontals (a box with lid at top and fitted with vertical strips of wood as slides for the Frontals is best). The C. in the Church are: (a) Store-room (in tower or over vestry, for storing frames and materials for decorating, chairs, flags, banners, etc.); (b) Verger's (at west end, for verger's gown and wand, alms-plates, and additional hymn-books for use of strangers). In churches where candles are used either for lighting or ritual purposes a separate cupboard should be provided in the Choir Vestry for the use of the sacristan. (See also FURNITURE.)—R5.

G. VALE OWEN.

CURATE.—The C. is one who has the care of souls in a particular area. The PB bids us pray for bishops and Cs.: the bishop is overseer of the diocese; the C. has charge of the parish, but is accountable for it to the bishop. The PB assumes throughout that one man has responsibility in each parish,¹ though there are indications that others may share the work with him.² Such "Assistant Cs." are under the direction of the "C.," but they too are responsible to the bishop. They cannot serve without his licence or be removed without his consent. As to the different titles of a C.—rector (or parson), vicar, perpetual C.—see PARISH, § 2.

1. Definition. History.

A brief summary of the history of the office must suffice. (i) Our Lord instituted and commissioned a ministry in His Church—men who should be "stewards" (Lk. 12 41-43) and pastors (Jn. 21 15-17).³ (Cp. also 1 Cor. 4 1, 2 Cor. 3 4-9.) (ii) Even during the earliest period, when the main work of the Church was evangelistic, a local ministry was established in every Church (Acts 14 23, Phil. 1 11). (iii) In the course of the 2nd cent. the chief responsibility for the cure of souls in each place came (as a general rule) to be vested in one man—the bishop.⁴ The diocese preceded the parish as the unit of pastoral care. (iv) The work of evangelising the Anglo-Saxons was largely done by monks, but dioceses were almost immediately formed, and from the time of Archbishop Theodore the parochial system, with one "C." in each parish, came gradually to be established. (v) That the "C." represents and is responsible to the bishop in the cure of souls is shown by the facts that notice of adult baptisms is to be given to the bishop and that only the bishop can confirm.

Of course, the Commission to the Ministry precedes the investment with the cure of souls in any parish. The Ordination

2. Commission.

Service clearly teaches that the Commission comes from above. A man must have an inner vocation, and must ¹ See Rubrics at beginning and end of HC, and in Bapt., Confirm., and Marriage Services.

² Rubric in Bapt. Service, "The Curates of every Parish"; do. in Comm. of Sick, "the Curates shall exhort..."

³ Others besides the Apostles were present when our Lord gave the commission recorded in Jn. 20 21-23. But the PB in the Ordination of Priests clearly interprets this commission as given to the ministry for all time.

⁴ Of course, this fact has little to do with the controversial question of Episcopal Ordination. From the point of view of that controversy the Bishop is a minister who has a commission to ordain, and the question is whether, from the first, Ordination has been conferred only by those to whom such a commission has been entrusted. This commission does not necessarily imply episcopal one-man government.

receive the testimony of the laity to his fitness; he receives his authority, outwardly by the Laying on of the Hands of one who has the commission to ordain, and inwardly by the gifts of the Holy Spirit. When thus ordained to the cure of souls he hears the same words which our Lord addressed to the first ministers in His Church, "Whosoever sins thou dost remit they are remitted, and whosoever sins thou dost retain they are retained."

"The officers of a spiritual body are charged with spiritual work, and need spiritual power to do it. To remit and to retain sins is the mission of the Church, and the Lord, who knew the extreme difficulty of this most exacting of tasks, endowed her for it with a special gift of 'Holy Spirit' (Jn. 20:23). But the Church's duty in this respect is chiefly fulfilled, at least since the end of the Apostolic age, by the three orders of the regular ministry, and the Easter gift of the Spirit goes with this exercise of responsibility. On these grounds the Western Church was justified when it ordered the use of Accipe Spiritum sanctum at all ordinations to the diaconate, the presbyterate, and the episcopate; and the Anglican Church when it followed the Latin Church so far as to retain the words at the Ordering of Priests and the Consecration of Bishops, adding on both occasions the solemn invocation of the Holy Spirit in the hymn 'Veni Creator Spiritus' (Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, pp. 323, 324).

In considering how a minister is appointed to a cure of souls in any given parish, we must distinguish four stages. He is "presented" by the Patron of the Benefice, who may be the bishop, or some corporation, or a private individual. Notice is given of the appointment by affixing an announcement of the same to the church door, and the parishioners can either assent to the nomination or make complaint to the bishop. It is greatly to be desired that the parishioners should have a more effective voice in the choice of their "C." There ought to be some via media between the undesirable system of direct popular election and the present quite ineffective right of complaint. The bishop, having satisfied himself that the nominee is fit for the post, institutes him, i.e., invests him with the cure of souls in the parish. The archdeacon inducts him with the temporalities of the benefice (see INSTITUTION and INDUCTION).

The Ordering of Priests thus describes the functions of Cs.: "To be Messengers, Watchmen and Stewards of the Lord; to

2. Functions. teach and to premonish, to feed and provide for the Lord's family; to seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for His children who are in the midst of this naughty world, that they may be saved through Christ for ever." The true priesthood and pastorate, the real cure of souls, belongs to the one Priest and Shepherd of the Church. He came to bring Grace and Truth (the effectual manifestations of divine Love and divine Light) to the world. The ministers of His Church are not delegates to do His work in His absence, but instruments through whom He—the living and present pastor—continues to minister His Truth and Grace within the Church which is His Body. Thus, in subordination to Him, they are ministers of the Word to show forth His Truth, and of the Sacraments to minister His Grace. We may consider their functions more in detail.

(i) The C. admits his people to membership of Christ and His Church in Holy Baptism. "The Cs. of every parish shall often admonish the people that they defer not the Baptism of their children. . . ."

Some important practical considerations arise from the present conditions of many large towns. It is clearly wrong to baptise infants unless there is a reasonable prospect that they will be "brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life." Can this be taken for granted? The main purpose for which sponsors exist is to secure the Christian training of the child. Clearly the C. ought not only to insist on the PB rule about sponsors but, whenever possible, to ensure their fitness and willingness to represent the Church in this matter.

The whole system of the PB implies that children are to be treated from their earliest years as members of God's great family. They are to be taught what they are, in Whom they should believe, what duties they are to perform, and whence they are to receive the power for performing them (see CATECHISM). Then, at Confirmation, which is really the completion of Baptism, they come to receive the gifts of the Holy Spirit which shall enable them to fulfil their duty as "priests" in the Church of Christ.

(ii) The C. must do the work of an Evangelist. He is called to be a fisherman as well as a shepherd, and a principal part even of a shepherd's duty is to "seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad." The C. is responsible for all the souls in his parish, unless they definitely refuse his help and seek some other shepherd. He must never cease his "labour, care and diligence" till all who are committed to his charge are brought into the way of salvation. The ministry of conversion is needed in every parish (see CONVERSION). It may be effected partly by means of the regular preaching, partly by mission services in the open air or elsewhere, partly by personal influence, especially with young people at the time of their preparation for Confirmation. At a Special Parochial Mission, lasting ten days or longer, the C. may call in the aid of some preacher who is markedly endowed with the gifts of the evangelist.

(iii) The C. must lead his people in prayer and worship. The PB takes the C.'s private prayers for granted. By the provision of Collects for Sundays and holy-days it assumes that the HC will be administered at least weekly, and "the curates shall exhort the parishioners to the often receiving of Holy Communion" (Rubric in Communion of Sick). As to the Daily Service, "all priests and deacons are to say daily the Morning and Evening Prayer either privately or openly, not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause"; "being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered, he shall say the same in the Parish Church or Chapel where he ministereth." This provision secures the regular reading of the Bible, and constant Intercession.

(iv) The C. exercises the Ministry of Reconciliation. He helps his people to travel along the way of repentance and to gain the peace of God's forgiveness through Jesus Christ. By virtue of "the power and commandment" given to God's ministers, he daily declares God's pardon and absolution. If any of his flock cannot "quiet their conscience" by the ordinary means of direct confession to God, he exhorts them to "open their grief," and then, exercising the ministry of the Word, he gives them the "benefit of absolution." The end of this ministry is peace of conscience and a healthy spiritual life.

(v) The Shepherd must feed his flock. He leads them to receive the Bread of Life in the Means of Grace, especially in the Sacrament of HC. He guides them in the narrow way by means of teaching and exhortation. The primary part of this duty, as has already been said, is the training of the young. Happy is that C. who has in his parish a Church Day SCHOOL, where the children are regarded as members of the family of God and receive the clear Bible teaching of the Church. The SUNDAY SCHOOL is almost equally important; and the duty of CATECHISING the children is laid on every C. The period of PREPARATION for Confirmation (to which at least three months should be devoted) gives a priceless opportunity for instructing young people in the Christian Faith and offering them the spiritual help which they individually need.

For older people the sermon affords the obvious occasion for instruction and exhortation. Bible classes, lectures and meetings of various kinds, are useful for the purpose of giving special instruction to special classes of people.

(vi) The C., as the friend of his flock, desires to be with them at all special times of joy and of sorrow. The PB gives him this opportunity. Through him God's blessing is given to man and wife in holy matrimony. He visits those who are Sick, and brings the HC to them when they need it. He offers the Church's prayers by the graveside of those who are departed this life. By VISITATION of the whole as well as the sick he comes into that close personal touch with his parishioners without which his spiritual influence will be futile and ineffective.

(vii) The C. ought, within obvious limitations, to care for the bodily needs of his people. The PB clearly contemplates that the relief of the poor will in some measure be the C.'s work. It is the deacon's business to find out cases of need and report them to the C. Nowadays this can usually be done more effectively by other agencies, in which his aid will always be welcome. If the clergy care for the relief of destitution, it is obvious that they will take at least an equal interest in all that makes for its prevention.

(viii) In the organisation of a PARISH the end which the C. keeps in view is the efficiency of the work of those lay helpers on whose aid almost everything depends. Among other matters of organisation may be mentioned COMMENDATORY LETTERS for parishioners passing into other parishes.

The equipment of the C. is outside the scope of the present article. It need only be said that, if the C. is to keep the vineyards of others, he must keep his own. If he is to teach others, he must be a life-long student of Holy Scripture and of "such studies as help to the knowledge of the same." [See STUDY.]

"Christ's lore and His Apostles' twelve
He taught, but first he followed it himself."
Before all he must be a man of prayer.

Books on the subject of the cure of souls are innumerable. The following may be specially mentioned. (i) For ancient ideals, see

5. Books. Gregory, de Pastoralis Cura; Chrysostom, de Sacerdotio; Archbp. Benson on Cyprian. (ii) For modern Anglican methods, see Bp. Walsham How, Pastoral Work and Pastor in Parochia; also the series of Handbooks for the Clergy ed. by Dr. A. W. Robinson; Bp. Gott, Parish Priest of the Town; H. A. James, The Country Clergyman's Ideal; Abp. Lang, The Opportunity of the Church of England. (iii) On special points, see Bp. Knox, Pastors and Teachers; Dr. Moore Ede, The Clergy and Social Service.—A.3. J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

CURATE'S LICENCE.—Curate in its ordinary current sense signifies a Clerk not instituted to the cure of souls but exercising the spiritual office under the Rector or Vicar. Of this description there are two kinds, the one who acts as the assistant of the Incumbent in the service of the Ch.; the other, who is called PERPETUAL CURATE, is the Clerk appointed by the lay impropiator where there is no spiritual Rector or Vicar. It is the first kind which will be treated of under this title, such an assistant being usually called a stipendiary curate. The appointment of such a curate to officiate under an incumbent in his own ch. must be by such incumbent's nomination of him to the Bishop.

Canon 48 directs that "No curate or minister shall be permitted to serve (cura animarum) in any place without examination and admission of the Bp. of the Diocese, or Ordinary of the place having episcopal jurisdiction, in writing under his hand and seal having respect to the greatness of the Cure and meetness (habilitatem) of the party. And the said Curates and Ministers, if they remove from one Diocese to another, shall not be by any means admitted to serve without testimony of the Bp. of the Diocese or Ordinary of the place as aforesaid whence they came in writing of their honesty (honestas conversationis), ability (sufficienitia) and conformity to the ecclesiastical laws of the Ch. of England. Nor shall any serve (ministrare) more than one Ch. or Chapel upon one (uno eodemque) day except that Chapel be a member of the Parish Ch. or united thereto, and unless the said Ch. or Chapel where such a Minister shall serve in two places be not able in the judgment of the Bp. or Ordinary as aforesaid to maintain (alenda) a Curate."

In order to obtain such Licence, (1) a Curate must produce a nomination signed by the Incumbent and the Declaration prescribed by Statute as to Stipend signed by the Incumbent and himself;

(2) he must produce his Letters of Orders (Deacon, or Deacon and Priest); (3) he must obtain Letters Testimonial signed by three Beneficed Clergymen and countersigned by their Bishop.

A licensed curate can only be dismissed by the Incumbent nominating him upon six months' notice in writing being given with the previous consent in writing of the Bishop. The Licence does not lapse upon a vacancy in the Benefice, but the new Incumbent may at any time within six months after his admission give to any stipendiary curate six weeks' notice. A Licence may be revoked or withdrawn at any time by the Bp. subject to an Appeal to the Abp. of the Province.—Ta. T. H. ARDEN.

CURATE'S STIPEND.—A Curate is only entitled to the Stipend assigned by his Licence, except that, during an avoidance of the Benefice, the Bp. may increase the stipend to a rate not exceeding £200 a year or the whole income of the benefice. The Stipends now generally paid as a rule exceed the scale of Stipends set out in Sect. 85 of the Pluralities Act, 1838. Endowed or partially endowed Curacies are becoming more common. Payment of arrears of stipend cannot be obtained by any process of law but only through the Bp., who is empowered to issue Sequestration to enforce payment.—A6. T. H. ARDEN.

CURTAINS.—There are many kinds of C. made especially for church purposes in suitable designs. Tapestry C. are usually 50 in. wide and cost from 3s. 6d. to 12s. 6d. a yard. Drugget, Kidderminster, Brussels and Wilton pile C. range from 3s. 9d. to 8s. 3d. a yard according to width and texture. The C. usually required are: (a) in Sacrament—C. to cover the east wall on each side of the Holy Table, and for the altar wing-brackets; (b) in Vestry, for robe-cupboard (see CUPBOARDS); (c) in Church—draught screen at west end. But it is desirable on account of acoustic considerations to be careful not to overload the church with loose, hanging C., as these serve materially to deaden the resonance both of the human voice and organ. Moreover they harbour dust. It is therefore desirable wherever possible to employ screens of wood or wood and glass which may in competent hands be contrived both cheaply and artistically, and are usually much more in harmony with the general structure of the church, besides adding to the resonance of the building.—R4. G. VALE OWEN.

CUSHIONS.—There are two kinds of C. used for pews: padded; and carpet or rug-seating. The latter is much the better kind, as it harbours less dust and is easier to clean, on which account it is more generally employed than the upholstered kind. Rug-seating is made in various ecclesiastic patterns, 12 in. or 13 in. wide. The cost of the ordinary kinds is from 8d. (durable rug-seating) to 2s. (velvet) a running foot.

In Ch. Inventories of the time of Elizabeth velvet "quishins" for the altar are mentioned. These C.

2. Altar Cushions. date from pre-Reformation times, and are ordered in the rubrics of the Roman Missal for use on the altar as book-rests. They are still used in some Anglican churches, and are considered by many to be preferable to altar-desks either of brass or wood, as they are softer and so less injurious to the book covers and are also warmer to the touch. They may be made of almost any material (velvet is best as the book is less liable to slide on its soft surface than on cloth), and in any colour considered suitable, blue, dark red, or, as specified in the Inventory of St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, 1574, green. A convenient size is 18 in. square. They should be firmly packed with best down or feathers and edged with cord. Tassels may be added to finish off the four corners, but a plain edging or a small loop of the edging-cord is better. Two C. were usually employed, and left when not in use at each end of the Holy Table.—R5.

G. VALE OWEN.

DAILY PRAYER, OBLIGATION OF.—The rule which imposes the obligation of daily prayer is contained in three paragraphs of the Pref. "Concerning the Service of the Church." The first of these paragraphs permits those who say them privately to use any language which they understand. The second is as follows: "And all Priests and Deacons are to say daily the MEP, either privately or openly, not being let by sickness, or some other urgent cause." The third requires that "the Curate that ministereth in every Parish Church or Chapel, being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered, shall say the same in the Parish Church or Chapel where he ministereth." The times of the two Services are left indefinite and apparently at the will of each "Curate": but he is to "cause a bell to be tolled thereunto a convenient time before he begin, that the people may come to hear God's Word, and to pray with him." In accordance with these provisions the title "The Order for MEP" has the additional words "daily to be said and used throughout the year"—words which were added in 1662 and reinforce the obligation already definitely stated in earlier PBs.

The circumstances attending Cardinal Quignon's Revisions of the Brev. in 1535, 1536 (see QUIGNON'S BREVIARY), make it clear that there was a widespread disuse of the Day Hours, not confined to England. The original wording (1549) of the second paragraph (quoted above) shows that the aim was to restore Daily Services in the churches. It was made more stringent in 1552, but preaching and studying of divinity were allowed as urgent hindrances which dispensed with the obligation: even thus it is not clear that these exceptions applied in the case of those in charge. In spite of this, canons 14 and 15 of 1604, ordering, besides due observance of Sundays and Holy-days, merely the Lit. on Wednesdays and Fridays, imply that there was still laxity about Daily Services. The fact that the "urgent causes," allowed as exceptions in 1552, were omitted in 1662, if read together with the addition then made to the title of MEP, shows that the obligation is now all but imperative. "Reasonably hindered" may include some of the new duties incumbent on the clergy. "I should regard the exigencies of a large or scattered parish in the case of a single-handed man as in many cases a reasonable cause of this kind" (Primary Visitation Charge, Bp. Robertson, 1910, p. 41). "I strongly urge the letter and spirit of the rubric": "disuse for no special reason, though not punishable as an ecclesiastical offence, is none the less contrary to the letter and spirit of the law" (ibid.). The use of Daily Prayers is imposed upon all Priests and Deacons; and the Parish Priest is to say them openly in his church.—B2^o.

PERCIVAL JACKSON.

DALMATIC.—A vestment worn by the Gospeller or Deacon at High Celebrations of HC, so called from its similarity to the ordinary dress worn in Dalmatia, whence it was derived. It is a tunic with long sleeves, reaching below the knees and open from the waist at both sides. It is generally embroidered with two narrow stripes, reaching from the shoulder downwards both back and front, with an apparel, or rectangular piece of silk connecting the stripes. Originally a dress of state worn by persons of rank and subsequently by sovereigns at their coronation, the D. is first mentioned as an ecclesiastical dress in an order ascribed to Pope Sylvester (c. 330). It differs from the TUNICLE, ordered by the rubric of the First PB to be worn by the priests and deacons assisting the celebrant, only slightly in form. It is usually made of material similar in colour and texture to the CHASUBLE.—R3. J. O. COOP.

DAMNATORY CLAUSES.—See QUICUNQUE VULT, § 14.

DEACON.—The Order of Ds. is the lowest of the three "Orders of Ministers in Christ's Ch.," which have been "from the Apostles' time" (Pref. to Ord.). The title D. occurs in the PB, once in the Lit. ("that it may please thee to illuminate all Bishops, Priests and Ds."), in two rubrics in the Order of HC ("the Ds., Churchwardens . . shall receive the Alms," etc., and "in Cath. and Collegiate Chs. . . , where there are many Priests and Ds. they shall all receive the Communion . . every Sun."), and in the Ordinal. The term MINISTER in the PB, but not in the Canons, covers both Ds. and Priests.

The word is formed from the Greek διδάσκων, which is frequently used in the NT of household servants, esp. as serving at a meal. As early as Phil. 1:1 and 1 Tim. 3:1-13 (4 times) it is used, in connection with ἐπισκοπος, of a class of ministrants in the Ch., acting in subordination to the "overseers," and the name is already tending to become a recognised official title (see further ORDERS, HOLY). The corresponding verb is used in Acts 6:2 in connection with the appointment of the Seven.

This usage is seen to have become customary in the days when the Didache was written. In Ignatius (A.D. 115) the Ds. form the lowest

2. History. of the three Orders, which are by this time definitely established as essential elements of Ch. life in Syria and Asia Minor. As time went on they became the immediate assistants of the Bp. They supervised Ch. property, managed Ch. finance, visited the sick, and distributed alms. By tradition they were limited to Seven. The Diaconate was quite a separate office from the Priesthood, and was held by many in the Middle Ages who did not wish to adopt the clerical life. Thomas Becket, for example, was only in D.'s orders until he was appointed Abp. of Canterbury.

* In the present day the D. takes as a rule a subordinate part in the services of the RC. Ch., but his original importance is shown in the fact that fourteen of the Roman Cardinals are called Cardinal-Ds. (J. H. Newman was such), although most of them are in Priest's Orders. The Diaconate was retained by the Eng. Ch. at the Reformation as one of the three Sacred Orders. (Cp. ORDINAL.)

The qualifications necessary as precedent to ordination are as follows. The candidate must

(1) be "of virtuous conversation and without crime" (Pref. to Ord.)

2. Preliminary Qualifications. To ensure this, testimonials are required from a, College Authorities, b, 3 beneficed priests, c, the congregation of the Parish in which the candidate resides—see SI QVIS); (2) be 23 years of AGE at least (before 1804 it was possible to obtain a faculty from the Ordinary to be ordained under age, but by 44 George III, c. 43, this was made illegal); (3) have a TITLE to Orders, i.e., the right given him, when ordained, to execute his functions in a certain place (Parish or College); (4) show competent learning (see EXAMINATIONS). A University degree is taken as a guarantee of general learning, and it is now usual to supplement this by training in a graduate Theological College. Non-graduates undergo a longer training in similar institutions specially adapted to their needs. The Archdeacon—see ORDINAL—is still, as in the Canon Law, theoretically the person to examine, if the Bishop is unable to examine in person, but this duty is now carried out by Examining Chaplains specially appointed for the purpose by the Bp.; (5) assent in due form to the 39 Arts., PB and Ord., and take the OATH of allegiance.

If we take the questions asked of the D. at his Ordination, we see that what the Ch. requires of her ministers may be summarised as follows: (1) the inward call by God Himself, and (2) the outward call to ministry in the Ch. of Eng. (cp. ORDERS, HOLY); (3) unfeigned belief in the Scriptures, and (4) diligence in reading the same publicly in Ch.; (5) glad performance of the duties of a D.; (6) training of life, personal and family, according to the doctrine of Christ; and (7) obedience to the Bp. and all to whom governance is committed (cp. RITUAL, § 51, r 17-13).

What, then, are the duties of a D.? According to Q. 5 in the Ordinal they are: (1) to assist the Priest in Divine Service, esp. at the

5. Duties. HC; (2) to read Scriptures and Homilies in Ch.; (3) to instruct in the Cat.; (4) to baptise in the absence of the Priest; (5) to preach, if licensed; (6) to visit sick and poor with a view to their relief. If the word Priest were to be taken as necessarily excluding Ds., the latter would not only not be permitted to pronounce the Absolution or consecrate the elements at HC, but they would not be able to read the Versicles before the Venite and before the Collect of the Day at MP, the Ante-Communion Service, etc., or any part of Bapt., Matr., Burial, and Churning. In practice, however, Ds. may and do perform all these latter services or parts of services, and it is arguable that the substitution in 1662 of the word "Priest" for "Minister" in the rubric before the Absolution does not exclude Ds. any more than the similar changemade at the same date before the Versicles which follow almost immediately after (see Blakeney on the PB). Moreover Ds. are licensed to preach as a matter of course, and many a young man of 23 with little, sometimes no, parochial experience, is called upon to perform (with two exceptions) all the duties of the fully ordained Priest.

It is a very grave question, however, whether, as a matter of policy and order, such a practice should be allowed to continue. It

6. Training. It is impossible to read the charge to candidates for the Priesthood (cp. PRIEST) without seeing how much greater is the responsibility intended to be laid upon Priests than upon Ds. Moreover, the rubric at the end of the Ordering of Ds. implies that the function of the year or more in the Diaconate is (1) to teach by practical experience the right methods of conducting Divine Service and administering Sacraments and working a parish so that the D. may be "perfect and well expert," and (2) to provide a test of character ("if he be found faithful and diligent"). Training in these matters is best done by parish priests of ripe experience and character, who will give time and trouble and prayer to it, and it would be well if the Bps. could select the most suitable men for the purpose. The Bps. rightly lay down a course of reading in preparation for the priesthood, and the D. should have ample time given him for study, and guidance should be offered him in his reading.

In the best parishes all this is already done, and it is imperative that the practice in other parishes should be raised to the same standard as a necessary condition of Ds. being licensed to curacies therein. [For ordination of Ds., see ORDINAL.]—TI. J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

DEACONESS.—A D. is a woman set apart by a Bp., under that title, for service in the Ch.

The order rests its claim to the

1. Origin. recognition of the Ch. upon apostolic authority and primitive usage.

In Rom. 16:1 there is direct mention of a duly appointed woman, "Phoebe our sister, who is a servant (διδάσκαλος) of the Ch. that is at Cenchreae," and 1 Tim. 3:11 is also taken by good authorities as having reference to the office of deaconess.

Both Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-220) and Origen (185-254) refer to these passages as showing that women formed part of the ministry of the Ch. in Apostolic times. From the evidence of the Apostolic Didascalia and the Apostolic Constitutions, which embody documents going back as far as the 3rd cent., it is seen that the D. was appointed by the Bp. to be the female counterpart of the Deacon. The form of prayer used at her ordination by the Bishop is given. Her duties are stated to be to minister to her own sex, to assist in the rites connected with their baptism, to visit them in their homes, and to tend and relieve the sick and needy.

She is regarded equally with the Deacon as the servant of the Bp., who delegates to both alike his responsibility for the sick and poor of his flock.

The order reached its greatest vigour and fullest development in the Eastern Ch. in the 4th cent. At the time of St.

2. History. Chrysostom there were forty attached to the principal ch. of Constantinople. Some were women of rank and wealth and of no ordinary ability, who devoted their services and means entirely to the Ch., and to the relief of the poor and sick. Their work was distinctly ministerial; they were admitted to their office by a special service, with the imposition of hands, and their calling was for life. The primitive deaconesses were attached to separate churches, and they appear to have lived singly, or in small groups. It is evident that the order was well known and widely spread through a great part of the Eastern Ch., and traces of them are found also in the West. Here they seem often to have been widows, and to have been set over the virgins and widows who received help from the Ch. alms. After the year 1000 the order seems to have gradually declined, becoming overshadowed by the religious houses. The circumstances of the time were not favourable to the uncloistered deaconess, and her work passed into the hands of her younger sister, the nun.

About the middle of the 19th cent., when opportunities of usefulness for women were opening out in every direction.

3. Revival. an effort was made, both in the Ch. of Eng. and in the Episcopal Ch. in America, to revive this ancient order of ministry. An example had already been set by the Lutheran Ch. in Germany, when Pastor Fliedner had founded the Kaiserwerth D. Institution in 1833. In 1861 Bishop Tait, of London, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, set apart Elizabeth Ferard as the first deaconess of the English Ch. The question of women's work being authorised by the Ch. came before Convocation in 1858 and again in 1862, but it was felt that the time had not yet come for laying down fixed rules. In 1871 a number of the Bps. drew up a paper containing "Principles and Rules" for the guidance of the D. movement, and this was signed by the Abps. and 18 of the Bps. In 1891 a series of resolutions was passed by the Upper House of Cant. Convocation regulating the life and training of a D., but it was not till 1897 that the D. cause received the formal recognition and approval of the whole body of Ang. Bps. assembled at Lambeth.

In America, however, where the office had been revived as early as 1855, a canon had been passed by the General Convention of the Episcopal Ch. in 1889, authorising the appointment of Ds. and laying down the principles on which the order was to be governed. On all important points these are in complete harmony with those accepted by the Ch. of England.

A D. then, as the Churches of the Ang. Communion understand the term, is a woman who, feeling called of God, gives her

4. Function. life for the service of others, with the special authorisation and blessing of the Ch. and under its direction.

She wears a simple, distinctive dress, which is both an economy and a protection. She may live alone, or in company with others, as seems best for her work. She has her modest salary, and may change her field of labour should she wish, with the permission of her diocesan.

The normal work of a parish deaconess corresponds in some respects to that of a curate. She must be "apt to teach," zealous in visiting the sick and poor. Under the direction of her vicar it is her duty to organise the work among the women and children of the parish, to superintend the relief of distress, and to be at the beck and call of all who need her services.

Two years, it is considered, are the shortest time in which it is possible to train a woman for efficient service as a D. She

5. Training. attends carefully-planned courses in the OT and NT, in Christian doctrine and Ch. History, in sociology and hygiene, and must pass satisfactory examinations on these subjects. She receives practical training in teaching and visiting the poor. Most important of all is the spiritual side of her training, which is acquired by the discipline of the simple orderly life of the D. Institution, the daily Chapel Services, the quiet times for private prayer and meditation—by learning in quietness and peace to do the allotted task, accepting it as from God, and doing it for Him whatever it may be.

The methods of training have certainly improved during the last ten years, but there is cause for considerable disappointment with regard to the growth of the order. There are at the present time some ten Deaconess Institutions in Eng., some of these being still maintained upon the dual system of Sister-deaconesses. The most complete training is probably given at the diocesan Institutions of Southwark (North Side, Clapham Common) and of Winchester (St. Andrew's Home, Portsmouth).

Ds. are also working in the Mission Field, where several Bps. have set apart women for work in their dioceses. Amongst these are two native Ds. who are doing admirable work in India.

Ds. take no vows, but the office is undertaken for life, and, if ancient rule be followed, a D. cannot be a married woman.

In all things a D. is subject to the authority of the Bp. of the diocese in which she works, and whose licence she holds. She is also expected to act in conformity with the rules of the Institution in which she was trained.

The name D. is used both in the Presbyterian Church and among various Nonconformist bodies to describe a worker to whom some special work for her church has been allotted. Of this kind are also the Mildmay Deaconesses, who receive training for their work, but are not set apart for life. It is unfortunate that, like deacon, the title D. should be used with such different meanings.—A3. BEATRICE CREIGHTON.

DEAD, CHRISTIAN TREATMENT OF THE.

—Underlying the tender care of Christians for their dead was the conviction

1. Its Origin. that the bodies of those who died in the Faith were joined to their Lord. While Pagans burned their dead, Christians always buried them, or (as in Africa) embalmed them, placing them as near as possible to departed saints and martyrs. Hence arose burials in churches and interments in places of special sanctity (e.g., near the altar) for persons of dignity.

The body was washed, anointed, and swathed in linen. The use of coffins in England did not become universal until within a comparatively

2. Details. recent period. Churchwardens' accounts (aft. the Reformation) allude to the purchase of a common coffin used for all, in which the body was carried to the grave, and then (wrapped in woollen) literally placed "earth to earth"—a custom much more to be commended than encasing the dead in wood or even lead. Flowers were often scattered over the grave, but the present elaboration of wreaths is often carried to wasteful excess. Lying in state seems to have been a mark of honour reserved for those of higher rank. It was duly observed prior to the interment of King Edward VII. Prayer was the natural solace of the survivors, and between decease and interment it went on more or less continuously. The celebration of the Holy Communion was its culmination, and there was repeated intercession for the departed, that the light of God might shine upon him. The ancient Lectionary of St. Jerome (Comes Hieronymi) preserves the nine passages of Scripture used in early days (all of which found place in the English pre-Reformation Burial Service; and two of which are in the present PB): 2 Macc. 12 43, 1 Thess. 4 13, 1 Cor. 15 49, Ezek. 37 1, Rev. 14 13, John 5 21, 24, 6 37, 51. All the funeral rites spoke eloquently of care, affection and reverence for the dead, and this underlying feeling finds its counterpart now in the simple ceremonial of the English Church. Every existing Liturgy has its commemoration of the departed—an instinct which has made itself felt in every age of the Faith. Suitable Pss. for private or family use are those indicated in the ancient English services—42, 116, 139 and 146; and such a pr. as the following breathes that old affectionate impulse towards the departed which still lives on in spite of abbreviated rites: "O God whose nature and property is ever to have mercy and to forgive, receive our humble petitions for the soul of thy servant Whom Thou hast called to depart out of this world; and because Thy servant did hope in Thee, we beseech Thee that Thou wilt neither suffer him to fall into the hand of the enemy, nor forget him for ever; but wilt give Thine holy angels charge to receive his soul and transport it into the land of the living, there to be found worthy to rejoice in the fellowship of Thy saints: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."¹—oe. H. E. SCOTT.

¹ [See further, DEAD, PRAYER FOR THE, and HOPE.]

DEAD, PRAYER FOR THE.—The Intercessions for the faithful dead which are found in the early Liturgies¹ differ widely

1. The Early Liturgies and Fathers. from those which developed out of the teaching of mediæval times. The former were for the rest and refreshment of those in Paradise, and were an expression of faith that "the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God," are enjoying the peace of Paradise, and have foretastes of that more perfect bliss for which we pray both for them and for ourselves. The earlier inscriptions found in the Catacombs breathe the same spirit of certainty, not that of entreaty, e.g., "In Pace," "Requiescat in pace." Even such forms as "Requiescat in pace" are later and rare, in comparison with those of restful hope. Such prs. and inscriptions furnish a basis for protest against any belief in the pains of PURGATORY, and in the need or value of Masses on behalf of the faithful departed.

At the Reformation a gradual cleavage was made, in consequence of the serious evils (e.g., INDULGENCES) which had grown up around the doctrines of Purgatory, and of Masses for the Dead. In the

2. The Reign of Henry VIII. Ten Articles of 1536 (representing what Fuller called a "twilight religion"), the doctrine of Purgatory in a measure survived. Masses and exequies were still recommended for "souls departed," not merely for repose and happiness, but that "they may be relieved and holpen of some part of their pain." The Art. however, although entitled "Of Purgatory," disclaims all power of defining "the place where they be, the name thereof, and kind of pains there." The same Art. appears in The Bishops' Book (1537). The King's Book (1543), although in some respects reactionary, in the matter of Purgatory marked an advance toward the reformed teaching. The Art. is headed: "Of Prayer for Souls Departed"; abuses brought in by Rome are to be "clearly put away"; and it is urged "that we therefore abstain from the name of Purgatory." The masses and prs. suggested are, moreover, "for the universal congregation of Christian people, quick and dead," which is very characteristic of the change of attitude adopted at this period.

The Burial Office of 1549 marked a still further movement, there being no mention of

3. The PB of 1549. any such state as Purgatory, or of Masses for the Dead. Direct and personal pr. was still offered for the souls of the departed, that their sins may not be imputed unto them, and that they may "escape the gates of hell and pains of eternal darkness." Such petitions are generally associated with pr. "for the universal congregation of Christian people, quick and dead" (as suggested in The King's Book), and the following phrases are to be carefully noted: "that his soul and all the souls of thy elect . . . may with us, and we with them, fully receive Thy promises"; that "both we and this our brother departed . . . may, with all Thine elect saints, obtain eternal joy"; "make him to rise also with the just and righteous . . . that then he may hear with them these most sweet and comfortable words." Compare the words of the Canon in 1549—"that, at the day of the general resurrection, we and all they which be of the mystical body of Thy Son, may altogether be set on His right hand."

¹ [The following early Christian documents and writers speak of prs. for the dead: Epitaph of Avricius (c. 200); Acts of Paul and Thecla 29 (2nd cent. ?); Acts of Perpetua 7 (c. 203); Tertullian (c. 210), De Monog. 10 and 11, De Exhort. Cast. 12; Cyprian (c. 255), Ep. 1 (66); Arnobius (c. 305), Adv. Gent. 4 36. Later than this it is needless to go.—J.W.T.]

This language was again distinctly modified in 1552. In the "Prayer for the whole Church"

4. The PB of 1552. all mention of the departed was left out, and the omission is underlined by the definition of the Church as "militant here in earth." That this change resulted from a further movement away from mediæval teaching is certain from the changes made in the Burial Office. In the first place, the prs. are now made quite general for the whole church, and the versicles, which contained direct pr. for the dead person, are wholly omitted. In the next place, such phrases as "we and this our brother," "they with us and we with them," were deliberately modified to "that we with this our brother, and all other departed in the true faith . . . may have our perfect consummation," and to "that we may be found acceptable in Thy sight, etc." These qualified phrases may be regarded (Bp. Cosin did so regard them) as prs. for the dead, but they are at least studiously ambiguous, and only present the petition that their state of bliss may be perfected by Christ's coming and the resurrection of their bodies to eternal life. The doctrine which underlies these prs. is clearly marked off from Roman error, and in a certain measure from that which is expressed in the First PB of 1549.¹

That this analysis does not overstate the change is clear from a comparison of the Bidding

5. The Bidding Prayer. Prayers found in the Injunctions of 1547 and 1559. In 1547 the form ran: "Ye shall pray for all them that be departed . . . in the faith of Christ, that they with us, and we with them at the day of judgment, may rest, both in body and soul, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven." But in Q. Elizabeth's Injunctions (1559) it ran: "Finally, let us praise God for all those that are departed . . . in the faith of Christ, and pray . . . that after this life, we with them may be made partakers of the glorious resurrection in the life everlasting." Direct prayer has given place to praise, and the words "they with us" are omitted. The later form is retained (with verbal alterations) in the present canons of 1604.

¹ [On the other hand, a proposal to include prs. for the dead in the condemnation of various mediæval errors in Art. 23 of 1552 (= our present Art. 22) was negatived. See Hardwick, Hist. of Arts., p. 103.]

There is one exception, namely, in the Primer of 1559, which contains a Dirge or "Office for the Dead." Primers were books of private devotion, and not for public use.

6. The Elizabethan Primer.

Greater liberty seems to have been contemplated so far as private devotion was concerned, and the "Dirge" contains direct petitions for the departed, as well as for the Church of the faithful in general. But such petitions are quite different to those in the Primer of 1545. There are no petitions for remission of sins, or for the "purging of all sins," as in 1545, but that they "may be graciously brought unto the joys everlasting," "may be associate with the company of Thy saints," and that God may "bestow (their souls) in the country of peace and rest." Moreover, the prs. in Elizabeth's Primer are general for "all faithful people being departed," not particular as in the Primer of 1545. This greater liberty in the matter of private devotion is what might be expected, and only confirms the view that in public devotion no direct and unambiguous forms of pr. should be permitted. Even in private pr. nothing was allowed that savoured of mediæval error.

It has, however, been widely stated that the Dirge was used publicly in Elizabeth's reign on at least two occasions. (1) On September 8-9, 1559, public obsequies were held in St. Paul's on the death of Henry II of France. Holinshed and Heylin call this service a "Dirge," and it is assumed that this was the Dirge of the Primer, and, if so, public intercession for the dead received authoritative sanction. But the Records of State Funerals, kept at the College of Heralds, describe the character of this service (Ex Offic. Armiger, f. 13), and Strype's account, based upon those records, makes it clear that the so-called "Dirge" was one of praise rather than of prayer for the dead king, and that the service of Communion on the following day had none of the characteristics of a "Requiem Mass" (see Lord St. Aldwyn's examination of Lord Halifax, Royal Com. on Eccles. Disc., 3 372 ff.). (2) On October 3, 1564, a similar service was used on the death of the Emperor Ferdinand. Grindal preached the sermon, and mentions the complaint of some that "here is no prayer for the soul of Ferdinandus." These services are instances of services outside the Act of Uniformity, but not of "services containing public pr. for the dead."

Two Latin forms of service belong to this reign: "In Commendationibus Benefactorum," and "Celebratio Coenæ Domini in funebribus, 7. Elizabethan Latin Services and Homilies.

si amici et vicini defuncti communicare velint": and in both the same cautiously worded language is used—"Ut nos . . . una cum illis," "Ut nos . . . una cum fratre nostro requiescamus tecum in vita æterna." The following words of Augustine accompany them, "Curatio funeris, conditio sepulturæ, pompa exequiarum, magis sunt vivorum solatia, quam subsidia mortuorum." The language of the "Homily of Prayer" (1571—Hom. 27) reflects the mind of Bp. Jewel and other leading Churchmen of that age: "If we will cleave only unto the Word of God, then must we needs grant, that we have no commandment so to do." Not only is "the gross error of purgatory" rejected, but men were bidden not to "dream any more that the souls of the dead are anything at all holpen by our prayers."

The Hom. (whatever authority be assigned to it) throws an important sidelight upon the mind and intention of the Elizabethan divines.

In the 17th cent. prs. for the faithful dead are found in books of private devotion, such as those of Bps. Andrewes and Cosin; and these men regarded the words used in the PB as involving pr. for the departed. To this fact correspond the changes proposed in 1662, which had Cosin's support.

8. The Revision of 1662.

In the Scottish PB (1637) commemoration of the dead had been restored on the lines of 1549, and a similar restoration was proposed at the last revision in 1662. But, while the actual commemoration was most happily restored, the petition was framed on the lines of the prs. already found in the Burial Office: "We bless Thy holy name for all Thy servants departed this life in Thy faith and fear; beseeching Thee . . . that with them we may be partakers of Thy heavenly kingdom." The proposal to omit the words, "Militant here in earth," was at first entertained; but afterwards rejected (see PB of 1634 with corrections in Cosin's writing).

The result may be thus summarised. (1) There was a distinct and final separation from the mediæval teaching on Purgatory.

(2) The history of our formularies reveals a desire to take into account the distinction between the doctrine of Purgatory and Masses for the Dead and that of prs. for the bliss and perfection of those who "die in the Lord." (3) All direct and explicit prs. for the dead, of any kind, have been deliberately excluded from our public services since 1552, and the proposal to restore such prs. in 1662 was rejected. The statement that such prs. are nowhere forbidden is a very partial one, and the assertion that they were publicly used in Elizabeth's reign has been disproved. (4) Greater liberty seems to have been recognised in private prayers for the light, refreshment and perfecting of the faithful dead; and the language of our present prs. is so studiously general, that its meaning should not be so limited as to exclude those longings for the fuller enjoyment of peace and refreshment, and for the final perfection of all the faithful, which formed part of the worship of the early Christian Church.—ob.

T. W. DRURY.

DEADLY SIN.—This phrase occurs in the Lit. and in Art. 16. It is a current expression in moral theology, meaning such sin as removes a Christian altogether from the state of grace, and, unless repented of, involves eternal death. By the Fathers it was used in respect of such open and flagrant sins as would naturally involve ecclesiastical condemnation, the removal of the sinner from communion, and the imposition of a course of public penance (see REPENTANCE) before restoration was possible. This reference would seem best to fit the expression in the Lit., where it is coupled with "fornication."

The more usual account given of D. (or mortal) sin by mediæval and modern writers is that it is deliberate sin in a grave matter, committed wilfully with knowledge that it is against the law of God. The broad distinction lies between a sin which is a wilful rebellion against God, whether open or secret, and a sin which is wholly or partly committed through infirmity or IGNORANCE. It will be seen, however, that such a distinction, reasonable as it is in itself, opens a wide field for CASUISTRY, and resulted in elaborate classification of sins, of which there is no trace in the PB.

The Puritans at the Savoy Conference and elsewhere objected to the expression in the Lit., as tending ing to draw distinctions between different sorts of sin, whereas they urged all sin is in itself D. (Rom. 6 23).

Logically, the objection may be sound, but common sense, a broader view of life, the mercy which characterises Holy Scripture, and the general teaching of the Church, show that all sins cannot equally be described as deadly.

In a narrower sense we speak of the seven D. sins—pride, envy, anger, gloom or sloth (acedia), avarice,

2. The Seven Deadly Sins.

gluttony, incontinence (luxuria). This classification is found in Peckham's Constitutions (1281), and was universally adopted in Western mediæval theology. Remarkable examples of it are to be found in Dante's Purgatorio, Cantos 10-26, where the seven sins are being purged, and are contrasted with the virtues of the first seven Beatitudes; in Langland's Piers Plowman, v; and in Chaucer's Parson's Tale. It will be noticed that these D. sins are types or varieties of natural concupiscence, rather than necessarily such sins as would be classed under the head deadly or mortal. The number "seven" was probably due to Matt. 12 45, Luke 8 2, and to the analogy of other sets of seven which are found in Scripture and in the language of the Church, e.g., the gifts of the Spirit, the Sacraments, etc.

As a basis for self-examination, the PB, in accordance with the purpose of the compilers to go back to Scripture for authority in regard to faith and morals, prefers the Ten Commandments to the seven D. sins, as being more positive, and in some ways more practical, e.g., as more directly condemning theft and falsehood.—PD.

A. R. WHITHAM.

DEAN.—Dean is the name given to the head of a Cathedral or Collegiate chapter. In Cathedrals of the Old Foundation there has been a D. since Norman times; in Cathedrals of the New Foundation he takes the place of the Prior; at Westminster that of the Abbot; at Manchester that of the Warden. In some newly-constituted chapters, e.g., Liverpool, Southwark, Truro, the Bp. is also Dean. For further information, see CATHEDRAL, INSTALLATION.

The name Dean is applied also to other Ch. officials, e.g., RURAL DEANS, Deans of PECULIARS, Dean of Arches.—A3.

J. W. TYRER.

DEATH.—The ideas associated with D. in the PB are naturally derived from the Biblical conceptions of D. and cannot be considered apart from the Bible doctrine. In the PB, as in the Bible, there are four distinct yet closely related groups of thoughts which gather around this word.

(1) In agreement with our ordinary everyday speech D. is regarded on its purely physical side, as the departure of the principle of life from the body which brings to an end the man's physical relations with other men who are still on earth and with the world of sense as a whole. In this use of the word nothing is necessarily implied as to the relations of the

2. The Four Biblical Thoughts of Death.

dead with one another and with God in a further state of existence, nor indeed of the continuance or disruption of spiritual relations with the living. That is D. considered in its external results. But the word in this ordinary physical sense suggests also the fear, distress and pain experienced inwardly by the dying man in the final agony when soul and body are separated. Voluntarily to undergo these terrors, to give up oneself to die, is the highest act of self-sacrifice. Instances of this purely physical sense of the word in the PB are:—in Burial Service, "In the midst of life we are in death"; in Marriage Service, "till death us do part"; Coll. for Easter Eve, "the grave and gate of death"; Colls. for Palm Sunday and Good Friday, "suffer death upon the Cross"; Lit., "from sudden death"; Coll. for Holy Innocents, "constancy of our faith even unto death"; Prs. at Sea, "jaws of this death."

(2) In the OT particularly, D. is often regarded not only on its physical side but as a physical event which carries with it certain consequences in man's spiritual relations with God. The ordinary Jewish belief about the dead was that they were cut off from God and existed in a joyless and feeble half-life which could not be called real "life" at all. In other words, D. meant not only what we mean by it, but also the loss of the light and the joy of God's presence. It was in this sense and with these associations that the introduction of death into the world is said to be due to the Fall (Gen. 2 17). The deep underlying truth of this is brought out by St. Paul in 1 Cor. 15 56, "The sting of death is sin." So in Rom. 5 12 ff. the D. which is said to be due to the Fall, and from which Jesus Christ delivered us, cannot be D. considered merely as a physical event, since in this sense the redeemed still die, but D. as involving a separation from God, i.e., the physical fact of D. carrying with it certain spiritual implications. It was Jesus Christ who brought life and immortality to light, because he finally dispelled the idea that the D. of the righteous took them out of the hand of God, and revealed the certainty that to die is to be with Christ where he is at the right hand of God. In the PB the word is found in this sense:—"the bitter pains of eternal death" (Burial); "by his death hath destroyed death" (Easter Pref.); "overcome death and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life" (Coll. Easter). The same thought is expressed in the opening words of the last Pr. in the Burial Service (quoted from the opening Sent., John 11 26), "in whom whosoever believeth shall live though he die; and whosoever liveth and believeth in him shall not die eternally."

(3) In a further stage of thought, the word D. is entirely disconnected from any physical associations, and is used figuratively to describe a certain moral or spiritual condition, the state of sin, which is separation from God. This figure is derived from the primitive Jewish conception referred to above in (2), that to die in the physical sense involved also exclusion from communion with God. Under this idea D. is an image of something which may happen to a man at any time during life:—"she that giveth herself to pleasure is dead while she liveth" (1 Tim. 5 6); "sin revived and I died; and the commandment which was unto life this I found to be unto death: for sin . . . slew me" (Rom. 7 9-11); "the mind of the flesh is death . . . because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom. 8 6, 7); "you being dead through your trespasses" (Col. 2 13).

The frequency with which the word is found with this significance in the NT is reflected in the usage of the PB. "Death" and its opposite "life" are spoken of without any reference to their merely physical meaning:—"without which whosoever liveth is counted dead before Thee" (Coll. Quinqu.); "be converted and live" (3rd Coll. Good Fr.); "sinners who lay in darkness and the shadow of death" (Exh.² HC). "Everlasting death" is the condition of those departed this life who are everlastingly separated from God (Cat., Burial); as "everlasting life" is primarily the condition of the departed who everlastingly "live unto God" (frequently in this sense, e.g., in Coll. "Prevent us," and Pr. aft. Confirm.—sometimes used also of life in this world, e.g., in Exhortation aft. Gosp. in Bapt.).

(4) There remains a further group of thoughts in accordance with which "to die," "to be dead," and "death," are good and not evil. It is the worst possible evil when a man is dead in sin: it is the highest good when he is dead unto sin. The figure in this last usage of the word is taken from one particular effect of physical D., that it cuts a man off entirely from his previous earthly surroundings: they exist for him no more: he is dead to them and they are dead to him. In the figurative application of this aspect of D. what is meant is that a man is as absolutely and finally cut off from all connection with sin as a dead man is from the world in which he once lived.¹ This significance is found especially (as we should expect) in the Bapt. Services, e.g., in the Thanksgiving after Bapt., "being dead unto sin"; and in the Exh., "so should we . . . die from sin"; also in the Cat. on Bapt., "a death unto sin." Further, as this dying must be voluntary and even "self-inflicted," so it includes the idea of self-sacrifice, and is therefore described as a "partaking in our Lord's death," "being buried with Christ" (Thanksgiving after Bapt.—cp. Coll. Easter Even).

¹ In making this figurative application it must be borne in mind that we are dealing with ordinary popular ideas and use of language. Whether the dead are so entirely cut off from their old material surroundings, as popular language based upon the ordinary evidence of the senses implies, is another question into which of course we cannot enter here (see INVOCATION OF SAINTS).

We possess in the Book of Homilies what we may almost call an authoritative exposition of the PB

2. Teaching of the Homilies.

("An exhortation against the Fear of Death") deals expressly with the subject. It starts with three reasons why worldly men fear D., and then proceeds to show that these ought to have no terror for the godly man. In general the Hom. brings out clearly that our Lord by overcoming sin has taken away the sting of D., which was the curse laid upon Adam for his sin. Take away sin, and D. becomes, not the great separation from God, but the approach nearer to God, the gateway to everlasting life and glory (cp. Colls. for Adv. Sun., Epiph., Easter Even, 4th Sun. aft. Trin., and many other passages in the PB). D. is then "no death at all but a very deliverance from death . . . and a beginning of everlasting joy" (Hom. 9, pt. 1). There is recognised, however, the natural human shrinking from D.: in this aspect it is regarded as the final chastening of our heavenly and loving Father (ib., pt. 2).

In the PB we find in one passage at least the idea that (physical) D. is sometimes a penal infliction of God because of some particular sin. The 3rd Exh. in HC says (referring to 1 Cor. 11 30) that by unworthy Communion "we provoke Him to plague us with divers diseases and sundry kinds of death." (See further, PURGATORY, RESURRECTION, JUDGMENT.)

Literature: Arts. Death in Hastings' DB and DCG; Salmond, Christ. Doct. of Immortality, esp. pp. 199-225; Agar Beet, Last Things, esp. Lects. II and XII; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, "Victory over Death" (3 17) and "Views of Death" (4 7).—K2⁹.

S. C. GAYFORD.

DECALOGUE.—See DUTY, CATECHISM (THE CHURCH).

DECLARATION OF ASSENT.—See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, § 6; CANONS OF 1604, § 7.

DECRETALS.—See CANON LAW.

DEDICATION FESTIVAL.—The annual commemoration of the consecration of a church.

In cases where a church dedicated

1. History. in a given Saint's name was not consecrated upon that Saint's festival according to the Calendar, two commemorations are made: (1) the Saint's day, according to the date in the Calendar; (2) the anniversary of consecration, or D. festival. The ancient practice was not to sever this connection, for the origin of several of the Saints' days of the Calendar is identical as to date with the D. of churches in their memory.

Broadly speaking, the commemoration of Apostles, Martyrs and Confessors in the Calendar, the majority of which were introduced later than the 4th cent., are due to the local D. of churches, named after the various saints. This D. was almost always, if not always, accompanied by the translation or deposition of relics of the saints thus honoured. Festivals of the D. of a church and of the translation of remains or relics were often synonymous: at first obviously merely local anniversaries, observed in the very places where the saints had died and were buried, or where their relics were preserved. Quite naturally these D. anniversaries would spread in the surrounding neighbourhood, and be taken up by the chief church of the diocese. Then the practice arose of one diocese adopting the commemorations of another, as the fame of the departed Christian heroes spread abroad. For example, the following BLACK-LETTER commemorations of the PB Calendar were originally the days of D. of churches—May 3, Invention of the Cross; May 6, St. John ante Portam Latinam; June 1, St. Nicomede; August 1, Lammass Day, or St. Peter ad vincula; September 14, Holy Cross Day; October 17, St. Etheldreda; November 25, St. Catherine; December 6, St. Nicholas—all these are originally D. festivals. In the observance of Michaelmas Day, we have another instance of a merely local D. festival becoming in time an annual commemoration throughout the Church. In the Roman Calendar the origin of the commemoration of the feast of St. Michael and All Angels is clearly indicated, the title being Dedicatio basilice sancti michaelis archangeli. The same may be said in regard to the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul—the more ancient designation being Translatio S. Pauli Apostoli; and also St. Peter (with St. Paul), June 29; St. Philip and St. James, May 1; and All Saints, November 1; all these and other commemorations originating in D. festivals. (See Duchesne, Christian Worship, c. 8; Staley, Liturgical Studies, c. 4, The Origin of Saints' Days.) Not improbably the observance of January 6 in the West as the festival of the Magi may be similarly classed (ib., c. 3).

In 1536 K. Henry VIII, "with the common assent of the prelates and clergy of this his realm in Convocation lawfully assembled,"

2. English Use. ordained that "the Feast of Dedication of the church shall in all places throughout this realm be celebrated and kept on the first Sunday of the month of October for ever, and upon none other day" (Wilkins, Concilia 3 823). When the confusion of K. Edward the Sixth's reign was past, the D. festival was again observed in Q. Mary's reign. Though, unfortunately, no liturgical proper is provided in the PB, the custom of keeping the D. Feast does not appear to have been forbidden; and it may well be revived as affording opportunity for thanking God for His gifts of grace and truth, chiefly ministered in our churches.

The following liturgical proper is sanctioned for use by certain of the bishops of the Scottish Church:

Collect. Almighty God, who year by year bringest again the day of the dedication of this thy holy temple, and hast preserved us in safety

2. Service. to worship therein; Hear, we beseech thee, the prayers of thy people, and grant that whosoever in this place shall make his supplication before thee, may, by the granting of his petitions, be filled with joy, to the glory of thy holy Name: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Epistle. Rev. 21 2-5. Gospel. Luke 19 1-11.

Lessons. Eve—Gen. 28 10, Matt. 21 12-17.

Matins—2 Chron. 6 12-22, 2 Cor. 6 14-7 2.

Evensong—2 Chron. 7 12, 1 Peter 2 1-10.

According to the Lectiary of Luxeuil (7th cent.), printed in Mabillon (De Liturgia Gallicana, Paris, 1685), the Eucharistic lessons for the D. Feast are—Gen. 28 11; 1 Cor. 3 9-18; John 10 22-29; Luke 19 1-11.—C2.

V. STALEY.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.—In the 13th year of his reign Henry VIII added to his other titles that of Fidei Defensor, an appellation given him by Leo X, 11 Oct. 1521, on his publication of the Assertio septem sacramentorum against Luther, dedicated to that Pope. The bull urges the King to show his successors how "they also may obtain the same title by following assiduously the king's noble footsteps." In 1543 (35 Hen. VIII, c. 3) this title (with others: see SUPREMACY, ROYAL) was "vnyted and annexed for ever to the Emperial Crowne of this his Highnes Realme of Englonde." Mary repealed this statute and Elizabeth confirmed the repeal; but Edward VI, Mary, Philip and Mary, Elizabeth, and all later kings and queens of Eng., have used the title.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

DEGRADATION.—An eccles. censure, whereby a clerk is deprived of benefice and office in solemn form, and of the insignia of dress and ornament (Acton, Const. d. Othonis, ed. 1679, 45 note a). Degradation in absentia took place in the case of H. Smyth-Piggott (1909, Times 21 Jan., 28 Jan., 8 Mar.).—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

DELEGATES.—These were Commissioners appointed by the Crown under the great seal to hear and determine appeals from the Eccles. Courts, and constituted "The Court of Delegates" . . . to try "all Causes of Appeal by way of Devolution from either of the Archbishops" (Ayliffe, Parergon, p. 191, A.D. 1726). This Court was superseded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (see COURTS, § 13).—A5.

G. HARFORD.

DEPOSITION.—An eccles. censure, whereby a clerk "is deprived of benefice and office, but not in solemn form." The penalty was re-introduced for cases within the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892. No sentence of deposition may be pronounced save by the bp. (canon 122). The deposition need not be contemporaneous with the deprivation (L.R., 1897, 2 Q.B. 414).—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

DEPRIVATION.—An eccles. censure, whereby a clerk is deprived of his parsonage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion or dignity. For twenty-eight lawful causes for deprivation see Phillimore, Eccles. Law (1895) 2 1082-4. Such sentence ought to be pronounced by the bp. (canon 122) or the Dean of Arches (but see CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 7).—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

DESECRATION.—The destruction of the sacredness of a place or thing by profanation of some kind, as a church by murder or suicide; distinguished from the conversion to secular use of a building or article of sacred use under sanction of lawful authority.—A4.

G. HARFORD.

DESK.—See AMBO, BOOK-REST, READING-DESK.

DIGAMY is the Marriage of two wives in succession, that is to say, of a second wife after the death of the first. Such Marriages are open to Christians generally, but in the history of the Church they have been largely forbidden to the clergy. The requirement of St. Paul (1 Tim. 3 2) that a bishop should be the husband of one wife was not commonly understood as intended to prohibit the polygamous marriage of a bishop with more than one wife at the same time, but as directed against second Marriages. The phrase μίας γυναίκας ἄνδρα seems to correspond with the similar phrase in 5 9, providing that a widow on the Church roll should have been the wife of one husband (ἀνὴρ ἀγαπᾷ γυναῖκα). In the Eastern Churches the rule excluding digamists from the priesthood has been maintained from the earliest times. In the West the universal requirement of celibacy in the clergy made the rule unfamiliar. At the Reformation in England the obligation of the clergy to lead a celibate life was repudiated (Art. 31 of 1553 and 1563, Art. 32 of 1571). No distinction between clergy and laity was made then or has been made at any time since. No prohibition of D. in the clergy has been adopted by any branch of the Anglican communion.—MA.

O. D. WATKINS.

DIGNITARY.—An ecclesiastic who holds a dignity or benefice giving him precedence over mere priests and canons. In cathedral churches of the Old Foundation there are four dignitaries or "Greater Persons," Dean, Precentor, Chancellor and Treasurer. See Walcott, Cathedrals (1865) 19f.; and cp. CATHEDRAL.—A3. R. J. WHITWELL.

DILAPIDATIONS.—This word raises a difficult question, but one easier of treatment now than a generation ago.

Before 1871 the practice was for the outgoing incumbent, or his representative, and the new incumbent each to appoint an arbitrator; these arbitrators afterwards co-opted a third as chairman.

1. Older Method.

As a result of their investigations a sum was fixed as the fair price of making good defects. But when this was done it was frequently found that the outgoing incumbent had "no effects" from which payment could be made. After exhausting in vain all means of enforcing payment, the incoming incumbent was frequently inducted without receiving any consideration whatever for dilapidations.

In 1871 the Dilapidations Act, now in force, was passed. The Diocesan Surveyor, though not made a compulsory visitor, may be called in:—(1) on request made by the Incumbent, or by the joint action of the Archdeacon and Rural Dean; (2) he must be called in on a vacancy, unless the outgoing incumbent is protected by a CERTIFICATE. In any case, the Bp. sets the surveyor in motion; see Dilapidations Acts, 1871, 1872. The Surveyor, when set in motion, inspects all the buildings, with gates and fences, and issues a report to the Bp. with a copy each for the patron and representative of the outgoing incumbent. It is his duty to specify the dilapidated parts to be restored, giving an estimate of the total cost; to decide what time may reasonably be allowed for completing the repairs; and lastly, to sign the Certificate of completion, when his fees, travelling and other expenses have been paid. This Certificate frees the incumbent from responsibility for D. during the ensuing five years, except in the case of wilful waste. Though these Acts come in for a liberal share of clerical abuse, it is held by many that they are an advance on the old system, and that eccles. property is now in a much more satisfactory condition.

2. Existing Law.

D. have been a frequent subject of discussion at Deanery and Diocesan Conferences, and in the Convocations of Cant. and York; committees have been appointed to consider and report. The following points have generally been considered to be desirable.

3. Proposals for Reform.

1. Compulsory periodic surveys.—The periods suggested are five or seven years. It will be assumed for the sake of clearness that five years is the approved period; should seven years find greater favour, let seven be substituted for five. Under the system of compulsory surveys, the Surveyor would automatically give notice every five years that it was his intention on a given date to survey the buildings of a benefice. A prudent incumbent will keep in mind the old proverb about "a stitch in time," and will himself maintain his premises in general repair. He will do well to acquaint himself with the D. Acts, taking hints from the Surveyor, who really is the parson's friend, and clearly to impress upon his own mind the purpose of those Acts, viz., to maintain eccles. property in tenantable repair.

2. Annual Contributions.—It is more difficult to raise £50, to meet a demand unexpectedly made for five years' repairs, than to lay by £10 a year for five years, under a carefully computed assessment. The sum laid by, perhaps with QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY, might be regarded as insurance against D. Some recommend that it be made a first charge on a benefice. Another suggestion is that an agency be set up in each diocese which should receive and administer such premiums and also act as a committee of advice and superintendence for the Surveyor. Such a committee could offer facilities to the "faithful laity" for making benefactions or bequests in aid of D., especially in the case of small livings and old houses. The Surveyor on his periodic visit would assess the sum to be regarded as annual premium, to be payable, say, between February 1st and Easter for each year.

In the case of a balance in hand after the D. have been completed and paid for, let it be taken into account in reduction of the premiums of the next quinquennial period, or let it be returned to the incumbent. In case the cost of the D. exceeds the accumulated premiums, let the incumbent make an extra contribution.

3. Payment of the Surveyor by fixed salary instead of fees.—The salary should be inclusive. A good Surveyor is worth a good salary, as Insurance and similar companies learn by experience.—A6. J. S. WILSDEN.

DIOCESAN BISHOP (modern Diocesan Bishops).—The fact that the Ch. is "established" in Eng. and Wales and not elsewhere in the Ang. Communion necessitates a different treatment in part.

I. ENGLAND AND WALES.

Bps. are nominated by the Prime Minister to the Sovereign, who expresses approval of the nomination, and gives to the Dean and Chapter (where such exist) of the vacant diocese a CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE, or permission to elect a Bp., at the same time recommending the person nominated by the Prime Minister. For practical purposes, therefore, the appointment is in the hands of the Government of the day.

(i) Ministerial. Bps. alone have authority to administer Confirmation, to select and ordain persons to be made Deacons and

2. Functions. Priests, to consecrate other Bps., and to consecrate Chs. and Burial Grounds.

(ii) Executive. Only a DB., or his duly appointed COMMISSARY, can license persons to act as Assistant Curates or to perform ministerial functions in other capacities; institute to the cure of souls persons selected by himself, if Patron of the benefice, or duly presented by some other Patron; issue mandates for the induction of such persons to the temporalities of the benefice; withdraw licences from licensed clergymen. He can put the law in motion, or consent to its being put in motion, against clergymen charged with error in morals, who are thereupon tried in the Consistory Court (see CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892). When charges are made of teaching erroneous doctrine or of using unauthorised ceremonial or of negligence in the performance of duties or inadequate performance of them, the Bp. issues a Commission under certain Acts of Parliament (cp. CH. DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840), and pronounces sentence or takes such other steps as he may be authorised to take in accordance with the findings of the Commission. When a beneficed clergyman has been found guilty by a temporal Court of certain offences, the Bp. may declare his benefice vacant without further trial. It belongs to the executive functions of a Bp. to allow, within certain limits, variations from customary use as prescribed in the PB (cp. RITUAL, §§ 2-66), and also to give permission, again within certain limits, for the use of special services on special occasions.

(iii) Judicial. The Bp. is Judge in his own Court (CONSISTORY), but he exercises his judicial functions through his CHANCELLOR, except that in certain circumstances he pronounces sentence in person as above indicated, and may for certain offences depose a Priest or Deacon from Holy Orders.

The Bp. appoints a Chancellor and a REGISTRAR, both of whom must be qualified lawyers, and ARCH-

3. Diocesan Officers and Chapter.

DEACONS who are, or become on appointment, of the number of the clergy of the diocese. All these appointments are for life, and do not lapse on the avoidance of the See. The Bp. is represented by his Chancellor in his Consistory Court, which considers applications for Faculties and some other matters. He also issues Marriage Licences through the Chancellor, and exercises discipline over Churchwardens. It is the duty of the Registrar to register all the official acts of the Bp. of which the Civil Law in any way takes cognisance, such as Ordinations and Consecrations of chs., etc.; he also keeps the records and documents of the Diocese. (See also CHAPLAIN and SECRETARY.)

The relation of the Bp. to his CATHEDRAL and its Chapter is governed by the Statutes of each cathedral. In many English dioceses the Bp. has no actual authority in his cathedral, although he is enthroned there and, by custom and with the consent of the Dean and Chapter, holds in it Ordinations and other Diocesan Services. He is not infrequently the Visitor of the Chapter, and in some cathedrals the Bp. holds periodical Visitations of the Cathedral Body.

The relation of the Bp. to the Clergy of his Diocese is by no means easy to define, because on the one hand his authority is limited by statutes, and on the other hand the independence of the beneficed clergy is secured by Common Law. Over the unbeneficed clergy, however, the Bp. has considerable authority, inasmuch as he can for due cause revoke a licence. It is doubtful whether he has even the right of entry into chs., for the purpose of taking part in public worship, and he has no power of enforcing obedience even to plain and undisputed directions of the PB except by cumbersome and costly legal process. This state of things is in its origin the outcome of that usurpation by the Papacy of the authority and powers of the Diocesan Episcopate, which was in large measure imitated and perpetuated by Parl. at the time of the Reformation. Still, it is generally recognised that there is a certain authority inherent in the Office of a Bp., and at their Ordination Deacons and Priests promise that they will "reverently obey the Ordinary and other chief Ministers of the Ch. and them to whom the charge and government over them is committed, following with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions," while at the same time, and subsequently on admission to new duties, they take the OATH OF CANONICAL OBEDIENCE, by which they bind themselves to pay true and canonical obedience to the Bp. in all things lawful and honest. These undertakings, though vague and undefined in themselves, contribute no doubt to the very great moral authority which in actual practice Bps. are for the most part able to exert, with the result that matters are commonly submitted for their decision in regard to which they have no legal authority.

4. Relation to Clergy and Laity.

Of late years the conception of a Bp. as a Father in God, and as the Pastor of both Clergy and Laity, has been steadily gaining ground, and, in matters outside the scope of the individual conscience, the expressed wishes of the Bp. are as a rule complied with. Towards the laity of his diocese the relations of the Bp. are in practice purely pastoral, though the Bp. has—nominally at least—authority to proceed against persons who offend in certain particulars and, if need be, to pronounce sentence of excommunication. It is safe, however, to say that no formal sentence of the kind is ever now pronounced. [But cp. COURTS, DISCIPLINE.]

II. NON-ESTABLISHED CHURCHES.

Details vary in different parts of the world; the customs of the following Churches are selected as being typical and as fairly covering the ground. We begin with Scotland.

1. Election. Nominations may be made by both clerical and lay electors. The clerical electors are all the instituted Clergy of the diocese

5. Scotland. and all Presbyters licensed and resident in the diocese who have served as Presbyters for two years preceding the election in any diocese in Scotland. Lay electors—one for each incumbency and certain mission charges—are chosen by the communicants, male and female, of 21 years of age and upwards; they must themselves be male communicants of the age of at least 24. When nominations have been made, the clerical and lay electors vote by orders, but without separating. A majority of both orders is required for election.

2. Duties. (Special provisions.) Every Bp. is required to visit each congregation in his diocese at least once in every three years, and also to hold a Confirmation in each parish at least once in the same period. A Bp. can officiate in any ch. in his diocese on giving 8 days' notice to the incumbent of his intention.

Bps. can pronounce sentence of Censure, Suspension, Deprivation, Degradation, on Presbyters and Deacons found guilty, after due trial, of certain offences; and the Episcopal Synod (see SYNOD) can pronounce the same sentences on Bps. found guilty similarly.

3. Coadjutors. Whenever it becomes necessary to appoint a COADJUTOR he is elected in the same manner as a DB. He has no vote in the Episcopal or Provincial Synods, except in the absence of the Bp. whose Coadjutor he is. He succeeds to the See when a vacancy occurs. (NOTE. In case of illness or temporary absence a Bp. may appoint a Commissary with strictly limited powers.)

4. Cathedrals. A Bp. may, with the concurrence of his Diocesan Synod, appoint any ch. in his diocese to be his Cath., and he may change his Cath. in the same way. The Bp. is the head of the Cath. body, which is governed by the Chapter, of which he is a member, and of which the other members are the Provost or Senior Presbyter (called DEAN in Edinburgh) and the Canons. The Bp. has the use of the Cath. for all Episcopal acts and diocesan functions whenever he requires it, provided that statutory services are not interfered with without the consent of the Chapter.

1. Election. The election of Bps. in Canada is governed by the canons of the various Diocesan Synods, which are not uniform on the subject.

6. Canada. Wherever there is a Synod the election of the Bp. is in its hands, though in some cases the Synod may if it thinks fit delegate the appointment. In some dioceses nominations are made, in others the Synod proceeds to vote without making any nominations. In all dioceses a majority of both orders is required for election, but in some a simple majority is sufficient, while in others a two-thirds majority is necessary.

2. Coadjutors. A Bp. may request his Diocesan Synod to elect a Coadjutor, and it becomes the duty of the Synod to decide whether the circumstances render such an appointment necessary. If the decision is in favour of the appointment, the election takes place in the same way as the election of a DB. The Coadjutor sits and votes in the Diocesan Synod and in the Upper House of the Provincial and General Synods, and succeeds to the See on the occurrence of a vacancy.

3. Patronage. The powers of Bps. in Canada vary in different dioceses. In some the Bp. is sole Patron of all the parishes and missions,¹ though in the case of parishes he is obliged before making an appointment to consult the Churchwardens and the delegates to the Diocesan Synod, without, however, being bound to accept their suggestions.

In other dioceses the congregation of a parish, through its representatives, selects an Incumbent and presents him to the Bp. for Institution, and the Bp. can only exercise a veto on grounds of the moral or doctrinal unfitness of the person so presented. There are other systems of patronage between these two extremes.

4. Cathedrals. In nearly all the Canadian dioceses the Cath., if there is any, is a parish ch., and the Bp. as a rule has some arrangement with the authorities of it as to the use of it as a Cath. The details of these arrangements vary considerably and are not of sufficient importance to be specified here.

5. Discipline. The exercise of discipline in most non-established Chs. proceeds on the same general lines as those indicated under Scotland, and it will not be necessary to refer again to this matter.

1. Election. In the province of South Africa Bps. are appointed by a body called the Elective Assembly,

7. South Africa. and consisting of the clergy of the diocese in Priests' Orders, one representative Deacon, provided that there are at least three Deacons in the diocese, and lay representatives of the parishes in the diocese, provided that there are at least six priests in the diocese. The election is in the hands of the clergy, but the assent of the lay representatives is required. Any diocese is at liberty to make its own regulations as to the majority necessary. For example, two-thirds may be required as a majority of the clergy, and any person receiving that number of votes may be deemed to be elected unless two-thirds of the laity negative the election. But in all dioceses there must be a majority of the clergy, and the assent of the laity must be given in some form. Provision is made, however, for the delegation of the right to elect to other persons.

2. Coadjutors. In all essential features the provisions for the election of Coadjutor Bps. are the same as those which prevail in Canada. Provision is also made for the appointment of Assistant Bps. in case of necessity. The assent of the Bps. of the province is required to the appointment of an Assistant, but the selection of the person rests with the Bp. of the diocese concerned, the assent of the Diocesan Synod (if any exists) to the selection being necessary. An Assistant Bp. has the right to sit, speak, and vote as a Member of the House of Clergy in the Provincial Synod and as a member of certain other bodies. He is summoned to all meetings of the Synod of Bps., and may speak therein but not vote. He has no right of succession to the See.

3. Vdo. See SYNOD.

1. Election. Election of Bps. in New Zealand is made by the Diocesan Synods, who may under certain

2. New Zealand. conditions delegate the appointment to any person or persons deemed suitable.

If a Synod decides to elect directly, one or more persons are nominated by one or more of the clergy and seconded by one or more of the lay representatives, and the Synod then proceeds to vote by orders, a majority of each order being necessary for election. These provisions do not apply to Missionary Bishoprics. Missionary Bps. are appointed by the General Synod, the members of the Mission engaged at the time in carrying on the work of the Mission being at liberty to recommend any one deemed by them a fit person for the office; the General Synod is not, however, bound to accept such recommendation.

¹ A parish is entirely self-supporting as regards the stipend of its clergy; a Mission is a Cure which receives help from Diocesan or other Funds towards the stipend.

2. Cathedrals. Any Diocesan Synod may constitute a Cath. Chapter, to consist of the Bp. and such other persons, including lay members, as may seem necessary. The functions of Cath. Chapters are not clearly defined, but their object is "the more efficient prosecution of the work of the Church."

Of Australia it is sufficient to say that the mode of electing Bps. proceeds on the same general lines as those which prevail in New Zealand.

3. Australia. Provision is made in Australia for the appointment of Bps. Coadjutor on a system not found elsewhere. The Synod of any diocese has power to create the office of Bp. Coadjutor with or without a defined area of work within the limits of the diocese. The appointment rests entirely with the Bp. of the diocese, but he cannot make any appointment until the Primate is assured that a reasonable income is secured for the Coadjutor. The appointment lapses with the avoidance of the See, and the Coadjutor has no right of succession.

1. Election. Each Diocesan Convention in America is free to make its own regulations for the election of its Bp.; it is impossible for lack of space to describe them in detail, but it is sufficient to say that speaking generally the procedure is much the same as in Canada and other English-speaking countries. In all cases a majority of both clerical and lay electors is required for election. There are special provisions for the election of Missionary Bps., i.e., Bps. exercising jurisdiction in parts belonging to the United States not yet organised into dioceses, but known as Missionary Districts, or in territory beyond the United States not under the charge of Bps. of the Ang. Communion. Bps. for Missionary Districts are chosen by the House of Bps. (see SYNOD), such choice being subject to confirmation by the House of Deputies during the session of the General Convention, and at other times to confirmation by a majority of the Standing Committees of the several dioceses. Application for the consecration of a Bp. for any part of the Foreign Mission Field of the American Ch. must be made in due form by the members of the Ch. in the part concerned; and the approbation of a majority of the Bps. entitled to vote in the House of Bps. is necessary before the presiding Bp. may proceed to consecrate.

2. Duties. Bps. must reside within the limits of their jurisdiction, and may not absent themselves therefrom for more than three months without the consent of the Convention or the Standing Committee of the diocese, or in the case of a Missionary Bp. without the consent of the Presiding Bp. Every Bp. is required to visit the congregations within his diocese or Missionary District at least once in three years, to keep a record of all his official acts, and at the Annual Convention to make a full statement of the affairs of his diocese.

3. Coadjutors. Bps. Coadjutor may, under certain conditions, be elected in all American dioceses, and have the right of succession.

1. Election. Bps. are elected in the Nippon Sei Kōkai (Holy Catholic Ch. of Japan) by the Diocesan Synods; both the clerical and lay delegates have the right to make nominations for the office of Bp., provided that at least two persons join in the nomination. The clergy and laity vote by orders, a vote of a two-thirds majority of those present of each order is necessary for election, and the election must be confirmed by the assent of a majority of the Bps. of the Ch. in Japan.

11. Japan.

¹ In the American Ch. a Convention is the same as a Synod elsewhere.

2. Cathedrals. A Cath. may be established by any Diocesan Synod, and all Cathedrals are under the direct control of the Bp. of the diocese.

[For history and constitution of the episcopate, see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, EPISCOPACY, ORDERS (HOLY); for consecration of a Bp., see ORDINAL.]
—TJ. EDWARD A. WELCH.

DIOCESE.—The first use of the term D. was as the name applied to a civil division of the Roman Empire. In its eccles.

1. The Diocese as Unit Area. sense Bingham says, "It is evident . . . that the most ancient and apostolical division of the Ch. was into Ds., or episcopal Churches, that is, such precincts or districts as single bishops governed with the assistance of their presbyters" (Antiq. ix. 2). He goes on to show that a D. was not merely a single congregation, "but the rule of government in every city, including not only the city itself, but the suburbs, or region lying round about it, within the verge of its jurisdiction. Which seems to be the plain reason of that great and visible difference which we find in the extent of Ds.; some being very large, others very small, according as the civil government of each city happened to have a larger or lesser jurisdiction" (ib.). In this we may trace the fundamental idea that it is wise that the civil and eccles. jurisdictions should, as far as possible, be coterminous. This principle was pressed by the late Prof. Freeman when he urged that, as a rule, Ds. should follow counties. It was also pressed by Napoleon in the Organic Arts. under the Concordat, when he made the area of the D. to be coterminous with that of the Department. The D. then is the unit of Church life and organisation. In the evolution of our eccles. system the D. came first, and worked downwards to the parish, and upwards to the province, and the Bp., not the parish priest, was the unit of pastoral authority and responsibility. As the late Bp. of Gibraltar said in the Pan-Ang. Papers 7 159: "The unit in the Ch. is the Bp. and his people, or more particularly the Bp. with his colleagues the presbyters, his assistants the deacons and other officers, and the people under his and their charge. This is of the essence of things." This co-operation of the Bp. and his presbyters in the work of pastoral responsibility is witnessed by the old words used by the Bp. at Institution, "Accipe curam tuam et meam."

Now, as the governance of Christ's Ch. is constitutional and not autocratic, we have the natural result that the Diocesan Synod is the oldest form of Ch. Council, and is essential to the full organisation of the Ch. In Eng. such Synods have fallen into abeyance through the unwieldy size of the modern Diocese.

What then should be the size of a D.? This has varied from the beginning, from the time

2. Normal Size of Diocese. when, as Bingham tells us, there were in North Africa "in Saint Austin's time about 466 bishoprics," till the day when the whole of Australia was an Archdeaconry in the D. of Calcutta. There can be no definite limit as to area or population laid down for any D., but we may take as a guide the statement of Dr. Newman, in No. 33 of Tracts for the Times: "We learn that large Ds. are the characteristics of a Ch. in its infancy or weakness; whereas the more firmly Christianity was rooted in a country, the more vigorous its rulers, the more diligently were its sees multiplied throughout the eccles. territory. . . . The most perfect state of a Christian country would be, where there was a sufficient number of separate Ds." The principle laid down above must be borne in mind, viz., that, when possible, the civil and eccles. jurisdictions should be coterminous. Above all, it is important to remember that, according to the ideal of the perfect Pastor, a Bp. should be in touch with his Clergy and people, "I know My sheep and am known of Mine," and to provide that the conditions may be such that there is not laid upon our Bps. the burden of an impossible duty.

Bp. Lightfoot declared that 250 was the number of parishes that a Bp. could effectively supervise. Only eleven Eng. Ds. fall below this limit. Or again, if we compare the number of priests committed to the charge of a Bp. in different parts of the world, in Scotland a Bp. rules on an average 47 priests; in America, 53; in Italy, 75; in Ireland, 122; in England (R.C. Ch.), 192, and (Ch. of Eng.), 616. These figures contain food for thought. Making every allowance for the need for a higher proportion of Bps. where the population or the Ch. congregations are sparsely distributed, it is evident that a large increase of the diocesan Episcopate is desirable in the Mother Church. Such an increase was designed at the Reformation, but it was only partially carried out. It was one of the first questions raised by the men of the Oxford Movement; it was one of the first raised in the revived Convocation of Canterbury, and again of York. It occupied a prominent place in the discussions of the first Ch. Congress in 1861, and in those of the Canterbury House of Laymen. It is now a generally acknowledged need. In the future care should be taken to avoid the "isolated patchwork measures that have been passed during the last seventy years," which "have frequently had no regard for the whole Ch., and have been subsequently altered" (the Bp. of St. Albans, Dr. Jacob, in his Introd. to The Increase of the Episcopate, by C. E. A. Bedwell, 1906).

As the government of the Ch. is "constitutional and not autocratic," the subdivision of unwieldy Ds. should be the corporate act of the Ch. working through the proper authorities.

3. Method of Subdivision.

In America it is the work of the House of Bps. In England, in these democratic days, it had perhaps better be the work of the Representative Ch. Council. It surely ought not to be left to one or more individual Bps. to inaugurate, or on the other hand to discourage or completely block, a division urgently called for by the needs of the Ch. at large. If the work is to be carried out in a business-like way, an authoritative Committee should inquire into and report on the working of the whole diocesan system; an authoritative scheme for the whole country should be thought out as a whole, but carried out bit by bit, as opportunity arises; and an authoritative fund should be raised from the whole country to aid localities in the foundation of new dioceses when and where they may be needed.

For purposes of administration a diocese is divided into archdeaconries, under the Archdeacon, who should be primarily the financial officer of the Ch. (see ARCHDEACON). It will depend largely upon the physical features and travelling facilities of the D. whether much or little use is made in practice of the unit of the archdeaconry. Each archdeaconry again is subdivided into rural deaneries, under the Rural Dean (see RURAL DEAN). Here again the conditions in great cities as contrasted with rural districts cause wide variations in utility and method.

In the expansion of the Anglican Communion the primitive method is generally followed out. A given area is assigned, as a missionary district, to a Bp. and the priests and deacons under him. This is administered as a Missionary diocese under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

As the Church becomes more settled, various missionary dioceses are formed into a province under its own Metropolitan and archbishop, and such a province has its own independent rights and jurisdiction.¹ Only disaster follows when the attempt is made to apply local English conditions and rules to other peoples, in other countries, under conditions that are entirely different. (See ANGLICAN COMMUNION.)—A7.

E. H. FIRTH.

DIRECTION.—See CASUISTRY.

DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP.—The rejection of the PB, before any other Order had been issued to supersede it, led to such great confusion that the Westminster Assembly compiled the Directory for Public Worship, which was established by an Ordinance of the Parliament on Jan. 4, 1645. It opened with a Pref. giving reasons for the rejection of the PB; then followed suggestions and headings for pr. and preaching on different occasions, which the minister might add to, if necessary. It was rather a Manual of Directions than a Form of Devotion. The Surplice, Sign of the Cross, Godparents, the Apocrypha, and all Festivals were abolished, and it was implied that communicants would receive sitting, the Holy Table being placed in the body of the church. It contained no service for Burials and no Creed or Decalogue.

When some still persisted in using the PB and others their own forms or none at all, the Parliament passed another ordinance on August 23, 1645, ordering all ministers to use the D. "on the Lord's Day after their receiving it," or incur a fine of forty shillings. The PB was entirely forbidden, even in private houses, under a penalty of £5 for the first offence, £10 for the second, and for the third one year's imprisonment.

¹ For a striking account of such a development see the recent Life of Abp. Machray, 1909.

(Literature: Neal, History of the Puritans, vol. 3; Perry, Church History, vol. 2; Procter and Frere, A New History of the PB, p. 158.)—B2.

P. A. MILLER.

DIRGE.—The first Antiphon in Mattins for the departed begins with the word Dirige, and hence the whole Mattins came to be called D., just as the Vespers, for a similar reason, was called Placebo. Placebo and D. is the common designation of the entire office for the departed.—Ob.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

DISABILITIES OF CLERGY.—See CLERGY, DISABILITIES OF.

DISCIPLINE.—Man in his natural state is subject to the moral D. of God, and his condition on earth is a state of moral probation. In this D. of Providence both Church and State have a share, since the powers that be are ordained of God for purposes of D., and the Ch. as a divine institution is bound by nature and grace to exercise D. on her members. The religion of the Israelitish nation was essentially moral, obedience to her law being exacted under severe penalties.

Our Lord in His Sermon on the Mount explicitly said that He came to fulfil, not to abrogate that ancient law (Matt. 5 17-20), but by example and teaching He elevated Morality from a slavish obedience to the letter to the joyful obedience of love, thus inaugurating a new chapter in the moral history of the world. By Church D. is meant the moral training of the Christian character. By the terms of his membership in the Mystical Body of Christ, the disciple must be holy (1 Cor. 3 16), for the Ch. is to be the light of the world (Matt. 5 14). Our Saviour (Matt. 18 15-20) laid down the elementary principles on which D. was to be exercised, and (John 20 23) gave authority to his Ch. to bind and to loose. In conformity with this commission, St. Peter condemned Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5 1-11) and Simon Magus (Acts 8 20-23). In the exercise of D., St. Paul excommunicated the Corinthian (1 Cor. 5) and authorised the Ch. to receive him back (2 Cor. 2 10). Further illustrations of the standard of D. required by the Apostles may be found at large in the Pastoral Eps. and in the Eps. of St. John. That this high standard was not always maintained can be seen in the Letters to the seven Churches (Rev. 2 and 3). The primary object of Ch. D. is to safeguard the Sacrs. (1 Cor. 6 11, 10 27).

Admission to the early Christian communities was an introduction to a society in which social distinctions were obliterated in the service of love. No finer school for the formation of character can be conceived than these small bodies of earnest men and women, living pious lives in the midst of impurity, the objects of misunderstanding, hatred, contempt, and persecution. "Non magna loquimur sed vivimus" was the answer of the Ch. to her critics in those early times.

But the advantages of belonging to such communities attracted the unworthy, compelling the Ch. in self-protection to introduce that "godly discipline" referred to in the Communion Service. The two chief aspects of Ch. D. are stated in that Service to be that sinners "might be saved in the day of the Lord" and that "others admonished by their example might be the more afraid to offend." This fear of offence was so widely felt, that many deferred Bapt. until old age, under the impression that post-baptismal sin was unpardonable. Others exiled themselves into the wilderness, living lives of stern self-discipline as hermits, or entered monasteries in order to live under the D. of a strict rule. That such conduct was induced by a passion for personal holiness, and not by a desire to evade the active duties of Christianity, is proved by the fact that from these hermitages and monasteries proceeded many of the most devoted Missionaries of the Cross.

The cruel persecutions that assailed the Ch. in the early cents. resulted in the defection of many half-hearted adherents. In the 2nd cent. the crime of apostasy could only be wiped out by martyrdom; but from an early period distinctions were drawn between the lapsed. The Sacrificati were those who had sacrificed to idols, the Thurificati those who had offered incense, the Libellatici those who had bribed their persecutors and thus obtained release, while the Traditores were those who had delivered up Sacred Books. The Montanists, in their desire for purity, condemned the lapsed to lifelong penance; and at a subsequent period, after a lull in persecution had enabled many to re-enter the Ch. on terms too easy to satisfy extremists, the Donatists protested that none of the lapsed ought to be readmitted on any condition to the privileges of Ch. membership.

When, in the decay of Roman civilisation under the overflowing tide of Northern invasion, Christian

3. Church Discipline in the Middle Ages.

Missionaries came in contact with the comparative barbarism of Teutonic Europe, new problems concerning D. inevitably presented themselves. The sturdy warriors who overthrew the fabric of Roman society acquired with difficulty even the most rudimentary ideas of Christian Ethics. What they did understand was a crude civil code, written or traditional, which had governed their ancestors from immemorial times, according to which every offence had a specific punishment assigned. To clear the ethical code from misunderstanding, the Missionaries drew up Penitentials, in which in like manner each crime was ticketed with its proper penance. In other parts of Europe a vast mass of miscellaneous regulations for the Ch., either in her corporate character or in her dealing with individual souls, was slowly taking form, destined in the course of time to shape itself into what was known in later days as CANON LAW. It was from the moral precepts and regulations of Canon Law that the casuists extracted the theory of Ethics which lies at the base of Moral Theology. Canon Law, to a large extent, borrowed its language and method from the ancient Civil Law of Rome. Thus in a twofold way the D. of the Ch. was affected by external influences, Teutonic Law giving rise to the Penitentials, and Roman Law profoundly influencing Canon Law. In early days while the Christian communities were small and isolated, disputes between the brethren could be adjusted by the Pauline method (1 Cor. 6 1); but, with the expansion of the Ch. into a vast body comprehending all sorts of men, the great mass of civil and criminal cases came naturally into the Civil Courts, the Ch. safeguarding her Sacrs. by independent disciplinary methods.

But in practice the two systems (Civil and Ecclesiastical) mutually interacted through the growing habit of employing clerical lawyers skilled in Canon Law in the ordinary civil courts. It was indeed a dream of the 11th cent. that in some happy time Ch. Law might supersede the civil code, and the administration of justice become the exclusive prerogative of the clergy. When therefore about this time schools of Civil Law appeared in various educational centres, the Popes took alarm. Honorius III (A.D. 1217) and Innocent IV (1259) forbade by Bull the teaching of Roman Law in Paris "or neighbouring countries."

The growth of Scholastic Theology dissipated this dream. Anselm in his theory of Salvation had laid down the principle that no penance, however severe, could by itself satisfy Divine Justice; that nothing but the Infinite Merits of One Who was Himself infinite could do this. At the hands of the SCHOOLMEN the principle was expanded into what is known as the Tridentine doctrine of Merit—that Christ's infinite merits enable the Saints by works of SUPEREROGATION to augment the store originally created by His own meritorious death, and that this treasure was at the disposal of the Ch. to apply to the contrite sinner in her ministry of Absol. A theory like this strikes at the root of the old idea that penance should be proportional to offence. If no penance the sinner can perform can possibly satisfy Divine Justice, and if the Merit of Christ can be imputed by the priest, the smallest penance, thus reinforced, may transcend in value the most severe and protracted D. Penance, thus robbed of its expiatory character, becomes a mere technical compliance with Eccles. law. But the principle has further consequences. If the Ch. can attach merit to formal penance, she can do so too to any other act. Hence masses, ps. at privileged altars, pilgrimages, trentals, INDULGENCES, at the word of Authority, become means of grace. Thus a purely speculative theory of merit in the course of time at the hands of the Schoolmen overthrew the Penitentials, and with them the ancient D. of the Church.

4. Scholastic Theology and Church Discipline.

Imputed merit and technical compliance with Ch. D. by a formal penance might possibly be deemed sufficient to safeguard the

5. Canon and Civil Law.

Sacrs., but it is evident that they are insufficient to protect society. The State could not assent to a prisoner condoning an offence by a technical penance, nor could it suffer the law to lose its terror without great peril to the entire community.

The relaxation of penance in the Eccles. courts tended to weaken Canon Law as a preventative of crime, and in consequence to reinvigorate the Civil courts. In two directions however Canon Law maintained its power. (1) It was the law of the clergy, secular and regular, and of all who could show sufficient clerly learning to write their names or read a few lines of Latin. This "benefit of clergy", at the time when the Civil Code was excessively severe, was a highly valued privilege. (2) The right of SANCTUARY provided for all classes a method of appeal from the Civil to the Eccles. Court. Theoretically, the Ch. undertook to discipline those who took refuge in the protected areas, but in practice Sanctuaries became the harborage of bankrupts and defaulters of every kind. For certain classes of offence the Courts of the Archdeacons with their apparitors and spies were dreaded tribunals. Bps. also had their Courts for reserved cases, while some crimes could only be purged in the Court of the Pope. Excommunication theoretically involved social ostracism; but when, in decadent times, bp. would excommunicate bp. on the most trivial occasions to gratify personal malice or revenge, these fulminations lost their terror. At the height of the Papal power, the ban and the interdict were terrible weapons in the hands of an enraged ecclesiastic, enabling a Pope to deprive a whole country of the ministrations of the clergy. England never forgave the Papacy for the humiliation inflicted on her in the time of John.

Owing to the rise of heretical opinions in the South of France, the Dominican Order embarked on a propaganda resulting finally in the establishment of the Inquisition, which both in Europe and abroad formed for cents. the most ruthless travesty of Ch. D. ever contrived by the art of man. As the object of this terrible system was to repress heresy alone, its action tended indirectly to lessen the care the Ch. had hitherto bestowed on the moral D. of the people. Exemptions of Monastic bodies from episcopal visitation did much to break up the disciplinary system, and this evil was greatly extended by the privileges granted to the mendicant Orders, whose friars received a roving commission to visit any parish and to absolve offenders, even those refused by the parish priest, by the Archdeacon and by the Bp. Thus the whole system fell into confusion, and at the dawn of the Reformation, when the machinery of D. was most elaborate, morality decayed.

For a long time the Reformed Churches tried to maintain the D. of the old Courts, but with diminishing success. A change was passing unperceived over Europe. Ideals of personal conduct were rising, and this reacted upon the State; Christian D. was in reality reverting to its ancient form. When, as we have seen, religious communities were small, the standard of life was high, and the mere entrance into fellowship in such societies was in itself a D. of the highest order. Now on a large scale Christianity was making her power felt, and in exact proportion to the decay of direct D. the indirect D. of popular opinion was growing both in volume and efficiency. The whole of the vast body of legislation for the regulation of trade and manufacture, particularly in the relations of employer to employed, that has grown up in England especially during the last cent., is the result of this gradual evolution of Christian sentiment. This will appear more clearly if we consider the course of events in France, where the Reformation was suppressed. It suited the policy of the Popes to place the D. of the Ch. practically in the hands of the Jesuits, and this body, imbued with a passionate desire to bring all the world within the net of the Ch., subordinated among her members the D. of character to that of Missionary efficiency. So long as her workers "did all for the glory of God," obeyed their superiors, and manifested missionary zeal, the Jesuit Order accepted responsibility for the personal actions of her agents even when flagrantly opposed to the ethical code of Christendom. To secure the salvation of souls at all costs, she charged her confessors to relax penance, and to absolve when even the grace of "attrition" was scarcely evident. The reader will find the history of this remarkable development in Pascal's Provincial Letters. The result of the relaxation of D. was disastrous to public morality, the rich became increasingly rapacious, the poor sank into degradation and misery, until the Revolution swept away both Ch. and State.

6. The Decay of Church Discipline.

The growth of public opinion is by no means continuous, and when through sloth the Ch. begins to lapse from her ideals, whether of personal holiness or of the conduct of man to his fellows, some new body impregnated with fresh zeal is sure to spring up, promising to do what the Ch. has failed to accomplish. The successive rise of Utilitarianism and Socialism in England are examples of this. Both are essentially humanitarian, emphasising the duty of man to man and of the State to the governed. The present apathy of the public to the degradation of the extremely poor is a proof of languor and inefficiency in the D. of the Ch. Until every communicant is trained in his duty to society, as well as in the duty of individual decency of life, the Ch.'s disciplinary work is not complete. Modern problems of D. centre round such problems as the marriage laws, commercial gambling and dishonesty, unjust dealing with labour, iniquitous and tyrannical strikes, excessive love of pleasure and prodigal expense, neglect of the ordinances of Religion; and out in the Mission field even wider issues are raised. There the Ch. is confronted with the same problems that vexed the Missionaries of mediæval Europe—that of dealing with peoples whose habits of thought and life are of immemorial antiquity, and whose tribal customs such as polygamy, serfdom and slavery, tribal warfare, the rights of chieftains, punishment of criminals, caste, and the like, frequently conflict with Christian ideals. Again, the constitution of native Chs. and a native ministry raises disciplinary questions of far-reaching moment. What seemed to the early Missionaries simple proves extraordinarily complex. Some of these problems are of merely local interest, but the solution of others may involve decisions affecting the fundamental principles of Christianity.

See CANON LAW, REPENTANCE, MORALITY; also Butler's Analogy; Cyprian, De Lapsis; Harnack, Prätisch Theologie, 1877, vol. 2; 2. Literature. Henson's Moral Discipline of the Christian Church; also canons 109–116. With regard to the Mission field, see Grant's Bampton Lect., 1843 (reprinted by SPG., 1910). Recent legislation will be found in A Century of Law Reform, Macmillan, 1901.—FE. E. A. WESLEY.

DISCRETE AND LEARNED MINISTER OF GOD'S WORD (Exh. ¹ HC).—In the OHC, 1548, and PB of 1549, "to me or to some other discrete and learned priest." Cosin's suggestion, "discrete and learned priest, the Minister of God's word," was not accepted in 1662. The phrase is ultimately derived from the 21st decree of the Lateran Council of 1215, which made yearly confession compulsory and ordered that the priest be "discrete and cautious." The word reappears in later decrees, used in a natural if conventional sense. There is no reason to suppose that it bears a technical meaning of "authorised." The Lateran decree allowed confession to priests other than the parochial clergy, if the latter gave permission; and the Council of Trent, to stop abuses, ordered that such outside confessors should have a licence (sess. 23, De Reform., art. 15). It has been suggested that in the Eng. Ch. some similar licence from the bishop is desirable.

(Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica,² c. 15, sec. 3, n. 1; Hefele, *Conciliengeschichte*² 35 627, p. 888.) —A3. CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

DISPENSATION.—Used by classical writers: "the paying out of money, (by weight)," "the work of a paymaster" or "steward"; and, in a derived sense, "administration," "management" (cp. 1 Cor. 9 17, "a dispensation of the Gospel"; "the Mosaic Dispensation"; the "dispensing" of drugs by a chemist).

Administration necessitates, under certain circumstances, the granting of indulgence. An administrator's first duty is to see that the law is obeyed. But the law contemplates a normal state of things, and under unusual circumstances there is a risk of the law becoming morally inapplicable, and, if enforced, odious, or even injurious. If the law has been broken, the administrator may re-enforce it, may avoid taking notice of the breach of the law, or may accept the fact of the breach and legitimate it. This third action came to be termed, in a limited sense of the word, "dispensation." It has sometimes been confounded with "privilege" or "absolution." It was more than "absolution," for it not only forgave the illegal act, but also validated its results. D. was always granted only with difficulty, and for important reasons. At first, Ds. were mostly post factum. In some cases, a future exemption from the obligation of a law was granted, and in time this became the usual meaning of the term. In this technical sense, D. = "an authoritative declaration that a law does not, under present circumstances, bind a person." Properly speaking, this is the act of a law-giver, by a temporary repeal of the law; but, in practice, the act is judicial, and is the decision of an officer who has jurisdiction over the person concerned, and has also weighed one law against another, that the positive law is not binding. Usually the conflict is between the law of nature and the law of the Ch., and a D., e.g., authorising an invalid to eat meat on a fast-day, declares that, in view of the necessity (by natural law) of nourishing food to a person in this condition, the eccles. law of fasting does not bind him.

Ds., notwithstanding the maxim Cuius est ligare, eius est solvere, were, when justified, for centuries

2. Earlier History. granted, as a necessary act of administration, by bps. to their subjects, not only from diocesan or provincial statutes, but even from laws imposed by a general council, or by the Pope. In later days the juridical theory developed and became stricter, until only some Gallican doctors were left, holding that a bp. can do for his diocese what the Pope can do for the whole Church.

The systematisation of the Canon Law lessened the authority of Councils and bps., concentrating legislative and administrative power in the hands of the Pope, who, as Ultramontanes assert, dispenses with all eccles. laws as legislator. The fees for Ds. regarding vows, orders, tenure of benefices, and marriage, formed an important item in the Papal income. At last bps. were permitted to grant Ds. mainly by virtue of their faculties, quinquennially renewed on a visit to Rome.

It was enacted, 25 Hen. VIII, cap. 21 (A.D. 1534), that application for Ds. should no longer be made to Rome, but that the Abp. of Canterbury should "grant . . . all manner such

1. Anglican Usage.

licences, dispensations . . . faculties . . . for causes, not contrary or repugnant to the Holy Scripture and Laws of God, as heretofore hath been used and accustomed to be had and obtained at the See of Rome, or any person or persons by authority of the same." These Ds. were granted by the Abp.'s faculty office. In A.D. 1570 Parker, worried by applications from men of position, who desired faculties for their protégés to hold benefices contrary to Canon Law, expressed a wish that the office were done away. In A.D. 1576 Grindal with the Privy Council decided (without result) to abolish letters dimissory, marriage licences, ordination under age, or to both diaconate and priesthood at once, still permitting Ds. to hold two (only) benefices at once, for the ordination of the illegitimate, for eating meat on fast days, for non-residence, commendams, and for laymen to hold benefices without cure of souls. Letters dimissory and marriage licences are still granted, and the Ordinal alludes to a faculty authorising the ordination of a deacon under 23 years (all in Grindal's black list). In addition Ds. on fast-days, for non-residence, and tenure of two benefices, are sometimes given.

Lawyers would, possibly, limit episcopal powers to grant Ds., substituting the Abp. for the Pope, as possessor of rights filched from the bps. Bps. may, like Bp. Temple (of London), more reasonably claim all powers originally inherent in their office.—A5.

Bibliography: Vacant, Dict. de Theol. Cath., fasc. xxx, pp. 1428 ff.; St. Thom. Aq., Summa, I, II^o, xcvi, ad. 4; E. G. Wood, Regal Power of the Church; Strype, Parker, Grindal; Mocket, Politia Eccl. Anglic., London, 1617; Gibson, Codex Juris Eccl. 3 5; Creighton, The Abolition of the Roman Jurisdiction, Ch. Hist. Soc., vii.—A5.

J. E. SWALLOW.

DISSENTERS.—The first body of Christians to "dissent" from the teaching of the National Church and separate themselves from its communion were the Roman Catholics, who after the bull of Pope Pius V in 1570, excommunicating Elizabeth and all who countenanced her "schismatical" church, ceased to attend their parish churches and were in consequence fined or imprisoned for "recusancy." The term "Dissenters" is, however, usually confined to those bodies of Protestants who object either to the doctrine or discipline of the Ch. of England. A large body of PURITANS in Elizabeth's reign objected to the discipline and polity of the Ch., although practically all of them accepted its doctrinal teaching, and the majority were strongly opposed to the idea of separating from its communion. But as early as 1568 an attempt was made by some extreme Puritans to leave the Ch. and form separate societies, where they could enjoy their own special form of discipline and worship. About 1580, owing to the teaching of a divine named Robert Browne, the sect of

"Brownists" or INDEPENDENTS was formed. They advocated complete separation from the Ch. of Eng., and maintained that each separate congregation was a distinct church endowed with full powers of independent government and organisation. They denied that the Ch. of England, or any church not formed after their own model, could be a true church or possess valid sacraments or ordinances, and thus refused to allow their followers to join in communion with the Ch., in consequence of which they were bitterly persecuted and frequently banished from the kingdom (cp. Neal, Hist. of Puritans, vol. i, p. 303, ed. 1822). During the Civil War, however, they rose into great prominence, and at length, with the aid of the army composed mainly of Independents, triumphed over the more moderate "Presbyterian" Puritans, who regarded them with the greatest abhorrence as "sectaries."

In 1633 the Independents were divided by the formation of a separate congregation of BAPTISTS, who advocated the necessity of adult "believers'" baptism, and this sect rapidly increased during the Civil War, and under the Commonwealth as many as thirty of their ministers held Ch. livings.

During the Civil War also the teachings of a religious mystic named George Fox led to the formation of the Quakers or Society of Friends, who denied the use of any external rites and affirmed the necessity of living under the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit. Under the leadership of Barclay and William Penn their numbers rapidly increased, although they were persecuted and ostracised, not only by the Ch., but by all the other sects.

The refusal of the PRESBYTERIANS to conform to the requirements of the Act of Uniformity in 1662 led to the ejection of a large number of their clergy from their cures, and the persecution which they endured, in common with the Independents and Baptists, drew these hitherto antagonistic bodies of D. into closer union. The Toleration Act of 1689, by bringing about the cessation of religious persecution for all D. except Roman Catholics and Unitarians, did much to gradually reconcile the D.; and a large number of them conformed to the Ch. during the early decades of the 18th cent., and many others drifted into Arianism or Unitarianism, a form of belief which was then very popular, owing to the prevalence of Deism. As early as 1712 Daniel Defoe considered "the Dissenters' interest to be in a declining state," while in 1741 Mosheim was informed that the D. "were continually diminishing" "owing to the mildness and gentleness of the bishops towards them" (Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., ed. by Murdock, p. 872).

The Methodist revival, however, although started within the Ch., did much to stimulate the declining vitality of Dissent, while the final alienation of the main body of METHODISTS from the Ch. was such a considerable addition to its ranks, that a contemporary estimate, at the end of the century, placed the proportion of

D. to the Ch. at one to eight, whereas at the beginning, it had been estimated at one to twenty-two. Besides a number of minor modern sects, the formation of the Salvation Army in the last century has added another large body to the numbers of the D. [See further, ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.]-A1.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

DISTRICT.—This term, or, more fully, "Conventional District," is applied to an area informally assigned to the charge of a curate by agreement between the Bp. and the incumbent or incumbents of the parish or parishes in which the area remains legally included. The term also legally describes the area formed into a Peel "District" under the New Parishes Acts, or a Consolidated Chapelry "District," etc., under the Ch. Building Acts, during the period between the date of the formation of any such D. and its acquisition of the status of New Parish (see PARISH, NEW).—A7. R. W. FOWELL.

DIVORCE.—Our Lord has taught us that in the original Divine ordinance of marriage D.

1. Mt Teaching.

had no place—"From the beginning it was not so" (Mt. 19 8). Fallen man introduced D., and history shows it as generally admitted in the practice of ancient nations. The Israelites were no exception: "Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives." We seem to understand that God as it were stood by, neither approving, nor adding condemnations. The time for restoring the full sanctity of marriage was not yet. With the coming of our Lord came the tightening of the moral law. He condemns the D. provision of Deut. 24:1 (Mt. 5 31). Henceforward "whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery" (Mt. 5 32). In this passage our Lord permits a man to put away his wife for the one cause of fornication. There is, however, no expressed sanction of the re-marriage of the man, even in this case; while the woman put away is an adulteress if she marry again.

One passage (Mt. 19 9) is very commonly quoted as giving sanction to the re-marriage of the man in the one allowed case of putting away: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery." This is the reading of the Textus Receptus; but the extant MSS., as also the Versions and Fathers, show here great variation. B. omits "and shall marry another," and reads "whosoever shall put away his wife saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery." Supposing the Textus Receptus to give the true reading, various explanations have been given of it. (1) Keble supposed the verse intended for Christ's Jewish hearers, and not for His own followers. (2) Von Döllinger regarded the specified exception propter fornicationem as meaning not adultery, but pre-nuptial unchastity. (3) Others regard the specified exception as to be read only with "shall put away," and not with "shall marry another." (4) Others understand the re-marriage of the man in this case to be allowed. Those who adopt this view have to meet the difficulty arising from the second half of the verse, "he that marrieth a woman put away committeth adultery."¹ The marriage bond, if it exist at all, exists for both, husband and wife; and if the woman be not free it seems to follow that the man also must be bound. The passage in Mt. 19 is the only passage in the Gospels in which any support for re-marriage can be thought to be found.²

In the history of the Christian Church no writer of the first three centuries is found to advocate or admit re-marriage after D., even in the case of the innocent husband. Tertullian and Origen, however, mention instances of Christians who had availed themselves of the facilities afforded by the civil law. The Christian community in the face of lax systems of D. alike in the Roman empire and among the Jews created the tradition of the indissolubility of marriage. After the conversion of Constantine and the large accessions which the Church received in the 4th cent. a divergence becomes discernible between the attitude of the East and that of the West. In the West the judgment of the Church was predominantly on the side of the entire indissolubility of the marriage bond: in the East D. with the right of re-marriage came to be permitted to the man for the adultery of the wife, and in some other cases recognised by the civil law.

The PB does not anywhere recognise D. In the Marriage Service the joining of the hands of the parties is accompanied by the pronouncement, "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." In the prayer before the second Benediction occur the words "and knitting them together, didst teach that it should never be lawful to put asunder those whom Thou by Matrimony hadst made one." There is no hint of exception. Moreover, no D. with right of re-marriage has ever been recognised by the canons or formularies of the Church of England, or was known to the law of England (apart from Acts for particular cases) prior to 1857. Separation a mensa et thoro, sometimes loosely called D., has always been permitted for adequate cause: and decrees of nullity of marriage have always been obtainable for reason shown, such as physical incapacity, or defect of consent. But no D. with right of re-marriage was known to the Church in the case of any marriage which had once been valid.

The Divorce Act of 1857 brought the law of England into conflict with the law and practice of the Church; and in most of the countries, colonies and dependencies in which the Anglican communion is at work a similar situation of conflict has now arisen. This unfortunate ¹ Most critical editions now reject the second half.

² But see for another view The Biblical Teaching on Divorce, by C. W. Emmet, in CQR, April, 1910, where it is argued that the right of re-marriage, in view of contemporary usage, must be understood to be included in any permission of D., and also that "it is difficult to hold that divorce for any other reason than adultery is necessarily and certainly unscriptural." Cp. Report of Commiss. on Divorce (1912) for evidence by Dr. Sanday and others. G. H.]

contrariety has led to much controversy and divergence of practice. The best wisdom of the Church on the controverted points may be looked for in the pronouncement of the bishops assembled at the Lambeth Conference in 1908. These bishops represented all the provinces of the Anglican communion, and were working under a great variety of systems of state law. Their resolutions were these.

"39. This Conference reaffirms the resolution of the Conference of 1888 as follows: (a) That inasmuch as our Lord's words expressly forbid divorce, except in case of fornication or adultery, the Christian Church cannot recognise divorce in any other than the excepted case, or give any sanction to the marriage of any person who has been divorced contrary to this law, during the life of the other party. (b) That under no circumstances ought the guilty party, in the case of a divorce for fornication or adultery, to be regarded, during the lifetime of the innocent party, as a fit recipient of the blessing of the Church on marriage. (c) That, recognising the fact that there always has been a difference of opinion in the Church on the question whether our Lord meant to forbid marriage to the innocent party in a divorce for adultery, the Conference recommends that the clergy should not be instructed to refuse the Sacraments or other privileges of the Church to those who, under civil sanction, are thus married.

"40. When an innocent person has, by means of a court of law, divorced a spouse for adultery, and desires to enter into another contract of marriage, it is undesirable that such a contract should receive the blessing of the Church."¹ (See further, MARRIAGE.)—Ma. O. D. WATKINS.

DOCTRINE is sometimes used in the PB quite generally in its etymological sense of teaching

1. PB Usage.

as in the Colls. for St. Paul, St. Mark, and St. Luke; and in one of the questions in the Ord. the candidates are asked if they will frame their lives "according to the D. of Christ," i.e., his ethical teaching. But elsewhere, as in common usage, the word relates to teaching about Truth, and not about Duty. The Pref. (B1³) makes "established doctrine" and "laudable practice" complementary elements of religion, and pr. is made that ordinands may not only be filled with "the truth of thy D.," but endued with "innocency of life." So they are to banish "erroneous and strange Ds.," they must be "persuaded that the holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all D. required of necessity for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ (T2)"; and they must undertake "always so to minister the D. and Sacraments, and the Discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Ch. and Realm hath received the same, according to the commandments of God" (T2).

From this is evident the high value attached to D. in the PB (see further, TRUTH). D. is the formulation of truth by authority. It may be only the authority of a parent expressing in simple language what little children can take in of great mysteries. It may be the delegated authority of the minister of God's word. It may be the special authority of a learned theologian. When used in this wider sense, e.g., in reference to a paper on D. in a theological examination, it may shade off into pious opinions and learned speculations. But in the PB passages last cited it is clear that a certain body of D. is regarded as carrying with it the authority either of "the Lord" or of "this Ch. and Realm." It is clear also that the CREEDS, and in particular the APOSTLES' CREED (required at Bapt., Confirm., and Vis. of Sick), hold a pre-eminent place. (For the position assigned to the ARTICLES OF RELIGION, see that art., and cp. ACTS OF UNIF., §§ 5, 10.) Certain expressions seem almost to imply that whatever anyone may infer from Scripture may be taught as necessary D. But it is obvious, in view of the express supersession of large parts of the OT as no longer binding on Christians, that this cannot be intended. And, although the Ang. formularies reflect the views of a time when, in theory at least, strict ORTHODOXY was reckoned an essential part of saving faith, no express statement of what is necessary for salvation is found, beyond what is implied in the uses named above of the Apostles' Creed.

This guarded economy in the imposition of doctrinal formularies is characteristic of the 3. Doctrinal Teaching.

PB, with which the rigid application of tests to ordinary worshippers is little in harmony, however much it has been attempted by administrators in State and Ch. The Creeds are loyally treasured as securing fundamental truth long ago established. They are, however, manifestly incomplete. The grounds and conditions of pardon and grace, the readiness of God to hear and answer prayer and to accept praise and gifts, the Divine commission of the ministry, these and other points do not fall within the scope of Creeds, which, like foundations, imply a superstructure. This is partly given in the CATECHISM, partly in the EXHORTATIONS, partly in the declaratory statements which introduce the forms of Absolution and other prs., and very largely in the SCRIPTURE selections. Even these are not sufficient, and the Sermon (see PREACHING), the CATECHISING, the INSTRUCTION, and the teaching in the SCHOOLS, all have their place in the necessary work by which life and colour and meaning and concrete application are given to Christian D. by the living voice of devout and reverent teachers of all grades. Doctrinal formularies are invaluable for the individual as points round which the gains of a lifetime in the search of truth may be one after another fitted into their proper place in the proportion of faith; they are necessary for the unity of the Ch., which requires the historic Creeds as links with its earlier self, and bonds between its several parts. But, just because they are old, they need perpetual re-translation into the vernacular speech of each generation, so that the old words may ring true and carry to the heart their message of help.

¹ [It should, however, be noted that the Conference was very evenly divided over the last resolution, 87 voting for it and 84 against.]

If the Creeds represent Catholic D., the Catechism contains elementary and the Arts. more advanced

4. Doctrinal Limits. Anglican D., and with these last may be grouped the incidental statements in the PB. It would be well if preachers and teachers avoided such expressions as "The Ch." or "The whole Ch. teaches . . ." when enunciating D. not covered by these. What they affirm may be some truth contained in Scripture, or taught by the Primitive Ch., but which has not found place in our formularies; but it may be some doubtful interpretation, or later tradition. It is, of course, perfectly legitimate to cite the Mediæval Ch. or St. Thomas Aquinas on points of D., but it is not legitimate to give forth dicta carrying no higher authority as if they had the endorsement of the whole Catholic Ch., or the ratification of our own branch of it. Much prejudice against "Church teaching" would be avoided if those who speak for the Ch. would with more uniform care distinguish: (a) what all Christians agree to find in the NT; (b) what the Catholic Ch. has enshrined in her Creeds; (c) those elementary truths which have always been taught, and underlie the common worship, rites, and sacraments of the Ch.; (d) that wider range of truth which the Eng. Ch. has soberly and with restraint defined in her Arts. and incidentally in the PB; (e) such further truths drawn from Scripture as are agreeable to the foregoing; (f) such alleged truths as at least appear to be at variance with Catholic or Anglican formularies, though a court of law would not necessarily regard them as excluded; (g) Ds. admitted to contravene both the letter and spirit of the formularies.

See further, APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, AUTHORITY, HERESY; books on the Arts. and Creeds; manuals by Strong, Mason, Moule, etc.; W. N. Clarke, Outlines of Christian D. (fresh and untechnical, though inadequate on special Ch. D.). Pleas for a wide latitude may be found in Anglican Liberalism (H. Rashdall on The Ethics of Subscription), E. A. Abbott, Kernel and the Husk.—U. G. HARFORD.

DOGMA.—See DOCTRINE.

DOMINICAL LETTER.—Another name for the SUNDAY LETTER.

DOMINUS VOBISCUM.—In the earliest liturgical formulæ which have come down to us with any detail (4th cent.), a mutual Salutation of priest and people is found at various points of the services. And, as it occurs in one of the oldest parts of the Canons of Hippolytus (32, 22), it may well date back to the 3rd century. This Salutation takes several shapes, e.g., "Peace be with all" (1 Peter 5 14), "The Lord be with you" (Ruth 2 4, 2 Thess. 3 16), the Response invariably being "And with thy spirit." In the Western Mediæval Ch. the ordinary form was "The Lord be with you" (though "The peace of the Lord be always with you" took its place at one very solemn point of the Mass), and it was used to mark every important change in the services. The PB of 1549 retained it in several places: MEP (1), HC (3), Bapt. (2), Ord.¹ (1) each; while "The peace of the Lord be always (abide) with you" occurred once each in HC and Confirmation. Most of these were omitted in 1552, but "The Lord be with you" still occurs (a) in MEP (at a somewhat earlier point than in 1549, marking the transition from the praise-part to the prayer-part of the service), (b) in Confirm., (c) in the new Access. Service. It is to be regretted it was not also retained in HC, immediately bef. "Lift up your hearts." A custom, based on primitive antiquity, prevails in some chs. of using it as the preface to sermons. (See art. Dominus Vobiscum in DCA.)—B2. J. W. TYRER.

DONATIVE.—A benefice which the patron can bestow without presentation to or investment by, and exempt from the visitation of, the Ordinary. The holder of such a living, according to Abp. Magee, "owes no obedience to his diocesan." All Ds. have been abolished by the Benefices Act, 1898.—TA. G. HARFORD.

DOORS OF CHURCHES.—The Thank-offering of the Merchants of Florence for the cessation of the Plague of A.D. 1400 was a new bronze door for the Baptistry. No less an artist than Ghiberti worked at this for twenty years, and it is still one of the world's beautiful things. English church doors were generally made very massive, and covered, at first with elaborate ironwork, and then with tracery. A beautiful modern church door is rare.¹ Ornamental work is now kept for the interior, and the door is regarded merely as a protection against thieves and draughts. It should, nevertheless, be made as good as possible, in honour of Him who said, "I am the Door," fitted with a spring to keep it closed in the winter, made to open outward if possible, and protected by a porch. It is advisable to provide a vestibule with inner doors, and to place a radiator or two in it, in order that the air which enters the church may be well warmed first. These inner doors should be without fastenings, hung on noiseless hinges, and allowed to swing either way. Or they may be well padded, with strong leather covering, and kept from slamming by a strap.—R6.

W. A. WICKHAM.

DORSAL.—(Lat. dorsum—dorsale). (i) An ornamental curtain, usually highly wrought, hung on the wall behind the Holy Table—the original of the reredos, and like the reredos designed to add dignity to the Holy Table. Also (ii) a hanging suspended behind the stalls for the choir or clergy; or even (iii) the back of the stall itself.—R4.

S. REDMAN.

DOUBLE.—See FESTIVAL, § 3.

DOXOLOGY.—The word D., though sometimes employed in a wider sense, is commonly used to denote a short expression

1. Preliminary. of thanksgiving or praise to God occurring at the end of some longer form. There are examples of this in the NT, e.g., Rom. 11 33-36, 16 25-27, and 2 Cor. 9 15. The custom of using Ds., founded as it is on the promptings of natural piety, has been kept up by Christians ever since. In the Church of England Ds. are found in four situations: (a) at end of Sermons and Homilies, (b) at end of Prayers, (c) at end of Psalms, (d) at end of Metrical Hymns. For (a) see art. ASCRPTION.

(b) There are a few, but not many, examples of Ds. at end of prayers in the PB, e.g., Coll. for St. Thomas and the two Post-Communion Prayers. In the early Church every pr. ended with a D., and this is still the case in the East. An interesting example is to be found in the Lord's Prayer. As it stands in the accepted text of

¹ But see those in the Lady Chapel at Liverpool.

St. Matthew, there is no D. But so essential did a D. appear to a pr. that we find one already attached to the Lord's Prayer as it is given in the Didache (8). And at a comparatively early date the D. was inserted in the NT text (Matt. 6 13).

(c) There are three forms of the Gloria Patri now in use: (1) the Greek, "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost: Both now and ever world without end. Amen" (Δόξα Πατρί καὶ Υἱῷ καὶ Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι· καὶ νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. 'Αμήν). (2) The Spanish, "Glory and honour be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen." (3) The Roman, as in our PB (Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto: sicut erat in principio et nunc et semper et in saecula saeculorum. Amen).

The earliest authority for the third form is the second Council of Vaison (in Gaul, 529), canon 5. But, as this Council shows it was already in established use at Rome and elsewhere, it must go back to the 5th cent. The first half of the Gloria is of earlier date, being found (as one of two alternatives) in Basil (c. 370) On the Holy Ghost 27 68, and it occurs, likewise, in the Canons of Hippolytus 3 29. We may conjecture that, in its present form, it was probably intended as a protest against Arian heresy. Its use at the end of Psalms is as old at least as the 6th cent., as we see from Benedict's Monastic Rule (9 and 18), and is practically universal both in East and West. But while in the East it is said at the end of each group of Pss. only, in the West it is usually said after every Ps. The Amer. PB has left it optional to follow in this respect either the Eastern or the Western custom. This use of the Gloria Patri is very beautiful and appropriate. The Pss. are Jewish compositions. And the addition of the Gloria is a sign they are being recited not with a Jewish, but with a Christian intention—not as hymns of the OT, but as referring to Christ and his kingdom.

(d) The practice of singing a D. at the end of Pss. naturally led to the same custom being adopted when metrical hymns were used in public worship. Hence all, or almost all, hymns in the Western mediæval service-books conclude with a D. written in the same metre as the hymn. This D. was sometimes the composition of the writer of the hymn; sometimes it was merely appended when the hymn was inserted into the service-book. The oldest English hymns were composed on the model of the Latin mediæval ones, and hence they too ended with a D. (e.g., Veni Creator in Ordination Offices, 1549). And this has been the case, more or less, ever since, especially in metrical versions of the Pss. For instance, there are five Ds. in different metres at the end of Tate and Brady's Pss., and six at the end of Watts' Pss. Most metrical Doxologies are not of very high poetic or devotional merit. But an exception must be made in favour of Ken's magnificent D., "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." There has been from time to time a certain amount of discussion as to the advisableness of using Ds. with all hymns. Perhaps the best rule is to use one after all joyful or objective hymns, but to dispense with it in the case of subjective or penitential ones.

(Arts. Doxology in DCA and in Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology.)—B2. J. W. TYRER.

DRESS OUT OF CHURCH.—See HABIT OF CLERGY (OUTDOOR).

DUTY.—D., or moral obligation, is a conception so elementary that it defies definition. To the Christian it implies a personal

1. Explanation of Term. relation with a personal God, Who has made His will known to us both by the Revelation of His Law and by the voice of conscience in the individual soul, and a God Whom we ought to obey because we trust and love Him. If I consciously disobey His will, I sin; if I obey it, I do my duty. God has made us for fellowship with Himself, and that fellowship must be a union of will with will.

The Stoics spoke of τὸ καθήκον, the "appropriate action" of one who is living "in conformity with nature." Cicero worked out a system of duties in De Officiis.

Among modern intuitionist moralists the idea of D. is prominent. Martineau asserts (as against some non-theistic moralists), "the identification between the inner consciousness of a sacred order among our springs of action and the real eternal objective will of God seems to me to construe very faithfully the sense of authority attaching to the revelations of our moral nature: they are in us, but not of us, not ours but God's."

The word D. does not often occur in AV, but OT and NT alike are full of that love and service which we owe to God. He

2. Use in PB: saves us from sin, which is the negation of D., to righteousness, for service. D. is the response of the son to the Father, the outward expression of love answering to love. So our Lord says, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day" (John 9 4). St. Paul writes, "Necessity is laid upon me: woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel," "The love of Christ constraineth us" (1 Cor. 9 16, 2 Cor. 5 14).

The PB speaks of self-oblation (which is the crown of filial trust) as our "bounden D. and service" (HC Pr. of Oblation). Thanksgiving is at once a privilege and "our bounden D." (HC aft. Sursum Corda). The Commandments, which declare God's Law, teach us our D. towards God and our D. towards our neighbour. In the majority of the Colls. we virtually ask for forgiveness of our neglect of D. in the past, and for grace to do our D. in the future.

A threefold division is usual. I owe a D. (i) to God, (ii) to my neighbour, (iii) to myself. This corresponds to the "godly, righteous and sober life" of the Conf. The Cat. however suggests that we may eliminate the third. Doubtless it is my D. to myself to develop and discipline my life and faculties to the uttermost, and especially to maintain that balance and self-control without which my true manhood will be lost.

3. Classification of Duties.

4. After Metrical Hymns.

But, seeing that I am "not my own," this self-development is my D. not so much to myself as to God. Of course, there is also a close relation between the duties to God and to my neighbour.

The Cat., in describing these duties, interprets the rule of the Decalogue, and follows the teaching of our Lord (Matt. 5 20-37). It applies the principle of each Commandment to our inward thoughts, dispositions and motives: assuming that good dispositions become effective in word and action whenever there is opportunity.

- (i) The D. towards God is summed up in one word—Love (Matt. 22, 37). To Love Faith and Reverence are closely akin: both express the right relation of the son to the Father. Diligent service must needs follow: faith in a person is inseparable from obedience and must issue in works.

Filial "Fear" is hardly distinguishable from reverence. "Hope" comes to one who has Faith in His Father, and knows that His purpose is Love and must be fulfilled. St. Augustine defines "temperance as love surrendering itself wholly to Him Who is its object: courage as love bearing all things gladly for the sake of Him Who is its object: justice as love serving only Him Who is its object, and therefore rightly ruling: prudence as love making wise distinction between what hinders and what helps itself."

These "virtues" (cardinal and theological) issue from the habitual performance of the corresponding duties.

Thus, we have enjoined on us in Commandment I, the service of God; II, spiritual worship; III, carefulness in word and specially veracity, as a consequence of a reverent sense of the continual presence of the God of Truth (see Bp. Gore's Sermon on the Mount, p. 208); IV, diligence in the use of time, and care in keeping the Lord's Day holy.

- (ii) The D. towards my neighbour is to "love him as myself" (Mt. 22 39). "Love is the fulfilling of the Law" (Rom. 13 8-10). With benevolence and justice, we must associate purity, honesty and a right sense of the value of things.

In Commandment V we have the application of love and justice to special relationships of the home (conjugal, filial and parental Ds.). The Cat. rightly extends this to our association in Church and State (duties of submission to authority and of good citizenship), and includes the attitude of humility and courtesy to our moral superiors (our "betters"). Such duties as those of good faith and considerateness between employer and employed might be added. Love and justice are applied in Commandment VI to our neighbour's person, VII to his home, VIII to his property, IX to his good name, X "anticipates that inwardness which constitutes the special feature of Christian morality."

A special note seems needed with regard to two characteristic duties.

Humility comes from a recognition of the truth about ourselves: it is the true attitude of the individual towards God. The D. of "walking humbly with God" is the necessary condition of almost all duties; D. has no worse foe than self-sufficiency.

Purity. "The root of the matter is the intense desire which religion has to protect the founts of life against whatever might destroy, waste, or pollute them. With this end Christianity declares that our bodies are temples of the Holy Ghost" (Inge, Truth and Falsehood in Religion, p. 74). It may be added that impurity is a sin against the home, which our Lord taught us to regard as sacred.

All duties are summed up in the character of our Lord, Who is the revelation of divine love.

He is the mirror of the Father's Love and Duty.

4. The Ideal—perfection, which we are to imitate (Matt. 5 48). He perfectly kept the Commandments and the Father's will. While God's commandments are the same for all, His will varies according to His ideal for each son and the "works which He has before prepared" for him "to walk in" (Eph. 2 10; HC Thanksgiving Pr.). Thus, His calls are progressive. But if one D. leads to another there is "grace for grace" (John 1 16) to enable us to fulfil it. And, seeing that the calls come from a loving Father, Who always gives the power to enable us to answer them, there can be no question of merit. "We are unprofitable servants, we have done that which it is our D. to do" (Luke 17 10).

Literature: see under CONSCIENCE; also Dale, The Ten Commandments; Robinson, The Church Catechism Explained; Gore, The Sermon on the Mount; Illingworth, Christian Character.—K3.

J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

EAGLE.—(1) The symbol of St. John Evan. (probably not before 5th cent.). (2) Used for LECTERN. There is an E. desk (6th cent.) on the Pulpit of Sant' Ambrogio, Milan. Another (later) at Ravello has the legend on its pedestal "in princip. erat Verbu." clearly showing the allusion to St. John. On the Lectern at Queen's College, Oxford (1662), is the inscription "Regina avium, avis Reginensium." This probably gives the best reason for this use of the E., as the King of Birds (Ezek. 17 1-7), so often used by the nations as the emblem of sovereignty, the noblest of the feathered race, solitary in habit, keen in vision, soaring and swift in flight, fierce and fearless in onslaught, never naturally submitting to a burden, but in God's service bearing His Holy Book, as the Bird most worthy to bear it, all its natural pride and fierceness being laid aside, its beauty and dignity and strength yet remaining.—R3.

W. A. WICKHAM.

EAST, TURNING TO.—This subject may be dealt with under two heads, the attitude of the worshipper, and the construction of churches.

Praying towards the East is attested by Tertullian (Apol. 16, adv. Valentin. 3), who says that the Christians are not therefore sun-worshippers, as the heathen supposed.

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 7 7) gives as the reason of the custom the fact that the sun rises in the East, which therefore is the emblem of light; he says that the oldest heathen temples likewise "looked towards the West that people might be taught to turn to the East when facing the images." He seems to mean that the entrance was to the West; see below, § 3. Probably the Jewish temple was built so that the worshipper faced West (DCA 2 1326); cp. Ezek. 8 16, where the sun-worshippers turn to the East. Daniel prayed towards Jerusalem (Dan. 6 10, cp. 1 Kings 8 48). Other early Christian references are: the older Didascalia 2 57 (third century?, ed. Funk, 1 160, ed. Gibson, p. 65), and the parallel Apost. Const. 2 57 (twice); Edessene Canons 1 (c. A.D. 350); Origen, de Orat. 31. The reason given in the Apost. Const. passage (it is due to the writer himself) is that Paradise is on the East. The custom is also implied by the Orientation of churches (below, § 3).

The normal practice then was for all the worshippers, including the ministers, to turn to the E. in addressing God. And this is the usual Eastern practice in the present day, especially among the separated Eastern Churches which are more conservative of old custom than others. But in the West an exception arose in the case of antiphonal singing, where there were two choirs (as in most of our churches at the present day); the decani and cantoris side then turned half round in order to answer each other, and this is the reason of the arrangement of seats in our chancels. The Sarum Consuetudinary, however, directs the choir to turn to the E. for Gloria Patri, and this was formerly the custom in France (Hier. Anglic. ii. 239). Another exception is universal. When a bishop or presbyter says a pr. of blessing, ordaining, or confirming, he turns to the person blessed, ordained, or confirmed. In the PB the Archbishop and Bishops are directed to say the Veni Creator over a Bishop-elect, and (it would seem, by implication) also the Pr. of consecration following. Praying to the E. was one of the Anglican practices much objected to by the Puritans in the 17th cent.; they wished the prayer desks to face the people (Hier. Angl. 2 26, 44, 3 338). See further, EASTWARD POSITION.

There is no ancient authority for the minister turning to the E. when addressing the people, as at the lections, whether at HC¹ or at MP and EP. The minister should turn himself, as the PB directs for the lessons, so that he may best be heard; and so the Nonjurors' Liturgy of 1718 directs the priest at the Epistle to turn to the people; and the English bishops in 1661 at the Savoy Conference said that the minister, when he speaks to the people as in Lessons, Absol. and Benedictions, should turn to them. (See art. POSITION AND POSTURE.) The reader of the liturgical lessons in the Eastern Churches, as far as the present writer has observed, always turns to the people. The provision for reading them, in the West, from an ambo or from the roodloft or choir step is made that the people may best hear. (See further, Scudamore, Notit. Euchar., p. 246.) The present custom at Low Mass in the Roman Church of the reader turning to the altar seems to be due to the people not understanding the language of the lections. All symbolical reasons for the position of the reader are afterthoughts.

It was the custom in the early Church (though it was perhaps not universal) for the candidate for baptism to turn to the West, the region of darkness, when making the act of renunciation (ἀπορρηγῆ) of the devil, and then to turn to the East, the region of light,¹ when making the act of submission (συμμετῆ) to God. The latter often took ¹ The earliest authority known to the present writer is Durandus (13th cent.). He directs the Epistle to be read facing the altar.

² For this symbolism see Lactantius, Inst. 2 10.

the form of a bapt. Creed, though in some authorities the Creed comes at the immersion itself. The custom is attested by Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. Lect. 19 2, 9; Testament of our Lord 2 8, Canons of Hippolytus 19 119, 122; Ambrose De Myst. 2, etc. It is not mentioned in the Apostolic Const. or in the Egyptian and Ethiopic Church Orders; and possibly the custom was not Syrian or Egyptian.

Our custom of facing East when saying the Apostles' Creed, and by analogy the Nicene Creed, even though for the reason given above (§ 1) all do not turn to the East for the prayers, comes from transferring this bapt. custom to the other offices. When the Apostles' Creed was said kneeling, as in the Pre-Reformation offices, this could not have been the case.¹ It seems desirable not to turn to the East specially for the Athanasian Creed, as that canticle is arranged for antiphonal singing.

The usual rule is for churches to face E. The Didascalia (l.c.) gives us the earliest description of a church that we have, and in it all

2. Orientation the worshippers are arranged so as to face E. So in Apost. Const. 2 57, Test. of our Lord 1 19 (probably), Arab. Didascalia (c. A.D. 400). Exceptions are, however, found at Antioch (Socrates, HE 5 22, which implies the usual rule), probably at Tyre (Eusebius, HE x. 4 41—the vestibule looked towards the E.), probably also Constantine's Church at Jerusalem (Euseb., Vit. Const. 3 37—the entrance doors placed at the E., cp. Clem. Alex. above, and DCA 1 369 b, but the description is not clear, and from "Silvia" it appears that there were three churches in the same enclosure); and almost certainly in the case of heathen basilicas converted into churches. In the normal case, however, there seems to be an ambiguity. It is possible, or probable, that the bishop and presbyters often in the early ages sat in a semicircle facing the people, as at a later period; but the accounts in the Church Orders clearly point to their leaving their seats (in that case) for the Euch., and coming to the West side of the Holy Table, and facing E. (see Maclean, Ancient Church Orders 4 1). The Mohammedans pray towards Mecca; hence in St. Sophia at Constantinople (a converted Christian Church facing E.) the worshippers stand slantways so as to turn South-east. For the Jews and heathen, see above. Orientation was more strictly kept to in England, Scotland and Ireland, also in the East, than on the Continent of Western Europe. In Rome, St. Peter's faces West, St. Paul's faces E.; in the former the Pope celebrates Eastwards at the high altar, facing the people. The Irish form of consecrating churches (A.D. 1666) directs the clergy to face East (Hier. Ang. 3 194, 208).—R2, R6.

A. J. MACLEAN.

EASTER.—See FESTIVAL, § 16, 17, 18, 19, 20; EASTERTIDE, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.

EASTER EVEN.—See HOLY WEEK, § 4; HOLY WEEK, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR, § 7.

EASTER OFFERINGS.—The eighth rubric at the end of the Communion Service requires that:

1. Obligation. "Yearly at Easter every Parishioner shall reckon with the Parson, Vicar, or Curate, or his or their Deputy or Deputies, and pay to them or him all Ecclesiastical Duties, accustomedly due, then and at that time to be paid."

¹ It is found in England in the 17th cent. (Hier. Ang. 2 55).

Dr. John Henry Blunt, commenting on this rubric in his Book of Church Law, remarks:

"Dues and offerings are of two kinds—Easter dues or offerings and mortuaries. . . . The distinction between dues and offerings is not very precise, and the two words are often interchanged. It seems, however, that, strictly speaking, offerings are gifts made at Easter in excess of the amount legally due.

In the case of Carthew v. Edwards it was decreed by the Court of Exchequer that EO. were due of common right. The usual offering is at the rate of twopence per head for every person in the house of sixteen years of age and upwards; but by custom it may be more." (See Sir R. Phillimore, Ecc. Law, p. 1,547.)

Anciently there were four offering days, viz., Christmas, Easter, Whitsun Day, and the Feast of the Dedication of the Parish Church. A Statute of Edward VI (2 and 3 Ed. VI, c. 13) indicates that it was beginning to be the custom to make the four offerings in one payment at Easter, and the "twopence per head" of that period was worth four or five shillings of present money value.

Dean Hook in his Church Dictionary, published in 1842, says of "EO." the "custom is now rarely observed," and at the first

2. Revival. Church Congress, held at Cambridge in 1861, a discussion on "The Income of the Clergy" was carried on without the slightest reference to EO., which of itself sufficiently establishes how far the practice had fallen into disuse. Here and there however it had been kept alive by the individual efforts of earnest men, and in 1892 a direct appeal was made to churchwardens through the pages of The Church Monthly to revive the collection of EO. as a ready, easy, simple way of supplementing the incomes of the clergy by a plan applicable to almost every parish, absolutely free from party bias, and open to rich and poor alike as a means of making a direct personal offering to the support of the ministry in their own parishes. One hundred and fifty-eight parishes responded. As indicating the great progress of the revival it will be sufficient to say, that, at Easter 1910, 7,945 parishes in the United Kingdom contributed EO., and that the movement is now extending rapidly in all parts of the world.

The following "Hints to Churchwardens" have stood the test of practical experience in all parts of the country. (i) Have notices clearly and plainly printed to this effect: "The Churchwardens beg leave to remind you that your Offerings on Sunday next (Easter Day) will be given to the Vicar (or Rector), and they ask your liberal support on this occasion." (ii) Cards are better than paper, as they can be used year by year. (iii) Let these cards be placed in the seats on the Sunday before Easter Day. (iv) Call on as many of the parishioners as possible, including the sick, during the days preceding Easter, and mention the matter. (v) Write to friends temporarily absent.

Since 1904 considerable attention has been given as to the legality of the taxation of EO. The battleground between the Income Tax authorities and the clergy has been the Diocese of Chichester. The Rev. D. V. Blakiston, Vicar of East Grinstead, appealed against the demand of Mr. Cooper, the local Surveyor of Income Tax, for payment of the tax on an EO. of £36.

The local Commissioners decided in Mr. Blakiston's favour. The Surveyor thereupon demanded a case for the Divisional Court, and in the High Court of Justice on Dec. 11, 1906, before Mr. Justice Bray, it was decided in Mr. Blakiston's favour; but in the Court of Appeal the decision was reversed on July 3, 1907. The local Committee who were supporting Mr. Blakiston in his fight then took the matter to the House of Lords, but in December, 1908, the decision was against Mr. Blakiston, so that, until an amendment is made in the law, EO. are liable to assessment for Income Tax.

Immediately this decision came into effect the writer took steps to bring about a change in the Law, and on April 29, 1909, the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P., brought into the House of Commons "a Bill to Exempt Voluntary Offerings to Clergymen and Ministers from Taxation," but owing to the congested state of public business the Bill did not get a Second Reading. Resolutions in favour of the Bill have been adopted by the Canterbury House of Laymen and by many of the Diocesan Conferences and Ruridecanal Conferences. The Bill is again before Parliament and every effort will be made to secure its enactment.

[It has, however, been thought by some that the admission of the right of taxation removes any idea of charity from these contributions, by placing them in the category of dues demandable on the score of justice as part of the ancient provision for the parson's support, even if by long disuse no longer enforceable by law.]—A6. FREDK. SHERLOCK.

EASTERN CHURCHES.—Under this head may be grouped the Chs. of Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa, whether (a) 1. General Survey. Orthodox, (b) Separated, or (c) Uniat. Of the second class are the

Chs. that reject either the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431) which condemned Nestorius, or that of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) which condemned Eutyches. These are: the East Syrians (§ 7) or Nestorians (the Ch. of the old Persian Empire), who reject Ephesus but accept Chalcedon; the Armenians (§ 3) who condemn Eutyches but reject Chalcedon, at which they were not represented, their country being at the time when it was held at war with Persia (it is said that the decrees of that Council were made known to them in a faulty translation); the West Syrians (§ 6) in West Asia, and the Copts (§ 4) and Abyssinians or Ethiopians (§ 5) in N.E. Africa, all of whom are technically Monophysites and reject Chalcedon (the West Syrians are also called "Jacobites" from Jacob Baradaeus, 541-578); and the Malabar Christians (§ 8). Of the third class are the Maronites of the Lebanon (§ 9); and the various Uniat bodies (§ 10) who have seceded from the other Eastern Chs. and acknowledge Rome. Whether the Separated bodies now hold heretical doctrine is a moot point, for which see the books noted in § 11. If we except the Christological points of doctrine on which they were separated from the rest of the Ch., we may, speaking broadly, and premising that they are even less inclined to define doctrine in the scholastic manner than the Orthodox, say that in the main they agree in general doctrinal principles with the latter (see § 2). All the old Eastern Chs. have the full complement of bps., priests, and deacons (with metropolitans, and most with at least one PATRIARCH), and usually of Minor Orders also; most of them have monasteries. The secular priests are allowed to marry; in some cases they must be married. But if widowed they may not (except among the East Syrians) marry again. The bps. are chosen from among the monks; in the Syriac Chs. they have prefixed to their names the title "Mar," i.e., "My Lord."

The Holy Orthodox Eastern Church, with about 101 millions of souls, is divided into: (a) the

2. Orthodox. ple, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and the autonomous Chs. of Cyprus and Sinai (these with abps.) and of Greece (under the Metrop. of Athens)—all Greek, though some speak Arabic; (β) the Ch. of Russia, with three Metropolitans (Kieff, Moscow, St. Petersburg) and an EXARCH of Georgia; (γ) the Chs. of the Balkans and Austria-Hungary with eight Metropolitans:—Karlowitz, Montenegro (Metrop. of Cetinje), Hermannstadt, Bukowina and Dalmatia (Metrop. of Czernowitz), Servia (Metrop. of Belgrade), Rumania (Metrop. of Bucharest, Primate; also a Metrop. of Jassy), Bulgaria (with an Exarch). The Metrop. of Cetinje has no diocesan bps. under him. These Chs. take precedence in the above order, except that Russia comes after Jerusalem, Sinai after Karlowitz, and Greece after Montenegro. At a General Council their heads have each an equal vote. Bulgaria is at present out of communion with Constantinople, but some of the other Orthodox Chs. do not recognise the excommunication. The four patriarchs have several metropolitans, abps. and bps. under them.

The Orthodox use liturgies (Communion services) of three rites. (a) Byzantine Rite, with Greek liturgies of St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, and the PRESANCTIFIED (or St. Gregory Dialogos); the first of these at least was known to Cranmer, and to it we owe the so-called "Prayer of St. CHRYSOSTOM." They are translated into many languages for Orthodox colonies all over the world: Syriac (not now used), Arabic, Georgian, Old Slavonic, Rumanian, Esthonian, Lettish, German, Finnish, Tartar, Japanese, Chinese, English, Neo-Syriac. The Greek liturgical books of this rite are: the Typikon (rubrics, etc. = Ordinal in its older sense); Eukhologion, or Trebnik (Book of needs: fixed elements of the liturgy, and occasional offices; Leitourgikon (liturgies); Hierodiakonikon (the deacon's part); Sulleitourgikon, Oktoëkhos, Triodion, Pente-kostarion, Menaia, Anthologion, Horologion (hymns, etc.), Anagnostikon (lectionary); sometimes separately published as Anagnosmata, i.e., OT lessons, Apostolos or Praxapostolos, and Evangelistaron). (β) Syrian Rite, with Greek Liturgy of St. James for the patriarchate of Antioch. (γ) Egyptian Rite, with Greek Liturgy of St. Mark, and Anaphoras of St. Basil and St. Gregory, for the patriarchate of Alexandria. The table of lessons is given in DCA 2 955 ff.

It is impossible adequately in a single paragraph to summarise the doctrine of the Orthodox, for which see the books noted in § 11. One great difference between East and West in point of doctrine is that the East has never been under the influence of Western scholastic theology, nor even under that of Augustine and his Western followers. Hence the Orthodox largely avoid definitions. The Nicene Cr. is their one authoritative doctrinal test; Western "confessions" like our Thirty-nine Arts. have no parallel in the East, though there are authoritative catechisms. The Orthodox receive seven General Councils; they number seven sacraments or "mysteries" (μυστήρια), viz., baptism, chrism-unction (= confirmation), communion, penitence, orders, matrimony, oil-unction (for the sick), "through which grace, or the saving power of God, works mysteriously upon man" (Longer Cat., in Blackmore, p. 84). The most essential act of the "Liturgy of the faithful" is the utterance of our Lord's words, and after this the Invocation of the Holy Ghost and the blessing of the gifts (ib., p. 91; other Easterns would make the Invocation the one essential act). The term μετουσίωσις (transubstantiation) is used, not as defining the method of change of the elements, but as signifying "that the bread truly, really, and substantially becomes the very true body of the Lord, and the wine the very blood of the Lord" (ib., p. 92; see also Khomiakoff in Birkbeck, p. 207; and, for the difference between the mediæval Western and the Eastern sense of this term, see Philaret, Metrop. of Moscow, quoted by Headlam, p. 8). The Orthodox do not believe in a PURGATORY in the Western mediæval sense (so expressly Philaret, and Khomiakoff in Birkbeck, p. 217; cp. Blackmore, p. 98), but encourage prayer for the dead (including all the saints, Khomiakoff, ib.), that they may rest and "be aided towards the attainment of a blessed resurrection" (Blackmore, ib.); they invoke all the faithful departed to pray for the living (Khomiakoff in Birkbeck, p. 216). Lastly, with regard to the Filioque: the chief objection felt by the Orthodox to it is that it is an addition to the Nicene Cr.; this is the only objection raised in the Longer Cat. (Blackmore, p. 73); but others object that it seems to affirm two sources (ἀπὸ δύο) in the Godhead. It is agreed, however, that the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of the Son; and in A.D. 787 (2nd Council of Nicaea) Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, affirmed the procession through the Son. We may hope that here is only a logomachy; but the Orthodox have not determined whether the phrase "through the Son" refers to the eternal procession, or only to the temporal mission, of the Third Person of the Trinity.

The Armenian Ch. (with about four millions of souls) is under the Catholics of Etchmiadzin (near Erivan, in Russia). There is also a Catholicos of Sis (who rules 13 dioceses in Cilicia, Mesopotamia, etc.), and one of Akhtamar (who rules

3. Armenians. only a small island in Lake Van); and, since 1311 and 1453 respectively, Patriarchs of Jerusalem and Constantinople; the last of these represents all the Armenians in Turkey at the Porte. In this Ch. the title Catholicos is superior to that of Patriarch. There are in all about 50 bishops. In point of time this was the first national Ch., Armenia having as a kingdom accepted Christianity c. 300. Its liturgy, named after St. Athanasius, is of the Byzantine Rite (see § 2). The four service books in common use are: (a) the altar book, not usually containing the deacon's part; (b) the book of hours, often with the diakonika of the liturgy attached; (c) the lectionary (for the table of Sunday lessons, see Fortescue); (d) the hymn-book. There are ten other Armenian liturgies, noted in Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, p. xcvi. The Armenian calendar is remarkable for the number of festivals which are transferred to the following Sunday (Dowling, p. 97). The Armenians alone of all Easterns (save the Abyssinians on Maundy Th.) use unleavened bread for the Euch.; and they do not mix the chalice. They preserve the older Eastern custom of confining the commemoration of the Nativity to the Epiphany (Jan. 6, O.S.). They are sometimes called Gregorian Armenians to distinguish them from the Uniates (§ 10).

The Coptic Ch., numbering about a quarter of a million, is under a Patriarch ("of Alexandria"), who lives in Cairo, having under him

4. Copts.

18 bps. in Egypt and the Sudan, and one in Jerusalem (some are styled Metropolitans, Fowler, p. 220). They have three liturgies: St. Mark (or St. Cyril), St. Basil, and St. Gregory of Nazianzus; the services are in Coptic and Arabic. The books necessary for the liturgy are: (a) the Kulaji (εὐχαλόγιον), the priests' book; (b) the Qutmarus or Katameros (κατὰ μέρος or καθημέριος), the lectionary; (c) the Synaxar (συναξαῖριον), legends of the saints; (d) the Diakonika, the deacon's part. Like all Eastern Christians, the Copts have a great veneration for the cross; they commonly have it tattooed on their arms (Bromage, p. vi). They form numerically the great majority of Egyptian Christians, the Orthodox (or Melchites = "king's men") having only about 50,000. The Copts date their years from A.D. 284, and their months, 13 in number (including the short "Nissi" = Aug. 24-28), are, except Nissi, 30 days each; the new year begins on Aug. 29.

The Abyssinian or Ethiopic Ch., which is said to number two (or, according to Fowler, three or four) million souls, is a daughter of and in full communion with the Coptic Ch. It has a Patriarch, the Catholicos or Metropolitan of Axum (who lives at Gondar), and three other bishops. This Ch. has the distinction of possessing what is probably the oldest known liturgy, that of the Ethiopic Church Order, though it is not now used (trans. in Brightman, LEW., p. 189; for a very ancient Latin version, see Hauler's Verona Latin Fragments, 1910). The Abyssinian liturgies are named after The Apostles, Our Lord Jesus Christ, Our Lady Mary, Dioscorus, Chrysostom; the first is given (with the Litany) in LEW., p. 194; see also § 11. Ten others, unpublished, are named in LEW., p. lxxiv.

5. Abyssinians.

The West Syrians, or Jacobites, numbering under half a million, inhabit Western Asia and Mesopotamia, and have a Patriarch ("of Antioch") with the dynastic name of Mar Ignatius, who lives near Mardin, and about 18 bps., most or all of whom are popularly called Metropolitans. The senior bp. after the Patriarch is called "the Catholicos of the East," but must not be confused with the East Syrian Patriarch (§ 7), the term Catholicos being among the West Syrians inferior to Patriarch (for the West Syrians of Malabar, see § 8). The liturgy used is the Syriac St. James, not published in Syriac as used by them, but translated in LEW., p. 69. There are at least 64 other liturgies known by name, of which 43 have been published in Syriac or in versions (see LEW., pp. lviii, lxii). We know less of this Ch. than of any other of the Separated communities, and it is much to be wished that their liturgical books could be published and their customs made known to Europeans.

The East Syrians, or Nestorians, or Assyrians, sometimes called Chaldeans (but see § 10), numbering less than a quarter of a million, live in Kurdistan and N.W. Persia, under the rule of a Patriarch, called also the Catholicos of the East (see § 6), who uses the dynastic name of Mar Shimun, and lives at Quchanis (or Qudshanis), in Kurdistan. The names Patriarch and Catholicos are here synonymous. The second bp. is called Matran (= metropolitan), and uses the dynastic name Mar Khnanishu; he also lives in Kurdistan. There are several bps., one in Malabar (§ 8). The East Syrians use the liturgy of the "Apostles" Adai and Mari, with two other anaphoras, of Theodore and of Nestorius; the beginning and ending of the service is the same in all three (see also § 8). Three other anaphoras are known only by name (LEW., p. lxxx). The service books are: *Takhsa ("order"), with liturgies, bapt. and other occasional offices; Khudhra ("cycle") and Kashkul ("containing all"), with the propers of the liturgy and daily services; Gaza ("treasury") and Warda ("rose," named after a man so-called), with hymns, etc.; *Qdham-u-Wathar ("before and after"), with the daily services; Burākha,* with the marriage services; Kurasta and Anidha,* with the burial service for clergy and laity respectively; Siamidha ("laying on of hands"), with the Ordinal; the *Lectionary; Surgadha,* the calendar; and *Dawidha ("David"), the Psalter (of these those marked with an asterisk have been published in Syriac by the Abp. of Canterbury's Assyrian Mission, as has been the service of the Fast of the Ninevites; for trans. of some of them, see § 11). The four daily services are: Nocturns (very long), Mattins, Evensong, and Compline (but the last as a daily service is now obsolete). The calendar is remarkable for putting almost all the Saints' days on Fridays, and for grouping—e.g., 12 Apostles, 4 Evangelists, the Syrian doctors, the Greek doctors. The year is divided into divisions, mostly of 7 weeks each, hence called shāwūʿē; it begins on Oct. 1. The months are the European ones (O.S.), but with the old Syriac names (First and Second Tishrin—vernacularly Chīrī—First and Second Kanun, etc.). The rules to find Easter are the same as those of the Orthodox.

7. East Syrians.

The Christians of St. Thomas in Malabar, S.W. India, are an offshoot of the East Syrians, but after the Portuguese conquest the Nestorian connection was forcibly broken. As a reaction against Portuguese rule, these Christians later put themselves under the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch, whose liturgy they adopted (§ 6). But there have been schisms among them, and there are several Uniates (§ 10), and of late many have returned to the East Syrian allegiance, having a bp. consecrated by Mar Shimun (§ 7). The Jacobite Malabarese are under the Metrop. of Malakara, and their liturgy is in Malayalam. The old Malabar liturgy (East Syrian rite) is very like that of Adai and Mari (§ 7); it seems to be now used only by the Uniat (LEW., p. lxxviii), though with some alterations.

8. Malabar Christians.

The Christians of the Lebanon (Maronites, named after St. Maro, c. 400?) were originally Monothelites, but became a Uniat Ch. in 1182.

9. Maronites. though the union with Rome was not fully consolidated till 1600. The liturgy is of the West Syrian rite, and is published (Beirut, 1888, and elsewhere; also in French by Morel, 1678; in Latin by Renaudot, 1847). It is in Carshuni (Arabic in Syriac characters) and in Syriac.

The term Uniat is given to those who have seceded from the above Chs. to the Roman obedience. The Uniat are allowed to use their old service books, but with modifications more or less drastic; the clergy are in some cases allowed to marry, but with ever-increasing restrictions. The East Syrian Uniat are called Chaldeans. The Greek Uniat are divided into four rites: Bulgarian, Melchite, Rumanian, and Ruthenian.—There are also several Protestant colonies among the Eastern Chs. and a very few Anglican Congregations; but the Ch. of Eng. discourages secessions from the old organisations.

10. Uniat, etc. The Uniat are allowed to use their old service books, but with modifications more or less drastic; the clergy are in some cases allowed to marry, but with ever-increasing restrictions. The East Syrian Uniat are called Chaldeans. The Greek Uniat are divided into four rites: Bulgarian, Melchite, Rumanian, and Ruthenian.—There are also several Protestant colonies among the Eastern Chs. and a very few Anglican Congregations; but the Ch. of Eng. discourages secessions from the old organisations.

(1) GENERAL LITERATURE. Neale, Hist. of the H. East. Ch., General Introd., 2 vols., 1850;

11. Bibliography. Brightman, Liturgies East and West, vol. 1, 1896 (all except the Greek Liturgies are translated); Renaudot, Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio, 2 vols., 1847 (in Latin); Swainson, Greek Liturgies, 1884 (in Greek); Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, 2 vols., 1863 (in Latin: very full, but does not give the Orthodox rites).—In the following select lists only English books are given (see also occasional papers of Eastern Ch. Ass.).

(2) ORTHODOX. Blackmore, Doctrine of the Russ. Ch., 1845; Neale, Patriarchate of Alexandria, 1847; Dowling, Patr. of Jerusalem, 1909; Bromage, Holy Catechism of Nicolas Bulgarsis, 1893; Birkbeck, Russia and the Eng. Ch. (ECA), 1895; Headlam, Teaching of the Russ. Ch. (ECA), 1897; Duckworth, Greek Manuals of Ch. Doctrine (ECA), 1901; Dampier, Orthod. Ch. in Austria-Hungary (ECA), 1905; Dampier, Organisation of Orthod. E. Ch. (ECA), 1910; Fortescue, Orthod. E. Ch., 1907; Adeney, Greek and Eastern Churches, 1908; Robertson, Divine Liturgies (new ed.), 1894; Littledale, Offices of H. E. Ch., 1863; Shann, Euchology, 1891, and Book of Needs, 1894; Riley, Athos, 1887. (3) ARMENIANS. Fortescue and Malan, The Arm. Ch., 1873; Malan, Life and Times of St. Gregory the Illuminator (with documents trans. from Armen.), 1870; Dowling, The Armen. Ch., 1910; Conybeare and Maclean, Rituale Armenorum (in English), 1905; Issaverdens, Rites and Ceremonies of the Armen. Ch., and The Armen. Ritual (liturgy, ordination, baptism, marriage, etc.), 1873-6, 1888; Cope and Fenwick, Divine Liturgy of the Ch. of Armenia, 1908; Cat. of Christian Instruction, Calcutta, 1900; Malan, Liturgy of the Armen. Ch., 1870. (4) COPTS. Malan, Original Documents of Copt. Ch., 1875; Butler, Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt, 1884; Evetts and Butler, Churches and Monasteries of Egypt, 1895; Filothaus, Cat. of Copt. Ch. (ed. Bromage), 1892; Marquess of Bute, Copt. Morn. Service for the Lord's Day (mostly in Eng.), 1882; Rodwell, Liturgy of St. Basil, etc., 1870; Fowler, Christian Egypt, 1901. (5) ABYSSINIANS. Evetts-Butler, and Fowler (c. 7), as above; Cooper and Maclean, Testament of our Lord, App. I (for Anaphora of our Lord; see p. 193 for the Litany). (6) WEST SYRIANS.

Etheridge, Syrian Churches; Parry, Six Months in a Syrian Monastery, 1895. See also Badger below, and (8). (7) EAST SYRIANS. Maclean and Browne, The Catholicos of the East and his People, 1892 (with much liturgical information); Wigram and J. Wordsworth, Doctrinal Position of the Assyrian Ch., 1908; Wigram, The Assyrian Ch., 100-640 A.D., 1910; Badger, Nestorians and their Rituals, 2 vols., 1852; Liturgy of Adai and Mari (with two other Anaphoras, Bapt. office, etc.), SPCK, 1893; Maclean, E. Syr. Daily Offices (with lectionary and calendar), ECA, 1894, and E. Syr. Epiphany Rites (in one vol. with Rituale Armen. above), 1905; Connolly and Edm. Bishop, Liturgical Homilies of Narsai, 1909; Bethune-Baker, Nestorius and his Teaching, 1908. (8) MALABAR CHRISTIANS. Howard, Christians of St. Thomas, 1864; Rae, Syr. Ch. in India, 1892. The old Malabar liturgy is in Neale, Lit. of St. Mark, etc., 1859, 1869. (9) MARONITES. Etheridge, op. cit.; Bliss, Quart. Statement of Palest. Explor. Fund, 1892.—A1. A. J. MACLEAN.

EASTERN INFLUENCES ON THE PB.—

Christianity is a religion of Eastern origin, and the main outlines of its doctrines, polity and worship are Eastern. It would be interesting to follow this out in detail, but that is not the subject of the present article. We treat here of the conscious imitation and adoption of Eastern rites and formulæ (1) in the Chs. of the West aft. their system of worship had received a definite shape, (2) in the Ch. of Eng. and its sister Chs. since the beginning of the 16th cent.

Under (1) we may mention the following: (a) use of the Kyrie and Gloria in excelsis and recitation of the Nicene Cr. during HC; (b) observance of certain days, e.g., Exaltation of the Cross (Sept. 14th) and the four Festivals of the BV. Mary (Purification, Annunciation, Falling asleep, Birth—see MARY); (c) adoption of certain ceremonies, such as the Procession of Palms and the Adoration of the Cross.

(2) We know that the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom was among the books in Cranmer's library, and it seems likely he was acquainted with the Liturgy of St. Basil also. From these he transferred into the PB: (a) the Prayer of St. Chrysostom, (b) some of the petitions in the Lit. (see Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, 1st ed., pp. 147 ff.), (γ) the Invocation of the Holy Ghost in HC (the wording probably taken from the Liturgy of St. Basil), (δ) (possibly) the word Table instead of Altar. The Invocation (γ) was, as is well known, unfortunately omitted in 1552, but was re-adopted in the Scottish PB of 1637 and the Scottish Communion Office of 1764; the latter, in addition, has the arrangement of its different parts conformed to that of the Eastern Liturgies. It is followed, in both respects, by the Amer. PB, so far as the Pr. of Consecration is concerned; and this is by far the most important result of all direct Eastern influences on the PB.—B1. J. W. TYRER.

EASTERTIDE.—See FESTIVAL, § 21, 23, 24; EASTERTIDE, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.

EASTERTIDE, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.—

The Holy Gospel (John 20 1-10) for Easter

Day sets before us the empty tomb, and, in the words of the Evangelist St. John, his own full realisation of the very truth of the resurrection of our Lord.

1. Easter Day.

The Epistle (Col. 3 1-7) teaches us to apply to ourselves practically the lesson of death and resurrection in the mortification of our fallen nature and the rising up to newness of life in Christ. The Easter Anthems and Proper Psalms give the note of victory and praise, and associate Easter with the feast of Passover, and the deliverance of the Hebrew people from Egypt. The OT Lessons of the day (MP, Ex. 12 1-28; EP, Ex. 12 29-31 or Ex. 14) carry on the same teaching: Easter is the Christian Passover, and the death and resurrection of the Lord have translated us out of darkness into light. And as the Passover set the note of the Hebrew year and fixed the Hebrew calendar, so Easter becomes the focus of the Christian year from which the other days are reckoned. The NT Lesson in the morning (Rev. 1 10-18) gives us the vision of St. John in Patmos "on the Lord's Day"—the day of the resurrection, the first day of the week—the vision of the risen and ascended Lord, "alive for evermore": and the strength and grace of renewal are given to the awe-struck Disciple by the touch of the compassionate Master. So are we taught that the Christian life is the outflow of the risen life of Christ our Head. The Second Lesson in the evening (John 20 11-18) tells of the appearing of Christ after His resurrection to St. Mary Magdalene, the typical penitent, that we may learn that penitence is the temper in which we can best see the spiritual and know God, and that the revival of a soul from the death of sin to a life of righteousness is an extension of the results of our Lord's resurrection.

In the Holy Gospel (Luke 24 13-35) for the Monday in Easter-week, we are shown the completeness of the Gospel of the Resurrection. Speaking with two disciples on the way to Emmaus

2. Monday in Easter Week.

the Master expounded the OT Scriptures, and led them to see that it behoved Christ to suffer, and so to enter into glory: the Resurrection is the climax and completion of the Gospel of redemption. This truth of the resurrection of the Lord is the crowning assurance of the power of God in action to save mankind. In the Epistle for this day (Acts 10 34-43) Christ is declared to be the Saviour of Mankind, raised up on the third day though He had been slain: He has prevailed for those who compassed His death. The OT Lessons (MP, Ex. 15 1-21; EP, Cant. 2 10-17) are hymns of praise, the song of Moses which memorialised the deliverance of the Hebrews from the Egyptians and from the Red Sea, and the mysterious love-song of the Canticles in which Christ is spoken of as the lover of the soul, the Bridegroom of the Church. The NT Lessons (MP, Luke 24 1-12; EP, Matt. 28 1-9) bring before us in direct narrative the simple statement of the reality of the Resurrection. We have the witness of the Lord Himself, showing Himself after His Resurrection, of Angels affirming that He is risen, and of the Holy Women carrying the message to His disciples. This day is closely attendant upon Easter Day, repeating and confirming the truth of the Festival with the story of the message given and responsive praise evoked.

The Holy Gospel (Luke 24 36-48) for the Tuesday in Easter Week sets before us Christ condescending after His resurrection to dispel the doubts and fears of His apostles, by infallible proofs of His identity and His companionship with His own: He shows His wounded Hands and Feet, He partakes familiarly of their food: He invites their confidence in Himself and the Scriptures. The Epistle (Acts 13 26-41) also is the record of a larger publication than that of Easter Monday: here we hear St. Paul preaching the risen Christ in the Synagogue of Antioch, whereas on Monday we heard the word of St. Peter in a house at Cæsarea. The Lessons of these days are appointed in such a way as to show the spreading out of the truth from the centre—the empty sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea—to all the world. The OT Lessons (MP, 11 Kings 13 14-21; EP, Ezek. 37 1-14) give us type and prophecy of the resurrection, extending from Christ to all God's people. We are buried with Christ in baptism, and our new life, the spiritual life, is the result of our identification with the crucified Redeemer. The NT Lessons of morning (John 21 1-14) and evening (John 21 15-23) comprise the whole of the last chapter of St. John's Gospel, in itself a complete statement of the relation of the risen Lord to His Church.

3. Tuesday.

On the First Sunday after Easter (Low Sunday), the closing day of the Festival of Easter, the Holy Gospel (John

4. First Sunday after Easter.

20 19-23) teaches us that the gift of the Holy Ghost is the supreme gift of the risen Lord. He bestows this gift on those who believe rightly in His Victory over death. He shows His disciples His Hands and Feet and then breathes on them that they may have the gift of the Spirit. And the Epistle (1 John 5 4-12) also teaches that the resurrection of Christ must have its immediate effect in the reinforcement of the spiritual lives of His people. We are so related to God, justified with God, that the benefits of Christ's passion and of His resurrection are ours. The OT Lessons (MP, Num. 16 1-35; EP, Num. 16 36-50 or Num. 17 1-11) warn us that obedience is the necessary temper of the people of God, and that the redeemed must glorify Him in body and spirit. The NT Lessons of the day (MP, 1 Cor. 15 1-28; EP, John 20 24-29) declare the doctrine of the resurrection to be the essential faith of the Christian people: this, St. Paul says, is the vital confession; this is the summary of the Gospel of salvation. The historic facts, the appearances of the risen Lord to Cephas, to the Twelve, to five hundred brethren at once, are adequate to support the truth, and the truth is adequate to inspire the lives of His people.

The Collect for the Second Sunday after Easter declares how Christ is "unto us both a sacrifice for sin and also an ensample of godly life"; and so the Church sets before us, as soon as Easter is past, the picture of Christ as the Good Shepherd (Gospel, John 10 11-16). The Good Shepherd gives his life for the sheep, and he also leads them, and they follow him. It is the leadership of our Lord that is particularly taught on this Sunday. In the Epistle (1 Peter 2 19-25) St. Peter exhorts us to recognise Christ as the Shepherd to whom we have returned in repentance from sin. The OT Lessons (MP, Num. 20 1-13; EP, Num. 20, 14-21 9 or Num. 21 10-35) show us the folly of rebellion against God's guidance. As God brought the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan, so now He leads His people from the bondage of Satan to the everlasting joys of Heaven: and we are warned from the record of ancient failings and backslidings that we must not murmur or rebel against God. In the way in which He led His people He also fed them: and, if we strive to obey Him and to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, we shall be sustained with gifts and heavenly graces. Following in the footsteps of the Son we are obeying the Father, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost shall be ours increasingly.

The days that follow the Easter Festival look towards Whitsunday with expectation of spiritual gifts. The liturgical sections are chosen with this purpose: they foster and inculcate the temper of detachment from the world and confidence in God's promises. In the Holy Gospel (John 16 16-22) for the Third Sunday after Easter, for instance, we read our Lord's promise to His disciples that, though His visible presence would be withdrawn from them, yet He would in very truth be with them to bless and cheer them. And in the Epistle (1 Peter 2 11-17) St. Peter exhorts the Christian people to know themselves as exiles, as not of this world but of Heaven, as living not under the promptings of the flesh but under the persuasions of the Spirit. The OT Lessons of the day (MP, Num. 22; EP, Num. 23 or Num. 24) teach us that God sees not as man sees, and overrules man's purpose, and that no earthly reward or blandishment should turn the Christian aside from obedience to God. The choice is pressed upon our attention: "if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live." The resurrection of our Lord is the argument and persuasion: the help of the Holy Ghost is the promise. And this should be the soul's recognition during the Great Forty Days.

As we approach Whitsunday we are taught not only to desire the gifts of the Holy Ghost, but also to understand the nature of those gifts and of His ministry. In the Holy Gospel (John 16 5-15) for the Fourth Sunday after Easter we have the teaching of our Lord on the mission of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter. Christ, about to leave His Apostles, promised them this more intimate and constant guide and help than His visible presence could be: from the Father and Himself would proceed the Holy Spirit to indwell and to inspire His people: His presence in their hearts would be the glorification of Christ: by the help of the Comforter, human life would be transformed into the Christ-likeness. In the Epistle (Jas. 1 17-21) St. James teaches in like manner that all spiritual gifts are the outflow of the present mediation of the Ascended Christ, and that every man in whom the grace of God is operative and effective must be increasingly separate from the world and given to holiness. In the OT Lessons (MP, Deut. 4 1-22; EP, Deut. 4 23-40 or Deut. 5) we read the last exhortations of Moses in view of the Promised Land: he moves the Hebrew people to fidelity and obedience: he urges them to remember the covenant that God made with their fathers. So are we taught to abide in Christ and to covet earnestly the best gifts, the transforming graces of the Holy Ghost.

As we draw near to the Festival of the Ascension of our Lord, we are called to consider the heavenly ministry of Christ in its relations to our earthly life. Before His death He not only promised to His disciples the gift of the Holy Spirit as the outcome of His presence with the Father, but He also gave to His people the privilege of approach through Himself to the Father in prayer. The Christian life is still one of temptation and difficulty, but since our Lord is in Heaven we have an Advocate with the Father, and we may pray, with confidence. In the Gospel (John 16 23-33) and Epistle (Jas. 1 22-27) for the Fifth Sunday after Easter we are taught the duties of our calling and its source of strength: we have to do God's word, but we are not left to struggle unaided: God's strength is given to our need and our prayer. In the OT Lessons for this day (MP, Deut. 6; EP, Deut. 9 or Deut. 10) we read the warnings that Moses gave to the Hebrews: they are bidden to obey God and to remember His mercies, their hopeless state in Egypt and their unworthiness. So we are taught that our covenant with God is the expression of His mercy towards us, and that we have neither merit nor strength of ourselves. It is through the merits of Christ that we pray, and by the help of the Holy Ghost that we stand.

—G30.

J. WAKEFORD.

EASTWARD POSITION.—The position of the celebrant at HC is mainly governed by three rubrics: (I) Fourth rubric bef. the Service; (II) Rubric bef. the Absolution; (III) Rubric bef. the 7.

Fourth
Sunday.

5.
Second Sunday.

6.
Third Sunday.

8.
Fifth
Sunday.

1. The Four Rubrics.

Pr. of Consecration. (In this art. History will be given under A; Ecclesiastical Law under B.)

I. The fourth Rubric bef. the Communion Service is as follows: "The Table at the

2. The North Side Rubric.

Communion time, having a fair white linen cloth upon it, shall stand in the body of the Church or in the Chancel, where Morning and Evening Prayer are appointed to be said. And the Priest standing at the North side of the Table shall say the Lord's Prayer with the Collect following." In the PB of 1549 the corresponding Rubric directed that "The Priest standing humbly afore the middes of the Altar, shall saie the Lordes praier, with this Collect." In consequence of great opposition and diversity of practice, this was replaced in 1552 by the following: "The Table havng at the Communion tyme a fayre white linnen clothe upon it, shall stande in the body of the Church, or in the chancell, where Morning Prayer and Evening Prayer be appoynted to bee sayde. And the Priest standing at the north syde of the Table, shall saye the Lordes prayer, with thys collecte followinge."

(A) This change in the Rubric (which has remained practically unaltered ever since) implied the universal substitution of movable wooden tables for stone altars, such tables being placed, in Communion time, lengthwise along the chancel, or body of the church, their ends east and west, the priest standing to the north of the table, in the middle of its broad side, with his face to the south.

2. The Position of the Holy Table.

The above P. of table and priest seems to have become general in parish churches by 1625, as the restoration of the holy table to its ancient place by Laud and his followers was resented as an unwarrantable innovation. Bishop Williams, of Lincoln, writing to the vicar of Grantham in 1627, says: "I do not believe that ever the Communion Tables were (otherwise than by casualty) so placed in country churches. . . . This Table (without some new canon) is not to stand altarwise and you at the north end thereof, but tablewise, and you must officiate at the north side." In 1628, Smart, the accuser of Cosin, preaching in Durham Cathedral, says: "Our Communion Table must stand, as it had wont to do, in the midst of the quire, not at the east end. Neither must the Table be placed along from north to south, as the Altar is set, but from east to west, as the custom is of all Reformed Churches. Otherwise the minister cannot stand on the north side, there being neither side to the north. And I trow there are but two sides of a table and two ends." These quotations show not only the customary P. of the Holy Table, but also how, in Communion time, when it was set altarwise, difficulty at once arose in defining what was the north side under the new conditions. The altarwise P. was increasingly adopted until 1640, when new canons were drawn up, the seventh of which would have tended to promote the usage considerably had they come into force.

In 1641 however, a Puritan Parliament ordered "churchwardens to remove all tables turned altarwise, from the east end of the church to some other convenient place." This order was enforced in most parish churches. The Bishops therefore, in 1662, retained the Rubric of 1552, the custom being too widespread for immediate change. Cosin says that they wished to substitute the following: "The Table always standing in the midst of the upper part of the chancel (or of the church, where a chancel is wanting)"—Works 5 313a. But expediency prevailed, and it was not inserted. The suggestion of north part for north side met with the same fate. After 1662 the altarwise P. gained favour rapidly, and by the beginning of the 18th cent. had become general and has remained so ever since.

¹ [But see LORD'S TABLE, § 4, for evidence as to variations in position.]

Though infinitely preferable to the old tablewise P. from the standpoint of reverence and order, a problem has arisen in consequence of this custom, which appears quite insoluble. The language of the rubrics does not express any single unambiguous rule. In consequence of this ambiguity two positions have been adopted: (1) the eastward P., in which the priest stands before the west side of the holy table, facing east; and (2) the north end P., in which he stands at the north end of the holy table, facing south. Those who favour the former (1) say that it is the ancient rule of the Church, and that when the holy table is in a different place from that implied in the Rubric literal compliance is impossible, and men may stand where they choose. Some add that, if the priest is still to occupy the midst of the broad side of the table, which he did when it was tablewise, he must now that it has been turned altarwise stand in the midst of the west side, facing east. Supporters of the latter (2) practice urge that the main idea of the Reformers who first framed the Rubric was to abrogate the EP. and to substitute a southward one, so as to avoid any semblance of Popish practice.

4. The Position of the Celebrant.

Laudian usage and that adopted after 1662 are interesting as evidences of the way the difficulty was met. There is no direct evidence of the EP. being taken throughout the Communion Service by the Laudian divines before 1662. Cosin and Wren were both accused of having done so, but they denied it, except during the Pr. of Consecration (cp. § 7). Laud's chaplain, Heylyn, contended, as against Bp. Williams, that north side was equivalent to north end (cp. Antidotum Lincolnense i. 232). And the corresponding Rubric in the Scottish Liturgy, compiled by Laud, directs that the priest shall stand "at the north side or end thereof." Laud never seems to have adopted the EP. Puritan pamphlets published at this time accusing the Bps. of doing so are quite unreliable, as the evidence at the State Trials shows. In 1640, Bp. Juxon, in his Visitation Articles, speaks of the minister "standing at the north side or end of the Table."

After 1662, engravings in commentaries and devotional manuals, depict some the EP. some the north end P. For interesting reproductions of those showing the EP. at St. Paul's Cathedral, Magdalen Coll. Chapel, and elsewhere, see Chambers' Divine Worship. These are reliable evidence, as men like Sparrow and Comber, in whose books other instances occur, would never have allowed such illustrations in their commentaries had the EP. been considered unlawful or incorrect. Wheatly and Nichols published commentaries on the PB in 1710, and both uphold the north end P., the former having a frontispiece to a second edition of his work, in 1720, representing a priest celebrating at the north end. The terms in which they defend their view show indirectly that the EP. was also a well-known practice at that time. The concurrence of these learned High Churchmen in defence of the north end P. may account for its almost universal adoption after 1720. The practice of Bp. Maltby, however, and of the clergy in some districts in the North of England in 1831, before the Oxford Movement (cp. G., July 16, 1873, p. 923), shows that the EP. had never been completely abandoned.

(B) The EP. was pronounced a legal interpretation of this Rubric by Abp. Benson, in Read and Others v. the Bp. of Lincoln, in 1890, on the ground that: "In order to make the act described an illegal act, it would be necessary to prove that no interpretation or accommodation of the term North side except North end was correct in point of language, and that the position at the north end had been required by at least some authority since the last revision, and that no other had been practically permitted. This is not proved" (Lambeth Judgment, p. 45). The north end P. was also pronounced to be legal, and both were declared free of any special doctrinal import, sacrificial or otherwise. This interpretation was confirmed by the Privy Council.

II. The Rubric bef. the Absol. runs thus: "Then shall the priest (or the Bishop, being present) stand up, and turning himself to the people, pronounce this Absolution."

(A) At the Savoy Conference the Ministers suggested that "the minister turning himself to the people is most convenient throughout the whole ministration" (Cardwell, Conferences, p. 320). The Bps. answered: "When he speaks to them, as in Lessons, Absolution and Benedictions, it is convenient that he turn to them. When he speaks for them to God, it is fit that they should all turn another way, as the ancient Church ever did" (Cardwell, Conf., p. 353). Whatever their practice may have been, the Bps. seem here to favour, in theory at least, the EP.¹

III. Our last Rubric is that bef. the Pr. of Consecration: "When the Priest standing before the Table hath so ordered the Bread and Wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the Bread before the people and take the Cup into his hands"; he shall say the Prayer of Consecration, as followeth." The above Rubric was new in 1662, the earlier one being simply: "Then the Priest (standing up) shall say as followeth."

(A) Between 1625 and 1662 there are several instances of the EP. during the Pr. of Consecration. In a Consecration Service, drawn up by Bp. Wren for use at Abbey Dore in 1634, this Rubric occurs: "Then . . . standing with his face to the Table, about the midst of it, he saith the Collect of Consecration." A like direction occurs in the "Service for the Consecration of Churches," issued by Bp.

¹ The supporters of the north end P hold that north or south would be "another way" as well as E., and that therefore this rubric has no bearing on the matter.]

² The semicolon is in the Book Annexed.

Lloyd of Worcester in 1675. Wren and Cosin at their trial both admitted that they had consecrated facing E., Wren alleging that he did so "for the better taking of the Bread . . . and reaching of the flagon," etc., being "short of stature"; but "only while he rehearsed the fore-mentioned Collect" (i.e., Pr. of Consecration) "and at no other time." Cosin also admitted that he had done the same, "as others did there (i.e., in Durham Cathedral) before him." Cosin and Wren both assisted, the former pre-eminently, at the Revision of 1662, when this new Rubric was inserted, and they both thought the EP. "more convenient" for consecrating. In view of these facts, the natural interpretation of this Rubric implies the EP.¹

(B) In Read v. the Bp. of Lincoln it was taken as settled by a former case, Ridsdale v. Clifton, that "standing eastward on the west side of the holy table during the Pr. of Consecr. was not illegal" (Talbot, Modern Decisions on Ritual, p. 132). Both of these Judgments also concurred in deciding that the Manual Acts must be done in such a manner that the people may be able to see them.

To sum up: History and Ecclesiastical Law both agree that none of these Rubrics can be so clearly interpreted in favour of

8. Conclusion. one P. as to exclude the other.

Neither P. really implies any doctrine, sacrificial or otherwise. Men of strong sacrificial views like Nichols, Wheatly and Pusey, celebrated at the north end; men like Bp. Maltby adopted the EP. In such circumstances every priest is free to decide for himself.²

Literature: Read and Others v. the Bp. of Lincoln; Talbot, Modern Decisions on Ritual; Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica; Bp. Wordsworth, Holy Communion; Howson, Before the Table; CQR 1 438 (Beresford Hope); Chambers, Divine Worship (for engravings); Commentaries on PB by Wheatly and Nichols; Tomlinson, Judgment of the Lords of the Privy Council in Ridsdale v. Clifton, 1877.—ra.

P. A. MILLER.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.—The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were incorporated in 1836 by the Act 6 & 7 Wm. IV.

1. Establishment and Constitution. of carrying out certain recommendations made in the first four Reports of the Church Inquiry Commissioners. The latter Commissioners had been appointed with a view to devising remedies for abuses then

¹ [On the other hand, others feel that the words "standing before the table" introduced at this point are meaningless unless the north end P. is presupposed, as the minister would already be occupying this position. Also, it is urged that any special direction to "order the bread and wine" was only needed to obviate the inconvenience of stretching across the table from the end. Moreover, in the Book Annexed to the Act, there is a semicolon after "hands" as shown above, making it possible that a return to the north end is implied, where "he shall say . . ." Archdeacon Pory, a Rev. ser., in 1665 in a Visitation question, asks if the table is placed "so as the priest . . . may stand before the table to order the bread and wine." G.H.]

[On the other hand, the words "before the people" point to the possibility of the Manual Acts not being visible to the people, and therefore seem to imply the EP., as, if the Northward P. were adopted, the Manual Acts would of necessity be visible, and these words would therefore be superfluous. J. W. T.]

² [See further, NORTH SIDE, and, for Westward position, LORD'S TABLE.]

existing in the Church establishment and particularly the inefficiency of episcopal supervision; the unequal division between the bishops of revenues and duties and the practice of bishops holding in commendam other offices and benefices; the holding of benefices in plurality and the failure of incumbents to reside upon their benefices; the deficiency of the provision for the parochial cure of Souls on the one hand and the existence on the other hand in the cathedral churches of a large number of sinecure offices.

The constitution of the Commission (which from 1840 had consisted of all the bishops, three deans, six judges, five members of the Government, and nine lay members) was altered in 1850 by the addition under the Act 13 & 14 Vict., cap. 94, of three laymen as "Church Estates Commissioners," of whom the first and second are appointed by the Crown, and the third by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The recommendations of the four Reports above mentioned, with which the Act of 1836 dealt, were concerned solely with episcopal jurisdiction and revenues and diocesan arrangements and divisions. They laid down a complete scheme for the reorganisation of the dioceses of England and Wales, the redistribution of episcopal incomes, and the re-arrangement of boundaries with a view to the simplification of episcopal and archidiaconal jurisdiction and for the abolition of peculiar jurisdictions. To carry out this scheme of reorganisation in all its detail and with all necessary modifications and supplemental arrangements was the first work committed to the E. Commissioners, and it will be observed that at this time no funds were placed at their disposal for the improvement of the provision for the parochial cure of Souls.

Included in these arrangements were the creation of the new sees of Ripon and Manchester (the latter not carried out, however, until a later Act of 1847 was passed particularly dealing with it) and the union (dissolved in 1897) of the sees of Gloucester and Bristol.

The endowments of the two new sees were provided by a re-arrangement of the endowments of the older sees.

The matters of pluralities and non-residence were dealt with by a separate Act, viz., the

2. Diocesan Reorganisation. Pluralities Act of 1838, also founded upon the recommendations of, indeed drafted by, the Church Inquiry Commissioners.

But the evils of pluralities and non-residence flowed from the inadequacy of the provision for parochial incumbents and the distribution of that provision no longer according with the distribution of population, and to remedy these evils required not merely a more perfect legal system but especially an application to meet these needs of existing resources of the Church unprofitably employed. The resources of the Church were altogether insufficient, but no effective appeal for their increase could be made so long as it was possible for her critics to say that much was unprofitably employed.

The Church Inquiry Commissioners therefore dealt with the even larger question of the measures to be taken for the purpose of rendering available for making, out of the endowments of the cathedrals and cathedral offices, further provision for the cure of Souls while maintaining the efficiency of the cathedral churches. For carrying out this part of their scheme the Act 3 & 4 Vict., cap. 113, was passed in 1840. The administration of this Act was entrusted to the Body (the E. Commissioners) incorporated by the Act of 1836, but the constitution of the Body was materially altered thereby (see § 1 above), especially by the addition of all the diocesan bishops (except the Bishop of Sodor and Man, to which diocese the provisions of these Acts were not applied), and the functions of the Commissioners were greatly extended. The most important result of this Act was the foundation of the "Common Fund" of the E. Commissioners, to be applied to the relief of parochial spiritual destitution; into this Fund were to be paid the revenues of the Commissioners arising from the transfer to them under the provisions of the Act of the endowments of the non-residentiary prebends and sinecure rectories in public patronage and the revenues of canonries suspended under the Act. The Commissioners were directed to apply their Common Fund in making additional provision for the cure of Souls in places where such provision was most required, and a local claim to prior consideration was given to the places from which the revenues were derived.

The ancient endowments of the Church are therefore the original source from which the Common Fund is derived.

The Act (13 & 14 Vict., cap. 104) contained provisions for augmenting the "Common Fund" by transferring to it the balance of the Episcopal Fund—the Fund resulting from the operations of the Commissioners under 6 & 7 Wm. IV, cap. 77, in the settlement and redistribution of episcopal incomes. The "Common Fund" for the relief of spiritual destitution thus became interested in the whole of the improved value obtainable by the better management of episcopal property as well as in the surplus arising from the re-arrangement of Capitular Revenues.

The episcopal estates and the corporate estates of the chapters remained vested in and under the control of the bishops and chapters respectively. These estates were managed for the most part on the system of leasing for lives or for fixed terms, in consideration of small and sometimes almost nominal reserved rents, and substantial fines payable on every renewal whether by the addition of a term of years or of a life or lives. It was very difficult, if not impossible, for bishops or chapters, having regard to the limited interests of individual occupants of sees or members of capitular bodies, to change this system, and yet to obtain the full value of the estates a change was essential.

By an Act, therefore, of 1851 (14 & 15 Vict., cap. 104) bishops and chapters were empowered with the consent of the Church Estates Commissioners to sell the reversions belonging to them or to buy their lessees' interests. A large number of the chapters entered into voluntary arrangements with the Commissioners by which the latter took the bulk of their corporate estates and secured to them annuities until such time as other estates in possession producing incomes equal to the annuities should be transferred to them. The "Common Fund" of the Commissioners, instead of receiving the improved value on each separate enfranchisement, received the improved value on the whole estate as soon as the permanent estate was restored.

With regard to episcopal estates a different arrangement was made by the Act 23 & 24 Vict., cap. 124, which directed that the estates of every archbishop and bishop should on the first vacation of the see vest in the E. Commissioners, who should provide estates in possession sufficient to secure to each bishop the income fixed for his see under the Act of 1836, and in the meantime should pay such income out of the Common Fund.

The general result of the Acts of 1840 and 1860 and of the arrangements with the chapters is that the large estates formerly belonging to E. Corporations with limited powers and restricted means are now vested in the Commissioners as absolute owners having full powers to develop them to the best advantage. Moreover, a large redistribution of episcopal and caputal incomes in favour of the parochial clergy has been effected, and the management of the properties formerly belonging to bishops and chapters has been so improved as to enable a great increase of income to be obtained wholly for the benefit of the parochial clergy. Thus, the net rental for the year 1908 from estates vested in the Commissioners in respect of the Common Fund was nearly £1,400,000, including £501,000 from ground rents, £463,000 from minerals (chiefly coal), £273,000 from agricultural property, and £232,000 from tithe and corn rent charges; and the Commissioners were able, in that year, after meeting the permanent and other grants to benefices, the payments for bishops, chapters, etc., and all other charges and outgoings, to appropriate a capital sum of £400,000 for making new grants for the augmentation, endowment, etc., of benefices.

During a period of sixty-eight years extending from 1840 (when the Common Fund was established) to the 31st October, 1908,

4. Augmentations of Benefices.

the Commissioners have augmented and endowed over 6,000 benefices by annual payments charged on the Fund, by capital sums expended in the provision of parsonage houses, etc., and by the annexation of lands, tithe rent charges, etc. The value of these grants exceeds £910,000 per annum in perpetuity; and if to this be added the value of benefactions received by the Commissioners on behalf of benefices, and for the most part made with a view to eliciting the grants from the Commissioners, the total increase in the incomes of benefices resulting from their operations is over £1,175,000 per annum.

In addition to grants for the augmentation and endowment of benefices and the provision and improvement of parsonage houses, the Commissioners, in certain cases, make grants in aid of pensions for facilitating the retirement of aged and infirm clergy.

By various Acts subsequent to those above mentioned the Commissioners have had committed to them a large body of administrative work, of which two classes deserve special mention, viz., (a) the administration of the Church Building and New Parishes Acts, and (b) the approval of sales and leases of glebe, etc., under the E. Leasing Acts.

Among the more important measures authorised to be effected under the Church Building and New Parishes Acts are: the formation of new E. districts and the settlement of the patronage thereof; the alteration of the boundaries of existing E. districts; the acceptance of conveyances of land for sites for new churches, new burial grounds, parsonage houses and glebe; the substitution of new for old parish churches; and the fixing of tables of E. fees.

Under the E. Leasing Acts it is competent to an incumbent, with the consent of the patron of his living and the approval of the Commissioners, to sell, lease, or exchange any lands, houses, mines, minerals, or other property belonging to his benefice; and these transactions include the dealing with glebe land for building purposes either by way of lease on ground rents or grant on chief or fee farm rents, and the creation of easements in or over such land. But for these Acts the development of glebe lands for any purposes other than agricultural was practically an impossibility; in cases here and there special Acts of Parliament had been obtained, but now by virtue of these Acts glebe lands can be developed with almost as much freedom as lands of any absolute owner.

It would be too long to mention here the numerous general powers in relation to Church Administration which have been entrusted to the Commissioners to exercise, but it would not be far wrong to say that the Commissioners have been the Body on whom the Legislature has found it convenient to confer administrative functions for E. purposes of every nature where the assistance of a central executive Body has been required.

The Commissioners make a Report for Parliament of their proceedings every year, in which will be found an abstract of the accounts of the Commissioners for the year, and

5. Annual Report.

schedules of: (1) the grants which have been secured to benefices; (2) the classes and numbers of new districts formed; and (3) the cases in which the boundaries of districts or new parishes have been altered, new churches substituted for existing parish churches, tables of fees authorised, and conveyances of sites for churches, etc., accepted during the same period; and a list is given of the sales effected and of the leases granted under the authority of the E. Leasing Acts. The Report is annually printed and issued as a Parliamentary Paper.—A6. R. W. FOWELL.

ELDER is etymologically the same as presbyter. The term is used by PRESBYTERIANS, ministers and ruling elders being distinguished.—1a. G. HARFORD.

ELECTION.—Before the 13th cent. cathedral chapters became, and are still nominally, electors of the BISHOP. PROCTORS are elected by chapters and by the benefited clergy of dioceses or arch-deaconries; CHURCHWARDENS and SIDESMEN¹ (and, in exceptional cases, Incumbents) are elected by the PARISHIONERS.

Assessors under the CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, are elected by chapters, the benefited clergy and quarter sessions.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

ELECTION OF BISHOPS.—In England there are two modes of election, (a) capitular, and (b) royal. In (a) the King issues a writ, known as Congé d'élire, to the Cathedral Chapter, authorising them to elect, with a Letter Missive recommending a candidate. The election being reported on return of the writ, the King then certifies his consent by a MANDATE directing the archbishop to confirm the election and consecrate the elect. Refusal to obey the direction of the Letter Missive appears to bring the Chapter within a PRÆMUNIRE. Further, the statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (revived in 1559 after repeal), provides that, if they do not so elect within twelve days, the King may himself elect. (b) In that case, as also in the case of some recently founded sees, the King names a bishop elect by letters patent to the archbishop conveying a mandate to consecrate.

The election of an archbishop is certified in the same way with a mandate to another metropolitan with two bishops, or to four bishops.

The earliest indication of the mode of election is found in the letters of Cyprian, who mentions cleri ac plebis suffragium (Ep. 68 2) and coepiscoporum consensus (Ep. 59 5). The 4th canon of Nicaea and others to the same effect refer to this consensus without saying anything about the local selection, and seem to indicate a process of confirmation (ARCHBISHOP, § 3); some tumultuary elections, as that of St. Ambrose, are recorded later, but the choice of the people, and even of the clergy, fell into a mere formality, and the nomination of bishops almost universally passed into the hands of temporal princes. From Knut to Henry I, the English kings appear to have appointed by act in the Witan or Great Council; Henry allowed a nominal election by the Chapters, which attended the Curia Regis for the purpose. John established and confirmed by the Great Charter the process of capitular election, which continued thenceforth, usually under royal dictation, except when superseded by papal provision.

In Ireland since 1869, in Scotland since 1689, and in most daughter Churches of the English Communion, some form of popular election is now established. Indian bishops are nominated by the Crown.

(Stubbs, Const. Hist. of Eng.; Bright, Early Eng. Ch. Hist.; Dixon, Hist. of the Ch. of Eng.)—r3. T. A. LACEY.

ELEMENTS.—The term E., as signifying the materials necessary for the administration of a Sacr., can be traced up to the 4th cent. In the ministrations of a divinely ordained rite the utmost care must be taken to employ exactly the materials prescribed by the Divine Institutor, and none other; otherwise the spiritual grace promised to the right use of the ordinance cannot be expected. Why such materials were ordered to be used rather than any other is no affair of ours; such or such materials were ordained to be used; it is our part simply to believe and obey. To tamper with the E. of a Sacr. ordained by Christ is to adulterate a divine ordinance, and to invent a new Sacr. to which no promise of grace belongs. God is just, and will keep no good thing from any man only because he was placed in circumstances under which it was impossible for him to receive any Sacr. But to alter the E. of a Sacr., because the ordained materials are unprocurable, and then to expect the benefits promised to the original institution, is surely rash presumption.

¹ [By custom having the force of law the Incumbent in some parishes nominates one of the wardens and one or more of the sidesmen.]

1. Necessity of Using the Appointed Elements.

In instituting the Euch. our Lord used (a) Wheaten Bread; (b) Wine of the Grape. About this there is not, nor has there ever been, any serious doubt in the Christian Church.

(a) Whether the Bread used by Christ at the Last Supper were unleavened or leavened, and therefore which kind of Bread is most suitable for consecration now, is a point that has caused vehement controversy between the Latin and the Oriental Churches (see UNLEAVENED BREAD). But theologians on all sides agree that the point is immaterial as far as the validity of the Sacr. is concerned; so long as the Bread is wheaten bread our Lord's institution is sufficiently kept, whether it be leavened or unleavened (see WAFERS).

(b) There seems never to have been any serious doubt that any description of wine, provided that it be the purest that can be procured, is a lawful element, if it only be "the fruit of the Vine,"

2. The Element of Wine.

"the Blood of the Grape." Councils and canonists seem from early times to have favoured red rather than white wine for use at the altar, chiefly for obvious symbolical reasons; but the point has never been considered of essential importance. In modern times the question has been raised, whether the unfermented juice of the grape constitutes a valid element. Is it "wine"? The answers to this question, which have been afforded by the discussions it has evoked, do not seem to be very decisive one way or another. Perhaps the best answer that can be given to it is St. Paul's: "We have no such custom neither the Churches of God" (1 Cor. 11 16). (For the custom of mixing water with the wine, see MIXED CHALICE.)—R2. T. I. BALL.

ELEVATION.—There are five distinct points in the rite of HC where the ceremony of E. has been practised: (1) at the Offertory (Western); (2) at the words Qui pridie and Simili modo (Western Canon); (3) immediately after the consecration of each element (Western Canon); (4) at the words Omnis honor et gloria (Western Canon); (5) before the Communion of the people, accompanied by the words τὰ ἕγχα τοῖς ἁγίοις (Eastern Liturgies)—with which may be classed the E. at the Communion of the people accompanied by the words, Ecce Agnus Dei, Ecce qui tollit peccata mundi, in the Western rite.

The earliest of these is that of the Eastern Liturgies (5). It was simply a signal that the bread and wine were now prepared for sacred use, and that, being themselves τὰ ἕγχα, they were now brought forward and offered τοῖς ἁγίοις.

This showing of the consecrated elements to the people was thus an invitation to receive and a warning against unworthy reception. But the words τὰ ἕγχα κτλ. are of much earlier origin than the ceremony which subsequently accompanied them. They are found in the earliest liturgies, while the ceremony of E. is not enjoined in the rubrics until the 6th century. It was probably an early custom to display the elements as a signal for actual Communion: this would naturally develop into E., and then be codified in the form of a rubric. It corresponds to that publicity and openness of the manual acts ("before the people") which is expressly enjoined in the Eng. rite. The E. at the words Ecce Agnus Dei, etc., is of late Roman origin (16th cent.). Its purpose was similar to that of the Eastern E. (see Ritus Celebrandi Missam).

The offering of the unconsecrated elements is clearly recognised in Eastern Liturgies at the "Great Entrance," when, after preparation in the chapel of the Prothesis, they were carried and placed upon the Holy Table. No public E. is named: but a late form of E. is found in the ritual of the Prothesis. The placing of the gifts upon the Altar signified their presentation to God, without any "lifting up." Nor is there any trace of this form of E. in the earlier Western Missals. But in the Sarum Ordinary of the 14th century the gifts are held in the priest's hands at the prayer Suscipe, sancta Trinitas, and in the later Sarum and Bangor Missals E. is distinctly named. In the PB of 1549 this oblation of gifts was recognised by the direction to place the elements on the altar before the Canon: while in 1662 the rubric directs both the offerings of the people and the bread and wine to be placed on the Holy Table before the Prayer for the Church Militant, in which our "Alms and oblations" are offered with our prayers to God. It should be noted that the words "humbly present" are used, in the rubric, of the "Alms for the poor and other devotions of the people," but not of the elements. But all are alike placed upon the Holy Table, which may reasonably signify, in accordance with ancient custom their solemn dedication to sacred use.¹

Of the three Es. which occur in the Western Canon the most important is that on which the mediæval Ch. laid such stress, and to which it gave so distinctive a meaning. Immediately after Consecration the Host or Chalice was elevated "to be seen by all," and "that the people may worship the same." The Godward intention of E. at this point has little or no support (see Bonaventura, Opera 7 78, Moguntia, 1609; the passage is regarded as spurious in the more recent edition of his works). The avowed intention of this late form of E. and the cause which gave rise to its adoption are beyond dispute. The development of the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, and its condemnation by Berengarius, suggested the thought of this new ceremony which is first found in the 11th or 12th century, and had hitherto been unknown.

The elevations at Qui Pridie and Simili Modo, and at (or about) Omnis honor et gloria, are of earlier date. The former was an extension of the manual acts of the priest at the words of Institution, and appears about the 11th century. It seems to have been a presentation to God for benediction (Micrologus, c. 15). When E. for worship came in, this earlier form was carefully guarded, lest, by premature adoration, the creature and not the Creator should be worshipped.

E. at the words Omnis honor et gloria can claim a still earlier mention, namely in the Ordines Romani (8th cent.). It was closely related to the "Crossings" (Consignationes) which marked the close of the Canon, and was intended to represent to the people the benefits wrought by the Passion of our Lord. Dr. Wickham Legg (Tracts on the Mass, p. 242) concludes from its position before the Lord's Pr., which commenced the preparation of the communicants, that it was probably "an invitation to Communion." It was called (after the introduction of the E. after Consecration) the "Lesser Elevation."

The evidence points to the conclusion that E. before Consecration had a Godward intention, while after Consecration it was intended to exhibit the benefits of our Lord's death to the worshippers.

In the PB the only hint of E. is contained in the direction to "humbly present" the offerings of the people. The

5. PB Usage. MANUAL ACTS of taking the elements into the hands of course involve a certain "lifting up," but not beyond what is necessary to the prescribed action. On the other hand, in the Order of Communion of 1548, E. was expressly forbidden, if a further consecration were needed — "without any elevation or lifting up"—while in 1549 all "elevation or showing the Sacrament to the people" was forbidden. In 1552 all the manual acts were omitted, and no caution against E. was needed. But since 1662, when the manual acts were enlarged and expressly enjoined, they have been carefully specified, yet without any mention of E. There is no clear historical support for a Godward E. at the words "Do this," etc., and it has no rubrical warrant. It seems to place upon the words, "Do this," a meaning ("Sacrifice this") which no Anglican formulary sanctions, and which no commentator of the first rank has adopted. It is moreover liable to confusion with the Roman E. for worship, which occurs at the same point of the Service. (See Elevation in the Eucharist, its History and Rationale, Cambridge, 1907, by the writer of the art.)—R2. T. W. DRURY.

¹ This Oblatio Consecrandorum is fully recognised in the CORONATION Service of our King; and a form of words, expressing this purpose is prescribed, the bread and wine, like other gifts, being presented to the Abp. by the King.

EMBER DAYS (Quatuor tempora; Fr. Les quatre temps; Ger. Quatember; in Heylyn "the Embring weeks," Hierurg. Angl., 2nd ed., 1248).—These are the Wed., Fr. and Sat. fasting days at the four seasons of the year, aft. the first Sunday in Lent, Pentecost, Holy Cross Day (Sept. 14), and St. Lucy's Day (Dec. 13). The name is probably derived, through German, from quatuor tempora, but a derivation has been proposed from Ang.-Sax. ymbren, "recurring." The Western custom of fasting on these three days in most of the weeks of the year (see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 3, 5) died out except at these seasons, when it was retained at Rome, in connection with the sowing, reaping, and vintage; the winter fast was added later. Leo the Great (c. 440) refers to the Ember Days at Rome. From Rome they spread over the West¹ but not to the East; and, as they were already established as fasts of the seasons, they were considered suitable for Ordinations. The Saturday was the usual day chosen for this purpose; but the Collect at the Ordination was that of the day. The Sarum Brev. prohibits Te. D. on these days except in Whitsun-week (ed. Procter and Wordsworth, 190). The PB special Collects for those who are to be ordained are appointed for the whole of the Ember weeks; they perhaps should be begun on the Saturday evening preceding (see EVEN). In the Amer. PB there are proper lessons for the Ember Days.—C3. A. J. MACLEAN.

EMBLEM.—Es. are conventional and traditional figures or designs employed in art, by means of which the Christian is led to the contemplation of God and the mysteries of the Faith, and by which angels and saints can be identified when represented in painting and sculpture.

In the ages of persecution, when an economy of the faith was necessary, and when Christian ideas and mysteries were withheld as far as possible from the knowledge of the heathen, Es. were largely employed in places of Christian worship. Thus on the walls of the catacombs, in rough scratchings or sgraffiti, the mysteries of the Faith were represented to the Christian by figures perfectly familiar and well understood, but unintelligible to the uninitiated. The redeeming Christ was symbolised by the figure of the Good Shepherd with the lamb upon His shoulder, by the monogram of the Chi Rho (✠), and by the fish, since the Greek word ixthys (= fish) gave the initials for "Jesus Christ the Son of God the Saviour." Found above the graves of those buried in the catacombs, these Es. signified that the departed had been united to Christ in Holy Bapt. The idea once seized, it was found capable of, and received, a wide and permanent development. Abstract ideas were represented: the anchor was an E. of hope, the palm of victory, the dove with an olive-branch of the eternal peace into which the departed Christian entered; the Orante, a standing figure with the arms upraised and outstretched in pr., signified the joy of heaven. Representations of bread and of fish, with which Christ had fed the multitudes in the wilderness, were Es. of the spiritual food of the Euch. The peacock, renewing its splendid plumage in the spring, betokened the Christian soul in the splendour of resurrection.

With the development of their use, the language of Es. became fixed, and certain signs were definitely allotted to certain persons, mysteries, or things. The most familiar of all

2. The Nimbus.

Es. is the nimbus, or halo round the heads of the Persons of the Sacred Trinity or the saints. In the case of the Divine Persons, the nimbus was represented as circular, including a cross within its circumference. The Holy Spirit was represented as a Dove, with a nimbus about the head. A larger form of the nimbus, known as the aureole, including the body and not merely the head, was sometimes employed, with a usual, though not an invariable, restriction to the Divine Persons and to St. Mary the Virgin as the Mother of the Incarnate Son. The acknowledged holiness of those of whom representations were made during their lifetime was indicated by a square nimbus.

The cross, in a great variety of forms, was the natural E. of redemption. With it were associated, in later times, the other instruments of the Passion, the nails, the spear, the reed and sponge, the dice of the soldiers, the seamless robe, the cock which reminded St. Peter of his rash vow, the lantern which lighted the betrayer through the garden of Gethsemane.

The angels, in the nine choirs or orders into which St. Dionysius the Areopagite divided them, are represented as follows:—

4. Emblems of the Angels.

—Seraphim, Cherubim—heads with or without bodies, having two or six wings; or as winged circles or wheels, after the vision of Ezekiel, the wings having eyes depicted upon them. Thrones—as winged circles; or as angels carrying towers or thrones. Dominations, Virtues, Powers—in human form, with armour and arms; or, in the East, in albs with golden girdles and green stoles, holding the Seal of God, a St. Andrew's cross within a circle, with a horizontal line drawn above the cross. Principalities, Archangels, Angels—sometimes in armour, overcoming evil; St. Gabriel usually in alb and crossed stole, bearing a lily; other angels are variously represented according to the action in which they are engaged, often as praising God with instruments of music.

Many different Es. are associated with the four ¹ The Council of Mainz, A.D. 813, orders a fast on Wed., Fr. and Sat. of the first week in March, the second week in June, the third week in September, and the last full week before Christmas (can. 34).

Evangelists. Those most commonly found are derived from the vision of Ezekiel. The angel with the face of a man is assigned to St. Matthew, whose Gospel emphasises the human nature of Our Lord. St. Mark has the lion, since his Gospel emphasises the kingly dignity of Christ. St. Luke has the ox, used in sacrifice, since he makes clear the sacrificial aspect of Christ's atoning work. St. John, who reveals most fully the Divine nature of Christ and the Mystery of the Incarnation, is symbolised by the eagle, which alone soars heavenward gazing open-eyed upon the sun.

6. Of the Evangelists.

In assigning Es. to the saints, a few general principles were observed. To martyrs the instrument of their martyrdom was usually allotted, and by this they are commonly represented even when the figure of the saint is not depicted, as in many instances in the rude "clog-almanacks" which in this country and in Scandinavia were in common use before the general use of written calendars and books. Founders of churches and religious houses were represented as holding a small model of their church. Other saints were shown holding the tools of their craft.

6. Of Saints in General.

The Es. most commonly associated with the Apostles are:—St. Peter, the keys, an inverted cross, 7. Of the Apostles.

a cock: St. John, a cup from which a snake issues, in allusion to the cup of poison which he drank unharmed: St. James, a sword, the staff, shell and wallet of the pilgrim: St. Andrew, the X cross: St. Philip, a cross, a pillar: St. Thomas, a lance, a carpenter's square: St. Bartholomew, a flaying-knife: St. Matthew, a hatchet: St. James the Less, the fuller's club of his martyrdom: St. Simon, the saw by which he suffered: St. Jude, a lance, a boat: St. Matthias, an axe: St. Paul, a sword: St. Barnabas, a stone, or flames and a stake.

To the saints in the PB Calendar, not hitherto allotted to, the following Es. are assigned:—St. Lucian holds his head in his hands:

8. Of Other Saints.

St. Hilary, three books, signifying his writings, serpents upon which he treads, signifying heresies which he combatted: St. Prisca, a sword, a lion at her feet: St. Fabian, a sword, a palm branch, a dove near his head: St. Agnes, a lamb: St. Vincent, a gridiron, sometimes a raven: St. Blasius, a woolcomber's iron comb, the instrument of his torture: St. Agatha, a pair of pincers: St. Valentine, perhaps a lovers' knot: St. David, a hill on which he stands, a dove above his head: St. Chad, sometimes a church, as a founder: St. Perpetua, a wild cow: St. Gregory the Great, a book, a dove on his shoulder: St. Edward K. and M., ensigns of royalty, a cup and a dagger: St. Benedict, a shattered poison-cup: St. Richard, a cup at his feet: St. Ambrose, a beehive: St. Alphege, stones in his chasuble, a battleaxe: St. George, a banner or shield, with a red cross on a white ground: St. Dunstan, a pair of tongs, a harp: St. Augustine, uncertain; perhaps a banner of the Crucifixion: Ven. Bede, a book: St. Nicomede, a spiked club: St. Boniface, an oak tree, a book pierced with a sword: St. Alban, a sword in the right hand, a cross in the left: St. John Baptist, a cross on a long staff, a lamb: St. Swithin, sometimes a shower of rain: St. Margaret, a dragon, pierced by a long cross which she holds: St. Mary Magdalene, the alabaster box of ointment: St. Anne, a dove with a ring or crown in its beak: St. Laurence, a gridiron: St. Augustine of Hippo, a heart, burning, or transfigured with arrows: St. Giles, a hind fawning upon him: St. Euvrinius, a dove alighting on his head: St. Lambert, a lance or dart: St. Cyprian, a sword and a book: St. Jerome, a lion, a cardinal's hat: St. Remigius, a dove with an oil cruse: St. Faith, a brazen bed like a gridiron, a bundle of rods: St. Denys, headless, carrying his head: St. Edward the Confessor, a sceptre: St. Etheldreda, crowned, and with a crosier, a tree blossoming by her: St. Crispin, an awl, or shoemaker's knife: St. Leonard, chains or fetters: St. Martin, a cloak which he divides with a sword, a goose: St. Britius, burning coals which he bears in his hands: St. Machutus, a child at his feet: St. Hugh, a swan: St. Edmund, arrows piercing him: St. Cecilia, a harp, or other musical instrument: St. Clement, an anchor: St. Catherine, a wheel set with spikes: St. Nicholas, three purses or balls of gold, a tub with three nude children, an anchor: St. Lucy, a dish with two eyes in it: St. Stephen, a stone in his hand or stones in his robe: St. Silvester, an ox lying near him.

The crowned initial of a saint's name often appears in the decoration of a church dedicated in his name, as a secondary Emblem.

Of the very numerous Es. assigned to the Blessed Virgin it must suffice to mention here the flowering 9. Of the B.V. Mary.

lily, with its conventionalised form of the fleur-de-lis, the mystic rose, the tower, the monogram MR crowned or uncrowned, the star, and the crown of twelve stars. And of the Es. often found in mediæval churches, two of the most common are the shield showing the Five Wounds of Christ, and the chalice and host, Es. of the Blessed Sacrament.—R4.

E. HERMITAGE DAY.

ENDOWMENTS.—See PROPERTY (CHURCH).

ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

I. TO THE CONQUEST.

The Ch. of Eng., a branch of the Western Ch., Catholic, Apostolic, and Reformed, represents the Ch. founded in the island of

1. British Christianity.

Britain by devoted missionaries whose names are unknown. That Christianity was preached in some part of the island in sub-apostolic, if not in apostolic, times, is exceedingly probable. It has been conjectured that the first Christians to land on these shores were soldiers sent out from Rome to replenish the army of occupation. Tradition, however, asserts that the earliest missionaries settled at Beckery, a small island in a marsh near Glastonbury. From the fact that the neighbouring village, Pilton (Celtic, "Harbour Town"), was a port for Ireland, it may be conjectured that they came hither from that country. The story that Joseph of Arimathea brought Christianity to our shores, though playing an important part in the Arthurian cycle of legend and in early Celtic literature, must be regarded as destitute of historic foundation. One thing is fairly certain, that the British Ch. was not a Ch. of the Roman colony, civil or military, but a distinctly national Ch. It sent bps.—Eborius of London, Restitutius of York and Adelfius—to the Council of Arles in 314. The Council of Ariminum was also attended by three British bishops in 359, and, from the fact that they alone among the assembled fathers were compelled to accept the imperial assistance offered to those who could not defray their own expenses, we may infer that the Ch. they represented was poor. Still further was it impoverished, on the withdrawal of the Roman army, by the incursions of the Picts and Scots; but the crowning disaster which befel it was the extermination of Christianity in England by the Anglo-Saxons, and the retreat into the mountains of Wales to their brethren of the scattered remnants of the defeated nation. Here in their rocky fastnesses they kept alive the ancient faith, assimilating in the process of time more and more the learning, customs, ritual and organisation of Western Christendom.

The re-conversion of England was effected by two separate, and at one time rival, missions, that in the North, of Irish origin: from Iona; that of the South, sent out by Pope Gregory under the leadership of Augustine, 597.

2. The Anglo-Saxon Church.

Columba founded a monastery in Iona, 563, which became the home of the northern mission. From it came Aidan, the founder of Christianity in Northumbria. At Lindisfarne, an island off the coast, he established the first episcopal see in the North, 635 (subsequently destroyed by the Danes). The great missionary bps., Cuthbert, Cedd and Wilfrid, were fruits of this mission. Christianity in the North was essentially monastic. It was the custom in Ireland for the abbot of a religious community to appoint certain monks in episcopal orders to ordain and confirm, reserving to himself the administration of the house and district around. The effort to govern the Northern Province by the Abbots of Iona or Lindisfarne through missionary bps. was not altogether successful. Though these missionaries were men of piety, devotion and courage, they lacked experience in organisation. The Southern mission under Augustine at the outset failed to conciliate the British bps., and suffered many reverses; but under Theodore and other able abps. it succeeded ultimately in evangelising the whole country, establishing priests with parochial, and bishops with territorial, jurisdiction, and monasteries and cathedrals with schools attached open alike to rich and poor. In the North, too, the monastery of Jarrow, the home of the Venerable Bede, and the cathedral school of York shared with the great schools of Ireland the honour of keeping alight the flame of learning, when the rest of Europe was plunged in darkness. Alfred the Great, also, under the influences inspired by Alcuin, still further advanced the cause of learning; and when in the course of years the monasteries fell into disorder and learning declined, the zeal of Dunstan and his pupil Ethelwold revived monastic life by the introduction of the Reformed Benedictine rule, while imposing a simpler yet strict rule on the secular clergy. So closely were the Ch. and State united during the Anglo-Saxon period, and the troubled times of the Danish invasion, that the history of the one is to a large extent the history of the other. It was the example of unity set by the Synod of Hertford that first suggested the possibility of a united nation under one monarch, one parliament, and one legal code. Every step in the process of unification was accomplished under the guidance of the great Ecclesiastics who for centuries were the trusted advisers of the Saxon kings.

II. THE MIDDLE AGES.

1066-1509. The Norman Conquest profoundly affected the relations between Chs. and State. By an extension of the feudal system, at that time in the course of rapid development, to the property of the Ch., bps. and abbots became feudal lords holding their estates, like other lords, from the King. In simpler times the relations between the Ch. and the State had been so intimate that clergy and laity were able to unite on equal terms. All that was now changed. The King and barons formed hostile camps, jealous of each other's power; and the bps. and mitred abbots, unless they happened to be employed by the Crown in offices of State, gravitated towards the baronial ranks, with which they were allied in the eyes of the law. Ch. Courts and Crown Courts, which in Saxon times had been scarcely distinguishable, now drew rigidly apart, each jealous of the other's prerogatives. So long, however, as Lanfranc, the sagacious adviser of the King, remained in power, these mutual rivalries were of small account; but at his death the King's party and the Baronial party began their continual bickering, the Ch. taking now one side and now the other. Acting under the influence of Cluniac ideas, Lanfranc had revived the regulations enforcing celibacy on the clergy. To thoughtful people of that day, and especially to the far-seeing Abbot of Cluny, the ensnaring of the clergy in the feudal net involved a new and imminent danger. Now that abbots and bps. had become feudal lords, nothing prevented their behaving as such, marrying as they did for political or family reasons, and bequeathing their estates to their sons. By this means the property of the Ch. would inevitably be secularised, unless the clergy were absolutely prohibited from marriage. Lanfranc compromised, imposing celibacy on all monastic and capitular bodies, but leaving the parish priest to please himself.

3. Effects of Feudalism.

Of social life in the Middle Ages we know little. With the expansion of trade, towns increased in wealth and importance, and by slow steps a middle class was formed. The country at large was fervently religious, its ideals during the earlier part of the 13th cent., the golden age of monasticism, being ascetic and other-worldly. The people dwelt in cottages but reared cathedrals, they worked hard and fared hard, but were generous when necessity arose alike to the claims of the Ch. and State. The corruption of the higher clergy, the decay of monasticism, the misgovernment and oppression that crept in later on, failed to dim the enthusiasm of their faith. If habits and methods of living were coarse, faith abounded, and the "poore parson of the town" never lacked hearers for his homely homilies. The friars in their earlier and purer days preached a simple gospel which the poor could understand. The towns as they grew were not allowed to relapse into heathenism; alike great cities and small bristled with towers and spires. Religion was the main topic of conversation in the market, the street and the field. Men dated their lives by the calendar of the Saints. The miracle plays were popular educators in religious truth; the walls and windows of the ch. glowed with pictures of Bible scenes which the unlettered man could read. The monks, nuns and parochial clergy, mainly recruited from the ranks of the middle and lower classes, were natives of the soil; in short the Ch. of the Middle Ages was intensely national. When in 1349 the terrible Black Death swept away one half of the population, it was the religious houses that suffered most, showing how well they ministered to the sick and dying at that fearful time. But the corruptions and exactions of the Roman Pontiffs, and the crowd of greedy sycophants which Pope after Pope foisted on the Ch., raised at length a feeling of sullen resentment. At one time it is computed that the Popes extracted from the country a larger revenue than the King himself could command for all purposes, civil and military. The stern protest of Wycliffe, first directed against the friars and the higher clergy who seemed to him hopelessly corrupt, and subsequently extended to doctrine, especially that of transubstantiation, marked a turning of the tide. The Ch. was losing the confidence of the people.

4. Medieval Religion.

With regard to her political influence there can be little doubt that the Ch. in the main took the part of the people against the King and the great feudal lords. 6. The Ch. and the Nation. By her influence villeinage was gradually destroyed and the Bristol slave trade brought to an end. Brave men like Hugh of Lincoln dared to resist royal efforts to levy for foreign wars contributions that were only legally due for home defence. In the resistance of the nobles to the iniquitous government of John, the Ch. played a noble part; and to her efforts in no small measure must be ascribed the Great Charter. If in the matter of the Constitutions of Clarendon her attitude was less disinterested, the action of Becket which led to his martyrdom was viewed by the people with approbation as an effort to prevent a dangerous extension of the Royal power. In her opposition to Papal aggression she was less successful, especially in maintaining her rights to elect abbots and bps., the appointments generally being determined either by the Pope or the King. When the King and Pope quarrelled (as in the case of the appointment of Stephen Langton), the Pope frequently showed the better judgment.

Long before regular Parliaments came into being the Ch. had held her CONVOCATIONS of the clergy, and it was her example which guided Edward I in the formation of his model Parliament, 1295. But the growing power of the Papacy on the one hand, and the steady encroachments of the King on the other, gradually sapped the life of the Ch. of Eng. Year by year she lost her power of self-government. Bps. appointed by King or Pope neglected their proper tasks to attend the Courts of Westminster or Rome. Simony crept in, and with it endless abuses. After the Black Death, a series of plagues succeeded, and the minds of the people turned with gloomy forebodings to the future. Chantry were established all over the land for masses for the dead. To "make a good end" seemed more important than to lead a good life, hence the popularity of INDULGENCES applicable to the souls in Purgatory. Then came the superstitious use of pilgrimages to Walsingham, Canterbury, St. David's, and a host of minor shrines; the multiplication of services, novenas, years, minds, etc., the veneration of dubious relics, the wearing of charms; and, with all this show of piety, a serious and widespread decline in morals. To meet this last evil, the archidiaconal courts became ever more and more inquisitorial. The authority of the parish priest was invaded by a host of pardoners and friars claiming special powers to remit sins, granted them by the Pope. The time was ripening fast for a Reformation.

III. THE REFORMATION AND AFTER.

1510-1662. The first step in England towards this event was occasioned by a personal quarrel between a strong King and 6. The Branch with Rome. a weak Pope, the former demanding the dissolution of a marriage for political purposes, the latter delaying to grant it through fear of offending Spain. The dissolution of the monasteries and the confiscation of their endowments together with those of the trades' guilds and the chantries, although associated in the popular mind with the Reformation, were measures which might have been taken by any Catholic King. The income arising from these sources, which should have been devoted to the endowment of parochial clergy and the purposes of education, was idly squandered amongst a band of dissolute courtiers, the King thereby unwittingly destroying one of the principal sources of national revenue. The result of these measures was shown in the short but disastrous reign of Edward VI. A brief period of reaction followed, when the Romish party forfeited for ever the good will of the nation by the odious martyrdom of many followers of the new learning; and this, later on, gave way to a conservative reaction and a return to reformation principles during the reign of Elizabeth. Under the prudent management of Abp. Parker, the changes thus effected secured the good will of the country.

Two grave difficulties attended the process, the utter impossibility of replacing clergy of the ancient model by a learned and pious body trained under the new, and the necessity of restraining the zeal of the returned Marian exiles, who

7. The Puritan Revolt. flocked back to the country eager to impose upon the Ch. the forms and doctrines of Genevan Calvinism. It was to the newly made rich, the growing middle class which, through the thriftless extravagance of Henry's courtiers, had succeeded to the inheritance of the monastic lands, that these Puritan refugees directed their appeal, for they were, as a body, nervous about the security of their estates, and keen to acquiesce in any project which would render a return of Popery impossible. Though the Hampton Court Conference, 1604, set its seal on the moderate reforms of Elizabeth's reign, it was evident that the extremists were resolved on far more drastic changes. The main purpose of Laud and those who shared his views on the one hand, and of the Puritans on the other, was fundamentally the same, i.e., the foundation of a model Christian State, the one seeking it in a Christian Monarchy, the other in a Genevan Republic. Neither party could claim a monopoly of learning or zeal. Both were idealists, both saturated with Scripture precedents, and neither able to distinguish between OT and NT ideals. In this bitter contest the Puritans conquered, sweeping away Ch. and King, and finally the Republic they had created. In the process they involved the country in a disastrous civil war, loaded the people with taxation such as England had never known before, and engaged the country in costly naval enterprises, which, however glorious, brought small trade to her ports. The reader will find in Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy a genuine, if at times partial, account of this period of persecution and intolerance.

IV. THE RESTORATION AND ITS SEQUELS.

Whatever view may be taken of the preachers, Presbyterian or Independent, who replaced the

8. The Ch. Re-established. Clergy, they were evidently unpopular. Whether the people were not good enough for them or they not good enough for the people, on the death of Cromwell the country at large revolted from them and their experiments and inquisitions, returning with joy into the old paths. So the King "came to his own again," and with him the Ch. of Eng. Many of the old clergy were reinstated in their parishes, some of the Puritans conformed, others, 2,000 in all, whether beloved or not, were promptly ejected; as they had treated others it was meted to them again. And now ensued a time of comparative calm, broken only by the foolish effort of James to enslave religion once more in the trammels of Rome. Again the Ch. showed her national character. The Bps. the King had imprisoned became the heroes of the hour, and in the end James himself was compelled to flee. But the Ch. had to pay her price. She had committed herself to the doctrine of the Divine right of kings, and there were some amongst her who would not forswear themselves by acknowledging another monarch; and among these Non-jurors were men of eminent piety and scholarship. These formed a small party by themselves. The broken ranks of Puritanism had already subdivided, one section, strongly tinged with philosophic Deism acquired from Hobbes or distilled out of the rationalism of Locke, developing into Unitarianism among those Dissenters who had formed distinct communities of their own, undeterred by the coercive Corporation, Conventicle and Five Mile Acts; the other, or Nonconformist section, uniting with the Ch. in its controversies with Rome, opposing her in her rigid application of the Act of Uniformity. In the Ch., owing to the Latitudinarian leaning of the King and his Whig supporters, two parties also were forming, the one acquiescing in the new episcopal appointments, broadly Latitudinarian, the other orthodox, high church, and with a spice of dry, unemotional moralism.

Queen Anne, who belonged to the High Ch. party, earned the gratitude of her clergy by restoring to them the TENTS and 9. The 18th Cent. FIRST-FRUIT, which Henry VIII had appropriated, henceforward known as QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY (1704). On the accession of the House of Hanover Erastianism governed all the Whig appointments under the Crown. Henceforward the Ch. was viewed by those in power as a convenient appanage of the State. The clergy selected to fill the bishoprics accepted their high positions as rewards for their staunch political principles, their connection with Whig families, or their university attainments. One of the first consequences of Erastian policy was the suppression of Convocation, which had presumed to assail the orthodoxy of one of the nominees of the Crown, Hoadly, Bp. of Bangor (1717). The immediate loss was not so great as it would have been in less Erastian times. Already the Ch. had found expression for her spiritual life outside that ancient body. Small groups of devout men had banded themselves together to promote good works by means of societies—the Society for the Reformation of Manners in 1692, for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge in 1698, and for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts in 1701, the last named, though primarily intended for the good of Englishmen abroad, pointing clearly, by a wider application, to the heathen throughout the world.

The attitude of the Ch. towards the prevailing Deism of the time was at first merely defensive.

10. Rationalism. Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity showed that thoughtful men were inclined to make reason henceforth the touchstone of faith. This tendency was shown still more in Toland's Christianity not Mystical, in which the writer essayed to purge the faith of everything that did not conform to this standard. Tindal, a Deist, carried the principle further, maintaining that whatever good might be found in Christianity was "as old as Creation." Aggressive Deism, however, met its fate when Bp. Butler's Analogy appeared in 1736, where in place of defensive tactics a bold counter attack was made on the fundamental principle of Deism, the Bp. showing with irrefragable common sense that it was not reason but probability that was the guide of life, and that it was unreasonable to demand "rational" proofs for religion while accepting probabilities in everyday affairs. From this time English Deism fell into decay.

Another notable book was Law's Serious Call, a timely summons from worldly indifference to active practical Christianity.

11. The Evangelical Revival.

A vast population was growing up owing to the expansion of manufacturing industries in various parts of the country, for which the Ch., deprived of corporate life, was making no provision. The answer to the call was the Evangelical Revival under Wesley and Whitefield, and the creation in the heart of the Ch. of a new religious order, called by the people METHODISTS, the loss of which, by separation after Wesley's death, is one of the saddest fruits of the suppression of Convocation and the paralysis of Ch. life following on the loss of her power of self-government and self-adaptation. An Erastian Ch. could find no place for a movement which regarded the world as its parish. Within the Ch. the revival led to the formation of the great Evangelical party whose activity called into being the Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society, Sunday Schools, Ragged Schools, later on securing from an unwilling government the abolition of slavery and the slave trade.

V. RECENT HISTORY.

1833-1912. Towards the close of the period which saw the growth of Evangelicism, a new tendency began to manifest itself, 12. Broad Ch., Tractarian, and Ritualist Movements.

again parting into two very different channels, one aiming at the cultivation of the individual moral and spiritual life, while tending to merge the ecclesiastical in the national; the other anxious to cultivate individual piety within a corporate body renewed and strengthened by the recognition of its own inherent powers. The first was the Broad Church movement, led by such men as Arnold of Rugby; the second the Tractarian, so named from the memorable Tracts for the Times, issued by a small body of Oxford men, of whom Pusey, Newman, Keble and Manning were the most prominent. The 90th tract of the series resulted in a great outburst of popular indignation and the secession of Newman, Manning and a few others to Rome.

With the revival of the conception of the Ch. as the Mystical Body of Christ, naturally came a new valuation of the Sacraments as means of grace, and of the authority of the Ch. as the custodian of a doctrinal trust. The Bible and the Bible alone was no longer to be regarded as the religion of Protestants, but the Bible as expounded by the Ch. Out of the Tractarian party came the Ritualistic movement, which was an effort to restore her ancient ritual. The net result of these two movements — the Tractarian and Ritualistic—has been a general reform of Ch. worship, the abandonment of slipshod, easy-going and dull formalism, and the revival of daily service and frequent celebrations of the HC. The joint movement was in fact directed against the Erastian and Latitudinarian heritage of the early Georgian times, rather than against Evangelical principles.

The Broad Ch. party, on the other hand, under the leadership of such men as Kingsley, addressed itself first to the reformation of the practical evils of the time, in which it was ably seconded by the Ritualists who combined a strong affection for Rome with a burning evangelical zeal to restore the lapsed masses of the great towns to the Ch. of their Fathers. The appearance of the Essays and Reviews in 1860 created quite as much stir as the Tracts for the Times, and for a while drew away public attention from the practices of the Ritualists, High and Low Churchmen uniting in a protest against what they regarded as an attack on the inspiration of the Bible.

During the fifty years that followed, the Ch. has gradually abandoned the Reformation and mediæval view of SCRIPTURE, recognising in the Bible a great organic literature of permanent value, which must be studied critically, as all other ancient literature, in order to discover from it the evolution of religious ideas, and above all the nature of the Personality of CHRIST therein revealed. With the expansion of the Empire, she has learned to feel the need of a wider conception of her mission, and the Conferences of Bps. from all parts of the Empire have given impetus to aggressive missionary effort, promising a vast extension of Christianity throughout the world. The most pressing problems she has now to solve are: (1) the evangelisation of the masses in face of militant and materialistic socialism; (2) the reconciliation of capital and labour estranged by selfish greed; (3) the determination of the limits of permissible divergency in ritual and doctrine; (4) the attitude of the State towards Religious Education, Ch. Endowments, and the Establishment; (5) the relations of the Ch. to other Christian bodies; (6) the responsibility of all Christians to the heathen world. These are great problems, but the Holy Spirit Who has guided the Ch. of Eng. through so many centuries of trial, conquest, hope and fear, will assuredly bring her at last to the haven of her desire.—A1.

13. Concluding Survey.

E. A. WESLEY.

ENTHRONEMENT.—The Consecration of a Bp. originally took place at his cathedral ch., and immediately afterwards he was enthroned, i.e., placed by the consecrating Bps. on his THRONE (Apost. Const. 85; Canons of Hippolytus 430; Ep. Clement to James 19). When seated, it was customary for him to preach his inaugural (or, as it was called, enthronistic) sermon (Apost. Const., l.c.). In later times, it became usual to consecrate Bps. not in their cathedrals, but in the Abp.'s ch., and their E. had of necessity to be deferred. But they were not considered to have full possession of their new office until it had taken place. An 11th cent. form of E. may be found in the Benedictional of Abp. Robert (HBS), pp. 129-130, and the Sar. form in Maskell's Mon. Rit. 3 28a ff. E. was one of the ceremonies retained by the Ch. of Eng. at the Reformation, but no Order was provided for it in the PB. Hence a variety of use has arisen, but it is customary to follow some such lines as these: (a) the Bp. is solemnly received by the ch. officials at the cathedral door; (b) the Abp.'s Mandate for E. is read; (c) the Bp. takes oath to preserve the rights, liberties and usages of his diocesan ch.; (d) he is then enthroned by the Abp.'s Archdeacon, or his proxy, with a suitable form of words; (e) prayer is made for him, and sometimes the Te Deum sung; (f) he goes into the Chapter-House, and the officials promise canonical obedience to him. By peculiar custom the Bp. of Ely is not enthroned, but merely installed.—s6.

J. W. TYRER.

EPACT.—See CALENDAR, § 14.

EPIPHANY.—See FESTIVAL, § 4, 5, 6, 7; EPIPHANY (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).

EPIPHANY (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).—(The word E. of course points to the

1. The Festival of the Epiphany.

Manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles). For the Festival of the E. there are no proper Pss. and no proper Preface at HC, but there are proper Lessons, and the Athanasian Creed is to be said. Of the proper Lessons those from the OT tell of the conversion of the Gentiles and the deliverance of God's people; those from the NT of the manifestation of Christ (a) in his Bapt., (b) in His first miracle at Cana of Galilee. The Collect prays for the ultimate manifestation of the Beatific Vision; the Epistle (Eph. 3 1) contains St. Paul's explanation of the revelation (or manifestation) of the mystery of Christ; and the Gospel (Matt. 2 1) gives us the story of the visit of the Magi to the infant Saviour.

The lessons of the manifestation of Christ are drawn out in the Sundays aft. E. in the following manner.

The first effect of this manifestation is (a) the knowledge of the truth; and (b) power to fulfil it (Collect for 1st Sunday). This is shown in the consecration of our bodies to the service of God (Epistle, Rom. 12 1) by lives of obedience, as exemplified by Christ Himself (Gospel, Luke 2 41).

The second effect is peace. The Collect for the 2nd Sunday prays for this: the Epistle (Rom. 12 6) shows how it can be obtained by our own actions; and the Gospel (John 2 1) gives a story of domestic peace blessed by Christ.

The third effect is external security. The Collect for the 3rd Sunday acknowledges our weakness and on that ground prays to God for help. The Epistle (Rom. 12 16) shows the line of individual action we must take in order to make it possible for God to answer this pr.; and the Gospel (Matt. 8 1), in the stories of the cleansing of the leper and the healing of the centurion's servant, shows how God answers pr., and how our true security is to be found in Christ.

The fourth effect is internal security. We are in danger and necessity not only by reason of our bodily infirmities, but likewise on account of the frailty of our wills. The Incarnation comes to rescue us from this. Christ manifested power not only over the body but also over the soul. In accordance with this thought the Collect for the 4th Sunday after E. prays for spiritual protection in temptation; the Epistle (Rom. 13 1) shows how that protection will come through our endeavour to walk uprightly among men; and the Gospel (Matt. 8 23), by the stories of the storm on the lake and the destruction of the herd of swine, shows how Christ can expel our want of faith and all evil dispositions, and so rescue us in the hour of temptation.

The fifth effect of Christ's manifestation is the establishment of the Church as a defence to the true believer. The Collect for the 5th Sunday after E. prays for the Church. The Epistle (Col. 3 12) reminds us of the charity and unity of the Church; while the Gospel (Matt. 13 24) tells of its comprehensiveness.

The sixth and final effect is destruction of all works of evil and our consequent purification and likeness to Christ. The Collect for the 6th Sunday after E., which is the longest of all these Colls., emphasises these points. The Epistle (1 John 3 1) sets forth the Love of Christ as the basis of victory over evil and of our likeness to Him, while showing that it is likewise the destruction of all works of the devil. The Gospel (Matt. 24 23) describes the second coming of Christ by which all evil shall be done away.

The first Lessons for the first three Sundays after E. are taken from Isaiah and contain: (1) a prophetic statement of the manifestation of Christ as the light and strength of Israel (51), as the Redeemer (52), and as the Servant who has won the victory by suffering (53); (2) a call to repentance in the light of the manifestation of Christ (55) and assurance of redemption (54); (3) the call of the Gentiles to whom Christ will be manifested in His Holy Church, and the rejection of the wicked Jews (65, 66). These lessons contain a solemn warning against our rejection of Christ and His work, and an encouragement for us to accept Him as Saviour.

The first Lessons for the last three Sundays after E. are from the book of Job and from the Proverbs. Those from Job (on the 4th Sunday) tell us how the hypocrite's hope perishes and the wicked are destroyed before the manifestation of God, while wisdom helps us to understand His revelation. The selections from the Proverbs (for the 5th and 6th Sundays) emphasise the need of wisdom in order to enable us to grasp God's revelation of Himself, and to acquire those cardinal virtues without which wisdom cannot exist.

The number of Sundays after E. varies, of course, with the date of Easter.—GEO. F. L. H. MILLARD.

EPISCOPACY is the name given to the traditional form of government in the Christian Ch. Its characteristics are these.

1. Definition. (i) The government of the Ch. is in the hands of the three Orders of Bishops (ἐπίσκοποι), Priests or Presbyters (πρεσβύτεροι), and Deacons (διδάκοι). This is the form which first meets us and is common to all Episcopal Churches. In the Western Ch., and to a certain extent also in the Eastern, there were added MINOR ORDERS; these may be looked upon as a non-essential element. (ii) In each locality there is one Bp., and one only, who has authority and jurisdiction, but he ought not to govern the Ch. alone. It has always been the Church's rule that the Bp. is to act harmoniously with the other Orders. So Ignatius writes (Ad Magn. 6): "Be zealous to do all things in godly concord, the bps. presiding after the likeness of God, and the presbyters after the likeness of the council of the Apostles, with the deacons also who are most dear to me." This ideal harmony of the Orders may be studied also in Cyprian's writings. Although Cyprian as a man was anxious to obtain his own way, as a bp. he always claims to act constitutionally and in harmony with his presbyters.

(iii) We have spoken of three Orders according to ordinary usage, but it must be stated that, according to the traditional teaching of the Western Ch., Bishops and Priests constitute only one Order, the difference between the two being that of authority and position, not of order. This principle goes back to very early times. In the Canons of Hippolytus 4 32, p. 61, ed. Achelis: Episcopus in omnibus rebus aequiparetur presbytero excepto nomine cathedrae et ordinatione, quia potestas ordinandi ipsi non tribuitur. Jerome, who may to a certain extent express an interested antiquarianism, says, Idem est ergo presbyter, qui episcopus (Comm. in Tit. 1 7). Episcopi noverint se majus consuetudine quam dispositionis dominicae virtute presbyteris esse majores et in commune debere ecclesiam regere.

(iv) The special characteristic of Episcopal government is that, as a rule of Ch. order, the rite of ordination is vested in the Bp. Whether this was universal in the early ages is uncertain. Various instances of ordination by presbyters are cited, especially the custom of the Ch. of Alexandria, certain references in the Canons of Ancyra and other individual cases, but none of these is free from ambiguity, and they may easily arise from some confusion of language. They are, however, sufficiently strong to prohibit any dogmatic statement to the contrary. It is possible that there was a short period during which ordination was vested in the presbyters (who were indeed also bps.), and, later, it may be possible that it was customary when the bp. died for the presbyters in certain Churches to consecrate his successor, thus preserving a succession of office in their own Ch. But in historical times and probably universally from the 3rd cent. onwards the rule of the Ch.

has been that a bp. alone may ordain and that the consecration of a bp. should be by three other bps. (See APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, where the subject is discussed more fully.)

At the Council of Trent a discussion took place as to whether the authority of a bp. was derived from God or from the

2. The Source of a Bishop's Authority. Pope, i.e., whether the appointment was jure divino or jure pontificii. The latter view was maintained very strongly by the advocates of papal authority, who held that the first commission was given to St. Peter, that it was through him that the other apostles received their commissions, and that all episcopal authority is derived from the successors of St. Peter. The French and Spanish bps. on the other side fought strongly for the independent authority of the episcopal office. The papal supporters at the time only succeeded in avoiding an adverse decision, but since that date the Papacy has strengthened its position, and in the Roman Catholic Ch. at the present day all bps. are merely vicars of the Pope, and exercise no independent authority or jurisdiction. The whole discussion is most illuminating, and shows how the existence of the Episcopate is a strong guarantee for the liberty of the Ch. (Sarpi, History of the Council of Trent, bk. 7).

The origin of E. is somewhat obscure, and the obscurity has not been illuminated by the controversy which has surrounded the question. It may be taken as certain that monarchical E. prevailed universally in the Ch. during the fourth quarter of the 2nd cent., and that it was then believed to be an apostolic ordinance; that the bp. was looked upon as the successor of the Apostles, and there were lists of bps. going back to the apostolic founders of the different Chs. Before the year 120 Ignatius (Ad Trall. 3) expresses the ideal of E. in its most complete form. He considers it essential to the existence of a Ch. (χωρὶς τούτων ἐκκλησία οὐ καλεῖται; without bps., priests and deacons, it is not called a Ch.), and he is apparently not aware of the existence of any Ch. where the threefold ministry on which he lays so much stress does not exist. Although his writings clearly imply that there were persons in the community who accepted neither the Ch.'s creed nor the authority of its ministers, that does not seem to imply a different theory of Ch. government, but merely a revolt from existing authority. Of the origin or the source of authority of this ministry Ignatius says nothing; he accepts it as the existing order of things, and his letters represent it as the custom prevailing from Antioch to the coasts of the Ægean. His letter to the Ch. of Rome—a purely spiritual writing—affords no evidence as to that Ch., but it may be safely said that if Ignatius when he arrived at Rome found that Ch. without a bp. it would have been a severe shock to him. The traditions of the succession of bps. at Rome, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, take us back to an earlier period still, and there is a specific tradition of the appointment of bps. in Asia by a John, whom it is difficult not to look upon as the Apostle.

3. The Origin of Episcopacy.

On the other hand, when we turn to the apostolic times, it is equally clear that there is no trace of E. in the sense that we have defined it. The Ch. was governed by the Apostles, and Apostolic men such as Timothy and Titus. The Ch. of Jerusalem, with James the Lord's brother at its head, was recognised as having a certain undefined authority, and the building up of a Christian Sanhedrin seemed possible. The local communities seem to have been governed by Colleges of Presbyters (πρεσβυτεροι), to whom also the names of ἐπισκοποι or poiqres were given. The ἐπισκοποι and πρεσβυτεροι were clearly identical in apostolic times, and the various fanciful theories for distinguishing them have no value: there are still traces of their identity in the 2nd century. Certainly in Clement of Rome they are not yet distinct offices. Moreover, the traditional theory of the Western Ch. to which we have already referred, which represents the bp. as belonging to the same order as the priest, shows that originally there was no fundamental distinction between the two.

As to the manner in which the change was made, there is an extraordinary absence of evidence. It took place apparently without controversy. The attempts to find in 2 John or in the Epistle of Clement signs of such a controversy are unconvincing. The change must have taken place naturally and easily, or we should not find the universality of the custom and the undoubted belief in its apostolic origin after the middle of the 2nd cent. The most probable explanation is that from the beginning the Colleges of Presbyters had a permanent president, to whom, as has been suggested, the celebration of the Euch. would be normally entrusted. During the latter half of the 1st cent. a series of events occurred which profoundly influenced the Ch. Jerusalem was destroyed, and with it the dangers of a reviving Judaism. The Ch. therefore lost its centre. The Apostles and the apostolic men gradually passed away. The missionary ministry of apostles, prophets and evangelists declined in importance as the local communities grew in stability. Naturally and without controversy the place of these as representing the authority of the Ch. as a whole was taken by the existing presidents of the local communities, and silently also the custom grew of confining to the latter the name of Bp. E. as we know it was thus easily and universally established. This hypothesis harmonises with the facts. It explains the later tradition of the Ch. of Rome, which included the Bp. in the body of presbyters. It explains also the tradition of apostolical institution and the lists of bps. going back to apostolic times. In any case, the statement of the Ch. of Eng. in the Ordinal that from the Apostles' times there have been these "Orders of ministers in Christ's Ch., Bps., Priests and Deacons," may be considered established. E. represents the form which the Christian ministry naturally took so soon as the abnormal and special conditions which prevailed in apostolic times passed away.

We may now compare the authority of E. with that of the rival systems of Ch. government.

They are the Papacy, Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, and the right of free association.

4. Comparison with other Forms of Church Government.

1. The Papacy. That in some sense our Lord gave St. Peter a position of leadership in the early Ch. and that the position he actually held corresponds to the promise given may be admitted, but there is no evidence of that position being in any way a primacy, or of any successor in any place holding it. It did not even continue apparently throughout St. Peter's lifetime. And the history of the Ch. through the next 300 years shows conclusively that whatever honour or presidency was given to the see of Rome, owing to its memories of St. Paul and St. Peter and its position as the Ch. of the Metropolis, it exercised no authority over other Chs. If anything approaching the Papal system had existed, the history of the Ch. would have taken a different form. There is no historical evidence for the Papacy.

2. Presbyterianism. The establishment of Presbyterianism in the 16th cent., so far as it arose from an appeal to antiquity and was not merely a reaction against existing circumstances, was really based on a false antiquarianism. It is true, of course, that the words (bp. and presbyter) are within certain limits interchangeable in the NT, and that the government of the local community was in the hands of a body of presbyters. But in no sense was the government of the Ch. presbyterian. It is obvious from the study of St. Paul's Epistles that behind the local bodies was the authority of the Apostles and other members of the missionary ministry, and, as these passed away, the authority of the Bp. developed.

3. Congregationalism. Congregationalism is an exaggerated assertion of a half truth. It is true that the Ch. and the whole of the local communities in particular are represented as exercising spiritual functions in their corporate capacity; that the local community is the representative in the place where it is situated of the Ch. as a whole, and it possesses all the spiritual functions of the Ch.; that the community also exercises its functions in appointing its officials; that the Ch. as a whole and the local community alike are filled with the Spirit. But the Churches are always represented as acting through their proper officials; and the authority of those officials, as of the Ch., is derived from the Apostles and other first founders of Christianity. The local Churches are parts of the Ch. as a whole. The idea of the Ch. as a whole is prior in thought and in foundation to the local community, and each community is expected to conform to the general customs of the Church.

4. Free association. Still less is there any trace of a right of free association. It may be that there was not complete uniformity at the beginning in the constitution of every community, although this is unproved. It is true, of course, that the expansion of the Ch. followed latent principle rather than eccles. rule, but there is no trace of the communities taking upon themselves each to organise itself in its own way. Both the Acts of the Apostles and St. Paul's Epistles represent authority as coming from above. Nor can the Charismatic ministry, as it is called, be quoted. There is no evidence for a Charismatic ministry as opposed to an official ministry. A person was appointed to an office because he had a Charisma. His Charisma did not give him office. The Ch. was guided by those who had been given authority by Christ himself. The Ch. was believed to be the abode of the Spirit, but it was the Spirit of order not of disorder, and it worked through the appointed organs of the Ch. The analogy of St. Paul between the Ch. and the body with its members means that each person in the Ch. must perform the functions assigned to him, and in every individual case appointments by the Spirit mean appointments through the normal organs of the Society [cp. Body, § 11, 12].

Although the old arguments in favour of E. were stated in too rigid a form, and in that form cannot be historically maintained, yet the authority both of history and of tradition is overwhelmingly in favour of it as against any other form of Ch. government, and history gives ample testimony to its value.

5. Value of Episcopacy.

(1) It was on the Episcopate after the Apostles had passed away that the unity of the Ch. was based. This was the testimony of Ignatius as of Cyprian. "Within the Ch. organisation the most weighty and significant creation was that of the Monarchical Episcopate. It was the Bps., properly speaking, who held together the individual members of the Churches" (Harnack, Mission, etc.; Eng. trans., 1 431-9). "Research," says Dr. Whitney, "places the E. in the closest relation with the whole Christian growth; it shows it to us as the product and the keeper of the Christian life; it was this through the storm of early heresies and the rush of barbarian invasions. Then for fourteen cents. it remained the normal type of Christian organisation" (The Historic Episcopate in relation to the Visible Unity of the Christian Church, CCR., 1910).

(2) It was the Episcopate that guaranteed purity of apostolic teaching, i.e., that guarded the transmission of tradition from the beginning of Christianity. What that meant, Gnosticism shows. This function of the Episcopate is the main theme of Irenæus. So Von Schubert writes (Outline of Ch. History, p. 55): "The Ch. rested upon these three pillars, the Rule of Faith, the Canon of Scripture, and the Bps." In times of strife without and controversy within the monarchical rule of the Bps. had proved to be the best means of preserving the teaching of the Apostles from one generation to another.

(3) It was the Ch. organisation, and, in particular E., that made the religious ideas of Christianity effective. Had Christianity merely meant a special form of religious or philosophical teaching, it would have been undermined by the wave of speculation in the 2nd cent., it would never have been able to stand against Pagan persecution, and it would not have recreated society under the strain of the northern invaders. It was because our Lord not only taught His followers but founded the Ch., because He entrusted authority over that society to the Apostles, and because He gave that society the principles of ministry, of fellowship, and of sacrament, that it was able to conquer, first the Pagan, and then the Barbarian, world.

(4) E. is the great bulwark of ordered liberty of the Ch. The later Middle Ages represented in many ways the degradation of E. Its authority was overpowered by the Papacy, which fostered the independence of the Monastic Orders, and thus the conditions were prepared which caused the Reformation. Had the Bps. throughout the Christian world been free to act, there can be little doubt that the reform movement would have worked within the Ch. The discussions at the Council of Trent on the source of episcopal authority referred to above show how dangerous the independence of the Episcopate was felt to be by the advocates of Papal power. The power of the modern Papacy depends upon the subservience of the Bps., who are now only Papal vicars.

(5) E. gives a strong and executive force. So Dr. Briggs writes (Church Unity, p. 78): "The inefficiency of Protestantism is largely due to the neglect of the executive functions of the historical Episcopate." There is abundant evidence at the present day that now, as much as at any time, the different Christian Churches feel the need of such administrative authority.

The advocates of E. specially at the present day must not lose sight of the episcopal ideal which arises out of the definition with which we started. On the one side, E. means a bp. with independent authority, bound to act with his fellow bps., but free within the limits of Ch. order and tradition, and with free executive initiative within his diocese. On the other side, the bp. is the constitutional ruler. He represents the whole Ch., and he is bound to act in harmony with the other members of the ministry: all alike, bps., priests, deacons and laity, have their proper functions. This implies the following principles.

(i) The Presbyter has his due rights. The Bp. cannot act apart from the authority of the Synod of his diocese. The Synod has legislative power and shares in the judicial functions. In executive matters it has the right of being consulted. A due and proper recognition of the status of the Christian Presbyterian is part of any ideal of Episcopacy.

(ii) The Bp. must be directly or indirectly the representative of the Ch. as a whole. There can be no doubt that originally he was elected by the Ch., and this custom prevailed to a late date in some churches. The exact mode in which the Ch. should express its opinions may vary; but in idea at any rate the appointment of a bp. by the Ch., and therefore mainly by the laity, should always be recognised as right. The appointment in the case of an established Ch. by the Sovereign on the advice of his responsible ministers may be recognised as in many ways a wise means of securing lay appointment and that representative.

(iii) Not only the presbyters, but also the laity, should have a voice, and a definite voice, in the government alike of the parish and the diocese. We know nothing decisive of the organisation of the Ch. of Corinth in its primitive times, but it is its unity as a whole that St. Paul looks upon as exercising judicial and disciplinary functions. The parish priest is the chairman of the body of Ch. members, he has his own spiritual functions and duties derived from his appointment, but in administration he should act always with his laity and their representatives. The mediæval office of Churchwarden is historically a sign of this fact. In the diocese Cyprian always lays stress on the co-operation of the laity. The exact method in which the laity may exercise their functions may not yet be worked out, but the rule that gives their representatives a place by the side of, or within, the Ch. Synod is in essence right.

An attempt has been made to state the arguments for E. on the basis of both history and experience, and to put the ideal that

7. Conclusion. it represents in a balanced form.

It is represented that such a historical E. linking the Ch. at the present day with the past, supple, elastic, capable of adapting itself to varied circumstances, balancing authority and freedom, is, more than any other system of Ch. government, adapted to the needs of democratic civilisation and fitted to form the basis of Christian REUNION.

The ideal of E. as held by the Eng. Ch. is looked at from different points of view in the well-known works of Lightfoot,

8. Bibliography. Gore, Moberly, Wordsworth. The traditional rules of the Ch. may be studied in treatises on CANON LAW and Ch. polity, such as those of Van Espen, Morinus, and Pelliccia. While older controversialists after the Reformation maintained the wickedness of Prelacy, modern writers confine themselves rather to attacking its exclusive claims.—

A2.

A. C. HEADLAM.

EPISTLES.—The series of Es. in the PB is derived (in the main) from the
1. History of corresponding series in the Sar.
Epistle-Cycle. Missal (see GOSPEL). It is generally believed that until the 5th cent. there were three lessons in the Roman Mass—a lesson from the OT as well as lessons from the Es. and Gospels: but, since about that time, these lessons have been (except on a few occasions) reduced to two—the first from OT, Rev., Acts or Es.; the second always from the Gospels. An OT lesson is used for all week-days in Lent, and a prophetic lesson (from OT or Rev.) on certain special days.¹ These lessons were selected: (1) for holy-days; (2) for all week-days in Lent (except for Thursdays, the masses for which are a later and clumsy addition), probably in connection with the preparation of catechumens for Bapt.; (3) for ordinary Sundays per annum. Such great festivals as Easter and Christmas (and, outside Rome, Epiph.) had Vigils, i.e., the service began in the evening and was kept up through the night. This service consisted of a long series of lessons with accompanying chants and Colls., ending with the E. and Gospel, and followed by the Missa fidelium in the early morning. This was the original "mass of the festival," and no later mass followed: but it was soon found necessary to add a later mass for the sake of the people who did not sit up all night: and, subsequently, this later mass came to be accounted the principal mass of the day, and so displaced the original mass of the festival from its proper position and importance. The same is true of the Ember Sundays, which also had Vigils: the later mass of these Sundays was not the original mass, and the lessons of the later mass were not the original lessons for the day.

The Es. (and Gospels) in the PB are founded upon those of the Sar. Missal: but certain changes were made in them for the first PB, and a few more subsequently (see GOSPEL).

The passages assigned to special holy-days or seasons were selected with appropriate reference to the day or season, but those for ordinary Sundays "per annum," i.e., after Epiph. and after Pentecost, were at first marked simply "colidiana" in MSS. of the NT, and were subsequently arranged in series for these Sundays. It must, however, be remembered that the earlier plan was not to number the Sundays after Pentecost in the present manner from I to XXV: in the older Lectionaries we find such a numeration as Sundays I to V "after Pentecost"; Sundays I to V "after the festival of the Apostles" (i.e., St. Peter and St. Paul); Sundays I to V "after St. Lawrence"; Sundays I and II "of September"; Sundays I to VI "after Michaelmas," or Sundays I to VIII "after St. Cyprian"; and, instead of Sundays in Adv., Sundays IV to I "before the Nativity." These Es. for ordinary Sundays have been preserved practically unaltered in our PB. In Eastertide, as also for a few Sundays after Trin., the Es. are taken from the Catholic Es. Then is commenced a series of passages from the Es. of St. Paul in the order of the books of the NT. These are read in order from the 6th Sunday after Trin. till the Sunday before Adv. (with the exception of one Sunday); but somewhat oddly a set of four Es. has been taken out of them

¹ From the above it will be seen that, when a lesson from some other book is read instead of from an E., it ought to be denominated by the term "The Lesson" instead of by the very awkward periphrasis of "The portion of Scripture appointed for the E."

(Nos. 4-7) for the first four Sundays after Epiph.; and the E. now assigned to the 5th Sunday after Epiph. (but which may come either after Epiph. or at the end of the Trin. series) is the last of the series and therefore really the E. for the 25th Sunday after Trin. (Our E. and Gospel for the 6th Sunday after Epiph. were added in 1662, but are not taken from any ancient Lectionary.)

The Es. for Saints' days are mostly from the Sar. Missal, though in several cases from the "Common" of Apostles or Evangelists. In some instances a more suitable passage was selected, e.g., St. John Ev., St. Philip and St. James, St. Barnabas, St. John Bapt., St. James, St. Michael, St. Luke, St. Simon and St. Jude. (For Ceremonial of E. and Bibliography of ancient E.-cycles, see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE, § 6, 7.—G. W. C. BISHOP.

EPISTLER (EPISTOLER).—See GOSPELLER.

ERASTIAN.—See PARLIAMENT, AUTHORITY OF.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—The discussion of Ch. problems has been much confused by the inaccurate use of technical terms.

1. Terms
Wrongly Used. Even Sir W. Anson writes: "The King is head of the Ch., not for the purpose of discharging any spiritual function, but because the Ch. is the national Ch." The fact that Sir W. Anson denies that the law and custom of the constitution ascribe spiritual functions to the Crown is important, but the denial could be hardly expressed in less felicitous terms. The "headship" of the Crown was asserted and defined by the Supremacy Act of 1534, though without the saving clause in which the clergy had accepted it in 1532. It was affirmed in the Arts. of Edward, repealed in Mary's Second Act of Repeal, which repeal was confirmed by 1 Eliz., c. 1, and the phrase was deliberately excluded from the 39 Arts. These Arts. correct Sir W. Anson at another point. They contain the phrase "national Ch." in its authoritative sense. "Every particular or national Ch. hath authority to change . . . ceremonies." If we substitute "particular" for "national" in the sentence quoted before, the argument is at once seen to be without point, for no one supposes that the King of Eng. possesses rights over the Ch. Universal or over the Gallican Ch. Elizabeth would have described Sir W. Anson as "slandrous" and as "a malicious person, deceiving the simple" (Admonition of 1559).

That writer has been guilty of no worse offence than an inaccuracy which may mislead. But Elizabeth's words would be by no means pointless if they were applied to a good deal that has been printed on the Ch. problem.

2. A "National Church." The phrase, "national Ch." has nothing at all to do with the question of the Church's relations to the State, e.g., with the question whether the former is coterminous with the latter in the sense described by Hooker (Ecc. Pol. viii, 12). Further, the conditions described by Hooker have entirely passed away. The proposition that every parishioner is in law deemed "a member of the Ch." was definitely rejected by the Courts in Baker v. Lee (House of Lords Cases, viii, p. 504), and is merely "a technical deduction from a former state of the law which could not or did not survive the Toleration Acts" (Lord Selborne, Defence, p. 196). No person is a member of the Ch. of Eng. who is unbaptised, excommunicate, or has by his language or conduct expressly or by necessary implication disclaimed Ch.-membership. The matter is discussed further in Church and Reform, p. 170. This paragraph strikes at the root of much that has been written on "the Establishment."

We now turn to some theories of the past. As Canon Henson says, "The post-Reformation doctrines of 'Establishment' have been attempts to provide a satisfactory theory to justify existing arrangements, the prime cause and explanation of which are purely historical" (Ch. Problems, p. 39). Warburton worked out a theory of "an Alliance of Church and State" which laid "an obligation on the State to defend and protect the Ch., and to provide a settled maintenance for its ministers." In return a grateful Ch. should be "most zealous for the service of civil government" (p. 86). Paley (Moral and Polit. Phil. 6 10) postulates three things in an establishment: a clergy, their limitation to a particular Ch., a legal provision for their maintenance. Coleridge (Constitution of Ch. and State, p. 63) argued on similar lines.

These theories are merely ingenious speculations which stand in hardly any intelligible relation to the facts and history of the Ch. of Eng. The climax of irrelevance is to be found in a speech of Burke who in 1772 resisted an attempt to relieve some of the clergy from subscription to the 39 Arts.: "The establishment is a tax laid by the same sovereign authority for the payment of those who . . . teach. . . . The hardship amounts to this, that the people of England are not taxed two shillings in the pound to pay them for teaching as Divine truths their own particular fancies."

Lord Selborne wrote: "The establishment of the Ch. by law consists essentially in the incorporation of the law of the Ch. into that of the nation . . . and in the enforcement of the sentences of those courts when duly pronounced according to law by the civil power" (Defence, p. 10). We are here at any rate in contact with facts. But as a definition of "establishment" the sentence is quite arbitrary.

No one would say that the Primitive Methodist Society of Ireland was established, yet its doctrines are set forth in the schedule of 34 & 35 Vict., c. 40, precisely in the same way as the PB is annexed to the Act of 1662, and are thus "incorporated into the general law of the land."

Bishop Collins in the Enc. Brit. (1911) took a more tenable position when he wrote (s.v.): "Perhaps the best general definition which can be given and which will cover all cases is, that establishment implies the existence of some definite and distinctive relation between the State and a religious society (or conceivably more than one) other than that

5. Bp. Collins. which it stands in to other societies of the same general character."

But there are several objections to the use of the phrase in this sense. (1) As the Bp. was careful to point out, every Act which touches the Ch. alters the conditions of its "establishment." (2) The legal status of the Nonconformist bodies is not in every instance the same.

At any rate, it is not true that "non-established" Churches are in point of view "voluntary associations just as cricket clubs,"

8. Analogy of Clubs. for cricket clubs have in most cases no existence in law, and a considerable amount of legislation gives privileges to Nonconformist religious bodies for which no parallel can be found in associations of this character even when they are registered under the Companies Acts, e.g., they can acquire sites for chapels, they are specially protected from disturbance, they are exempted from rates, and their ministers may marry or bury. If the status of the Ch. has shown a tendency to become assimilated to that of the Nonconformists (e.g., powers of Eccles. Comm., abolition of Church rates, revival of Convocations, rights of lay churchmen), there has been an assimilation on the other side.

We must just notice a not very tangible view which is expressed in various ways, but which suggests that the Ch. has secured political privileges, and in return consented to State control, and that the essence of establishment is to be discovered in this equipoise. It is difficult to discuss a conception so wholly unhistorical. Such plausibility as the hypothesis possesses is due to the presence of the Bps. in the House of Lords. But the writ of summons was for many centuries by no means regarded as a privilege. The matter belongs rather to the question of the constitution of the House of Lords than to the question of the relations of Ch. and State. Nor is there anything in the general relations of the Nonconformist bodies to the State which would be inconsistent with the passing of a law which permitted a writ summoning leaders of the Nonconformist ministry to the House of Lords.

Professor Brewer, in his Endowments and Est. of the Ch. of Eng. 2 182, 186, 187, applied the term "establishment" to the special status created by Tudor legislation. This use is inconvenient, for it implies that the Ch. was not established before the Reformation and is not established now. Brewer, of course, rejects the view that "establishment in this sense implies "privilege" (p. 181). Yet in a passage which is unintelligible, when read in terms of modern controversy, Abp. Whitgift assumes that toleration implies establishment and establishment privilege, but he means monopoly and is merely describing facts (Parker Soc. ed., 1 390).

8. Effect of Tudor Laws.

There is one strong objection which may be urged against all the explanations of the term "established" which have yet been mentioned. They are arbitrary and unauthoritative; yet in the discussions of constitutional questions it is important to use phrases in their legal sense if they happen to have one. Now Lord Mansfield, in Chamberlain of London v. Allen Edwards, laid it down as the law of Eng. that by the Toleration Act "the Dissenters' way of worship was not only rendered innocent and lawful, but was established: it was put under the protection of the law" (Life, p. 255). The Toleration Act had had the result anticipated by Parliament in 1663, when it petitioned Charles II against toleration on the ground that it would involve an "establishment of schism."

This use of the phrase in constitutional documents of importance prohibits us from accepting the definition suggested by Bp. Collins. We must content ourselves with a definition which connotes less and denotes more.

The establishment of a religious society is the recognition and protection of its proceedings by the State. The word conveys no suggestion as to the method by which the State recognises the society, whether, as in the case of the Church Army, it is as a limited liability company, or by special Acts such as those which define the status of Irish Primitive Methodists and the Ch. of Scotland, or by general Acts such as the "Dissenters' Chapels Act," or under a complex because ancient body of law such as that which defines the status of the Ch. of England.

Our discussion has not been a plea for any particular view of the relations of the Ch. with the State, but for the disuse of the arguments which assume the form, "The Church is established, therefore. . . ." To admit the validity of this method of handling the Ch. problem is to sign a blank cheque.

A few illustrations may be given as to the use of the word. Tudor Acts usually begin: "Let it be established and enacted." The State confirmed the Acts of the Ch. (see 11. Illustrative Examples. PARLIAMENT, AUTHORITY OF). Thus, in the 16th and 17th cents. the term is frequently applied to Ch. formularies, e.g., "I will now conform to the Liturgy of the Ch. of England as it is now by law established." The Act of 1571 says that the 39 Arts. are for "the establishing of consent." Derivatively the term is applied to the Ch. itself which is itself established in the establishing of its formularies (so first in canon 3 of 1604), and is so used in various Acts of Parliament, e.g., "the Protestant Reformed religion established by law" (Coronation Oath, 1 W. & M., c. 6).

William III, à propos of Toleration, said, "I do hope that the ease which you design to Dissenters will contribute very much to the establishment of the Ch." Defoe characterised his Shortest Way with Dissenters as "a proposal for the establishment of the Ch." In Coke and More's Life of Wesley (1792), "Mr. Wesley's great desire to remain in union with the Ch. of Eng. would not allow him to apply for a legal establishment (ii. 4 355).

10. Final Definition.

Digitized by Google

The questions of the Ch. establishment and its endowments are naturally connected in politics, because they arise from the same group of facts. But it is mere confusion of thought to regard the two problems as necessarily and logically connected.

Again, there is no relation of any kind between the question of establishment and a Coronation. A dissenting mayor goes to chapel on the first Sunday after his accession to office; the King to Westminster. The Coronation service requires no legal sanction and has no legal effect.

Disestablishment is the reverse process to establishment, and strictly means the withdrawal of the recognition of the State. If this process were carried through completely, Anglicanism would not necessarily become a religio illicita; it would simply not exist in the eyes of the law. It could not become the purpose of a trust, and brawling at an Anglican Service would no longer be a crime. But as a matter of fact, under a "Disestablishment" Act, the legal support given to the activities and decisions of the Ch. would not be reduced but extended. The consent of the Crown would not be essential to the validity of her canons, and there would be no appeal from her Courts to the Privy Council.

The effect of the Act for the Disestablishment of the Ch. of Ireland was as follows. (1) Every Eccles. Corporation sole or aggregate and every Cathedral Corporation was dissolved, compensation being given for the vested interests of individuals. (2) All Ch. property was vested in Commissioners for use for secular purposes. (3) Power was given to create a Corporation, the Ch. Representative body, to hold and manage property for the Ch. (4) Churches in use at the passing of the Act were conveyed to the Ch. Representative body with their burial grounds. (5) Upon payment to the Commissioners any see or glebe house with garden might be vested in the Ch. Representative body with thirty acres in the case of a see house and ten acres in case of a glebe house upon payment of a sum determined by arbitration. (6) In lieu of private endowments £500,000 were paid to the Ch. Representative body. (7) The clergy received annuities equal to their net income, upon the condition that they remained at their posts. If three-fourths of the clergy commuted, the Commissioners were authorised to add a bonus of 12 p.c. The Ch. received £7,581,471 charged with annuities amounting to £596,651.—AI, A2. H. J. BARDSLEY.

12. Dis-establishment.

14. Irish Experience.

ETERNAL LIFE.—Life, absolutely, in the Johannine sense of existence akin to the divine, shared with God by the faithful in Christ, hardly appears in the PB. "Predestination to Life," according to Art. 17, "is the everlasting purpose of God," and the believer in Jesus "shall live, though he die" (Burial). Life, however, occurs frequently with the attribute "eternal" or "everlasting." It consists in the knowledge of God (MP Coll. ³), yet progress is made on the way towards it (SS. Ph. and Ja.) through heavenly wisdom (VS), and dying with Christ is the door of entrance thereto (VS Exh.). It is a blessing sought for the baptised (Bapt.), and it is the hope of the mourner (Burial). It is given by God (Bapt., Chrys.), as it is "offered" through Christ (Art. 7), Who has "restored" it to us by His resurrection (Easter Pref.); on the other hand, it is finally attained (HC, Confirm., Bapt. ^{1, 2}, Matrim., Access.) or inherited (6 Epiph., Bapt. ³) in divine strength (HC Abs. Exh. ³), for only through God's mercy can men be "everlastingly rewarded" (Bapt. ^{1, 2}).

Of this everlasting life the risen Lord is the author (Ord. ³) as well as restorer, and the gate to it He has opened (Easter). It is, briefly, the final glorious state of the faithful (Ap. Cr., QV) with Christ and with God (VS Exh. ³ Pr. ³), to which they pray to attain corporately as the Church (St. John), and for preservation unto which sacramental food sustains the individual soul (HC Adm.); to the hope of such a consummation Christians must therefore hold fast (2 Adv.).

Of the various expressions synonymous with EL. in the language of PB worship, "thy (thine) ev. kingdom" is most often used, and with similar phraseology. Prayer is made for the bringing of men into that kingdom (R. Fam., Access.) and for the receiving of the soul into it by God (VS). Of such, communicants are assured that they "are heirs through hope" (HC Th.), and the true end of the baptised is to become inheritors or partakers thereof (Bapt., Matrim.). To this kingdom baptised and confirmed finally "come" (Bapt. ^{1, 2}, Confirm.), while in parabolic language the blessed "receive" it "in the last day" (Burial). Thus EL. and the km. come to be related together as a gift (Bapt.), and the latter is the sphere of the former (6 Epiph.).

2. Other Phrases.

Occasionally this L. is designated joy to which men may come or attain (MEP Abs., King) or into which they may be received (Ord. ³).

Again, the characteristic of EL. is glory (Access.) and that everlasting (Churching), and the sharing thereof is in apostolic figure as the receiving of a crown (St. Pet., Ord. ³): it is a "glorious km." of which the saints take possession (Comm.).

In view of the Incarnation, EL. may be called ev. salvation, for which right belief is said to be needful (QV), and that tested by Scripture (Ord. ³). Salvation likewise is spoken of as inherited (Bapt.), and attained (Coll. ¹ aft. HC) by divine assistance.

Further, it is the coming age with which the state of bliss is identified, the life of the righteous with God, as "the life to come" (Churching) or "the life of the world to come" (Nic. Cr.). That world, like the km. of heaven, is the sphere not only of life (Comm., Access.) but also of glory (Churching).

Life then, with the various epithets applied to it, is the state of the faithful beyond or "after this life," conceived throughout the

3. Review. PB as belonging to the future: this is in line with the Synoptic Gospels. Life, as something possessed now, as a present state in the manner of the teaching of the Fourth Gospel and of St. Paul, is a notion that does not find expression in the PB save for the phrases derived from Jn. 17 ³, identifying it with the knowledge of God (MP Coll. ⁴, SS. Ph. and Ja.). Accordingly, there is a certain one-sidedness in the PB use of this great idea, as contrasted with the NT as a whole: this has reacted upon the language of popular devotion. Moreover the individualistic aspect is predominant.

It is hardly to be doubted that a literal resurrection of the identical physical body to EL. is assumed in the formularies, nor should it be expected to be otherwise, although the knowledge of later days that the body is resolved into its elements has rendered that belief untenable to the modern mind, and for the thoughtful Christian the vivid traditional realism has to give way before a more ethical and spiritual symbolism.

However human attempts at the description of EL. may vary, being largely speculative, the conditions attached to participation in that life by the teaching of Jesus abide: salvation is indissolubly linked with character.—K2.

E. W. WINSTANLEY.

EUCCHARIST.—See COMMUNION (HOLY), LORD'S SUPPER.

EUCCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.

Our Lord Jesus Christ at the last Supper instituted the Sacr. of HC with the words, "Do this in remembrance of me."

1. The Problem.

Two questions at once arise. (A) What did our Lord intend to be done, when he gave this command? In other words, How are the elements to be blessed (consecrated)? (B) When we have consecrated the elements, what is the result? Great attention has been paid to (B), and many controversies have arisen about it. But (A), which is quite as practical as (B), if not more so, has been greatly neglected. The present art. treats of (A); for (B) see LORD'S SUPPER.

Five answers have been given to question (A).

(a) The elements are consecrated by the priest saying a Prayer of Blessing (Invocation, Epiclesis)¹ over them. (b) The elements are consecrated by the priest saying over them our Lord's Words of Institution, "This is my body," "This is my blood," etc. (ab) It is possible to combine these two answers, and hold that both Prayer and the Words of Institution are necessary. (c) The elements are consecrated by the Euch. Thanksgiving. This answer may be set aside at once. For the words our Lord used contained something more than mere thanksgiving, viz., blessing (Mark 14 22, Matt. 26 26); and 1 Cor. 10 16 makes it clear that the blessing was not merely a blessing of God, but a blessing of the elements. Hence, since the only way Christians can bless is by Prayer, (c) is only another form of (a). (d) The elements are consecrated by the repetition of the Lord's Prayer. This answer (suggested by Gregory the Great) seems to be negatived by the great probability that the Lord's Pr., though early introduced into the

¹ With regard to the distinction between a Prayer (εὐχή) and an Invocation (ἐπικλήσις), the latter word is much stronger than the former, and signifies a solemn and formal appeal to God for his presence and help. Hence, even if the Euch. Invocation contained the words of Institution, the stress would lie, not on them, but on the direct appeal to God.

Euch. Service (in Africa bef. 315, at Jerusalem bef. 348), did not originally form part of it.

Thus we have only Answers (a), (b) and (ab) to consider. And we shall consider them under the four heads of: (I) the NT; (II) the Fathers of the first four cents., later than which it will be needless to go; (III) the Liturgies; (IV) the Church Orders and apocryphal Acts.

(I) In all the four NT accounts of the Institution of HC our Lord is represented as having given thanks over (or blessed) the

3. The NT. bread and cup, and then given them to the disciples, saying, as he gave them, the Words of Institution. In one of the two primary accounts (Mark 14 24) the Words of Institution are stated, in the case of the cup, to have been actually spoken after the disciples had communicated. Thus the NT accounts of the Last Supper represent the consecration as effected by the Thanksgiving or Blessing, the words of which are not recorded, but which we naturally conclude took the form of a prayer asking for God's blessing. The Words of Institution were used, not at the Consecration, but at the Administration, and were not consecratory, but declaratory of what the elements had become by virtue of the blessing pronounced over them. This conclusion is confirmed by the only other certain reference to EC. in the NT, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ?" (1 Cor. 10 16). Hence all the indications in the NT are in favour of (a) and against (b).

(II) We now come to the Fathers. (1) Justin Martyr (c. 155) speaks of the Euch. as the "food

4. Fathers of the 2nd and 3rd Centuries. which is consecrated by the prayer of the word which is from him¹ (ἡν δὲ εὐχὴς λόγου τοῦ παρ' αὐτοῦ εὐχαριστήσας τροφήν"—1 Apol.

66). This is consistent with (a) but not with (b). (2) Irenaeus (c. 185) once (Contr. Haeres. iv. 18 5) speaks of the elements being consecrated by the "Invocation of God," and twice (ib. v. 23, bis) by the "word of God." The meaning of the former expression is quite clear, of the latter not so clear. But a comparison of the passages shows that he uses exactly the same language of both: "bread receiving the Invocation of God is no longer common bread, but the Eucharist (ἄρτος προσλαμβάνόμενος τὴν ἐπίκλησιν τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκέτι κοινὸς ἄρτος ἐστίν, ἀλλ' εὐχαριστία);" the elements "receiving the word of God become the Eucharist (προσλαμβάνόμενα τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ εὐχαριστία γίνονται)." This at once raises a suspicion that the "word of God" and the "Invocation of God" here mean exactly the same thing. And the suspicion becomes a practical certainty when we find Irenaeus in a third place (ib. i, 13 2) combining the two phrases and speaking of the elements being consecrated by the "word of the Invocation." Thus we see that Irenaeus, like Justin, witnesses for (a). On account of its importance we give this last passage in full. Marcus, the heretic, "pretended to consecrate cups mixed with wine, and protracted to an unusual length the word of the Invocation (ποτήρια ὡς κεκραμένα προσποιούμενος εὐχαριστεῖν, καὶ ἐπὶ πλεόν ἔκτεινον τὸν λόγον τῆς ἐκκλησίας)." This passage proves that the Euch. Invocation was in use, both among Catholics and heretics, soon after the middle of the 2nd cent., and shows the great likelihood of its being of sub-apostolic, if not apostolic, origin.¹ (3) Clement of Alexandria (c. 200—Paedag. ii. 2 32) says that Christ "blessed the wine, saying (εὐλόγησέν γε τὸν οἶνον εἰπών), Take, drink, this is my blood." (4) Tertullian (c. 210—Adv. Marcion. 4 40) likewise says that Christ "made the bread which he took and distributed to the disciples his body by saying, This is my body (acceptum panem et distributum discipulis corpus suum illum fecit, Hoc est corpus meum, dicendo)." These two passages have been quoted in favour of (b). This conclusion may well be questioned. But it is needless to argue the point here, because, whatever their exact meaning, they refer to the last Supper, and not to the Euch. of the Church. And it is by no means safe to argue too strictly from the one to the other. (5) Hippolytus (c. 230) in his Philosophumena (639) adopts Irenæus' language and speaks of the Euch. being consecrated by "the word of the Invocation," thus adding his witness in favour of (a). (6) Origen (c. 240) mentions EC in three places. In (a) he speaks of the Euch. Thanksgiving and Prayer, and describes the bread of the Euch. as "loaves . . . which become by means of the Prayer (διὰ τῆν εὐχὴν) a certain holy body" (Contr. Cels. 8 33). In (b) he calls the Eucharistic bread "loaves on which has been invoked (ἐκκεκλησται) the name of God and of Christ and of the Holy Ghost" (in 1 Cor. 7 5). In (γ) (Comm. in Matt. 11 14) Origen thrice applies to the Euch. St. Paul's words, "it is sanctified through the word of God and prayer" (1 Tim. 4 5). Then he proceeds to ascribe the efficacy to the "prayer which was made over it (τὴν ἐπιγενομένην αὐτῷ εὐχὴν)." And in the same breath he goes on to say, "It is not the substance of the bread, but the word which has been said over it (δὲ ἐπ' αὐτῷ εἰρημένος λόγος), which benefits" the worthy communicant. This shows that by the "word of God" Origen does not mean the 2nd Person of the Trinity, but the Prayer of Consecration, or some part of it, possibly the Words of Institution. Hence he adopts (a), or possibly (ab). (7) Firmilian, Bp. of Caesarea in Cappadocia, in a letter written in 256 to Cyprian, mentions a female fanatic who, about twenty-two years bef., had set up herself for a prophetess, and among other things "pretended to hallow bread and consecrate (facere) the Euch. with an Invocation by no means to be despised (invocatione non contemptibili)"—Cyprian, Ep. 75 10. Here again we have (a).

¹ I.e., presumably, "from Christ." For: (a) "Jesus Christ our Saviour" is the last Person named. (b) "Christ," and not "God," is the subject of the whole paragraph, "God" being barely mentioned. (c) Justin seems to have expressly chosen the wording "λόγου τοῦ παρ' αὐτοῦ" to distinguish the word of Christ from the λόγου Θεοῦ, the "Word of God" named just before. It is possible he is here thinking of the Words of Institution, and, if so, he is a witness for (ab).

In passing on to the Fathers of the 4th cent. we shall have to be content with the more important passages only. (8) Cyril of Jerusalem, in his Mystagogic Lectures (delivered in 347 or 348), speaks thrice of EC. In the first place (Cal. Myst. 1 7) he attributes it to the Invocation of the Trinity; in the other two (ib. 3 3, 5 7) to the Invocation of the Holy Ghost. It will suffice to give the second of the three passages: "The bread of the Euch., after the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, is no longer mere bread, but the body of Christ (δὲ ἅρτος τῆς εὐχαριστίας, μετὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος, οὐκ ἔτι ἅρτος λιτὸς, ἀλλὰ σῶμα Χριστοῦ)." Thus Cyril affirms (a) in the very strongest manner. A passage purporting to come from (9) Athanasius (c. 350) is given by Gummey, Consecration of the Eucharist (p. 251), and Edmund Bishop, Moment of Consecration (p. 156). But the passage only occurs as a quotation in a sermon attributed to Eutychius (Patriarch of Constantinople, 552-582), which sermon again is only known from extracts given in the 11th century Calena of Nicetas on St. Luke. With such manifold chances of error, its genuineness cannot be relied on. (10) Basil, Bp. of Caesarea in Cappadocia (c. 375), in his work On the Holy Ghost (27 66) has a very important passage which we must quote in full. "Which of the saints left to us in writing the words of the Invocation (τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ῥήματα) at the Consecration (ἀναδέξει) of the bread of the Euch. and the cup of blessing? For we are not content with what the apostle or the gospel mentioned, but in addition we prefix and append other things which we have received from unwritten tradition and believe to have great power with regard to the Sacrament." This is, we believe, the first certain reference to the use in the Euch. service of the narrative and Words of Institution, for such is of course the meaning of "what the apostle or the gospel mentioned." And, as he is here speaking of customs resting on tradition, we may take his words as evidence, not merely for the generation in which he lived, but for one or two generations earlier. But, as he is careful to say that EC. does not depend on these alone, and as he expressly calls the whole Prayer an Invocation, it becomes clear he believed both necessary, and adopted (ab). Basil's Funeral Oration was pronounced in 379 by his brother (11) Gregory of Nyssa. And in it Gregory (a) says, "The priesthood of the teacher imitates the dark symbols (αἰνύματα) of the priesthood of the prophet (Elijah), drawing down by threefold summons (διὰ τοῦ τρισσεύειν) in the word of faith the heavenly fire to the sacred rites. For we are frequently taught by Scripture that the power of the Holy Ghost is called fire" (In Laud. frat. Basil.). By "the teacher" Gregory means, primarily, Basil, and hence Gregory's words seem to prove that Basil, too, invoked the Holy Ghost in EC. Two other passages of Gregory's must be mentioned. (β) In his Sermon on the Bapt. of Christ he says, "The bread again is up to this point common bread, but when the sacramental action consecrates (τὸ μυστήριον λειτουργήσῃ) it, it is called and becomes the body of Christ; thus also the sacramental (μυστικόν) oil, thus the wine, are things of little worth before the blessing, but after the sanctification bestowed by the Spirit (τὸν ἁγίασμα τοῦ Πνεύματος) each of them possesses excellent power (ἐνεργεῖ διαφόρως)." (γ) In his Oratio Catechetica (37), like Origen, he applies to the Euch. St. Paul's words, "it is sanctified through the word of God and prayer" (1 Tim. 4 5). Thus Gregory of Nyssa bears witness to the custom of invoking the Holy Ghost on the elements, and must be reckoned among the supporters of (a), or, possibly, from passage (γ), of (ab). (12) Chrysostom (Antioch, c. 385) knows of the Invocation of the Holy Ghost in HC, and mentions it at least five times in his writings (De Sacerd. 3 4, 6 4; De Coemeter. Appel. 3; De Pentecost. 1 4; Hom. in Joan. 45). It will suffice to quote two of these: "The priest stands before the table, lifting up his hands to heaven, calling the Holy Ghost to come down and touch the elements" (De Coemeter. Appel.); The Bishop "calls (καλεῖ) the Holy Ghost and consummates the most dread sacrifice" (De Sacerd. 6 4). Chrysostom knows too that the Words of Institution were repeated by the priest. In his 2nd Hom. on 2 Tim. he is speaking of the eternal oneness of the Euch., and among other proofs of it he says, "As the words which God uttered are the same as those which the priest even now says, so also the offering is the same." But he does not attribute EC. to their use. Two passages, however, from his two Hom. on the Treachery of Judas have often been cited to the contrary. They are almost verbally the same, and it will therefore suffice to quote one of them. "The priest stands fulfilling his part, uttering those words. But the power and grace are God's. 'This is my body,' he says.¹ This word transmutes the elements. And as that word which says 'Increase and multiply and fill the earth' was spoken once for all, but becomes effective through all time, strengthening our nature to the procreation of children; so the former word, said once for all, makes the sacrifice complete at every table in the churches from that time till to-day and till his coming" (De Prod. Jud. 16). This last sentence makes it certain that Chrysostom is referring, not to the repetition of the Words of Institution by the priest, but to their original utterance at the last Supper, as authorising and rendering effectual every Euch. since. Hence Chrysostom must be ranked among the supporters of (a). (13) Paer, Bp. of Alexandria, in a letter written in 373 (apud Theodoret, HE iv. 22 7) speaks of "the altar where we invoke (ἐπικαλούμεθα) the descent of the Holy Ghost." (14) Theophilus, Bp. of Alexandria, in his Paschal Epistle for 402 (written, of course, in 401, and translated into Lat. by Jerome), accuses Origen of not believing that "the bread of the Lord . . . and the sacred cup which are placed on the table of the church . . . are sanctified by the Invocation and coming of the Holy Ghost (per invocationem et adventum Sancti Spiritus sanctificari"—Jerome, Ep. 98 13). (15) Jerome himself (c. 400) says of presbyters that "by their prayers the body and blood of Christ are consecrated" (Ep. 146 1, ad Evangelium). (16) Optatus (c. 370), Bp. of Milevis in Numidia, speaks of "the altars . . . where, in answer to prayer (postulatus), the Holy Ghost has descended" (De Schism. Donat. 61). The testimony of (17) Ambrose, Bp. of Milan c. 380, is ambiguous (the work De Sacramentis is not his, and probably belongs to the 5th cent.). Ambrose knows of the Invocation of the Holy Ghost ("he is invoked in the offerings"—De Spir. Sanct. iii. 16 12). He knows also that the elements are consecrated "by the mystery of sacred prayer" (De Fide iv. 10 124). So also he speaks of the "blessing" (benedictio) as consecrating (De Mysteriis 9 50). But, a little later (9 52) in the same work, he says, "What do we say of the divine consecration itself, where the words (verba) themselves of the Lord and Saviour operate? For that Sacrament which thou receivest is consecrated by the saying (sermone) of Christ." Again in 9 54: "The Lord Jesus himself cries, This is my body. Before the blessing of the heavenly words one kind of thing is named; after the consecration, a body is signified. He himself speaks of his blood. Before consecration it is called one thing, after consecration it is named blood." Again, in De Ben. Patr. 9 38, Christ "gave this bread to the disciples that they might divide it to the people of believers. And to-day he gives us that which he himself daily as priest consecrates by his own words." It is somewhat difficult to decide whether Ambrose, like Chrysostom, attributes EC. to the effect of Christ's words spoken once for all at the last Supper, or whether he is speaking of them as repeated at every celebration. In any case, however, he considers prayer necessary for Consecration. And therefore he may be classed among the supporters of (ab). A careful examination of what (18) Ephrem Syrus (c. 360) says about EC.

¹ Contr. Haeres. iv. 17 5 might be cited as proof that Irenæus believed the Words of Institution formed part of our Lord's Thanksgiving (though he does not attribute Consecr. to them). But in v. 33 1 he distinctly says they were spoken aft. the Thanksgiving, when the disciples had communicated.

¹ Or 'it (i.e., Scripture) says'; cp. 1 Cor. 6 16, Heb. 8 5.

in his genuine works is greatly needed. Professor Burkitt informs me that the genuineness of all three passages quoted as from him by Gummey (pp. 263-4) is highly doubtful. It would appear, however, that Ephrem sometimes speaks of the Euch. elements almost as if they were changed into the Third Person of the Trinity (see Edmund Bishop, Moment of Consecration, pp. 147-9). Such expressions, for which Scripture gives no warrant, would seem to imply familiarity on his part with the Invocation of the Holy Ghost.

We are now in a position to review the Patristic evidence. We have considered eighteen Fathers of the first four centuries. Of these, three (Clement Alex., Tertullian, Athanasius) have given us no reliable testimony as to EC.

in the Church. Ephrem Syrus, probably, and the remaining fourteen without exception adopt (a), and attribute EC. to prayer, all but two (Justin, Jerome) describing that prayer as an Invocation. Three only, and these among the latest (Basil, Chrysostom, Ambrose), mention the repetition at the Euch. of the Words of Institution. And of these only two (Basil, Ambrose) consider them necessary, in addition to prayer (ab); though it is possible Justin, Origen and Gregory of Nyssa held the same opinion. Not a single one of our authorities adopts (b).

(III) From the Fathers we pass to the Liturgies. No extant Liturgy can be assigned to an earlier date than the 4th century. But at any rate two (Sarapion's and the Clementine) may be dated about 350 and 375 respectively. By the 5th cent. the six main types of Liturgy (see COMMUNION, HOLY, § 2-6) were fully established, and the principal Liturgies of each type were in existence. And, although these latter have undergone great changes since in some respects, there is reason to believe that the priest's public prs. in the central portion (from the Sursum Corda to the Lord's Pr.), which includes the Consecr., remain almost unaltered. The Consecr. is practically always on the same plan. First, the priest recites the Narrative and Words of Institution. Next, he makes a Memorial of Christ's death and resurrection. And last, he invokes the Holy Ghost to descend and bless the elements for the benefit of the communicants. The rationale of this is quite clear. The narrative of Institution is given as the authority under which the priest is acting. The Memorial is a fulfilment of Christ's command, "Do this in remembrance of me." And, man having now done his part, God is asked to bless man's obedience by consecrating the elements in the only way they can be consecrated—by the Holy Ghost (cp. Rom. 15 16). Nothing could be more logical or Scriptural. It is obvious that the Liturgies, by adopting this method of EC., throw the main stress on the Invocation, even if the Words of Institution be likewise considered essential. That is, they favour (a) or (ab), but are irreconcilable with (b).

A few special Liturgies have peculiarities, but there is one only which needs mention here—the Roman (for text, see CANON OF LITURGY, § 2). The Roman Canon contains two Invocations¹ or quasi-Invocations, one bef. and one aft. the Words of Institution. The latter departs widely from the normal type. It contains no mention of the Holy Ghost, and no pr. for ¹ So likewise St. Mark, Sarapion, and possibly the Liturgy in the Oxford Papyrus (for text of which see Cabrol, D.A.C. art. Canon, 2 1891-2), though its fragmentary condition forbids certainty on the point.

Consecr. of the elements. Instead, God is asked to "command them to be borne by the hands of thy holy angel to thy altar on high in the sight of thy divine majesty." But five things must be noted. (a) This Pr. occupies the exact position of the Invocation in other Liturgies. (b) As in other Liturgies it ends with petition for the spiritual benefit of the communicants. (c) Not till it has been said are the elements called the body and blood of Christ. (d) The old Roman Benedictio Fontis has in part been modelled on a consecratory prayer of the normal type; this gives reason to suspect that originally the Roman Liturgy contained an express Invocation of the Holy Ghost (see W. C. Bishop, Primitive Form of Consecration). (e) The following fragment of Pope Gelasius (c. 495), Epistle to Elpidius (if genuine or Roman), settles the point: "How will the heavenly Spirit come to the consecration of the divine mystery in answer to invocation (invocatus), if the priest, even the man who beseeches him to be present (qui eum adesse deprecatur), be rejected as full of wicked deeds?" (Migne, PL 59 113).

(IV) We now come to the Church Orders and apocryphal Acts of Apostles. Of the Church Orders

8. Church Orders and Apocryphal Acts.

the Didache (9, 10) gives formulæ for a service connected with a meal of bread and wine expressly called the "Eucharist." But at that early date (c. 100-120), while Christian terminology was still in a fluid condition, the word Eucharist (Thanksgiving) might easily be used to denote the Agape, or any religious meal over which a solemn Thanksgiving was made. And there are features in the description which do not seem to square with what we read about the Euch. in the NT or elsewhere. It is to be noted, too, that the formulæ given close as follows:—"Hosanna to the Son of David. If any man is holy let him come (ἐλθὶς ἅγιος τὸν ἐρχόμενον). If any man is not (holy) let him repent. Maranatha. Amen." And the writer immediately adds:—"And permit the prophets to give thanks as much as they wish." This certainly looks as if the solemn Euch. service, conducted by the prophets, were to follow, and the one already described were merely the Agape. If this be so, the Didache gives no information with regard to EC. Of other formulæ in the Church Orders we can only mention the Pr. of Consecr. in the Latin and Ethiopic versions of what Woolley (Liturgy of the Primitive Church) calls the First Church Order (the Coptic version does not contain it, but Woolley, pp. 10, 84, gives reasons for believing it was originally there also). This seems to be the earliest of all the Euch. forms in the Church Orders, and those in the Apost. Constit. (Clementine Liturgy) appear to be later (see Maclean, Ancient Ch. Orders, pp. 49 ff.; Brightman, Eastern Liturgies, pp. xxxiii ff.); if so, it must be as old as the middle of the 4th cent. and may be still older. The Consecr. is of the normal type, though the Invocation is not so fully developed as in Cyril of Jerusalem.

The apocryphal Acts of John (2nd cent. ?) and Acts of Thomas (3rd cent. ?) contain five accounts (Woolley, pp. 138-147) of Euchs. purporting to have been celebrated by St. John or St. Thomas. It is not clear whether the whole of the prs. used are intended to be given, or merely some specially edifying parts; hence negative inferences can only be drawn with caution. None of them makes any mention of the Institution, but two (in the Acts of Thomas) have Invocations, one (Woolley, p. 141) of both Jesus and the Holy Ghost, the other (Woolley, p. 145) of Jesus only.

We have now examined the NT, the early Fathers, the Liturgies, and the Church Orders, and have found them in complete harmony with each other. The conclusions they establish are the following. (i) The Words of Institution are not the form of EC. (ii) It is doubtful whether they are even necessary to Consecr., though they may be. (iii) The true Form of EC. is Prayer for God's blessing on the elements. (iv) This Prayer ought to be an Invocation, as it has been ever since the middle of the 2nd cent., and probably earlier. (v) The Invocation ought to follow, and not precede, the Words of Institution.

9. Results Arrived At.

One important point remains yet to be considered—the nature of the Invocation. We have seen that in the latter part of the 4th cent. it was usual to invoke the Holy Ghost. It has been questioned (Edmund Bishop, Moment of Consecration, p. 138) whether such an Invocation can be "earlier than the 4th cent., and (as concerns a wider diffusion) the second half of that century." Let us look at the facts.

(i) The custom in question was widespread by the year 380. Cyril (8) is witness for Palestine, Chrysostom (12) for Antioch, Gregory of Nyssa (11) for Asia Minor, Peter (13) for Alexandria, Optatus (16) for Africa, Ambrose (17) for Italy. The natural inference from this is that it was no new introduction, and the burden of proof lies on those who affirm the contrary. (ii) Had it been a new introduction, some of our witnesses would most likely have dropped some hint to that effect. No such hint exists. (iii) On the contrary several of the Fathers imply it was a well-established custom when they wrote. Our earliest authority, (8) Cyril of Jerusalem (348), uses it as an undisputed datum from which to reason and prove other things not so certain (Cat. Myst. 1. 7, 33). Optatus (16) is addressing the Donatists; and his words lose their force unless the Donatists (who refused to adopt anything from the Catholics) too practised the rites he mentions. Gregory of Nyssa (11) implies that his brother Basil (10) invoked the Holy Ghost at the Euch.; and Basil regards the words of the Invocation as fixed by unwritten tradition. Theophilus of Alexandria (14) believed the Invocation of the Holy Ghost to be as old as Origen's days, a cent. and a half earlier. The cumulative force of this evidence seems to us to prove that the Invocation of the Holy Ghost was no recent introduction, but a well-established custom of the Church long before 380. And, if this be so, it follows that it was not a result of the Pneumatomachian controversy which began c. 360, as indeed the mention of it in Cyril of Jerusalem (8), some twelve years before, would of itself suffice to prove. It is true that the Cappadocian Fathers (Basil and the two Gregories) and Didymus of Alexandria say nothing of it in their writings on the Holy Ghost. But, as we have seen, this silence could not, with the Cappadocian Fathers (11), proceed from ignorance. Nor could it in the case of Didymus, who must have heard the Invocation of the Holy Ghost every time he was present when his Bp., Peter (13), celebrated. Indeed the Invocation was of little use for their purpose. It was not expressly mentioned in Scripture, and their main arguments were taken from Scripture. And it did not prove their point—the consubstantiality of the Holy Ghost. This, on the contrary, followed directly from the Bapt. formula (which was moreover given in Scripture), and from the traditional Creed (which was used publicly only in connection with Baptism).

We must say a word about Sarapion's Liturgy (c. 350), which invokes in EC., not the Holy Ghost, but the Word, the 2nd Person of the Trinity. Passages (Edmund Bishop, Moment of Consecration, p. 155 ff.) have been cited from seven Fathers (Justin, Irenæus, Clement Alex., Origen, Athanasius, the two Gregories) as seeming to support Sarapion's manner of Invocation. We have already examined the quotations from (1) Justin, (2) Irenæus, and (6) Origen, and found that the "word" they speak of in connection with EC. is not the 2nd Person of the Trinity, but the consecratory Prayer, or some part of it. Hence they give no real support to Sarapion. Nor does (11) Gregory of Nyssa. He speaks of "the bread hallowed by the word of God (τῷ λόγῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ)" being "changed into the body of God the Word (τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγῳ)"—Orat. Cat. 37). Here the change of phrase seems used intentionally to distinguish the word that consecrates from the Divine Word; and, if so, Gregory of Nyssa too gives Sarapion no support. As we have seen, the genuineness of the passage quoted from (9) Athanasius cannot be relied on. The remaining two quotations (from Clement Alex. and Gregory of Nazianzus) are very brief (five words each) and vague, and the former seems to have no reference whatever to the Form or Act of Consecration. Hence, so far as our evidence goes, Sarapion's Invocation stands by itself, and may well be only a local or personal peculiarity. It shows that the Invocation of the Holy Ghost was not universal in the 4th cent., but it shows nothing more.

But can we trace the Invocation of the Holy Ghost to a date earlier than the 4th century? Not with certainty. But may not (6) Origen's words where he speaks of "the name of God and of Christ and of the Holy Ghost" being "invoked" over the elements imply that, in his time (c. 240), the 3rd Person of the Trinity filled an important place in the Consecr. Prayer? And may not (1) Justin's words describing that Pr. (together with the whole Euch. Thanksgiving) as addressed by "the president" to "the Father of the universe, through the name of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" (1 Apol. 65), imply the same for the 2nd century?

Thus the general conclusions to which this latter investigation leads us are the following. (i) The mention of the Holy Ghost in the Euch. Invocation was the normal usage in the 4th century. (ii) It is probably older, possibly much older. (iii) It is probably not absolutely essential to EC. (absence of definite mention in NT, Sarapion's Liturgy, etc.), though highly desirable.

The Eastern Church has always held and still holds that EC. is effected through the Invocation, either by itself (a), or in conjunction with the Words of Institution (ab). For evidence it will suffice to quote the oath taken by Russian Bps. at their Consecr.: "I believe and hold that in the Divine Liturgy the Consecr. of the Body and Blood of Christ is accomplished . . . by the overshadowing and operation of the Holy Ghost, through the episcopal or priestly Invocation" (the original may be seen in Gummey, p. 323).

In the West, as in the East, EC. was, as we have seen, originally attributed to Prayer. But an opinion gradually grew up, fostered no doubt by the absence of an Invocation of the Holy Ghost in the Roman Canon, that the Words of Institution were the Form of EC. (b). By the time of the Schoolmen, this had come to be the recognised belief, and we find it reflected in their pages (e.g., Peter Lombard, Sentent., bk. 4, dist. 83; Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theol., pt. 3, q. 78, art. 1). One result of this was that, when Euch. ADORATION was introduced in the 12th and 13th cents., the Words of Institution became the centre of the whole service. Every effort was made to fasten attention on them by ringing bells, holding up lights, burning incense, and elevating for worship the elements believed to be just consecrated. (b) has ever since been the accepted faith of the Ch. of Rome, and is thus expressed in the Catechism of the Council of Trent: "We are taught by the holy Evangelists Matthew and Luke, and also by the Apostle, that the Form consists in these words, This is my body. . . . This Form of Consecr. was observed by Christ the Lord and has been perpetually used by the Catholic Ch." (pt. 2, c. 4, q. 19).

The Reformers had been brought up in Scholastic modes of thought. And, however much they came to differ from the Ch. of Rome in other respects, they continued to hold (b)— that the Words of Institution were the Form of EC. This is still the belief of the Lutheran and, with one exception mentioned below, the Calvinistic bodies. The Lutherans have moreover carried this belief to its logical issue; they have no Prayer of Consecration at all, the Celebrant merely reciting over the elements the Narrative and Words of Institution. The Established Church of Scotland has however adopted (ab). For in her DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP she enjoins that the Words of Institution be first read, and then pr. made to God the Father "so to sanctify these elements both of bread and wine, and to bless his own ordinance that," etc.

12. The Reformation.

The Ch. of Eng. before the Reformation used the Roman Canon, but an express Invocation of the Holy Ghost, "with thy Holy Spirit and Word vouchsafe to bless and sanctify these thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine," was introduced from some Eastern source into the First PB of 1549, though in the wrong place, before the Words of Institution. This great Liturgical gain was unfortunately omitted in the PB of 1552 through the influence of Bucer, though the Pr. which followed was retained in a somewhat altered form. And the wording of the Pr. of Consecr. has remained practically the same ever since 1552. Cosin's efforts in 1662 to have the Invocation re-inserted proving ineffectual. With regard to the doctrine of EC., canon 21 of 1604 and the rubric of 1662 both direct the use of the Words of Institution only for a fresh Consecr.; this points to (b). But the phrase "Prayer of Consecration," introduced in 1662, points to (a). We may thus fairly say that the Ch. of Eng. has left the question undecided.

12. The Anglican Communion.

Two of her sister churches have, however, adopted the Invocation. In the Scottish PB of 1637, the Invocation from the 1549 PB reappears. The Scottish Book at first met with little success, but was largely used after 1689 by the disestablished Episcopal Church. In the 18th cent. the Communion Office out of that Book was remodelled into a form more in accordance with the early Liturgies, and became what is called the Scottish Communion Office, which is still authorised by the Episcopal Ch. of Scotland to be used as an alternative to the Office in the English PB. In it the Invocation occupies its correct place—after the Words of Institution.

When the Amer. Ch. drew up her PB in 1789, she adopted (with some alterations) the Pr. of Consecr. out of the Scottish Communion Office.

and she thus consecrates by an express Invocation of the Holy Ghost. This feature of her services is very precious in the eyes of Amer. Churchmen, and one of her Bps. has declared that, in giving the primitive Form of EC., "Scotland gave us a greater boon than when she gave us the episcopate." One of the first results of any future revision of the English PB ought to be the adoption (at any rate as an alternative) of an Invocation of the Holy Ghost in the Pr. of Consecration. And for guidance we may well turn to the Amer. Church.

On the general subject: E. S. Foulkes, Primitive Consecration of the Eucharistic Oblation (fanciful, but suggestive); Edmund Bishop, The 14. Literature. Moment of Consecration (Appendix VI to Dom Connolly's Liturgical Homilies of Narsai, Texts and Studies, Cambridge, 1909); R. M. Woolley, The Liturgy of the Primitive Church, Cambridge, 1910; W. C. Bishop, The Primitive Form of Consecration of the Holy Eucharist, CQR, July, 1908; H. R. Gummey, The Consecration of the Eucharist, Philadelphia, 1908. On Scottish and Amer. Offices: see the last-named work; also Bp. Dowden, Historical Account of the Scottish Communion Office, Edinburgh, 1884.—H2. J. W. TYLER.

EVANGELIST—There appears to have been no special order of evangelist in the early Ch. In the NT the term is used generally of those who, whether ordained as St. Philip and St. Timothy or as laymen (Acts 8 4), preached the Gospel. There seems to have been in subapostolic times a large class of such men, who are described as apostles or prophets, side by side with the regular ordained clergy; and the word is used by Euseb. (HE. v. 10) of Pantaenus, the teacher of Clement of Alexandria, who went as a missionary to India. From the 4th cent. it became restricted to the writers of the four canonical gospels, though it is sometimes used of the reader of the Gospel in public worship. In recent years the title has been given, somewhat vaguely, to anyone doing mission work by preaching; but the Abps.' Regulations respecting Readers and other lay officers, § 14 (see MINOR ORDERS, READER), define an E. as a Reader who has been trained for a year at least at a recognised institution, has passed an examination, and has the necessary testimonials. His status is that of a Parochial or, in some cases, of a Diocesan Reader, and his commission may include all or any of their duties, but his work is "more that of a mission preacher than that of a regular assistant of the clergy." How far preaching, as commonly understood, is the most effective method of propaganda in our complex modern society, or how nearly it has reached the limit of its power, and whether more effective mission work is not done by schools (see CATECHIST), by literature and through the Press, by societies and organisations, are questions that have not been thought out in pastoral work with the same thoroughness that they have received in the political sphere, but in any case the work of laymen in such evangelisation must be large. (Cp. literature under MINOR ORDERS.)—A3. CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

EVE.—See EVEN.

EVEN or EVE.—The (complete) day before certain Holy-days. The PB rubric (1662) says that the Coll. for a Sunday or Holy-day which has a Vigil or Even is to be said at the evening service next bef., i.e., at the "First Evensong." This rule comes from the old custom of the day beginning with sunset, so that what we should call Saturday evening was "Sunday evening," as among the E. Syrians to-day, with whom (for example) the service on what we call "Sunday evening" is the ferial service of Monday. The PB tells us which festivals have "Vigils," but not those which have "Evens." It has been suggested that PB uses both words synonymously, which would mean that the Coll., e.g., for Michaelmas, was not to be used on the evening bef. But as the PB talks of "New Year's Eve" (Dec. 31), which is certainly not a vigil, this view is hardly tenable. As therefore the PB gives us no information, we must have recourse to pre-existing custom. According to the Pre-Reformation usage, which probably went on till 1662, Sundays and all our present Red-Letter or other Holy-days (we may omit Jan. 30, May 29, Nov. 5 as of more modern origin, and the days after Easter and Pentecost as not affecting the question) had evens except Ash Wed., Good Fr., Easter Even. On the evenings bef. these exceptional days, then, the Coll. should not be said. The three Holy-days after Christmas have, strictly speaking, no First Evensong, according to pre-Reformation usage; but their Collects would be said at the Evensong of the day bef. in addition to and aft. the Coll. for that day. Thus, on the evenings of Dec. 26, 27, there would be three Collects, that for Christmas coming last. Another Pre-Reformation rule appears now to be abolished, that, if a vigil had a Coll. of its own (e.g., Easter Even), that Coll. and not the Coll. of the festival was to be used at the Evensong; the PB rule makes no such exception. See also OCCURRENCE AND CONCURRENCE.—C3. A. J. MACLEAN.

EVENING COMMUNION.—It is clear that in St. Paul's day the Euch. was celebrated by the Ch. of Corinth in the evening at the

1. Primitive
Use. Agape (1 Cor. 11 21); and as long as this combination prevailed the evening (or very early dawn, Acts 20 11) must have been the usual hour. If Bp. Lightfoot's view be correct that Ignatius' phrase "ἀγᾶθη τοῦ εὐχέλ" (Ad Smyrn. 8) is equivalent to "celebrate," then the Euch. and Agape had not been separated in the Churches of Smyrna and Antioch in A.D. 115. St. Augustine, in his first letter to Januarius (Ep. 54 6), attributes the institution of the fast before Communion, which would involve the separation, to St. Paul's disciplinary action at Corinth (1 Cor. 11 34). And Pliny's letter to Trajan makes it clear that before A.D. 112 the custom of the Churches of Bithynia-Pontus was to celebrate in the morning (ante lucem) and to hold the Agape at a later hour, a practice which was almost universal by the end of the 2nd century.

The subsequent exceptions may be divided into (a) those which were survivals of primitive custom, and (b) those due to the

2. Exceptional
Uses. rigid character of fasting, which was held to be broken even by the reception of the Eucharist.

(a) Socrates (HE 5 22) says that the churches near Alexandria, and in the Thebaid, were accustomed to hold their gatherings on Saturday night, and partake of the mysteries after a banquet. The other example is a case rather of dramatisation than of survival. St. Augustine relates that some Churches in North Africa celebrated after supper on Maundy Thursday "that a more striking commemoration of the sacred event might be made" (Ep. 54 7).

This custom is recognised and tolerated by the Council of Hippo (A.D. 393) and the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397).

(b) Owing to the rigid nature of fasting, the practice arose of postponing the Celebration on week-days in Lent and other fast-days, on which, according to the Roman Missal, conventual High Mass shall be celebrated after None, or, in some cases, immediately before Evensong.

In the Church of England, the practice of communicating in the evening is of comparatively recent origin. In November, 1852, the Leeds Ruridecanal Chapter, under Dr. Hook, proposed Evening Celebrations, with a view to meeting the needs of working-class populations, and the practice was adopted in other places. It has been strongly opposed on the ground that it involves a breach of the rule of the Fast before Communion, which was for many centuries universally observed by the whole Church, and for other more sentimental reasons. [See further, FASTING COMMUNION, and for the validity of such rules cp. ORDER.]—B2.

M. LINTON SMITH.

EVENING PRAYER.—See COMMON PRAYER.

EVENSONG.—See COMMON PRAYER, § 12.

EXAMINATION.—From the earliest days one of the gravest responsibilities of a bp. has been the testing of ordinands as to their fitness for the ministry (1 Tim. 5 22; 3rd Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, c. 22; cp. 1st Ember Prayer and Questions in Consecration of Bishops). The fitness includes moral uprightness, spiritual capacity and learning.

In the primitive Church we find allusions to several methods of "proving" men. Such are the direct witness of the Holy Spirit speaking through a "prophet" (Acts 13 2; 1 Tim. 4 14; Clem. Rom., Ad Cor., c. 42); the attestation of the Church (Acts 6 3, 16 2; Clem. Rom., Ad Cor. 44; Cyprian, Ep. 38 1); and esp. the bp.'s personal knowledge of his men (e.g., 2 Tim. 1 5, 3 15; cp. 1 Tim. 3 1-13, Tit. 1 5-9).

Quite early it became the custom for the bp. to gather about him a band of young men, whose training consisted in the common life with him and the education he gave them, together with pastoral work done under his supervision while passing through the Minor Orders, until he judged them worthy of the diaconate and presbyterate (so at Rome in 4th cent., Ep. Siricii ad Himerum 9). In 531 a Council of Toledo (cap. 1) required that ordinands should reside under supervision of their bp. in a house attached to the cathedral ch. A more advanced education in theology was supplied by the schools attached to famous teachers such as Justin Martyr at Rome, Irenæus in S. Gaul, and especially the great Schools of Alexandria, Antioch, Edessa: but these affected only the élite of the Church's scholars.

From the 5th cent. the monasteries became great training schools for the clergy, but the close personal touch with the bp. was still preserved. In England, St. Peter's, Canterbury, under Theodore; Lindisfarne under Aidan (Bede, HE 3 3-5); Whitby (ib., 4 23); Wearmouth-

Jarrow; York under Egbert; and Sherborne under Aldhelm are conspicuous instances. On the Continent, Charlemagne further organised clerical education by establishing two grades of institutions: (a) for boys, a school in each parish under the vicar, (b) for higher education, a school at each cathedral and abbey. The outlines of this system are still preserved in the petit and grand séminaires, ordered by the Council of Trent to be established in every diocese. The subjects of sacred study at Charlemagne's schools were the Bible, the Fathers, Church Ritual (i.e., Liturgies, etc.), Plainsong, and Church Discipline. Apart from personal knowledge, the bps. probably accepted ordinands on the recommendation of these institutions. The first formal examination of which we hear is in the 9th cent., when Hincmar, Abp. of Rheims, used to test his candidates as to their ability to say off by heart the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Mass, and to read with fluency St. Paul's Epistles. In the 12th cent. the rise of the Universities brought about important changes. In England, Oxford and Cambridge became the chief schools for training the clergy, and their degrees were accepted by the bps. as sufficient security for the intellectual standard of ordinands.

At the Reformation it was contemplated (esp. by Lord Bacon) that this should be supplemented by a clerical seminary attached to each cathedral, but the only seminary actually established was one at Salisbury founded by Bp. Burnet. At the same time, the qualifications were defined in the Pref. to the Ordinal: the ordinand is to be "a man of virtuous conversation and without crime," and "learned in the Latin tongue and sufficiently instructed in Holy Scripture" [see further, ORDINAL]. The canons go into fuller detail (can. 34).

No person is to be admitted to Holy Orders except he "hath taken some degree of school in either of the said Universities (i.e., Oxford or Cambridge), or at the least . . . be able to yield an account of his faith in Latin according to the Articles of Religion . . . and to confirm the same by sufficient testimonies out of the Holy Scriptures; and except moreover he shall then exhibit Letters Testimonial of his good life and conversation under the seal of some College of Cambridge or Oxford where before he remained, or of 3 or 4 grave ministers, together with the subscription and testimony of other credible persons who have known his life and behaviour by the space of 3 years next before." These last requirements are still in force: the testimonials from the College and from 3 (beneficed) clergy are both required. They are further supplemented by the Si quis, which occupies the same place with regard to ordination as banns to matrimony. The three testimonials represent the primitive consent of clergy and laity to the ordination. Canon 35 requires that the bp. shall "diligently examine him in the presence of those ministers that shall assist him at the imposition of hands; and if the said bp. have any lawful impediment he shall cause the said ministers carefully to examine every such person to be so ordered." It goes on to order that these examiners shall be of "his cathedral church, if they may . . . be had"—or "other sufficient preachers of the same diocese to the number of 3 at the least." A bp. contravening these regulations may be suspended from ordaining for two years by the abb. By canon 49 (cp. also Ordination of Deacons) an ordained person may not preach except he be licensed after examination by the bp. as "a sufficient or convenient preacher"—otherwise he may only read the Homilies (without gloss or addition).

The system of examining chaplains thus instituted has become universal. The subjects in detail and the method of examination were left to the discretion of the bp. During the 18th cent. the standard grew very lax indeed. The merit of raising it rests largely with Bps. Jebb (Limerick, 1822-33) and Samuel Wilberforce (Oxford and Winchester, 1845-73). Bp. Jebb's list of subjects (see Forster, Life of Bp. Jebb, pp. 178 ff.) was much the same as at present day. As well as answering the set questions the candidates were required to furnish written analyses of the books set them. The bp. personally examined them in their "manner of reading the Liturgy." The whole examination was intended by him "to kindle and diffuse in his men a lifelong spirit of professional study." The time of the E. was the Ember Week: it was not till after 1850 that the present practice of putting the E. some weeks earlier than the ordination was introduced. The revival in the 19th cent. of training schools for the clergy has had an important influence upon the examinations. For convenience of their work, they pleaded for more uniformity amongst the dioceses as to choice of subjects and standard required. The result was the institution in 1875 of the Preliminary Examination for Holy Orders (conducted originally by the Theological Faculty at Cambridge, but since extended to other Universities). As a rule, bps. require non-graduates to take this examination. Some bps. accept it in lieu of their own Diocesan Examination. In 1886 the English bps. agreed that the special subjects of the Universities Preliminary should be adopted for each Diocesan Examination also: and that in all dioceses the general subjects should be: contents of Bible; Creeds and Articles; Prayer Book. In 1892 the bps. in Convocation provided a central examination (called Central Entrance Examination) for non-graduate candidates previous to entrance into a theological college. Its purpose is to test the general knowledge of the candidate and it is of a very elementary character.

At the present time considerable dissatisfaction is expressed with the present method of episcopal Es., esp. with regard to (a) the inequality of standard in different dioceses, (b) the separation of the examining staff from the teaching work. Two lines of reform are suggested: (1) a Central E. for all candidates in the more academic subjects, supplemented by a Diocesan E. on the more immediately pastoral work; (2) a decentralising of examination by allowing the theological colleges to follow each its own system of training and examining, subject to supervision by a Central Council, and supplemented as before by a Diocesan Examination (see CQR, 1910, July, pp. 343 f., Oct., pp. 136-9).

For early and mediæval period: Zschokke, Die theol. Studien u. Anstalten der kath. Kirche in Oesterreich, 1894, pt. I; Braun, Geschichte der Heranbildung des Klerus (1889-97); Westcott, Cathedral Foundations (in Howson, Essays on Cathedrals) 1872; Pusey, Prospective and past benefits of Cathedral Institutions (1833). On modern Roman methods: Icard, Traditions des Prêtres de St. Sulpice (1886). On Anglican methods: Prentiss, Union Theol. Sem. of New York (1899); Handbook of Theol. Colleges of Ch. of England (1885 onwards); Report of Committee appointed by the Abps. on Supply and Training of Candidates for Holy Orders (1908); Report of Committee of Bps. on Training of Non-Graduate Candidates (1905); Stitt, Regulations for Ordination (1904); and arts. in Cont. Rev. (vol. 35), Journal of Sacred Lit. (vol. 12), Brit. Quar. (no. 52), CQR (vols. 19, 20, and July and Oct., 1910).—re.

S. C. GAYFORD.

EXARCH.—In Greek a title signifying any ruler. It was used in the Councils of the 5th cent. indiscriminately of metropolitans and patriarchs. In later usage it was confined to the occupants of certain greater sees, as Ephesus, Thessalonica and Caesarea, who had the privileges, without the title, of PATRIARCH. In modern times it has been given to the administrative heads of some national Churches in the East, as of the Bulgarians (Suicer, Thes., s.v.).—T3.

T. A. LACEY.

EXCHANGE OF LIVINGS requires the concurrence of (a) the incumbents concerned, (b) the patrons of both livings, (c) the bps. of both dioceses. Such exchanges are difficult to arrange upon a voluntary basis, from the great inequality of the values of benefices and from other causes. But an E. between town and country incumbents is often beneficial to both parishes.—T4. G. HARFORD.

EXCOMMUNICATION.—By the 33rd Art. (see text under ARTICLES OF RELIGION), "open denunciation" of "excommunicate persons" was to be made in parish church and cathedral during the Ante-Communion Service, after the recital of the Nicene Creed. It is to be noticed that these provisions only applied to E. by a competent court, after citation of the offender and monition to him,¹ and the terms of canons 65 and 68 (taken with the "Forme of the sentence of E.," appended to the canons of 1571) show further that the "greater E." (see below) is intended.² To a man so sentenced Christian burial was not to be denied unless his crime were

¹ Even where the law provides that an offender is by a certain offence "ipso facto excommunicate" (e.g., 5-6 Edw. VI, c. 4, and canons 2-12, 73), it is implied that proof of the factum shall first have been made and a declaratory sentence given by a competent eccles. court.

² So Lyndwode, i. 18 78 (1679), "Nam Excommunicatio simpliciter prolata intelligitur de majori."

"grievous and notorious;" and there were "no man able to testify to his repentance" (canon 68). This earlier law governs the present rubric (of the year 1662) in the Burial Service.

There were two forms in which this discipline was imposed on offenders: (a) the lesser E., whereby they were deprived of the sacraments of the Ch. and the divine offices; (b) the greater E., by which, in addition, the faithful were forbidden to consort with or comfort them, on pain of themselves incurring the lesser Excommunication.

E., devised in order to punish offences against religion and morals, was soon extended to those wherein the secular rights and privileges of the Ch. or of men in Orders were invaded;¹ and eccles. courts were very largely occupied with these demands for pecuniary redress.

From an early period, E., with the civil consequences described below, was the only sanction by which such courts could enforce obedience. The non-appearance of a defendant or his failure to answer after appearance, his non-fulfilment of a sentence, or non-payment of costs, were all treated as contempts that authorised Excommunication.

Civil Consequences. Blackstone (Comm. 3 102) states the English Common Law, as it was in 1768: "An excommunicated person is disabled to do any act, that is required to be done by one that is probus et legalis homo. He cannot serve upon juries, cannot be a witness in any court, and cannot bring an action."

If the offender remained forty days under sentence of E., his diocesan bp. might certify the fact in chancery (see SIGNIFICAVIT), with a prayer for the imprisonment of the offender "according to the ancient custom of the realm"; and thereupon the sovereign's writ issued commanding the sheriff to arrest and imprison him until he was reconciled to the Ch. and such reconciliation certified by the bp.

Statute 53 Geo. III, c. 127, substituted for E. in all such cases of contempt a decree pronouncing the offender contumacious, and signifying his contempt in the same way as E. used to be signified, all other proceedings being the same. While formally preserving E. as a spiritual censure in definitive sentences, the Act (ss. 2, 3) fixed the maximum term of imprisonment at six months, and provided that "no person who shall be so pronounced . . . excommunicate shall incur any civil penalty or incapacity whatever" (except imprisonment, if any). See also 2-3 Will. IV, c. 93.

As a matter of fact, while several imprisonments (chiefly in ritual cases) have taken place under s. 1 since the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, it is believed that the procedure de excommunicato capiendo under ss. 2, 3 is entirely obsolete.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

EXHORTATION.—The word Exh. covers all addresses in which the Minister, in prescribed terms, calls the people either to the due performance of acts of worship or generally to Christian duty. The principal Exhortations are the following:

¹ We find the lesser excommunication in cases of taking away the goods of a church, intruding into benefices and denying of tithes, as well as in those of making privy marriage contracts, and maintaining schism and conventicles. And the greater excommunication was applied in cases of depriving the minister of grass or trees in the churchyard, as well as of hindering a man from making a will, of assaulting a priest in church, and of bigamy. By Stat. 5-6 Edw. VI, c. 4, E. is the punishment prescribed for a violent assault in a ch. or churchyard.

1. The Address, beginning Dearly beloved Brethren, after the "Sentences of the Scriptures" which open MP and EP. This first appeared in 1552. Then, and in 1559, it was printed for MP only, but a rubric prescribed the Sentences and Exh. for use at the beginning "likewise of Evening Prayer." In 1662 Sentences and Exh. appeared in full in both places. This ministerial appeal for the public confession of sin as a Scriptural exordium to public worship is not without ancient precedent in the Euch. and other Offices of Gaul and Spain.¹ Perhaps a more immediate suggestion came to our Reformers from the Service Book of Calvin, translated into Latin and published early in 1552 by Valerand Pullain, pastor of the Flemish exiles at Glastonbury. But no close parallel in words appears between his opening and ours.

2. The Exh. in HC, beginning Dearly beloved, on—day next I purpose. In substance, this appears in "The Order of the Communion," 1548, and it stands almost unaltered in the Book of 1549, but prefaced with a rubric providing that "if upon the Sunday or holy-day the people be negligent to come to the Communion, then shall the priest earnestly exhort his parishioners to dispose themselves to the receiving of the Holy Communion more diligently, saying these or like words unto them." (In 1548 the Exh. was for normal use, "at the least one day before," and the priest was to say "as hereafter followeth, or such like.") In 1552 the corresponding Exh. was to be "sometime said also, at the discretion of the Curate." In 1662 the Exh. and its rubric were brought to their present form.

